The loss of the Rt. Rev. James A. McFaul, Bishop of Trenton, is a great blow to the Church in America. One of those strong, practical, democratic prelates who have contributed so much to the virile Catholic piety of the country, he was in touch with his people at every stage of his career. He passed through every phase of sacerdotal life, and rose to high office, wearing for the last twenty-three years of his life the mantle of the successors of the Apostles, but to the very end he remained, like Pius X, preeminently a pastor of souls. The years of his priesthood were the mystical forty of Holy Scripture; for almost two decades and a half he bore the burden of crozier and miter, and through all that period he was indefatigable in labor, humble in thought, kind of heart, gentle with his priests, compassionate with his people, ever preaching the good tidings of salvation.

He exerted a remarkable influence in his State in all that concerned Catholic interests, and this he did, not by agitation, but by sound counsel, intimate knowledge of affairs, and the confidence which his integrity and wisdom inspired; he organized with the now Archbishop Messmer of Milwaukee the American Federation of Catholic Societies, which has a membership of over 2,000,000 and is the largest united body within the Church; he administered his diocese with rare prudence, a task which called for much skill on account of its polyglot population; and not only did he put it on an excellent financial basis, but enriched it with many churches and institutions of learning. Yet in the midst of these many activities he was tireless with his pen, and wrote many pastorals, which, aside from their solid doctrine and literary finish, showed his people with fearless and uncompromising candor just where Catholics stood on the various questions of the day. Perhaps the best way to sum up his lifework is to say that he was at all times and on all occasions what God ordained him to be, a zealous, clear-sighted, courageous shepherd of men.

The Shield Against the Beast

OUT of the pitiable story of New York's most recent murder, one lesson arises, not indeed connected with the innocent victim, but worthy of much consideration. It is the old, old lesson, never learned by some, that the first duty of fathers and mothers is to take care of their children.

For the benefit of the general public, investigators now report what is to them and to all lovers of the young, a bitter, never-ending story. Our nightly streets, the beaten trails of human vampires, are filled with boys and girls in their teens. Resorts of cheap and dangerous amusements, dance-halls, refreshment-parlors, even our public parks and breathing-spaces are their rendezvous, unknown to heedless parents but profitable marts for traders in the honor and lives of our boys and girls. That the unhappy victims are not exclusively the children of the poor, is a fact borne out by experience. In all ranks of society, unfortunately, there are parents devoid of that protective instinct which even the brute of the field never loses, and all ranks contribute their quota.

But care for the child does not mean that he is to be immersed in sex-hygiene, that panacea of the yellow journalist and the saffron sociologist; much less, that he is to be given the run of a library equipped exclusively with "sexional" book-cases. It does mean, however, and it insists, that the child be taught from the beginning the saving virtue of Christian modesty. Viewing the garb, the posture, the language, the customs of some young people who pass as well-bred Christians, the clergyman and even the hardened social-worker, must ask in frank amazement, if some of our presumably Catholic mothers are bent on bringing their daughters to shame and disgrace. "Fashion" is a poor excuse. It is no consoler when disgrace comes, and at the bar of eternal justice before which these criminally negligent parents must one day stand, it means the sentence of hell.

Today as never, perhaps, since the pagan era which called vice virtue, are our children exposed to the claws of the beast. Without modesty, no child, particularly no young girl is safe. With it, the first advances which end in ruin of body and soul for the flirt, for the girl who "lives her own life," who "can take care of herself," are effectively averted. Youth's most obvious lack is intelligent choice. It is folly to picture evil, in the hope that it will be instinctively rejected. Evil has its lure; youth cannot see that its gold is tinsel, and its end destruction. Modern sociology may know nothing of original sin; the human heart knows much. Show our boys and girls the beauty of whatsoever things are good, and there is hope, well-founded, that their feet may be kept unfaltering in the paths of purity.

Free Speech and Treason

THE barking dog, we are told, never bites, but he can be an intolerable nuisance. If kind measures cannot cure, the neighborhood is justified in requesting his removal to the city pound, where discord is the rule. The events of the last few weeks, following close upon the military registration law, indicate that a few canines, hitherto allowed shelter in our hospitable land, are engaged in barking at citizens who have volunteered to defend their country. The United States Marshal in New York, a long-suffering person, is now busily engaged in transferring the barkers to the Government's pound. He has no intention of interfering with free speech, he announces, but he does not believe that anyone is free to preach disloyalty.

Under circumstances somewhat similar a great man once wrote:

> Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert? This is none the less injurious when effected by getting a father or brother, or friend into a public meeting, and there working upon his feelings till he is persuaded to write the soldier boy that he is fighting in a bad cause, for a wicked administration of a contemptible government, too weak to arrest and punish him if he shall desert. I think that in such a case, to silence the agitator and save the boy is not only constitutional, but, withal, a great mercy.

Until recently, one might with impunity preach in the streets of New York that our soldiers were enlisted "in a bad cause, for a wicked administration of a contemptible government." We have been too tolerant in this country. Henceforth the once-despised "contemptible government" will suppress this anarchy with a firm hand.

As for the man who wrote the words quoted above, it may be pertinent to know that his name was Abraham Lincoln, and that they were addressed in 1863 to certain defenders of Vallandigham in the city of New York.

Invisible Government

AFTER a sharp legal battle, decision has been rendered, that in appointing a "business manager," the New York Board of Education plainly exceeded its powers under the Charter. The incident is local but it contains a lesson on invisible government, which other communities now flirting with the moneyed foundations will do well to ponder.

As appears from the record, the "business manager" was elected by a strict administration party vote. The choice was immediately contested, in the only feasible manner. A tax-payer's suit was filed, praying an injunction restraining the City Comptroller from paying the new official's salary, and a temporary injunction, since made permanent, was granted. This action of the court, however, left matters precisely as they were, for "private parties" immediately announced that they themselves would pay the manager's salary. In other words, the authority of the State, from which the law-abiding citizen sought relief, was set completely at naught.

Is there anything, either in the charters or in the purposes of our larger foundations, which can restrain them from employing their huge financial resources on a larger scale, to the complete break-down of normal government? It is not easy to answer this question, for the foundations are, in effect, secret societies. Keen beyond measure in the critical analysis of other agencies, these plutocratic organizations resent nothing more bitterly than any attempt to bring before the public a complete record of their own activities. Only under threat of revocation of charter was the State of New York able, some months ago, to order a public hearing, and even then the information secured was but meager. Furthermore, it obtained hardly a line of publicity in the New York press. The "lid was on"; riveted and clamped.

Perhaps the war would be as good a time as any other, to teach our stocks-and-bonds foundations that a government within a government is a thing incompatible with democracy. The relief of birds in Louisiana, and the elimination of the hookworm in Alabama are worthy objects, no doubt, but they cost too much if the price is invisible government.

The Flag and the Crucifix

HEROISM and courtesy go hand in hand, especially in Belgium. Another instance of the old truth has been furnished by Baron Moncheur, the head of the Belgian War Mission now visiting the United States. Replying to the words of official welcome extended to his countrymen, he said that they were trembling with hope at the assurance of America's solemn determination to help in the restoration of Belgium to her rightful place among the nations, and he added, with an inspired utterance that went to the heart of our highest aspirations, that the eyes of his people were fixed confidently on the "Starry Banner which has become more than ever the symbol of strength placed at the service of the highest and noblest principles." His words which constitute one of the most graceful compliments ever paid to the national emblem, are in striking contrast to those spoken mostly by aliens who are advocating a policy which would make our flag a sign of cowardice and weakness and neglect of duty. They are so true and so forceful that they make comment superfluous. To Catholics, however, they suggest another reflection which M. Viviani and his associates would do well to ponder.

We are gratified to learn that the American flag flying over the fields of Flanders will encourage stricken Belgium. Not long ago we were proud to hear from Marshal Joffre that that same flag would have a similar inspiring effect on tired Frenchmen, as soon as it is seen beside the tattered tricolor. Both countries may surely count on America to make the Stars and Stripes not merely a sign of hope but a source of strength.

But we should have much more confidence in the efficacy of our assistance, if we did not remember that M. Viviani had grossly insulted the sublimest of all symbols of hope and strength, the Cross with its sacred figure of the bleeding Christ. The ex-Premier, it is true, will be powerless to take the crucifix from American hands, nor can he wrest it from the hearts of his own countrymen. Neither can he alter the fact that the spectacle of Divine self-sacrifice was the hidden source of power that made Belgium a martyr to heroic duty, and keeps her, though wounded almost to death, decimated and devastated, still sublimely undaunted and unafraid. Honor paid to our flag fires the soul of every American with grateful enthusiasm, but dishonor shown to the crucifix, the testimony of the most generous love of man recorded in history, and the inspiration of all who are brave and generous to forget themselves in the interests of others, grieves the hearts of all Christians. Belgium's tribute to our flag leaves nothing to be desired; the tribute given by the officialdom of France is somewhat tainted. France's heart is not altogether right with ours when it allows its minister to insult our King of Kings.

The Food Controller

AS presented by Mr. Hoover, the question at issue in the Food Control bill is simple. Shall the food speculator be allowed to imperil the country? On the extent of power to be vested in the Controller, there may well be honest difference of opinion; but it is difficult to see anything but crass stupidity in the contention that no governmental control whatever is called for. The Administration repudiates the assumption of a dictatorship, and, as the President wrote some weeks ago, honest commercialism has nothing to fear from the legislation sought from Congress. On the other hand, every check upon the unscrupulous trader is an asset to the honest dealer. With its tremendous resources of all kinds, the United States can successfully undertake the heavy burden of the present war, provided always, that these resources be properly developed and wisely husbanded. Not unlimited, with prudent management they will prove amply sufficient.

Nor is there a trace of "paternalism" in the proposed legislation, much less of Socialism. It is the right and duty of the State to protect the citizen in those matters in which he is unable to act for himself, and in the unsettled conditions inevitably attendant upon war, this duty becomes doubly imperative. Mr. Hoover is authority for the statement that in the one item of flour, speculators have reaped an illegal harvest, during the last five months, of nearly two hundred and fifty million dollars. We are now confronted with the paradox, due in no small measure to these ghouls, "that with the greatest output in the history of the nation, we have the highest prices."

The correction of conditions so intolerable is plainly beyond the power of private individuals or associations. Frugality on the part of every citizen will help, but cannot completely rectify them. When private energy reaches the end of its resources, it is no arrogance of power for the Government to assume control.

Love's Revelation

LOVE did it this time and did it well, God be praised! What? Tore the mask from the face of another "professional Catholic" and exposed the venerable features of a woman wreathed in smiles over the possession of a brand-new boy-mate bestowed upon her, last Good Friday, by a country squire or justice of the peace in the romantic State of Vermont. Even so? Surely such events have happened before and will happen again. Quite true, but this is a very significant occurrence. The woman is a Catholic: all her life she has carried about with her tom-toms, a trumpet and a spotlight to attract attention to her Catholicism, especially at the psychological moment when the influence of Catholics was needed for her advancement. A few years since she or her many satellites or her press-agent filled this country with clamor, because, forsooth, bigotry had accomplished her defeat for the presidency of the National Educational Association. She posed not only as a Catholic but as a martyr for the Faith, and simple folk, ignorant of the badge of her tribe, believed her raucous protestations and hastened to pour into her wounded soul the oil of love and the wine of pity. Now they have their reward, those priests and lay-folk who spoke fair words of her and harsh words of the "bigots" who humiliated her on account of her tender attachment to the Church. Their heroine has proved herself. Reversing the role of young Lochinvar, she hopped into a "flivver" last Good Friday, and out of devotion to the Sacred Passion and to the law of the Church as embodied into the "Ne Temere," rushed a Catholic youth of twenty-four blushing summers and as many coy winters into the presence of a justice of the peace who forthwith pronounced them man and wife according to the Vermont formula.

"There wasn't time for a church ceremony," so the squire helped out. There is the sum and substance of this devout Catholic's speculative and practical theology on matrimony. And that is the point to be insisted upon. The woman in question is neither here nor there. Despite her continued accessibility to reporters she will soon pass out of sight; now that she has publicly revealed herself, her factitious notoriety will wane. But her bad example may have an immediate effect. That public and dramatic violation of a law of the Church, of which this "movie" woman was guilty, is a grave scandal, and as such deserves the severest condemnation, if for no other reason, in order to vindicate a sacred principle and to prevent, if may be, imitation of her action, on the part of weak and giddy girls.

For the rest there is sore need of a repetition of this scene:

> And he found in the temple them that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money setting. And when he had made, as it were, a scourge of little cords, he drove them all out of the temple, the sheep also and the oxen, and the money of the changers he poured out, and the tables he overthrew. And to them that sold doves he said: Take these things hence and make not the house of my Father a house of traffic.

While Catholics are awaiting in hope this repetition, the woman whose action occasioned these remarks is advised to read a translation of the "Ne Temere," even though she may have lately evoked the ministrations of a priest.

Literature

EACH HIS OWN ANTHOLOGIST

THOSE who amuse themselves by reading the queries put to the editor of a paper's literary department often have occasion to marvel no less at the meager poetical value of the "gems" sought for, than at the obviousness of the answers that the questions deserve. "Will some one kindly supply me," writes W. K., "with the second line of the stirring poem which begins, 'How doth the little busy bee?'" "I have been searching high and low," writes "Perplexed," "for the text of a soothing hymn my nurse used to love. 'Sing a song of sixpence,' it ran. Can any of your readers help me find it?" "I am eager to copy into my scrapbook," writes another subscriber, "the poem containing the pathetic verses:

> "He thought of his childhood, left far, far behind,
> That blissful and innocent state," but most of the cantos have escaped my failing memory. Will some one kindly name the author?" "Was it Dante Gabriel Rossetti or William Morris who wrote the musical ballad of which the haunting refrain is 'Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese'?" "Could you tell me on what occasion Lord Beaconsfield—or was it Lord Lytton?—improvised the moving lines:

> 'It may have been right to dissemble your love
> But why did you kick me down stairs?'"

Those who ask a weary literary editor such questions as the foregoing, it is safe to say, are the makers of their own anthologies. They are hoarding up voluminous scrapbooks filled with clippings and transcripts which are the fruit of long and patient perusals of "poet's corners," "Gems of Literature," "keepsakes" and poetasters' first volumes. Yards and yards of commonplace verse which once "appealed to" the sentimental anthologists are thus preserved, diligence rather than judgment being the collectors' most striking characteristic.

To make for oneself a true anthology, however, by selecting and binding together flowers of poesy that are exceptionally fair and fragrant, while a profitable and praiseworthy enterprise, is by no means free from perils and difficulties, for the skill to distinguish true poetry from mere verse is a sure test of one's correctness of taste and literary discernment. The publisher of a new anthology, therefore, is a brave man, for critics are always quick to point out his lapses in judgment and take malignant pleasure in enumerating all the "flowers" which in their opinion should have had no place in the bouquet, and in naming all the other blossoms which should of course be there but have been stupidly left out.

Nevertheless the Hon. Stephen Coleridge has had the courage to offer the critical public a new anthology of his selection which he calls "An Evening in My Library Among the English Poets" (Lane). The volume is made up of the poems by British and American authors which he likes best, and in prose passages that bind the selections together. Mr. Coleridge comments on the poems and poets of his predilection and tells us what guided his choice.

For the most part our anthologist gives praise to the poets who deserve it, is happy in his selections and judicious in his remarks. He does not limit his commendation to the works of the master-singers only, but finds bright flowers in the gardens of the minor poets too. Most readers will doubtless share Mr. Coleridge's fondness for Austin Dobson's "Sign of the Lyre," a volume of eighteenth-century vignettes, in which the poet's sweet and simple "Phyllida" is contrasted with the haughty, affected "Ladies of St. James's," and "Monsieur the Curé" is charmingly described thus:

> Monsieur the Curé down the street
> Comes with his kind old face,
> With his coat worn bare and his straggling hair,
> And his green umbrella-case.
>
> You may see him pass by the little "Grande Place,"
> And the tiny "Hôtel de Ville";
> He smiles as he goes, to the fleuriste Rose,
> And the pompier Théophile.
>
> He turns, as a rule, through the "Marché" cool
> Where the noisy fishwives call;
> And his compliment pays to the "belle Thérèse,"
> As she knits in her dusky stall.
>
> There's a letter to drop at the locksmith's shop,
> And Toto, the locksmith's niece,
> Has jubilant hopes, for the Curé gropes
> In his tails for a pain d'épice.
>
> There's a little dispute with a merchant of fruit,
> Who is said to be heterodox,
> That will ended be with a "Ma foi, oui!"
> And a pinch from the Curé's box.
>
> There is also a word that no one heard
> To the furrier's daughter Lou;
> And a pale cheek fed with a flickering red,
> And a "Bon Dieu garde M'sieu!"
>
> But a grander way for the Sous-préfet,
> And a bow for Ma'am'selle Anne;
> And a mock "Off-hat" to the Notary's cat,
> And a nod to the Sacristan.

For ever through life the Curé goes
With a smile on his kind old face—
With his coat worn bare and his struggling hair,
And his green umbrella-case.

This is a pretty epitaph Mr. Coleridge finds in Miss Jenkins's poems:

Father, forget not, now that we must go,
A little one in alien earth low laid;
Send some kind angel when Thy trumpets blow
Lest he should wake alone, and be afraid.

And here are two stanzas by Sir Henry Newbolt that our soldiers should now make their own:

To set the cause above renown,
To love the game beyond the prize,
To honor, while you strike him down,
The foe that comes with fearless eyes:

To count the life of battle good,
And dear the land that gave you birth,
And dearer yet the brotherhood
That binds the brave of all the earth.

Mr. Coleridge's selections from American poets do not always seem to be particularly discerning. For instance, we do not take Ella Wheeler Wilcox at all seriously, and the stanzas by William Winter that Mr. Coleridge quotes hardly rise above the commonplace. Catholics may feel that our anthologist is a little unfair to Francis Thompson, but they will endorse heartily what he says about Walt Whitman, and the just strictures passed on Omar Khayyám whom Mr. Coleridge describes: "Sitting in a lonely place doing nothing himself, and telling everybody else that it is no use to do anything." "When to this sterile and monotonous doctrine of negation," he concludes, "there is added a recommendation to seek consolation in frequent cups of wine, we shall do well to choose another guide to life, however musically, and with however stately a diction, the bibulous advice is given."

After the model set by Mr. Coleridge, perhaps other lovers of poetry could profitably make for themselves an anthology of favorite poems. The collection would of course be for the anthologist's private perusal, not for publication. Not for publication, be it noted again. No, it needn't come to that! Few collectors in all probability will be found who can help showing each newly chosen poetical flower to a bored but discreet friend or two. But by sufficient fasting and prayer most amateur anthologists can surely secure the grace to avoid publishing their collections.

Let this then be the method of procedure for every man who would be his own anthologist: When you chance upon a poem you think you like, note it well, lay it aside and take it up again another day. Then read the poem carefully once more and see if you like it still. If you do, ask yourself why, for perhaps the reasons for your admiration are not based on sound criticism and correct taste, so you should not really like the selection at all. Be independent in your judgments. Do not admire a set of verses merely because others do, but learn for yourself to discern in them what is admirable owing to its beauty of rhythm, thought or expression. Whatever the world's best critics have always considered a masterpiece is likely to have in it something worthy of admiration. Try to find what it is.

When the poem under scrutiny has passed these tests, snip or copy it out and place it in your collection. If the book that is used has pages that can be easily removed, it would be a convenience. Then write after the poem selected the reasons that led you to include it among your flowers of poesy. Thus the growing volume will become both a record of the compiler's progress in literary discernment and a fragrant anthology which, as the years go by, can be read with ever-increasing profit and pleasure.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

THE MOTHER'S HELPER

I love all my children far more than I thought to.
They do everything just the way that they ought to,
And the ones that can talk say their prayers as they're taught to.
But still every night as I sit at my sewing,
My mind turned adrift on its own pleasures going,
Underneath my wild thoughts is a steady prayer flowing:
"St. Brigid, please keep
My babies asleep!"

St. Christopher helps me when forth I am faring,
St. Rita assists me when things are past bearing,
But the care of my children St. Brigid is sharing.
They are wilful and happy and dear beyond measure.
No riches could equal the worth of my treasure.
But in spite of my love and my pride and my pleasure,
"St. Brigid, please keep My babies asleep!"

ALINE KILMER.

REVIEWS

Thomas Maurice Mulry. By THOMAS F. MEEHAN. New York: The Encyclopedia Press, Inc. $1.50.

This memoir of a great Vincentian, which Mr. Thomas F. Meehan, of AMERICA's staff, has written, should make a wide appeal to the Catholics of this country. For as a man and as a citizen the late Thomas M. Mulry was a sterling example of the type of Catholic layman we need nowadays. The fact that four of his children became religious speaks eloquently for the character of his home-life, and the following letter, written to his daughter, shows how loath he was to become a mere politician:

> So you were not a bit disappointed when your father threw away all chances of becoming Mayor of New York? . . . I detest political life and dread political office. . . . The work of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul gives me plenty of business and I have always determined to allow nothing to interfere with that work. I am now looked upon as a rare species of man, one who absolutely refuses office, and I have the pity of many who feel that I am somewhat demented.

The only public office Mr. Mulry ever accepted was that of delegate to the New York State Constitutional Convention in 1915, and that he undertook in order to defend the private charitable institutions of New York against the attacks of the "Charity Trust." But the mere enumeration of the offices he held in connection with the presidency of the Superior Council of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, and as head of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank, fill several paragraphs of this memoir, and no citizens' committee for the furthering of any charitable work was considered complete unless it included the name of Thomas M. Mulry. It is as a devoted Vincentian, however, that he will be longest remembered. From the day in 1872, when as a youth of seventeen he joined the Conference of St. Bernard's parish, New York, until he died last year the President of the reorganized Superior Council of the United States, he was first, last and always a model St. Vincent de Paul man. The "Ozanam of America," some called him, and the title was not undeserved, for there is no form of Catholic relief-work in which he did not take an active interest, and the promotion of the movement for the spread of Ozanam clubs for boys was particularly dear to the heart of Mr. Mulry.

The countless friends and admirers of this great Vincentian will perhaps find the most interesting chapter in the memoir to be the hearty and enthusiastic tributes to Mr. Mulry's personal character which Mr. Meehan has gathered together and which come from such eminent men as Cardinal Gibbons, Theodore Roosevelt, and Count d'Hendecourt. Mr. Mulry's "Papers and Addresses" which make up a good half of the volume prove how thoroughly he understood the theory and practice of Vincentian relief-work. In preparing the memoir Mr. Meehan has drawn once more upon that wide and deep knowledge of Catholic New York's history of which he has repeatedly shown himself the master.

W. D.

Early European History. By HUTTON WEBSTER, Ph.D. New York: D. C. Heath & Co.

Ancient Times: A History of the Early World. An Introduction to the Study of Ancient History and the Career of Early Man. By JAMES HENRY BREASTED, Ph.D. New York: Ginn & Co.

Here are two history text-books. The author of the first, who is Professor of History in the University of Nebraska, takes the reader from prehistoric times down to the Peace of Westphalia, A. D., 1648, thus covering not only all ancient history, European or Asiatic, that serves as a groundwork for European civilization, but the entire medieval and Reformation periods as well. Despite the great compression that was necessary in order to bring into one volume material embracing such a wide hisorical range, Dr. Webster has introduced a wealth of detail and a broadness of vision unusual in similar text-books, and this, too, without interfering with the readability of the work.

The book is very interesting and notwithstanding the opportunities in the latter part for giving offense to Catholics, the author walks very warily. Though there are some statements to which exception might be taken, they are obviously due rather to inaccuracy or to a desire for brevity than to unfairness, for the whole book shows conscientious efforts towards impartiality. With so much in its favor, it is too bad there are any inaccuracies on the religious side. But "selling indulgences," on page 617, is a sad blot, while the "Inquisition and the extermination of Moors and Jews," on page 668, is reminiscent of the history-writing of the past. Surely such a "safe" anti-Catholic writer as Henry Charles Lea, if consulted, would have shown that not "Moors and Jews," but "Moriscoes" and "Maranos," i. e., feigned Christians of Moorish and Hebrew descent, were the objects of the Inquisition's severity. With regard to the assertions: "Priests of the Greek Church may marry," and "In the Greek Church the national languages are used," it should be noted that the practice of ordaining married men and the use of what were once the vernaculars, but are now archaic tongues are what misled Professor Webster. The illustrations and maps are abundant, new and instructive. Taken all in all, this "Early European History" is one of the best text-books on the market.

Dr. Breasted's volume covers the periods from the Early Stone age to the overthrow of ancient civilization by German and Moslem. The author, who is Professor of Oriental History and Egyptology, in the University of Chicago, has spent much time in archeological researches in the East, and it is precisely in this portion of his book that he chiefly excels. Though 740 pages may seem a bulky volume for use in a classroom, still the author has done wisely in making it large, as in this way it is possible to treat the various topics at such length as to give the work the air of a story, instead of what is practically a catalogue of names and dates. The faults of Dr. Breasted are his habit of stating, as an uncontested fact, what is at best a mere theory, e. g., the origin of the Scriptural account of the Deluge and the Tower of Babel; and a certain over-credulousness in regard to all points making against accepted Christian views. Was primitive man necessarily a savage like our lowest modern ones? Would not a more careful perusal of the findings of modern science have shown him that "the Cro-Magnon man and his contemporaries," in the words of an eminent geologist, "are eloquent of one great truth. They tell us that primitive man had the same high cerebral organization which he possesses now, and, we may infer, the same high intellectual and moral nature. . . . They indicate also . . . that man's earliest state was the best—that he had been a high and noble creature before he became a savage." In handling purely Christian topics the author is generally very reticent, though here too some errors creep in.

J. F. X. M.

A Munster Twilight. By DANIEL CORKERY. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.00.

The literary archeologists are earnest in delving for the great store of ancient Irish manuscripts which are scattered among the libraries of Europe. Get them done into English, they say, repeating the words of the late Stopford Brooke, and we shall set the "Idyls of the King" going for another thousand years. Yet there are other literary workers, not a whit less earnest than the delvers in research. And who shall say that the one is more important or more interesting than the other! Ireland ever ancient, Ireland ever young, sounds like a line of verse, but it is a great historical truth, and the book in hand aptly illustrates it.

Munster and the twilight hours for atmosphere, and Mr. Corkery for artist! Munster! what it represents in ideas and culture in contrast to the dour ways of Ulster. One need not go for testimony to Canon Sheehan's stories, nor to these excellent sketches but to a passage from the pen of a sturdy and aggressive Protestant—for such the English Tablet calls him—Mr. Harold Begbie, in his book, "The Lady Next Door." Says this alien traveler:

> In the South, where Catholic influence is supreme, the people are almost enchanting in their sweetness, entirely admirable in the beauty and contentment of their domestic life, wonderful beyond all other nations in the wholesomeness and sanctity of their chastity. . . . The charm which every traveler feels in the south of Ireland is the character of the Irish people; and my investigation has forced me to the judgment that this character is the culture of Irish Catholicism.

In translating the dwellers of this charming Munster to a book of stories, Mr. Corkery displays consummate skill. The intimate views of his characters, the incidents, the things said, some direct, some with half-utterance by means of a nod or a dim echo, the landscape magic by hill and valley, and the skilful management of his dialogues or his flashing obiter dicta, are among the book's excellences. For instance, there are the eyes of one, "more earnest than her tongue—they implored the pity of silence." And see the mountain, which, when the valley was dark with night, "had still the red gleam of sunset on it. It hung over the misty valley like a velarium—as they used to call the awning-cloth which hung over the emperor's seat in the amphitheater." But even more interesting than its scenic charms, are the ideals which actuate the book's men and women, the terms of the soul according to which they live, in a word, the culture which is theirs, rooted in eternal principles, and growing, trunk and branch, in the achievement of the one thing necessary. Dreamers, yet hard at work upon the daily tasks at hand. "Now he would be all brightness, quoting old poems of the Gaelic bards, old prophecies of the Gaelic Saints, but at another time he would say—Rooted in the soil again—we will, child, and there'll be kings in Tara."

M. E.

A Mind That Found Itself. By CLIFFORD WHITTINGHAM BEERS. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

This is in some ways an extraordinary book. It is a clear and fascinating narrative of the adventures of the mind of one who experienced all the throes and agonies of that most pitiable of all infirmities, insanity. Seized in the very prime of his manhood by that terrible disease, passing at first through the delusional and then the more dangerous maniacal phase, the victim, nevertheless, by an extraordinary set of circumstances emerged from the "territory of insanity" where reason had been a prisoner, with faculties evidently unimpaired and with the will more strongly set than ever before for the accomplishment of a determined end.

Mr. Beers tells of the tragedy which overshadowed his young manhood with the utmost frankness and sincerity. He lays bare the sufferings of body and soul which he underwent, but in no sentiment of egotism or vain parade. With a mind before which the sad experiences of his days of confinement with the insane were perfectly clear, he recounts them with the sole purpose of making them a source of help to others, especially to all those who, in any way, may have to do with the mentally unbalanced and the insane. He believes in remedies applied before the disease manifests itself in its acutest form. Above all things, he opposes all those methods, whether mechanical or chemical, so often used to subdue and tame the more violent victims. A strong upholder of the "non-restraint theory," he believes neither in strait-jackets, nor the administration of temporarily paralyzing drugs, such as hyoscine. The violent, he maintains, can be subdued by other means. It remains for doctors, specialists, and psychotherapists to determine whether that can be accomplished in all cases. But there can be no doubt, that, with the exception of the rarest cases, the most violent can be mastered by far more effective means and with better hopes of a permanent cure. Those who may have visited a hospital for the insane managed by our Catholic Sisters can testify to the splendid control which, with a word, or a look, but especially with the compassion and the love born of their heroic yet tender spirit, they exercise over their patients. The reading of this book, to which Cardinal Gibbons and Miss Julia C. Lathrop give their heartfelt approbation, will undoubtedly revive the interest of the public in the care of the insane. No cause more heartily deserves our sympathy and our generous cooperation. J. C. R.

The German Fury in Belgium. Experiences of a Netherland Journalist During Four Months with the German Army in Belgium. By L. MUKVELD, War Correspondent of De Tijd. Translated by C. THIEME, London Correspondent of De Nieuwe Courant. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

England and the War (1914-1915). By ANDRÉ CHEVRILLON. With a Preface by RUDYARD KIPLING. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.60.

The World at War. By GEORG BRANDES. Translated by CATHERINE D. GROTH. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

Gems (?) of German Thought. Compiled by WILLIAM ARCHER. Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y. $1.25.

Trench Warfare. A Manual for Officers and Men. By J. S. SMITH, Second Lieutenant with the British Expeditionary Force. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

The subject-matter of these five volumes makes it easy for the reviewer to group them together. The author of the first is a Dutch Catholic journalist who entered Belgium early in August, 1914, with the object of investigating the reports of German "atrocities" he had heard. He began as a strict neutral, but what he saw done in Liège, Louvain, Dinant, Bilsen, etc., made him an anti-German, and his testimony is here. Much of the ruthless brutality that marked the invasion, says Mr. Mukveld, was due to the fact that many of the Germans, both officers and men, were drunk. When the Kaiser is forced to repair, as far as they can be repaired, the cruel wrongs his soldiers did the unoffending Belgian people the calmly-given evidence in this book will doubtless be of great value.

M. Chevrillon's volume contains a Frenchman's impressions of what he saw in England during the first year of the war. He keenly analyzes the national mind, describes how slow the British were to realize the magnitude of the conflict in which they were engaged, and tells what costly blunders they made. He is an enthusiastic admirer of the English character.

In "The World at War," Georg Brandes, the well-known Danish pacifist, points out with an impartial hand the hypocrisies and inconsistencies of all the belligerents. For instance, he calls the reader's attention to the fact that "when Germany appealed to the sympathy of neutrals because of the overwhelming odds she was fighting against," she conveniently forgot that in 1864 Austria and Prussia made Denmark face odds five times greater than those with which Germany was confronted last year, yet the general eye of neutral Europe remained quite dry. The author also has some caustic comments on the Great Powers' touching concern for the rights of small nations, and even hints that Ireland, Finland, Persia, Morocco, Korea, etc., do not seem to be enjoying complete autonomy. Mr. Brandes cites Woltman's authority for the fact that "All the great men in history were German in reality." Giotto's true name, for instance was Jotte; Tasso's Dasse; Leonardo's, Leonhardt; Gounod's, Gundiwald, etc. It is a pity that the author could not manage to avoid repeating that threadbare calumny about "Jesuitic ethics."

The most interesting of the 501 "Gems" in the "Anthology of the German War Scriptures," Mr. Archer has culled from the Fatherland's authors, statesmen, and divines, are the Lutheran ministers' ridiculous pulpit utterances. But it is tragically fitting that the results of State-absolutism in religion should reach its climax in the country that gave the system its birth.

Lieutenant Smith, the author of the last book mentioned above, is an American who has served in a British regiment since the beginning of the war and has watched how trench-fighting has developed. So he has now written for his countrymen a thoroughly practical manual, giving descriptions of all kinds of "Trench Warfare," and detailed directions about how to wage it with the greatest safety and success. The little book would make a suitable present for our departing soldier-boys.

W. D.

The Influence of Horace on the Chief English Poets of the Nineteenth Century. A Thesis Presented to the Faculty of the Graduate School of Cornell University for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy. By MARY REBECCA THAYER. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.00.

The first thing to praise about this thesis, and it only deserves praise, is that it is not forced. It is scholarly and unbiased, not the partial work of a special pleader. The author has tabulated all the traces of Horace, "unquestionable" and "probable," that occur in the works, prose and poetry, of the seven principal poets of the last century; this is the chief part of her study; and it is upon this solid body of evidence that she appraises fairly, like an honest searcher after truth, the Horatian element in the poets, and shows reasons drawn from their several aptitudes why it is greater or less in each case. She does not eke out this element of influence to attenuation, as Tennyson complains of other "editors of booklets" doing. "They will not allow one," he says, "even to use such a simple expression as the ocean 'roars,' without finding out the precise verse in Homer or Horace from which we have plagiarized it." Neither does she mistake a mere quoting acquaintance with the "tuneful Horace" for the true kinship of feeling revealed by the casual fossil phrase of Horace found "reclothed according to his own fancy" in the modern poet's text. Certain pet phrases and words of Tennyson best reveal that real artistic sympathy.

Compare, for instance, the following: "Whate'er my grief to find his less than fame, "Major minorve fama"; "Great Orion sloping slowly towards the west," "pronus Orion"; "on either shining shoulder laid a head," "albo sic umero nitens." Of these deep-set resemblances, it must be admitted, Miss Thayer's exhaustive investigation has discovered but few, and those principally in Tennyson, Wordsworth and Shelley. It is the quotations from Horace in which these romanticists abound. Byron's "Farewell, Horace, whom I hated so," was, it appears, only a schoolboy's execration; Coleridge, as Stevenson would say, had a cold head-knowledge, divorced from enjoyment; but "profanum volgus," "genus irritabile vatum," and "nil desperandum" were Keats's sum and all of Horatian lore. A kindly appreciation of the many-sided Horace and his poetry, and a general sketch of his influence upon his own and later times forms the introduction of the volume; and there is appended to it an index of parallel passages which will make it doubly valuable in the hands of teachers and students.

W. T. T.

The Life of Henry David Thoreau, Including Many Essays Hitherto Unpublished and Some Account of His Family and Friends. By F. B. SANBORN. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $4.00.

The author of this biography died early this year, and was practically the last survivor of that circle of Concord Transcendentalists to which Thoreau belonged. The book shows that Mr. Sanborn knew the young naturalist and his relatives intimately, contains many specimens of Thoreau's youthful literary efforts, which we could well have spared, and is too full of long disquisitions on unimportant details to be of much interest to the general reader. Though Thoreau was of Norman-French ancestry, and his grandfather must have been a Catholic, the author of "Walden" seems to have shared his much-admired friend Emerson's highly-diluted religious creed. Channing, Thoreau's earliest biographer, wrote of him: "He was not a believer in the things he did not know about." He rejected Christianity altogether and once remarked when seriously ill, "I have nothing to confess."

The master of an attractive style and a close observer of Nature, who, apparently, was "born and brought up in Concord," Thoreau is now enjoying a new vogue. As Hawthorne said of him: "He is familiar with beast, fish, fowl, and reptile, and has strange stories to tell of adventures and friendly passages with these lower brethren of mortality." It is clear from Mr. Sanborn's book that Thoreau was not very companionable. Brusque, pugnacious, and eccentric, he had few friends and lived the life of a recluse. "Nothing makes me so dejected as to have met my friends," he writes, "for they make me doubt if it is possible to have any friends." He took great pride in being independent. He did not expect literature to yield him a livelihood, but at different times supported himself by teaching school, making pencils, surveying land, lecturing, and acting as a general utility man at his neighbors' beck and call. A Harvard graduate, and familiar with several languages, Thoreau was quite well-read, and gathered together a good library of his own, which Mr. Sanborn describes. Thoreau's admirers call him a "mystic," too, and quote from his poems such stanzas as these:

I hearing get, who had but ears
And sight, who had but eyes before;
I moments live, who lived but years
And Truth discern, I who knew but Learning's lore.

I hear beyond the range of sound,
I see beyond the range of sight,
New earths and skies and seas around;
And in my day the sun doth pale his light.

But Thoreau's fame rests rather on the faithful, carefully-worded records he has left of what he saw and heard in the woods and fields and streams of Concord as the year went round, or of what he observed and pondered on during his many journeys.

W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In the June Irish Monthly, Professor R. A. S. Macalister, Litt.D., F.S.A., begins a series of papers on "Pre-Celtic Ireland," the substance of which was contained in a course of public lectures he delivered at University College, Dublin, last year. He first treats of the place-names of Ireland, insisting on their correct orthography and pronunciation. Another important article in the number is Father McKenna's appeal for the formation of "An Irish Catholic Women's League." He urges a more extensive exertion of his Catholic country-women's interest in public life, complains of their "tragic apathy" toward the solution of pressing social problems that are of the highest importance to the Church, and then outlines a practical scheme of local and general organization.

In "The Banks of Colne" (Macmillan, $1.50), Eden Phillpots' new novel, he takes oyster-beds and flower-gardens as his setting and then describes the doings of a dozen English people who have little that is attractive about them. The author makes the book a vehicle for preaching the tenets of Socialism and for expounding other "advanced" ideas, his leading characters defy the conventions of Christendom and several "religious" men and women are made particularly contemptible. The plot of "The Banks of Colne" is cleverly developed. The story comes to a most striking and unexpected conclusion, and there are numerous descriptive passages that will arrest the attention. The book seems to give a faithful account of how men and women act who are without God in this world.

"Mrs. Norton's Cook Book" (Putnam, $2.50) contains hundreds and hundreds of infallible ways of pleasing a husband. Into a volume of more than 600 large pages Jeannette Young Norton has gathered the results of some twenty years' experience as a cook and of fifteen as a writer on household topics. The chef who can discover that anything really worth eating or drinking has been omitted from this book is a clever man. After six chapters of "General Information" about cooking by coal, gas and electricity, on serving meals, caring for table-linen, silverware and glass, measuring tables, etc., there follow an amazing variety of recipes, ranging from canapés to cocktails. The book is furnished with a thorough index and will lie open without a weight.

In their charity, Catholic reviewers have been wont to excuse much of Miss Olive Katharine Parr's undeniably mawkish literary work on the ground that the lady meant well. For "White Knights in Dartmoor" (Longmans, $0.40), the latest effusion of this singularly naïve and indiscreet writer, no such excuse can be found. The book is not mawkish, but morbid to an extreme degree, and can only do serious harm to the cause which it purports to aid. Miss Parr states that "Prioresses" and "Lady Abbesses," together with a large number of nuns, are actively engaged in a scheme, which would be ridiculous did it not contain possibilities of serious scandal. If Miss Parr is drawing on fact in making this claim, and not on what she fondly deems fact, it is high time for the ecclesiastical superiors of these religious houses to put an end to this spiritual lunacy. Clearly, the "sob-sister" is not a strictly American production.

Dr. Harry Lyman Koopman, Librarian of Brown University, has gathered into an attractive volume, entitled "The Booklover and His Books" (Boston Book Co.), two dozen addresses and magazine articles he has written, for the most part, about the material make-up of books. He has accumulated a great deal of lore regarding the format of Elzevir, Aldus, and Pickering volumes, and deplores the fact that there is so much careless book-making nowadays. The paper of volumes published 500 years ago is still white, and the ink black, but many of today's books will probably be illegible in a hundred years. However, in numberless instances that will be a real mercy. With Mr. Henry Stevens the author divides, among ten parties, the blame of spoiling modern books: the author, the publisher, the printer, the reader, the compositor, the pressman, the paper-maker, the ink-maker, the binder, and the consumer. As a cure for the evil the establishment of a school of typography is recommended, "in which every disciple of these ten tribes shall study a recognized grammar of book-manufacture based on the authority of the best examples."

Three new volumes of the "Short Course Series" have been issued by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Dr. George Milligan, Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism in the University of Glasgow, contributes a popular book on "The Expository Value of the Revised Version." He gives a distinctively Protestant account of the earlier English versions of the Bible, lauds Tindale rather unduly, slaps down a few things about the Douai-Rheims translation, and has not even a hint at the undoubted influence of this Catholic version upon the King James' Authorized. The treatment of the superiority of the Revised over the Authorized Protestant Version is very good, although replete with Protestant prejudices. Another recent book of the same series, "Belief and Life," by Dr. W. B. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, is a study of the leading thoughts of the Fourth Gospel. The Johannine authorship is from the outset denied; and so the historical worth of the tradition of John suffers. Yet the author seems to believe in the Word made Flesh, despite his approval of the eschatologist Burkitt to the effect that "the Evangelist was no historian; ideas, not events, were to him true realities." A third volume of the same set of popular manuals is an expository study of the main thoughts of "The Prophecy of Micah," by Dr. Arthur J. Tait, Principal of Ridley Hall, Cambridge. The treatment of sin is fortunately free from the error of pragmatism, and its relativity of goodness; though faith is said to be of the heart, and knowledge is identified with love: consequently we are bewildered.

"American—the New Pan-American Language," a book written and published by Charles George O'Connor, of Buffalo, N. Y., is one of the latest literary developments of the Pan-American movement. It is a text-book of a language suggested by the author as the most feasible solution of the language difficulty, which has always been in the way of the easy progress of the movement. Mr. O'Connor seems to have outlined a language that is extremely simple, and at the same time euphonic and flexible. Of course the artificial imposition of a new language upon a people is full of tremendous difficulties. Still "American," if adopted, and in winning an adoption for it all the difficulty seems to lie, would surely form an easy means of communication between North and South America.——"Short Lessons in Church Music" (Choir Press, 1634 Gregory Street, Chicago, $0.10), is a good booklet compiled for use in parochial schools and church choirs. In catechetical form it explains the nature and the various kinds of approved church music and then enters into the important details of this sacred function according to the mind of the Holy Father.

The author of the useful volume, "Our Minnesota" (Dutton, $1.60), is the teacher of history and civics in the high schools of St. Paul. In her preface she notes: "We are apt to lay much stress upon the necessity for teaching the responsibilities of citizenship, but it is really more important that we plant in the hearts of children a love for the place where they live, so that the care and responsibility for it will grow as a natural result." But, of course, our view must not be narrowly exclusive. While the young student should be taught to appreciate his own State first, he should also be made to realize that there are forty-seven other States, and that none is unimportant. The book is written for children; and the child who reads it carefully will know with sufficient fulness the history, the resources, etc., of Minnesota. There are times, however, when, without loss of historical accuracy the author could make her record of events more telling and impressive for the young student, notably, when she writes of the early discoverers, and of the pioneers.

The publications of the Babylonian Section of the Museum of the University of Pennsylvania have reached the eleventh volume. The first number of this volume is "A Syllabary of Personal Names" from the Temple School of Nippur, edited by Edward Chiera. Most interesting, to one who is not a specialist in Babylonian, are the account here given of school-texts, together with some phototypic facsimiles of teachers' model-texts, and the reproductions of them by pupils. The tablets of this class were for temporary use, and are not baked. On one side, they are divided into two columns. To the left is the teacher's model, beautifully written and well preserved; to the right is the pupil's reproduction of that model, always spoiled by erasure, indentation, or breakage. On the other side of the tablet is always the work of some advanced pupil, who had no need of a model; yet even this work is often destroyed by indentations with the style or breakage of the tablet. Either teacher or pupil was fully set on leaving little trace of these first attempts in Babylonian calligraphy.

"The Poems of B. I. Durward" (The Pilgrim Publishing Company, John T. Durward, Baraboo, Wis.), is a memorial edition for the centennial of the birth of the Catholic poet of Wisconsin. The volume, prepared by the poet's son, the Reverend John T. Durward, is prefaced by a life of the poet, and an essay on poetry. The volume will express to the author's friends the thoughts of a deeply religious mind, and it is to these friends chiefly that the poems will make their appeal, and no doubt strongly.——Charles Louis Palms, a Catholic financier, of Detroit, has recently published a volume of poetry, entitled "Rhodanthe, or The Rose in the Garden of the Soul's Delight" (The Marion Press, New York). It is a "fantasy" of 4,000 lines, describing true love as a spiritual thing that is nobler than sense delight, and was written during the last six years in the intervals of business. The book is beautifully bound in orange, printed on fine Italian paper, and is for private circulation only. Mr. Palms received his degree of Ph.B. from Georgetown in 1889.

In managing the development of the scenes in "The Guileless Saxon" (Gill, 1 shilling), Louis J. Walsh displays fine perspective and proportion. The three acts of this Ulster comedy abound in humorous situations, and sallies of repartee are flung off on every page.——"A Lily of the Snow" (Encyclopedia Press), is the story of the martyrdom of St. Eulalia, a little girl who by her death strengthened the courage of many martyrs in Spain under Dacian. It is written in pleasing verse by F. A. Forbes, the author of other similar plays.——"Garcia Moreno's Death," a tragedy in five acts, is the first of a series of Catholic plays to be brought out by the Fathers of the Divine Word, Techny, Ill. It well portrays the lofty character and heroic end of the great patriot, but some of the dialogue is perhaps too wordy for the stage.——Two cities in Massachusetts during the past two years witnessed the successful performance of "On the Slopes of Calvary," the religious drama written by Father Aurelio Palmieri, O.S.A. Now that the English translation, by Mr. Henry Grattan Doyle, 816 Christian Street, Philadelphia, has been published, doubtless this edifying drama will be in demand for the coming season.

SOCIOLOGY

St. Francis Regis and the Social Evil

THERE is a passage somewhere in Newman's sermons on the power of the Catholic religion to keep the young heart pure. With singular clarity and his peculiar eloquence, the great Cardinal explains how the Church teaches her children to lead the life which gives the eyes "to see God." To every one blessed with a Catholic home, the lesson is familiar. Before he is able to talk, the Catholic child has heard of Jesus, of His Blessed Mother, of the Saint whose name he bears, of his Guardian Angel, and of the Angels whom the great God sends down from heaven to watch over him while he sleeps. Nothing is said of the ugliness of vice; much of the beauty of a white soul, and in those sweet and delicate ways, born of mother-love, the plastic mind of the child is turned always to ideals of purity.

Catholic Training

THUS does the process go on, day by day, in homes poor in many ways, but richly dowered with the Faith. The child is introduced to the great court of heaven; he makes friends with that matchless company of gallant men and pure women, and, before the corruption of the world has worked its way, he is united with the very fount of purity, through the privilege, thanks to the discerning heart of Pius X who opened the tabernacle to the lambs of the flock, of the daily reception of the Bread of Angels. An ideal has been placed before him, high indeed, yet attainable through his own efforts reinforced by the grace of God, generously given through prayer and the Sacraments. This child knows nothing of physiology, or of the social evil. He does know, however, that his body is a temple of the Holy Ghost, worthy of reverence. He has been taught to pay that reverence to all, and to exact it for himself. The Church has shielded him from evil, given him the ideal of purity, and placed in his hands the means of conforming his life to it. No more than God, has she destroyed his free-will. Not even God, in His ordinary Providence, will prevent its misuse. But with this early soul-training premised, the strength of the child against evil is made as the strength of ten, because his heart is pure.

Sin Systematized

YET it must needs be that scandals come. Made a little less than the Angels, man who, if he chooses, may sit at the table of the King, may also turn to the husks of swine, and often does. He calls his passions virtues, and deliberately systematizes evil. In a famous passage, not quoted in approbation of its underlying philosophy, Lecky pictures the common result.

> . . . There has arisen in society a figure which is certainly the most mournful, and in some respects the most awful, upon which the eye of the moralist can dwell. That unhappy being, whose very name is a shame to speak . . . who is scorned and insulted as the vilest of her sex, and doomed for the most part, to disease and abject wretchedness and an early death, appears in every age as the perpetual symbol of the degradation and sinfulness of man. Herself the supreme type of vice, she is ultimately the most efficient guardian of virtue. But for her, the unchallenged purity of countless happy homes would be polluted, and not a few who in the pride of their untempted chastity, think of her with an indignant shudder, would have known the agony of remorse and despair. On that degraded and ignoble form are concentrated the passions that might have filled the world with shame. She remains, while creeds and civilizations rise and fall, the eternal priestess of humanity, blasted for the sins of the people.

Lecky here takes the view that this unhappy being is inevitable, since the generality, or a fair proportion of men will never control their passions. Thus stated, the doctrine, not without an element of truth, is too pessimistic. History, it is true, shows that these conditions, due to men who scorn restraint, have always existed; and history, we are reminded, is philosophy, teaching by example. Hence the plausible conclusion, that since man does not change from age to age, the future will be as the past in reproducing these deplorable conditions. Yet the conclusion, as it seems to me, ignores the plain instruction of Christ, in which we are bidden to pray with confidence, for the triumph of God's Kingdom in the hearts of men. "Thy kingdom come" cannot be a prayer that will remain forever unanswered.

Theologians and Tolerance

GREAT names have been quoted in favor of the pessimistic view. In pagan Rome the social evil was accorded State recognition, and it would appear that St. Augustine regarded it as "an institution offering a necessary relief to corrupt society." St. Thomas concurred in this view, because it seemed to him that the institution effectively prevented evils of a far graver nature. The opinion of Saints like Augustine and Aquinas may not be lightly rejected; yet it is clear that their authority has been invoked to condone excesses that they would never countenance, and to give currency to the common opinion that Catholic theologians find in the toleration of organized vice, restricted to its own section of the city, a solution of this grave problem.

A study of the modern moralists will, I think, show the falsity of this persuasion. All agree, certainly, on the principle that an evil may be tolerated, if it really secures the avoidance of greater evils. But such passages as may be found in St, Alphonsus, lib. 2, n. 70; lib. 4, n 434; Ballerini-Palmieri, Tract. V, sect. 3, c. 2, art. 3; Noldin, De Sexto, Art. 1, 18; Prümmer I, p. 413; Lehmkuhl, I, p. 405, note, and Sabetti-Barrett, n. 187, 3, will demonstrate that the "restricted district," still permitted in some American cities, can find no apologist in accepted moralists. Without exception, these authors exact as prerequisite to the policy of toleration, certain conditions rarely if ever verified in modern municipalities.

The "Suppression Policy"

ON the other hand, the easy solution of "closing the district" is wholly superficial, and in no case can it be regarded as anything more than the first step to better conditions. The passions which called it into existence, and its miserable inhabitants, remain after the district has been legally abolished. Within the last ten years, the plan of suppression, immediate or gradual, has been adopted in all but two American cities, of a population more than one hundred thousand. The results have never equaled the anticipations. In one instance, a Catholic publicist who has held high office in his State, writes me, that within a year after the enforcement of a carefully-planned policy of gradual suppression, conditions in the city were worse than ever.

The truth is that the social evil cannot be attacked successfully, if religion is ignored. With certain individuals, the modern method of reformation which replaces ideals wholly bad, with ideals naturally good, can certainly result in an exterior reconstruction. But it has no direct influence towards the more important reconstruction of the soul, by setting it aright with God. Reconstruction is not attained merely by "forgetting the past." It means, first of all, turning from the past, and then by a true, inward conversion of the heart from the creature to God, atonement for the past. Soap and water, college work and vocational training, poetry and a life in the country, are all good; but not if offered as substitutes for interior repentance. The God-man who confounded the leering ring of hypocrites, by bidding him among them without sin, to cast the first stone, never pretended that the miserable creature in the dust at His feet, was not a sinner. In fact, His very words of absolution reminded her that she was. It is absolutely untrue to say that Christ always forgave the fallen woman. He forgave her only, who repented.

A Saint's Methods

WHAT true principles can accomplish in this sorrowful matter is well illustrated in the life of St. Francis Regis. He did not hesitate to use strong measures when necessary, even if they set the town by the ears. Personal assaults, encountered in his efforts to lessen scandal, he regarded as nothing. "And indeed," he said to a confrère who offered his sympathy, after an attack by one of the gilded youth, "indeed, considering the Young Blade's hasty Temper, I did not think to come off so Cheap." But he knew very well that, unless he reached the souls of these unhappy persons, his reforms would mean little. He seems to have undertaken this work first at Montpellier, then as for centuries, the seat of a famous medical school. How he proceeded is thus told by Daubenton:

> Being determined to lay the Ax to the Root, he resolved to clear the Town of these unhappy Women. . . . The Enterprise was equally nice and dangerous: But Regis could not fear.

Regis recognized clearly the economic conditions connected with the evil, and provided against them.

> But that he might at once secure her from Want, and the Criminal Habit Want had brought on, he procured her a safe Retreat with a Virtuous Woman. . . . In Effect lest such Persons faced by Want in a tyrannical Habit should relapse into their former Excesses, to preserve them from both the Dangers, he put them under the Care of twenty Persons of their own Sex who divided them amongst themselves, some of whom kept five or six in their Houses.

Although from the early days of the Church, homes of some kind had been provided for repentant women, it is noteworthy that Regis seems to have preferred placing them with private families. In the ages of Faith, or in Catholic communities, this ideal disposal would not, perhaps, present the difficulties which today surround it. Towards the end of his career, Regis founded a refuge for those who wished to embrace a life of penance, but even then he coordinated it with the home-placing method.

The Basis of Reconstruction

THE Saint's pity was quickened in his realization that many of these poor creatures had been forced into this horrible life through destitution. The toll exacted by murderous greed which will not pay a living wage to women-workers is today far greater than in the time of Regis. "I'm only the fellow that set fire to the orphan asylum and murdered a blind man for his pennies," says O. Henry, when asked if he is one of "the men who hired working-girls, and paid them five or six dollars a week to live on." The influence of this tyranny must not, however, be exaggerated. That it breaks down the moral fiber of some, seems unhappily true; on the other hand, there are good reasons for believing that the moral standards of the vast majority of underpaid Catholic working-girls are of a type that leads to heroic sanctity. Daubenton thus tells of some who at last gave way under the strain:

> Some were less addicted to Vice than others: And meer Want had put them in evil Courses: they were even ashamed of that infamous Life, and continued in the unhappy Life contrary to their Inclinations, for Want of a Subsistence. Regis took particular Care of these: for Some he provided an honest Livelihood: Others he placed in Religious Houses: His industrious Charity suggested always the Means of their Perseverance.

"It is very Certain," continues Daubenton, "that the Conversions which he effected were of a Particular Stamp, and by the Precautions which he took proved as constant as they were sincere." The reason is not far to seek. The heart of Regis was on fire with love of his Saviour, and therefore with a pitying and an understanding love, he was drawn towards those who most needed him, the sinful outcasts of the city. But precisely because it was filled with Divine charity, it found no place for weak and hurtful sentimentality. He placed before these once lost women the high ideals of purity, and taught them to brace their weak wills by constant recourse to prayer and the Sacraments. For he knew that only on the Rock, which is Christ, can this difficult work of reconstruction safely rest.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

EDUCATION

"Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde"

PROFESSOR KEENAN was a dapper little man of forty-five. As I glanced at the high, broad forehead, bright eyes, and pointed chin, I thought I perceived the marks of congeniality. "Winslow is my name," I said, as we shook hands. Before long, we were conversing like old friends.

"I have just finished a scientific course," I was saying, "and I wish to follow some courses in psychology. I intend to take them at one of three places, Harvard, Cornell or here. I was warned by a friend to steer clear of Harvard and Cornell. He gave no reason. Perhaps you can."

"Permanent Identity"

THE professor thrummed on the desk for a moment. Then, looking me in the eye, he said, "They deny the soul."

"Then I cannot understand," I continued, "how they can teach psychology."

He smiled. "Have you studied logic?" he asked.

"Yes," I replied.

"And biology?"

"Yes."

"Have you read 'Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde'? You know," he continued, after my affirmative reply, "how the doctor, on gulping down the mysterious potion, would be suddenly transformed into Mr. Hyde, and vice-versa. Neither the doctor nor Mr. Hyde had a permanent identity. The story is impossible. Critics tell us that the public reader of today wants the inevitable, and so we conclude that Stevenson's masterpiece, if its first appearance were in this age, would not receive approbation. Now if you take a course of psychology at Harvard or Cornell, and use your logic sincerely, you can come forth and tell the world, that Stevenson's story is not only not impossible, but inevitably true."

"I don't understand," I said.

Solace for Tired Brains

"AFTER you see the connection, everything will be as clear as daylight. The distinguished Harvard professor says that the soul is old-fashioned and must be rejected. He declares that all our intellectual cognitions are reduced to sensations; that there are immaterial processes in the mind without any subject; that these immaterial processes correspond with the material processes in the nervous system in such a way that along with the determined nervous processes as conditions, go determined intellectual cognitions; that sometimes the nervous processes themselves are considered under a twofold aspect, and consequently that all intellectual knowledge must be explained by the laws of the physiological nervous system according to the measure of reflex movements."

He laughed, as he noticed my puzzled look. "All that I've just said," he added, "might be true as far as you are concerned. However, it's all wrong, but we will discuss just one point. When those men reject the soul, the subject in which all immaterial cognitions inhere, the personal identity of man must go. For even if the absurd statement that 'sensations are immaterial' were true, yet, if the soul is rejected, the connection between those sensations, which constitute my personal 'Ego,' my 'personal identity' by which I know that I was John Keenan eight years ago, and by which you know you were Mr. Winslow, cannot stand."

"But how can those men teach such absurd doctrine?" I inquired.

The "Stream of Thought"

"THAT is their least trouble," he went on. "The proof that man has a personal identity, without a soul, is something like this. They are familiar with the concept that man's body undergoes a complete change in the course of seven years. This difficulty they avoid by introducing 'immateriality' which is another word for 'spirituality.' They are not materialists. Bless your stars, they will let you have all the spirituality you wish, but they will admit no abiding principle. Instead, they invoke 'the stream-of-thought hypothesis,' i. e. a stream of thought without supposing any other agent than a succession of perishing thoughts. According to this hypothesis, each new thought takes possession of its predecessor and is taken possession of by its successor. In other words, it is 'born an owner and dies owned.' The Harvard professor introduces a simile about a long succession of herdsmen coming into possession of the same herd of cattle; which simile would seem to betray an unfamiliarity with even the laws of rhetoric. It is not a simile but a limping caricature of his still more limping hypothesis.

"What he means, is this. Suppose there were no employees at the C. B. Q. depot, and suppose every man that changed cars there were to become acquainted with two persons, namely, the preceding and the succeeding individuals who changed cars. In truth, we could say this depot was a kind of mysterious 'collective self' which preserves the 'stream of thought.' But 'collective' destroys of course the idea of abiding principle or soul. Now suppose there is a break, that the depot has no passengers for some eight hours, where is the connecting link in the 'stream?' Will the traveler who now enters the station of 'the collective self' be familiar with his predecessor who was there eight hours before? The Harvard professor, be it noted, seems to forget that out of his twenty-four-hour day he spends in dreamland about eight hours during which come no travelers, no thoughts that are 'born owners and die owned.'"

Stevenson Justified

"ALL this is very mysterious," I ventured. "But what is your doctrine regarding psychology?"

"Longum est," the professor replied, "but I can give you some principles in a few words. First of all, there is a soul, and secondly, by the presence of this soul and by that only, man possesses a permanent identity, a permanent 'Ego.' The distinguished Harvard and Cornell professors reject the soul. With it goes the free-will, and, no matter how hard they fight, permanent identity as well As far as I know, the Harvard professor is a law-abiding citizen who moves in respectable society, and as to his Cornell colleague, I have heard of no misdemeanor connected with his name. But let those men practise what they teach in theory, and a few hours would find them in the hands of the police. For if a man has no soul, no free-will, and consequently no permanent identity, he is a fool to obey any law. Hence I conclude that outside their classroom these men must be big, manly, congenial Doctor Jekylls, but before entering their classroom they gulp down a potion of prejudice. Then as little hump-backed, cold-visioned, treacherous, repellant Mr. Hydes they foist their doctrine on open-minded students. Another gulp at the end of class or lecture, and they are again amiable Doctor Jekylls. Thus is Stevenson justified."

Thomas J. Martin, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholic Summer School of America

THE lectures of the Catholic Summer School of America, Cliff Haven, N. Y., begin July 2 and continue until September 7. The grounds will remain open until September 30. The purpose of the Summer School and its attractive opportunities for relaxation as well as social intercourse and educational improvement are thus stated in the prospectus of its twenty-sixth session:

> The Assembly, incorporated by the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York, is instituted for the purpose of providing Catholics of the United States with the means of meeting during the summer months in a place where, amid the delights of natural beauty, the pleasures of social intercourse and the accompaniment of legitimate, healthful recreation, they may learn to know one another better, to understand their strength, to enlarge the scope of their education, and to get correct views upon the many important questions incident to Catholic life in our country.

The scope of the Catholic Summer School has won for it the warmest words of approval from ecclesiastical authorities, our Cardinals, the Apostolic Delegate and the Holy See. Beside musical features, an attractive and instructive lecture program is arranged, so that an ideal vacation is provided for American Catholics.

Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati

A CENTURY has passed since the incorporation of the Daughters of Charity in America. Among the participants in that event was Mother Margaret Cecilia George, the first superior of the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati whose valuable history is now being published. Mother Margaret was one of Mother Seton's first novices at Emmitsburg, and remained intimately associated with her in later life. When in December, 1850, Father Etienne, Superior of the Daughters of Charity of France, brought about the affiliation of the Emmitsburg community with that in France, Mother Margaret was Superior of the Cincinnati branch. The Sisters at Emmitsburg were desirous of conforming in every respect to the ideal of the French society, but the Sisters at Cincinnati believed their own work could be more effectively carried on by maintaining unchanged all the rules, constitutions, traditions and details of costume prescribed by Mother Seton, which had all received confirmation from Archbishop Carroll. A particular point at issue was the teaching of boys, which strict conformity to the the French rule would have made impossible. This difficulty had already, in 1846, brought about the separation from Emmitsburg of the New York branch, which at present is teaching more than 42,000 children in the schools of the New York archdiocese, besides the many other admirable works undertaken by it. The American Daughters of Charity had evidently come to a parting of the ways, and each group felt bound to make its choice as the Spirit of God dictated. That His visible blessing rested upon them all is evident from the success that attended the labors of each single division, while their combined achievements fill many a glorious page in the annals of the Church and the country. Mother Margaret and her Sisters had laid their case before Archbishop Purcell, who in turn consulted with his brother-bishops. His decision was at last reached, and on February 25, 1852, after concluding the Holy Sacrifice, he gave the following confident assurance to the kneeling community of Sisters:

> My dear children: My brother-clergymen and myself, after invoking the Holy Spirit and after diligently studying the question concerning your future, have decided that it is God's will for you to remain as you are, Sisters of Charity, formed by Mother Seton and approved by his Grace, the Venerable Archbishop Carroll. I shall establish your mother house in my episcopal city, and you will be my children and I shall be your father.

A new life now opened to the Sisters who were henceforth to be left to their own resources in carrying out the determination of keeping inviolate every custom of the early community of the American Daughters of Charity. "The spirit of Mother Seton was impressed upon all and, as much as possible, she was kept a living personality by one who loved her much, Mother Margaret Cecilia George." On March 25, 1852, the little community took its vows before Archbishop Purcell, as its ecclesiastical superior. Today, after sixty-five years of splendid service, they are rapidly advancing towards the thousand mark in their membership, with more than half a hundred branch-houses, with many excellent hospitals, sanitariums, academies, orphanages and other institutions of charity, together with almost three-score parochial schools scattered throughout Ohio, Michigan, Colorado, Tennessee and New Mexico. Under their training and with their assistance the community of Sisters of Charity at Seton Hill, Greensburg, Pa., came into existence, which now in turn numbers several hundred members. So God, everywhere and in every way, prospered the noble work begun by Mother Seton, and from Mount St. Mary's of the East to Mount St. Mary's of the West, and throughout all the land, her daughters gladly pay to her their debt of gratitude in devoted lives of true Christian charity.

K. of C. Million Dollar War Camp Fund

THE Knights of Columbus have set themselves the great task of raising $1,000,000 to establish recreation centers at all the principal concentration camps of the United States troops, and to provide support for the additional volunteer chaplains who will be needed where the regular military chaplain is not a Catholic priest. The following is taken from the appeal sent out to the various councils by the Supreme Knight:

> A million men will soon be in concentration camps preparing for War. Thirty to forty per cent of this number will be men of our faith, many of them members of our Order, and all ready to give "the last full measure of devotion" to our common country. Thousands of loved ones at home will be anxiously awaiting news, and in their prayers asking protection for the husbands, sons and brothers who have offered their lives for the flag. We did something for the spiritual comfort and for the recreation of the National Guard along the Mexican border last year. The call now comes from all over the country that this work, then attempted for the first time, shall be continued and enlarged to meet present conditions. We are confronted with the proposition of opening up recreation centers at all of the principal concentration camps (at least sixteen in number), possibly also at the regular army expansion camps, and of furnishing priests (where the military chaplain is not of our faith) and their support while so engaged both here and in Europe. The centers will of course be open to all, regardless of creed or membership in our Order.

Since the Order numbers nearly 400,000 Knights, it is suggested that each Council raise a contribution equivalent to two dollars per member, and that the further amount necessary be gathered in various ways from those within or outside the Order. It is a work of great moment and the Knights will doubtless know of no such word as "failure."

Catholic Editors and the War

LIKE other Catholic editors who have been trying to deal in a spirit of perfect fairness and impartiality with all the problems involved in the great war, the editor of the Ave Maria finds himself charged equally with unfairness towards Germany and towards the Allies.

> The contradiction is easily explainable. A peculiarity of prejudice is that while it prevents one from seeing existing things straight, it doesn't prevent one from seeing things that have no existence at all, except in one's own imagination. No editor should be held responsible for what he didn't say, or for more than he intended saying,—for anything, in fact, but just what he said. People who have the habit of "reading between the lines," as it is called, forget that what they visualize is only a reflection of themselves, the expression of their personal thoughts, the manifestation of their private sentiments. The habit is not an excusable one except in the case of writers who express themselves badly, or who evidently conceal their meaning. Then only may we inculpably speculate as to what the meaning may be. In no case, however, can there be justification for attributing malicious motives, or for suspecting sinister intents.

It is pitiful that passion should so far sway Catholic readers as to induce them to attribute wrongful and even malevolent motives to men whose sole desire is to defend the truth and to be loyal to Church and country. Editors may fail in their high purpose, but they do not wilfully offend against truth and justice. "Let us assure our readers of all nationalities," Father Hudson is constrained to say, "that we have published nothing from malevolent motives. We have no ill will for, nor any conscious prejudice against any people on earth. Our only intention has been to uphold religion and to defend truth. And our willingness to be forgiven for unintentional offending is constant and entire." To this statement other Catholic editors cheerfully subscribe.

Luther and the Declaration of Independence

"REFORMATION and Freedom" is the newspaper heading given to an account of the Luther festivities solemnized at Rock Island by the Augustana Synod. The principal address of the occasion was delivered by Dr. Julius Lincoln, who glorified the "Reformer," proclaiming his kinship with Washington, Jefferson and the early Founders of our Republic:

> Freedom of conscience is the keynote of the Declaration of Independence. That wonderful document is an echo of the voice which spoke so plainly during the course of the Reformation. Martin Luther and Thomas Jefferson were kinsmen in their conception of certain inalienable human rights. The religious liberty which was won by the heroism of Martin Luther was a precursor to the civil liberty which, under the Great Jehovah, the Continental Congress, Washington, his compatriots of 1776, has become our heritage.
>
> The American revolution was an uprising of outraged conscience. The draft of the Constitution of the United States may be found in the writings of the reformers. Here civil and religious liberty go hand in hand.
>
> To the Protestant world of 1917 the voice of the Protestanism of 1517 is crying out aloud: Guard your liberty! Let not conscience be enslaved either by indulgence or coercion. Let it not be violated from within or without! The dangers of 1917 must be met with the heroism of 1517. It must be the same old spirit for a new age. Luther's watchword must become ours: I can do nothing contrary to conscience. That should be the glory of our jubilee, and this: I am free in Christ Jesus to do that which I believe to be right.

It would be difficult to find words that could express more perfectly the direct opposite to the truth. If ever there were two documents diametrically opposed to each other they are the American Declaration of Independence and Melanchthon's declaration of intolerance signed by Luther, prescribing the death penalty for all "blasphemers" who dare to hold that Luther's baptism and sermon are not Christian or that Luther's church is not the Church of Christ. For further incontrovertible evidence of Luther's spirit of intolerance; of his "mania for persecution," as a Protestant authority describes it; of his subjection of the consciences of the people to the tyrannical despotism of their temporal rulers whenever the latter were willing to favor his own doctrine; and even of his desire for a restoration of the institution of slavery to shackle the freemen of his own nation, we can here only refer to the Luther article in the present number, and to the articles that have appeared in the preceding numbers seven, nine and eleven of the present volume of AMERICA. The only witness whose testimony is taken is Luther himself. No fairer trial could be given him.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

JULY 7, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

The Y. M. C. A.'s Protestantism

Edward F. Garesché

Reflections on a Revival

Shane Leslie

Luther and Woman

Joseph Husslein

An Open Letter to a Modern Artist

A. L. Holmes

Francis Grierson

Michael Williams

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS for JULY 7, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 13

PAGE

CHRONICLE 311–314

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Y. M. C. A's Protestantism—Reflections on a Revival—Luther and Woman—An Open Letter to a Modern Artist—Francis Grierson 315–323

COMMUNICATIONS 323–325

EDITORIALS

Constitutions and Executives—Apostles of Democracy—Inconsistent Vegetarians—The Church and Protestant Marriage—The Triumph of Our Schools—Headline English..326–328

LITERATURE—The Science of Ethics—Reviews—Books and Authors—Books Received 329–333

SOCIOLOGY—A Model for Social Workers 334–335

EDUCATION—Penmanship in the Grades....335–336

NOTE AND COMMENT.....336–338

Who's Who

MICHAEL WILLIAMS, contributor of "Francis Grierson" to this issue of AMERICA, was born in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1877; came to the United States in 1896, joined the editorial staff of the Boston Post in 1898, and ever since has been engaged in journalistic and literary work, New York, Boston, San Francisco; contributor of fiction, essays, articles, poetry, special correspondence, to many magazines and newspapers; went to Mexico during the Huerta trouble for the International News Association; was a member of Upton Sinclair's socialistic colony at Helicon Hall, and collaborated with Upton Sinclair in writing a book on radical ideas in modern health culture; left Socialism for Catholicism in 1913, after a separation from the latter since boyhood; now lives in Carmel, Cal., where he is engaged in writing a book dealing with the history of San Francisco; also a book describing his adventures among the modern cults and radical movements, which led him back to the Church.

Read AMERICA and Keep Up with the Best Current Thought

The Catholic Mind

Issue for July 8, 1917

THE MIXED MARRIAGE PROBLEM

A Remedy for Mixed Marriage
The Danger of Mixed Marriage
The Church Always Right

ONE of the perils confronting the Church today is the constantly increasing number of mixed marriages. How they can be discouraged and the remedies to be used to avert their disastrous spiritual consequences are pointed out in this issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. It is a seasonable number owing to the constant need for such admonitions and especially on account of the social exigencies arising from summer-vacations.

You cannot afford to be without these useful little pamphlets.

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers)

Send us your Subscription at once. $1.00 Per Year

Single numbers 5 cents each

For Parish Book Racks $4.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS 59 East 83rd St. New York, N. Y.

NOW IN PRESS

What Luther Taught

Luther's Character and Doctrine Exposed in a Handy Pamphlet by the Rev. Joseph Husslein, S.J., and the Rev. John C. Reville, S.J., Associate Editors of AMERICA.

Order Now and be prepared for argument

PRICE 15 CENTS

The America Press

59 East 83rd Street New York

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 13
WHOLE No. 430

JULY 7, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The principal theater of fighting during the past week has been the territory about the city of Lens in northern France, where a series of gains by the British have made the German hold on the city very precarious. The attacks began southwest of the city, where the British advanced on a front of a mile and a half, on both sides of the Souchez River. Later they captured La Coulotte, south of Lens and forced the Germans to abandon a mile and three-quarters of their first line trenches. Then they took Hill 65, which is the dominating height of the same sector. Subsequent attacks drove the Germans back to the western and southern fringes of the city. The Oppy line, in the vicinity of the village of the same name, were then attacked on a front of two miles with substantial gains on half that distance. Finally the British pushed forward from the Reservoir Hill and occupied Eleu, and from La Coulotte and secured a hold on the western portion of Avion.

Bulletin, June 25, p.m.-July 2, a.m.

Fighting of great intensity has been renewed at Verdun. where the Germans took the offensive and stormed the French trenches on a mile front west of Hill 304. Part of this territory was subsequently recovered by the French. In the Trentino on the Asiago Plateau the Austrians have taken possession of the Agnello Pass. For the first time since the revolution the Russians made an attack in force along the Stripa front for the distance of eighteen and a half miles. The Germans held their ground.

The Administration Food bill, passed by the House, was referred to the Senate Agricultural Committee on June 25, and then handed over for consideration to a sub-committee. This sub-committee quickly completed its revision of the bill, modifying it in such a way as to vest in the President not only power and discretion to commandeer distilled spirits in bond, but to determine whether or not beer and wine shall be manufactured. Other changes also were made. When the revision was reported to the entire Agricultural Committee, the prohibition plan was rejected by a vote of nine to seven, and another of a more drastic form substituted, forbidding during the war the manufacture of both distilled and malt liquors but giving the President power to prohibit or not at his discretion the manufacture of wines. The section referring to wine is as follows:

The Administration Food Bill

> Provided, That whenever the President finds it necessary to conserve perishable fruits he is empowered to permit the use of such perishable fruits in the manufacture of vinous liquors, and whenever the question arises as to whether any particular fruit is perishable or non-perishable the President is authorized to determine that question and his determination shall be conclusive for the purposes of this act.

The House bill, as so revised, was reported to the Senate on June 28 and substituted for the Senate bill. Except for the section dealing with prohibition it is not now anticipated that serious opposition will be made to its passage. Indications, however, pointed to a prolonged debate on the prohibition of the manufacture of wine and beer. Accordingly President Wilson took occasion to say that in view of the vital interests involved in the immediate passage of the bill, he deemed it unwise to risk protracted debate by insisting on the provisions affecting beer and wine. Thereupon Senator Gore, the Chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, "at the request of higher authorities," drafted an amendment, which he proposed should be substituted for the prohibition measure reported by the Agricultural Committee. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

> Section 12. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to use any foods, food materials or feeds in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes. Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation or prohibition of the use of foods, food materials or feeds in the production of vinous, malt or fermented liquors, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such liquors is essential in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food or feed, he is authorized from time to time to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked, no person shall after a reasonable time, which shall be prescribed in such notice, use any foods, food materials or feeds in the production of such vinous, malt or fermented liquors except in accordance with the limitations, regulations and prohibitions prescribed in such notice, or to produce any such liquors having an alcoholic content in excess of the amount prescribed therefor in such notice.

However, as this amendment, when circulated among the Senators, received but cold approval, the Agricultural Committee took up the matter again, and as a result Senator Chamberlain drew up the following:

> Section 12. That from and after thirty days from the date of the approval of this act, no person shall use any foods, fruits, food material, or feeds in the production of distilled liquors, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, or other non-beverage purposes. Any person who wilfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

At the present writing it has not been determined which substitute amendment will be presented to the Senate. Senator Gore's substitute amendment puts a ban on the manufacture of whisky, allows the making of beer and wine, and leaves it to the President to prohibit the latter, namely, beer and wine, should he deem it expedient to do so. Senator Chamberlain merely prohibits the manufacture of distilled liquors, and omits all mention of beer and wine. The extreme Prohibitionists will oppose either amendment; but it seems likely that the Chamberlain amendment, if it be proposed, will carry with it a majority of votes.

The War Revenue Bill

The Senate Financial Committee finished its revision of the War Revenue bill on June 30; it will be formally approved by the Committee on July 2, and reported to the Senate by Chairman Simmons at an early date. The sum provided for in the bill as passed by the House, which amounted to $1,800,000,000, has been reduced to $1,652,170,000; and the bill has been practically rewritten, with the elimination of many of the House taxes and the substitution of others.

The principal burden of taxation in the revised bill is to fall on incomes and excess profits, the former yielding $532,700,000, and the latter $740,000,000. Exemption from income taxes has been extended to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons; an additional tax of two per cent on incomes up to $5,000 is to be levied, and surtaxes on incomes greater than $5,000 on a graduated scale from one per cent to thirty-three per cent. Excess profits will be taxed according to the Senate bill on a graduated scale from twelve per cent to forty per cent.

The publishers' tax section provides for a tax of five per cent on publishers' profits over $4,000, which will yield $7,500,000, and an increase of a quarter of a cent a pound in second class postage rates, which will yield $3,000,000. An increase of one cent on first class mail will yield $50,000,000. The tax on liquors will yield $155,000,000; on tobacco, $56,600,000; on freight transportation, $77,500,000; on passenger transportation, $37,500,000; on automobiles, $40,000,000; on amusement admissions, $23,000,000,.

Consumption taxes of one-half a cent a pound on sugar, two cents, on coffee, three cents, on cocoa and substitutes, and five cents on tea, will total $86,000,000. From stamp taxes $30,000,000 will be collected. Prohibitive taxes are levied on the manufacture of distilled beverages, and a tax on whiskey in bond yielding $278,000,000, taxes on other intoxicants are doubled, that on beers and wines netting $250,000,000. Taxes will also be levied, though in amounts much less than those provided in the House, on patent-medicines, perfumery, cosmetics, Pullman accommodations and soft drinks. Parcel-post packages are to be taxed one cent for each twenty-five cents paid for express transportation.

The Council of National Defense, through its medical section, has been urged to bring pressure on the Government to draft doctors on a selective conscriptive basis for work in the army, during the period of the war. It has been pointed out that the volunteer system has proved ineffective and offers little likelihood of supplying the nation's need. One hundred and forty thousand doctors are at present in the United States, but of these less than one-half are available for military purposes. The constitutionality of the legislation which it is proposed to pass has been demonstrated.

Other Items

Final reports for the registration list shows 9,659,382 names enrolled, of whom 7,347,794 are white citizens; 953,899 are colored citizens; 1,239,865 are unnaturalized foreigners from countries other than Germany; 111,823 are unnaturalized Germans; and 6,001 are Indians. The report of the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce, declares: "There is nothing in the returns to indicate that there has been any general attempt at evasion of registration by any important element of the population. One county in New York and three precincts in Wyoming still remain to be heard from, but otherwise the figures are complete. The President has set July 5 as the day for registration in Alaska.

The Committee of National Research Council has recommended that the minimum height requirement for service in the army and navy be reduced from five feet four inches, the present requirement, to sixty-one inches, and that the minimum weight be reduced from 128 pounds to 120 pounds. The Committee declares that variation in height is due rather to normal racial characteristics derived from descent, than to physical degeneration. It is also proposed that for the requirement which demands that condidates for service in the army and navy should be able to speak, read and write the English language, another should be substituted calling for "a fair speaking-knowledge of the English language." The number of sound teeth required in those called to military service, according to the suggestions of the committee, would also be reduced.

On June 26 the Red Cross issued the statement that the Red Cross war fund of $100,000,000 had been subscribed. Since then $14,000,000 have been added to the fund. The campaign is still in progress. More than 4,000,000 men and women subscribed to the Liberty Loan, the total amount of subscriptions reaching the figure of $3,035,226,850. Only $2,000,000,000 of bonds will be allotted, so that the loan has been over-subscribed to the amount of $1,035,226,850. Twenty-one persons subscribed to sums of $5,000,000 and over, aggregating $188,789,900, and 3,960,000 persons to sums between $50 and $10,000.

France.—As a result of a Cabinet Meeting, M. Malvy, Minister of the Interior, has addressed to the prefects of the departments of France instructions to forbid the sale at retail of spirituous liquors testing over eighteen degrees of alcohol in cafés and saloons, except during the hours when the principal meals are served. Adult males can procure liquors during these hours, but women and minors under eighteen years of age will be unable to procure them at any time. Excluded from the scope of the regulations are beer, wines, cider, imitations of them, and all other aromatic wines and liquors, with not more than eighteen per cent of alcohol, and liquors prepared from fresh fruit with not more than twenty-three per cent of alcohol.

Drink Restrictions; Financial Measures

While these executive orders were being sent to the departments, a new Finance bill had been introduced into Parliament by the Minister of Finance, M. Joseph Thierry. If voted it will add $300,000,000 a year to the income of the country. The most radical of the features introduced into the bill is a tax upon the expenditures of individuals, which is to be collected by the merchants, who, when a sale is made, will add on behalf of the Government 5 per cent on all articles classed as indispensable and 10 per cent on luxuries. A tax of three-tenths of one per cent is proposed on all inheritances and donations exceeding in value $4,000. The special tax on war profits exceeding $100,000 will be increased to 80 per cent. Taxes on railroad transportation will be increased and transportation by water will be asked to pay a slight contribution. Admission fees will be required of visitors to museums, Government art galleries and the national palaces. The Government also proposes to place a small tax on all gas and electric light bills. An inventory of safe deposit boxes of deceased holders is also provided for in order better to verify inheritances.

Cardinal Dubois and the Dearth of Priests

On account of the general mobilization of the clergy which took place at the beginning of the war, and the recent drafting for service at the front or in the various branches of the Ambulance Corps, of those who had been left in their parishes, many localities in France, especially in the rural districts, have been left without priests. This sad condition of affairs has caused the most serious alarm. In a letter to Deputy Bignon, Mayor of Eu, and Chairman of the "Conseil général de la Seine-Inférieure," who had partially succeeded in remedying the evil in one of these parishes, his Eminence Cardinal Dubois, Archbishop of Rouen, after thanking the deputy for his efforts, calls the attention of the "Conseil général de la Seine-Inférieure" and through it, that of the authorities of the State, to certain administrative regulations and orders which grievously violate "the most sacred rights of a vast number of French Catholics."

The prelate recalls that by the first article of the "Law of Separation," all Frenchmen are guaranteed liberty of conscience and freedom of worship. It is true, adds the Cardinal, that by the second article of the same law, the Republic officially recognizes no creed or worship. But, "on the other hand, the Republic does not ignore, could not possibly ignore a religious fact. . . . The exercise and practice of religion is not in France an officially recognized service, but, no matter what may be said, it is a public one." The Cardinal then declares that the application of the recent laws with regard to the drafting of priests, has rendered practically impossible the exercise of public worship in many parishes. He then paints the spiritual destitution which is the inevitable result. In many parishes, the Sunday services have been entirely given up, catechism cannot be taught regularly, children have died unbaptized and the sick without the last Sacraments. He then pointedly asks "Where is that liberty of conscience and freedom of worship guaranteed us by law!" He acknowledges that in this supreme crisis, France needs all her children, and recalls with pride the splendid part played by the priests in the war, but he protests against the indiscriminate mobilization of the spiritual guides of the people, never needed more than they are now. But he sees no reason why, since men required at home for industrial, educational and medical purposes are not indiscriminately called to the colors, an invidious distinction should be made in case of priests. "Not one of our Allies, not one of our enemies acts in this manner. All alike know how to reconcile the exigencies of military service with the rights of conscience and freedom of worship." The Cardinal, in closing, begs M. Bignon to interest himself further in a cause which so deeply concerns the welfare of religion and the country. His noble appeal should not be unheeded.

Greece.—On June 25 it was announced from Athens that the Greek Cabinet headed by Alexander Zaimis had resigned and that King Alexander had informed M. Jonnart, the High Commissioner, representing France, Great Britain and Russia, that he would ask the former Premier, Eleutherios Venizelos, to form a new Cabinet. Two days after, the new Ministry, headed by M. Venizelos, took the oath of office at the palace and was acclaimed by the people on returning to the Government Building, where the new Premier thanked them for their support. Strong military precautions had been taken to prevent possible disorders, but they proved unnecessary. The new administration is made up as follows: Premier and Minister of War, M. Venizelos; Minister of the Interior, M. Repoulies; Minister of Justice, M. Tsirimokos; Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Politis; Minister of Marine, Admiral Coundouriotis; Minister of Finance, M. Michsalacopoudos; Minister of Agriculture, M. Negropontes; Minister of Communications, M. Papanastasion; Minister of Education, M. Dingas; Minister of Food Supplies, M. Embirkos; Minister of Relief for Refugees, M. Simos.

Venizelos Breaks with Central Powers

On June 29 further dispatches from the Greek capital announced that the Greek Government had broken diplomatic relations with Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey. The Government considered that a state of war existed since its advent to power. This declaration ranges on the side of the Entente fourteen nations. Twenty-one nations have broken off diplomatic relations with Berlin. Greece's act adds 3,000,000 to the 934,000,100 already arrayed against Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey with their 163,000,000.

Russia.—The Russian situation does not appear to have changed much. The Provisional Government is working hard in an effort to improve the country's financial and economic state. A supreme council, representing all interests, is planned for the organization of national production, and united with the council, there will be a new economic committee which will try to coordinate the different State departments, and undertake economic and industrial reforms. The Provisional Government has passed laws increasing the existing progressive income-tax thirty per cent. on incomes, exceeding $200,000, and the war-tax on increment of industrial profits to sixty per cent. Bills have been drafted establishing monopolies in minerals, fuel and sugar, and for transferring all fodder supplies to the State.

Taxes and Reforms

The Congress of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates which has been sitting at Petrograd, voted last week by a large majority to make no separate peace with Germany. The resolution which was proposed by revolutionary Socialists and Minimalist Social Democrats ended as follows:

> The present war arose in consequence of aspirations of imperialists prevailing among the ruling classes of all countries and tending toward the usurpation of markets and submission to their economic and political influence of small and decadent nations. The war is leading to complete exhaustion of the peoples of all countries and is placing the Russian revolution on the edge of a precipice. While making millions of victims and absorbing billions of the wealth of the country it threatens to increase still more the disorder in which Russia was left by the old régime, leading to famine and turning the country from productive labor for consolidation of its newly won liberty.
>
> The Congress recognizes consequently that the struggle for more rapid ending of the war constitutes the most important problem for the revolutionary democracy—a problem imposed as much by the interests of the revolution as by the aspirations of the workers of all countries to put an end to mutual extermination and restore their fraternal union for the common struggle for complete liberation of humanity.
>
> The Congress recognizes, first, that ending the war by means of the defeat of one of the belligerents would constitute the point of departure for fresh wars, increase dissensions among the nations and lead them to complete exhaustion, famine and ruin; second, that a separate peace would strengthen one of the belligerents and give it the possibility of gaining a decisive victory over the others, would strengthen aspirations toward usurpation by the ruling classes and, while liberating Russia from the grip of worldwide imperialism, would hinder international unification of workers. Consequently the Congress categorically rejects every policy tending in fact to the conclusion of a separate peace or to its prelude, a separate armistice.

In answer to the recent resolution passed by the Congress, calling for the dissolution of the Duma, the latter body decided at a private meeting of its members that as it has been loyal to the revolution, "The Duma is of the opinion that it cannot cease to exist as an organ of national representation and will adhere to its patriotic duty of raising its voice, if necessary, to preserve the fatherland from the dangers which threaten it."

On leaving Moscow for Petrograd on June 24 Mr. Root is reported to have found the situation more encouraging. He thought the Moscow Socialists were inclined to support the Provisional Government. "I have derived much more encouragement from my observations of conditions in Moscow than I expected," said Mr. Root. "It seems clear that the men we met there and the classes they represent are patriotically devoted to the task of bringing the country through her present difficulty. I may say that I think, after visiting Moscow, that there is a fair chance of their succeeding."

Mr. Root Optimistic

The morale of the army is also said to be better. M. Kerensky, Minister of War, surrounded with cavalry two revolting divisions of sharpshooters, and forced 500 of them to surrender. At the front the soldiers' fighting spirit is reviving and fraternizing with the enemy has stopped.

Spain.—The Dato Cabinet formed on June 12 seems so far able to cope with the economic, military and foreign problems confronting it. But owing to the unrest in the country, especially in Catalonia and the Asturias, the Government on June 25 decided to suspend all constitutional guarantees. This amounts to a proclamation of martial law. The decision of the Government was reached at a special meeting of the Cabinet and immediately after the King had signed the measure it went into effect. The constitutional guarantees have been suspended several times since the outbreak of the war and were restored only recently.

Constitutional Guarantees Suspended; Submarine Regulations

On June 30 King Alfonso signed a decree by which submarines of all the belligerent powers are forbidden to navigate within Spanish territorial waters or to enter Spanish ports; all such submarines which enter the Spanish zone for whatever reason will be interned until the end of the war; the submarines of neutral nations which enter Spanish territorial waters must navigate on the surface with their colors visibly displayed.

The Y. M. C. A.'s Protestantism

EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

IN last week's AMERICA it was established by quotations from the official resolutions of the Y. M. C. A. at its conventions, and from statements in its Hand Book, that the Y. M. C. A. is distinctly and exclusively a Protestant organization. If any further evidence is needed it may be found in a published interview which the writer had with Mr. L. Wilbur Messer, the General Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in Chicago. At the outset of the conversation I asked Mr. Messer's judgment on the articles in the series which had already appeared in the Queen's Work and which he had read carefully.

"How did these articles impress you, Mr. Messer," said I, "from the standpoint of an official of the Y. M. C. A.?"

"Your articles were very fair and true," he replied. "You called things by their right names and made them very clear." Mr. Messer offered no criticism of the previous articles. He seemed quite satisfied with their tone and substance.

"And now," I continued, "may I ask you to give me your frank and full opinion on the questions opened up by these articles, so that I can present these questions to my readers from the standpoint of a Y. M. C. A. official?"

"I shall be very glad to do so. First of all, I wish to emphasize this fact: The Y. M. C. A. is essentially a Protestant organization. In my judgment it should remain distinctly Protestant."

"I have been assured by one officer of the organization," I replied, "that in his opinion if the Catholics made a determined and unanimous demand for active membership it would be granted them."

"I do not agree with that view," Mr. Messer answered. "So far as I am concerned I would oppose such an attempt. I think that the Y. M. C. A. should remain what it has always been, a Protestant organization."

This account of the interview with Mr. Messer was submitted to him for approval before its publication, and in approving it he further declared that he had since the interview gone over the matter of our conversation with others among the heads of the Y. M. C. A. and found them in substantial agreement with the judgments he had here expressed.

Finally, in an article published in the Queen's Work for March, 1915, on the status of the Catholic young men in the Y. M. C. A., a number of quotations and instances were cited from the official organ of the Young Men's Christian Association, entitled Association Men, which strongly confirm the assertion that the Young Men's Christian Association is primarily a religious association and that its religion is entirely of the Protestant stamp.

The foregoing facts are not set forth in a spirit of criticism of the Y. M. C. A. The officials of the Association may be given credit for the activity with which they have sought to provide for the urgent needs of young men in the way of innocent recreation, good-fellowship and education. Their secretaries are desirous of promoting the interests of young men and use the means at their disposal with method and energy. But it must be remembered that they are working in a distinctly and professedly Protestant association, pledged to the Protestant churches and committed to promote their interests, officially excluding Catholics from active membership, and classing them among the non-Christians. They are therefore not suited for the care of our Catholic recruits.

As to the action of the President in commanding the officers of the army to render the fullest practicable assistance and cooperation in the maintenance and extension of the Association, both at permanent posts and stations and in camp and the field, our attitude is likewise not one of criticism but of comment and suggestion. The President is conversant with the salient fact thus put into words by the Association Hand Book in the chapter entitled, "Loyalty to the Church." "It should be borne in mind that no young man can become an active, voting member of the Y. M. C. A. or be admitted as a delegate to the International Convention of the Association unless he is a member, in good standing, of an evangelical church." (Hand Book, page 64.) So Mr. Wilson has knowingly aided a distinctly Protestant organization. Congress has given leave to use the moneys of the United States to provide heating and lighting for its buildings. This money is raised by taxation from the public in general. We have then a very clear case of active and material support and aid of a distinctly religious and Protestant organization by the President and Congress of the United States. It is to be supposed, however, that this aid and assistance is given by the President and Congress not as to a religious organization nor in support of any particular religious creed, but in recognition of the efficiency of the Y. M. C. A. to care for the physical and social needs of our soldiers in camp.

It is clear then that in taking this action the President and Congress have shown that where an organization, whether it be distinctly and characteristically religious or not, can offer the Government a special service which the Government needs, the Government will use the services of this organization for such purposes, not in consideration of its religious character, but in consideration of the material and tangible service which the organization renders to the Government of the United States. This seems to be a fair and just principle. It is one for which Catholics have been contending, more or less definitely, for many years.

The first provision of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States reads as follows: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The decisions of the Supreme Court have declared that this provision constitutes a guarantee of religious freedom and prohibits Congress legislating in favor of any particular religion, or of taxing the people for its support. The attitude of the Government is therefore one of enforced impartiality to all religious beliefs. In the words of Mr. Jefferson, this amounts to "building a wall of separation between Church and State." If, then, the President had intended by his order, quoted in our last article, to help the Y. M. C. A. as a religious body, or if Congress had intended to allow the officers of the army to supply the Y. M. C. A. as a religious body with heat and light at the Government's expense, their action would have been contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. But since they have done this thing in consideration of the material services rendered or to be rendered by the Y. M. C. A. quite apart from its religious and Protestant character, their action has been within the powers given them by the Constitution.

The whole spirit of our Government, refusing as it does to recognize any distinction or to entertain any favoritism for any form of Christian religion over the other, would demand that the same principles under which the President and Congress have acted towards the Y. M. C. A. should be applied toward Catholic organizations which, like the Y. M. C. A., are rendering services to the Government. While the Y. M. C. A. is efficiently serving the Government in one department, hundreds of Catholic organizations conducted by the devoted Sisterhoods are capable of serving and are actually serving the Government in many different capacities, rendering to the State as tangible and as valuable service as the Y. M. C. A.

The principle contained in the President's action towards the Y. M. C. A. may, we think, be enunciated in this manner. The United States Government has the right to seek and pay for services which it needs from any source whatsoever. If it cannot obtain these services from any existing private organization it has the right to create the necessary officials to provide these services for its needs. Where, however, an organization is already in existence, thoroughly qualified to provide just the sort of service which the Government requires, then it is the part of prudence that the Government use this existing organization, independently of the circumstance that it is or is not of a religious character, and to pay that organization either in service or in money for the material and tangible service rendered the Government, always understanding, however, that the Government has no right to support or favor the existing organization as a religious institution, but only in so far as it renders the Government material service appreciable in dollars and cents.

Applying this common-sense practice to the dealings of the Government with Catholic institutions, it would seem we have the right to expect, where Catholic organizations, as in the case of the Indian schools or of Catholic associations similar to the Y. M. C. A., or in any other case, render the Government definite and material service, that the Government should help them with money and service in proportion to the value of their assistance. It would be deeply injurious to the spirit of our laws if the Government of the United States should apply one set of rules of action to a distinctly religious and Protestant organization like the Y. M. C. A. and take a different and less favorable attitude towards a Catholic or any other religious organization whatsoever.

Viewed in its ultimate significance then, the action of the President in recognizing the Y. M. C. A. for its social efficiency has a strong bearing on the rights of Catholic organizations. The United States Government may pay for needed service wherever it finds it. Why should our wealthy and generous nation accept the help of the poverty-stricken Sisterhoods in such distinctly governmental functions as education, the care of the destitute and abandoned, the maintaining of asylums for orphans and defectives, and similar national and State utilities, without at the same time making any return whatever? For this one Protestant religious association which the President has chosen to help the Government, we can point to numbers of Catholic associations, both of men and women, who are giving their services to the State. The spirit of our Constitution requires an absolutely equal administration of the revenues of the people, irrespective of religious belief. From this standpoint the action of the President in regard to the Y. M. C. A. is even more far-reaching in its consequences than at first sight appears.

What we have said about governmental help to the Y. M. C. A. applies of course only to that body's ministrations among non-Catholic soldiers. While the Government is impartial to all beliefs, it has again and again in its official action admitted the principle that distinctly religious activities in behalf of members of the Catholic Church should be conducted according to the principles and laws of the Church itself. Now the Catholic Church admits of no participation in religious services of other denominations. Hence it would be a grievous violation of the spirit of our Constitution to subsidize and assist the Y. M. C. A. to extend its religious activities to the Catholic soldiers. Happily, a recent and well-authenticated report makes it clear that the President intends no such departure from the Constitution, for, according to the press, the War Department has officially approved of the Knights of Columbus as an agency for work among Catholics, thus placing the K. C. on an equal footing with the Y. M. C. A.

Reflections on a Revival

SHANE LESLIE

THE Rev. William Sunday has passed to his temporary rest. His voice will no longer cry over the wilderness of Harlem, "Make straight the way of the Lord," with every variation of slang imaginable to an athletic mind, and we ask where are we? Whether people heard him or not, they seem to be the same old spiritual sixpences. They do not deny the sincerity or envy the business methods shown by his mission. Both leave them neither warm nor cold. But they feel the pathos of his efforts.

It seems fatuous to discuss whether slang is reverent or not in preaching. The medievals flooded the street corners with religious slang. Many a "Friar Friday" called folk to repentance with crude and bitter words that shocked as much as they melted. When slang was needed, the Church never turned an eyelash. Ecclesiastical slang, now a lingering affectation of ritualistic life, was once an art. But the holy slang of the medievals touched the sublime. When civilization was steeped in religion, slang came as a variant. When civilization is materialism, as today, there is danger that religion presented in slang may fall to its own foible.

No doubt the comic element in man almost as clearly distinguishes him from the beast as does the religious element. Laughter and religious ecstasy are somewhat akin. Physically prayer and laughter can be ridiculously alike, the opened mouth, the shaking organs of the body, the salt tears and the feeling of katharsis or purification in the mind. Theologically one has a high mystical value. The other has not. One cannot laugh oneself into heaven or slip under the bars by twitting St. Peter. Some of us go too far in imagining God saying: "I hate your jokes, and religious slang is an abomination unto me." Nor can we say that God has a sense of humor, but as He is omniscient He must know what a sense of humor is. Charles Kingsley thought the Creator actually had a comic sense and called attention to the crab in proof. We forbear to think whether the heavenly Hierarchy has been amused or not by the antics in the New York Tabernacle.

The Salvationists gave us what Huxley called "corybantic Christianity" and Billy Sunday has given us galvanic Christianity. It could hardly be otherwise. The time of the hallelujah maenads has passed. The Salvation Army has become respectable and slow. It bespoke a kind of spiritual drill and massage. But now there is no time for loose tweakings or for casting a net at a venture. Consummate business methods are necessary to throw up an immediate result that can be flashed in advertisement and handled by journalism. Christianity in New York lies too dead for massage and it requires galvanization. And it got it!

All that sheer business-sense could suggest was done. Busses, placards, posters, stenographers and printers did their work. A conventicle claque was provided and the converted reconverted to enthusiastic order. Thousands hit the starry trail, thousands shook a prophet's hand, thousands hoped . . . believed.

It seems too good to be true. Is Heaven as easy to get to as going to a circus and shaking hands with the entertainer? The music is cheerful, if one understands music, and the entertainer is arresting even to an old habitué of vaudeville, but somehow if one understands the difficulty of religion, it is all pathetic. Mr. Sunday has no doubts, no internal strife, no theology. The Kingdom of Heaven can be handed out like oyster-soup and for the purpose of supplying savor and condiment to the old-fashioned mush. Billy Sunday plays the part of the appetizer until the audience feels that what is only soup has got the very sparkle of champagne. In all of this some good is done to the irreligious and many folk are left happier and more comfortable in body and soul than they ever felt before. But with the orthodox, the stupid and the judicious there is left a faraway sense of pathos, pathos that in 2,000 years of Christian history we have not got further than this. For what does such a mission lead to? Can it be called a revival? Is it a fitting prelude to the apocalypse of war?

A religious revival such as took place in Wales some years ago seemed a moving of the soul. Men and women prayed in tears all night, in the lonely mountain chapels. The evangelists wrestled like some weak swimmers in their agony. There was no advertisement, no finance, no laughter. The dim cravings of the Celtic spirit seemed to be seeking some new undefined channel of religious expression in default of the old. There arose a mystic cry for God. No man knew or could explain what happened. The Welsh revival passed as mysteriously as it came. To the respectful Catholic it seemed full of hope and imbued with meaning because it was mystical. Father Benson used to say of religious outpourings that they were all to the good. They generated, he thought, a spiritual electricity which was never lost. He felt that the Evangelical movement of one generation passed into the Catholic movement of the next, and that the most wayward rivers and fantastic brooks found their way eventually to the sea. Perhaps he was right.

But as far as spasmodic galvanization goes, Billy Sunday has won a passing triumph. Energy and popular favor are a fine pair. With these hitched to a light-built creed Billy has Phoebus-like essayed to drive this chariot of righteousness across the New York sky. The Rockefeller patronage must have been a great drag. The gulf that lies between the Standard Oil and the Sermon on the Mount is one that even a tight-rope walker like Sunday did not attempt to cross. People are willing to admit that he is not out for money and yet the rich are with him. Certain texts have to be politely left in the background. Indeed most churches have long since done the very same.

There have been no prophets in this war. If the good God sent Billy Sunday, He seems to have done so in the same lightness of heart with which America has taken Him. As this great Republic approaches her trial and agony she may or may not remember with a pathetic smile the gyrations of the strange messenger who turned spiritual somersaults by diversion, or preparation for the fast-coming apocalypse. She may think of him, simply because no other voice was raised in those latter days, and perhaps because she had deserved no other prophet. We do not mean to say that it pleased the humor of Providence to make fun of good Americans, but we feel there is a pathos of contrast in the supreme destiny America has taken upon herself and in the curious laughter-swept antics in the Tabernacle, which have preceded her entry into the war.

It is an agony to many that there has been such slight sign of the Second Coming in this time and that the schools of the Prophets seem closed. No Divine manifestation has been vouchsafed, but had He come and stood awhile at the gates of the country that calls itself "God's own," we feel that He would have wept over New York and bade the daughters of America weep for their children as He once counseled the women of Jerusalem. He would have come sadly no doubt and spoken in perfectly empty churches. His words would have been as an ointment unto burial and His voice a benediction unto pain. But He would not have availed to make New York weep. This Mr. Sunday realized, so he made New York grin and the spiritual and permanent value of his mission is exactly that of a good and cheerful grin in the face of eschatological possibilities. So we come back to the choice of laughter or of mysticism, of the human or the Divine attitude toward what is terrible in life and unknown after life. The Catholic Church has long fallen back upon mysticism. But Americans are free to mourn or grin in spirit as they approach their portion of pain and curtains of fire.

Luther and Woman

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

LUTHER has been acclaimed the restorer of woman's dignity. The Fathers of the Church, he tells us, had never written anything worthy of note upon the subject of matrimony. God had waited for his coming in order that marriage might be reestablished in the world before the Last Day, as it had from the first been "instituted and commanded." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. LXI, p. 178.) Catholics, we are assured, had hitherto regarded the nuptial state as "un-Christian" and entirely "dedicated to the devil." "They have made mortal sins of all the words and actions of married people, and I myself, when I was still a monk, had the same idea: that the married life was a damned state." ("M. Lutheri Exegetica Opera Latina," Vol. VI, p. 283. Grisar II, p. 481, etc.)

There is one short word which adequately describes such statements as the foregoing. That here, as elsewhere when speaking of the Church, Luther should wilfully misrepresent the truth is not strange. It is the simple application of his principle that a lie must not be balked at when it serves the New Evangel: "What would it matter," he said in the famous case of the Landgrave of Hesse, "if for the sake of a greater good and of the Christian Church one were to tell a big round lie?"—"Ein gudte stargke Lugen thet," in Luther's sixteenth-century German. ("Briefwechsel," between Philip and Bucer, Vol. I, p. 369.)

That Luther was aware he was libeling the Church is plain from his own earlier writings, in which the Catholic attitude towards matrimony is perfectly stated. "Matrimony," he wrote in 1519, "is a Sacrament, an external, sacred sign of the most high, holy, worthy, and noble thing that ever was or ever will be, the union of the Divine and human nature in Christ." This is the exact description given by the Roman Pontiffs of the Sacrament of Matrimony as existing between the Faithful when consummated, while the Sacrament in general is described as representing the union between Christ and His Church. Luther then continues to speak of it as a "bond of fidelity," which has for "its end and principle object" to bear children who are to be "educated in the service of God." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXIV, 2, p. 63.) This definition of the Catholic doctrine, as it has always been held in the Church, is completed by the equally Catholic statement: "Marriage is good, virginity is better"; "Bonum coniugium, melior virginitas." (Weimar Ed., Vol. VIII, p. 330.)

Luther therefore merely applied his clearly expressed principle about lying when he said that as a monk he had believed, in common with other Catholics, that all the words and actions of married people are mortal sins. No Catholic ever believed so absurd a doctrine, and nowhere is married life esteemed so highly and held to be so holy and sacred as within the Catholic Church. In rating the chastity of the virginal state as higher in excellence than matrimonial life, the Church was not belittling the latter, but was merely repeating the plain teaching of Christ and of St. Paul. But a great change had come over Luther, and no one who discerningly follows the development of his New Evangel can say that it was a change for the better.

Marriage in the first place was robbed by him of its sacramental character, and entirely secularized. It became for him "an external bodily thing, like any other manipulation." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XVI, p. 519.) It was to be regarded simply like eating, drinking and sleeping; whence he also concludes: "As I can eat, drink, sleep, walk, ride, trade and deal with a pagan, a Jew, a Turk and a heretic, so too I may marry and remain married with them." (Ibid., Vol. LXI, p. 205.) Finally, after being robbed of all its sacredness, marriage was handed over by Luther entirely to the secular powers: "Hitherto I was foolish enough to expect more than is human from human beings, and to imagine that they could be guided by the Gospel. No, the fact shows that they despise God and would be forced by the law and the sword." ("Briefwechsel," Vol. VI, p. 6.) Such was the disastrous effect of his new doctrine from the very first, and such the cynicism of Luther.

Secondly, it was Luther, and not the Church, who taught that matrimony is of necessity sinful. This statement may appear startling to those who are not acquainted with the real Luther and his teachings. "The matrimonial duty," he says, "is never performed without sin." (Weimar Ed., Vol. XX, 2, p. 304.) That sin, which he holds married people must of necessity continually commit, is described by him as in its nature "differing in nothing from adultery and fornication." (Ibid., Vol. VIII, p. 654.) To complete the absurdity of his doctrine, he adds that the heinous sin thus repeatedly committed by every person in the married state is overlooked by God out of pure mercy, "since it is impossible for us to avoid it, although we are obliged to refrain from it." (Ibid.) Could any doctrine be more unreasonable, more disgraceful, or more dishonorable to God?

In the third place, marriage is made of strict obligation by Luther. Mistaking for a universal law God's blessing, "Increase and multiply," spoken likewise over the fish and fowl which surely were not capable of receiving a Divine precept, Luther created a new commandment, thus placing himself in opposition to the words of Our Lord and of St. Paul, who, though not enjoining the state of virginity, yet highly commended it. Here then is Luther's law: "Whatever is man must have a wife." (Weimar Ed., Vol. X, 2, p. 276.) So likewise he commands every woman to have a husband. Some rare exceptions, he admits, are made by God; but these are "wonders," and no man or woman is to presume that such a miracle will be worked in his or her regard. In a letter to Archbishop Albrecht, dated June 2, 1525, he thus applies his hitherto unheard-of law:

> It is a terrible thing for a man to be found without wife at the hour of death. He must at least have the intention and resolution of entering into the married state. For what answer will he give to Almighty God when He asks of him: "I made you a man, who is not to stand alone, but is to have a wife. Where is your wife?" (De Wette, Vol. II, p. 676.)

No less terrible, however, will be the fate of the unmarried woman. "God's word and work are evident," says Luther, "that woman must be used for matrimony or for lust." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. LI, p. 6.) We forbear to give his plainer language. All single women are flatly accused by him of immorality:

> Though women-folk are ashamed to confess it, yet it is proved by Scripture and experience that there is not one among many thousands to whom God gives the grace to keep pure chastity; but a woman has no power over herself. (Ibid., II, p. 535.)

Can any Protestant woman consent to the apotheosis of the shameless ex-monk who thus defames her sex and slanders her sisters who by thousands upon thousands are living pure lives in the unmarried state? Can a Protestant gentleman, once he understands Luther's infamous slander of womankind, look on such doctrine with indifference?

Much is said of the domestic felicity of Luther's household, and tender passages are quoted from his letters. But is there a Protestant woman so far lost to all sense of decency that she could sit down without shame and indignation at Luther's table and listen to his outpourings of coarse and vulgar jests at her own sex and at all that is sacred in her person, "taking a stable boy's unclean delight at rude witticisms over woman's physical differentiation from man"? Even the most foul-mouthed of Luther's contemporaries found his language too obscene. A volume could be filled with Luther's scurrilities that would be fit reading nowhere outside the bottomless pit. Yet out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.

How profound his appreciation for woman really was may be gauged from the following estimate written by him in defense of her sex:

> The body of women is not strong, and their soul is even weaker in the common run. So it is a matter of importance whether the Lord places a wild or a mild one at our side. The woman is half a child. He who takes a woman should consider himself as the guardian of a child. . . . She is likewise a freakish animal ("ein toll Thier"). Recognize her weakness. If she does not always walk in the straight path, guide her weakness. A woman remains a woman in eternity. (Weimar, Ed., Vol. XV, p. 420.)

His personal experience gave him little opportunity to act upon his own advice, for "Master Kate," as he called his wife, was not the "weaker vessel" so far as family authority was concerned. "If I were to woo another," he said, "I would hew me an obedient wife out of a block of stone, else I despair of the obedience of all wives." (Köstlin-Kawerau, II, p. 487.) The fact is, however, that Luther had not done the wooing, since Kate had simply offered herself indifferently to him and his friend Amsdorf. Luther took her, and we do not wish to question either his affection or his fidelity towards her. These are the least to be expected of any married man. The religious exaltation of his ideals may be judged from the following "jocular" language which occurs in a letter to Spalatin by Luther before his own marriage. He is urging his clerical friend to marry, and says:

> But if you desire me for an example, behold I have given you a most signal one. For I have had three wives at once, and loved them so ardently that I have lost two of them, who will take other husbands. The third I scarcely hold on my left arm, and am perhaps about to lose her too ("Briefwechsel," Vol. V, p. 157.)

While this is merely a sample of Luther's idea of humor, his permission given to the Landgrave of Hesse to have two wives at once is sufficiently well known. A confessed libertine, the ruler had delicately hinted at the strong support he might give to the New Evangel if the keeping of two wives were granted him, and it was therefore deemed advisable for the sake of the good cause to permit this on condition of secrecy, "for the Church is poor and miserable, small and desolate, and is indeed in want of righteous rulers (!)" (De Wette, Vol. V, p. 237.) The reason of piety is likewise alleged, for when did this ever fail even the devil himself: "If his Highness does not abstain from an impure life, which according to his own statement is impossible, it is better that he should provide for the peace and security of his conscience by an additional marriage." (Ibid.)

This must not, however, be regarded as an isolated case. The right of keeping several wives was openly preached by Luther. "It is not forbidden that a man should have more than one wife. I could not forbid it today." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXXIII, p. 324.) It is true that Luther did not advise it, and that, as occasion served, he even severely reprehended it. Yet he held it to be entirely permissible before God. In the test case at Orlamünde, when his counsel was asked, he gave the same clear reply: "I confess that if a man wishes to marry several wives, I cannot forbid it, nor is it in opposition to the Holy Scriptures." "Ego sane fateor, me non posse prohibere, si quis plures uxores velit ducere, nec repugnat sacris literis." (De Wette, Vol. II, p. 459.) Thus, in spite of empty remonstrances, was a complete license given for polygamy, as the Landgrave of Hesse said, to abbreviate his words: "If it is right in conscience before Almighty God, what do I care for the cursed world!"

When Luther's sanction of Philip's bigamy became public, Melanchthon was deeply chagrined, but Luther soon recovered himself, and joked about the topic, even bantering his wife upon the subject, in that ideal home, by telling her the time was coming when "A man will take several wives," to which the meek Kate replied: "The devil believe it!" Decency forbids quotation of Luther's argument. A marvelous application of supposed texts now followed: "Paul said," was Kate's rejoinder, "'Let every man have his own wife.'" To which the Doctor replied "'His own,' but not 'one only one,' that cannot be found in Paul." So, we are authentically informed, "The Doctor joked for a long time, until the Doctor's wife said: 'Before I will tolerate that, I will rather go back into the convent, and leave you and all the children alone.'" (Schlaginhaufen, "Tischreden Luthers aus den Yahren 1531 und 1532," p. 69.)

Whether or not Luther rejected this doctrine in an isolated passage towards the end of his life, is of small concern. In word and practice he had defended polygamy as entirely "Christian" and lawful before God. Mormonism is nothing more than the consistent application of his words. Polygamy is inseparably connected with the name of Luther; we cannot loathe the one and extol the other.

Adultery, with the husband's consent, is also expressly sanctioned by Luther, when no children result from the marriage. The child thus secretly begotten is to be ascribed to the legal husband. (Weimar Ed., Vol. VI, p. 558.) The keeping of a mistress, too, is strongly urged by him upon those who were bound by vow to celibacy: "Let them secretly marry their cook." (Lauterbach, "Tagebuch," p. 198.) Neither before the law nor before the Church was this a marriage, and its object is clear.

The members of the Teutonic Order were expressly told by him not to seek a dispensation for marriage from the Council. "I would rather look through God's fingers and trust in His grace for him who has two or three concubines, than for him who takes a lawful wife with the consent of the Council." (Weimar Ed., Vol. XII, p. 237, etc.) And what are we to say of the brutal language regarding the wife who refuses her duty: "If the woman would not, let the maid come." The husband has only to "Let Vasthi go and take an Esther, like King Assuerus." (Ibid., Vol. X, 2, p. 290.) To the wife's remonstrance he is simply to say: "Go — and run to the devil!" (Ibid., III, p. 222.)

We might multiply quotations but the subject is too nauseating; it smells to heaven. Yet mention of it cannot be avoided if Luther is to be seen in his true light. Many beautiful passages can doubtless be gathered from his writings, but they are merely the remnant of his Catholic inheritance. What has here been given is Luther's own entirely, and upon this must therefore be founded his claim to a Divine mission. One-tenth of what is quoted here is sufficient to discredit him forever as a religious teacher.

An Open Letter to a Modern Artist

A. L. Holmes

SIR: You have arrived upon the earth at a fortunate moment. I will not venture to say that there have not been periods in the world's history when a more general interest was taken in art. I am inclined to think that there have been such periods. But in such periods the advantage which the artist derived from the wider dissemination of taste was in part at any rate neutralized by the unfortunate narrowness and severity with which his work was judged. If I may put it briefly, there may have been ages when the profession of an artist was more profitable, there never can have been an age when it was easier.

Your predecessors of a ruder time used to attempt to draw certain things, to reproduce on canvas what their vision saw. The practice was for a thousand reasons worthy of a severe condemnation. It was crude, stupid, reactionary, degrading, unimaginative, bourgeois. Also, it was very difficult.

You have the good fortune to escape the "Dark Ages" that lie behind us. We need not refer to poor fellows like Raphael and Titian and Velasquez and Rembrandt. Even Whistler is out of date. We are all post-impressionists now. Whistler meant well, but he suffered from an incurable habit of producing effects that really bore some resemblances to effects that one had seen. He painted oddly, no doubt; and he had all the talents of a charlatan in addition to the genius of an artist. Still, when he painted Battersea Bridge at night, anyone who had seen Battersea Bridge at night felt a queer sensation which can only be expressed by saying, crude as it may seem, that it looked rather like it. This was the fatal error which warped his unquestionable abilities. It must have put him to a quite unnecessary amount of trouble, besides destroying his influence with a younger and more emancipated generation. Then, too, when he drew the human figure, he made it anatomically correct. This was an even graver artistic sin, but it is one into which I am happy to think you are in little danger of falling.

There are several methods open to a really advanced artist such as I conceive you to be. Here is one: I hardly venture to recommend it; though easy and I believe remunerative, it involves a certain initial expenditure on the purchase of a ruler and a pair of compasses. When once, however, this small capital has been accumulated, a number of astonishing masterpieces may be produced with great facility.

The method is as follows: Take a blank piece of paper, and then with the ruler draw a number of straight lines diagonally from right to left or left to right, across it. Then, taking your compass, describe sundry circles. These circles must on no account be completed, but must impinge on the aforesaid straight lines. Smaller circles may be made within these, provided that they are made to look odd by having a different center. When this feat of composition has been duly accomplished, proceed to put in a certain amount of criss-cross shading wherever it may occur to you to do so, always with this reservation, that it shall be entirely unmeaning.

A superficial reader might think that I am merely recommending what at school we used to call "freehand" while a coarser mind might suggest that I am merely instructing you how to imitate the design of a Turkish carpet. You, I am sure, are too cultured to entertain so unworthy a thought. Between the type of art to which I am introducing you and any form of mere decoration, there is this essential difference: that in your picture there must on no account be any balance to the design. None of the lines must go anywhere or mean anything, even to the eye. They must go elaborately and ingeniously wrong. The effect at which you must try to aim in so far as any earthly product may serve you as a model is rather that of a number of odd pieces of linoleum sewn together.

This artistic school is called, I believe, "proportionism." It is practised in particular by a certain Mr. Herbin. There is a monument in the Mall in Central Park, New York, which bears evidence of its influence.

However, as I say, I hardly venture to recommend proportionism to you. For besides the incidental expenditure on mathematical instruments, it requires a hand steady enough to hold the compasses and to keep the ruler straight. And many persons with the artistic temperament do not possess this qualification, especially late at night. To such distinguished persons I would rather suggest the artistic method of M. Picasso, of which I fear I do not know the correct name.

After a close study of one of M. Picasso's drawings, I think that I may boast that I have torn the heart out of his secret. I now give it to the world. Like most of the secrets of great men, it has about it a wonderful simplicity. It rests on nothing more recondite than the non-absorbent powers of ordinary paper. If you write your name or a statement of your religious opinions on a piece of paper, taking care that your pen is full of ink when you do so, and then instantly fold it before it has time to dry, you will find that the ink will smudge and run and produce all sorts of queer and complex patterns, particularly if you run your finger gently but firmly along the crease after folding. It used to be one of the amusements of my childhood. But M. Picasso, with the inspiration of genius, has developed the idea to extensions hitherto undreamed of. He has, as far as I can follow his method, scribbled things all over a piece of paper and then folded it in different directions, so that the ink ran across the sheet in all sorts of odd channels. By conscientiously pursuing this program he has produced something which might be mistaken for a man's house, if it were not a lady's parasol. He describes this particular drawing as a presentation of a mandolin, a wine-glass, and something else, the nature of which I forget. I take it, however, that these were the words written on the piece of paper before it was blotted.

I need not tell you that there are all sorts of variations. There is a French artist who has achieved a great reputation by painting all his interiors as though they were seen through thick fumes of nitric acid. But then you have to be able to handle a brush to some extent to produce that effect, which is always a disadvantage. I believe that there is an even more advanced fellow in Paris at the present time who makes his men out of triangles. I do not know how this is done, but it sounds rather like the things I used to scribble in my Euclid at school. By the way, we had a beautiful way of drawing Henry VIII in fifteen straight lines, but that would hardly do. It was not advanced enough. It really looked rather like him. Then the same objection applies to the cat we used to make out of two lines and two small circles with the addition of straight lines for whiskers, and to the way of drawing Napoleon Bonaparte which I invented myself and of which I am quite obstinately proud. But let us leave on one side such follies of mere realism and return to the claims of your art.

Of course I do not want you to follow slavishly any of the great masters to whom I have alluded. Freedom, I must inform you, is the keystone of the new art. A great deal can be done by drawing quite ordinary figures and shading them wrong, drawing black transverse lines at random across the face and hands. Then there are those human figures which children draw with four dots for eyes, nose and mouth, and forks for hands. I fancy that something might be done with these if they were properly introduced to the cultured and admiring public.

Failing all these there is always the expedient of taking a pen very full of ink in one hand, bending it backwards, letting it fly sharply forward in the direction of a piece of blank paper pinned to the wall. In this way a number of spots of ink of irregular size and shape will be obtained. I can imagine an entirely new school being founded in this way.

On the matter that most immediately concerns you, I am afraid I can give you little or no information that can be of service to you. I do not know how much they pay for such things. But seeing that, at a very moderate estimate, some half-dozen specimens of the newest art could easily be produced in half an hour, the gross receipts ought to be at least equal to the wages of a skilled engineer. And the work is very much less trying.

Francis Grierson

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

IT will be welcome news to those who appreciate the importance of literature to learn that Francis Grierson has decided to stay in the United States and that he is now contemplating a book to be issued at the close of the war which will be more definitely connected with American life than any of his books since "The Valley of Shadows." The latter book dealt with conditions in this country prior to and during the Civil War, but the new book will deal with later developments of the national life and characteristics.

The recent announcement of Francis Grierson's conversion to the Church will be of additional interest to all Catholics who are aware of the enormous influence wielded by this modern master of stylistic prose, who, although he has been until of late years known only by a few, is now emerging from this limited circle of appreciation into wide and ever-increasing popular attention.

The personality of this artist so fundamentally colors his work, explaining his tendencies and certain of its peculiarities, that it will be well to set forth a few of the main facts concerning him before discussing the work itself.

His life has been a continuous romance. "He is one of the most mysterious personalities now before the lettered public," as Arnold Bennett recently wrote concerning him. "His life has been quite special in its inclusiveness. Not every one can talk of Abraham Lincoln in Illinois, and Stéphane Mallarmé and the elder Dumas in Paris with equal sympathy and knowledge." Perhaps no writer is more personal or more designedly so, yet without being obtrusive, still less morbidly objective. He is even less prone to obvious objectification of his own experiences; indeed at times nothing can be more tantalizing than his reticence. For he is continually opening vistas toward experiences which we would delight to know more about. His is not the egotism, or morbid frankness of a Rousseau, a Tolstoy, an Amiel, or a Bernard Shaw. In other words, neither a morbid habit of introspection, nor ethical nor sociological motives impel him to make use of his own experiences, impressions, and ways of thinking, in his work. He is always the artist. His extraordinarily varied and exceptional life, however, is his main subject-matter, his material. What he himself has seen, felt, known, divined or conjectured, and not what others have told him, or what he has read in books, supplies him with themes and subjects. But he does not dissect his life like a surgeon, or a scientific psychologist or a moralist; he shapes it in varied forms of artistic beauty. To those merely curious in the matter of biographical facts and material adventures, he has little to give; but for those happily constituted persons who delight in the results wrought through the marvelous and perhaps unfathomable alchemy of artistic genius, whereby the experiences and impressions, and imaginings, and innate temperamental qualities of a human being in his progress through life are transmuted into shapes of beauty—for these people of true culture, who are so rapidly increasing in America, and without whom the creative artist labors in vain—no modern author is a more fascinating study than Francis Grierson.

Born in England some sixty years ago, he came to America with his parents before the Civil War, and lived on the Illinois prairie and later in Alton and in St. Louis. He knew intimately the conditions and the people of Lincoln's country, and came under the spell of the greatest American. He heard the decisive debate in Alton between Lincoln and Douglas. He walked by the bier of the martyr. The influences of that epochal period left ineffaceable and profound impressions on him, which nearly half a century later inspired and guided the composition of "The Valley of Shadows." While yet a youth he went to Europe to cultivate a musical talent that made him renowned as a prodigy. Alexandre Dumas, the elder, whom he met in Paris, predicted that his unusual gifts would open all doors before him, and so it was. He lived a cosmopolitan life for the next forty years in all the capitals of Europe, and everywhere became the associate of artists of all kinds, and thinkers, and the leaders of the worlds of science, philosophy and society.

Not until he had lived a long life of a kind, perhaps unique in the fashion in which it brought opportunities for contact with those inner circles of men and women who really shape the world, did he come before the world with writings of his own. In 1899 he issued a privately printed little book of essays and aphorisms in the French language, entitled "La Révolte Idéaliste," published in Paris. It was not placed on sale, nor advertised; nor was it reviewed in the journals, so little was its author publicly known at that time. Nevertheless, within a few weeks of its publication, scores of letters from leading French poets and thinkers and artists of all kinds and degrees of opinions, Academicians, anti-Academicians, Imperialists, Republicans, members of the old Catholic aristocracy, and young Socialists, poured in.

Writers and thinkers of such diverse types as Jules Claretie, Sully Prudhomme, Maurice Maeterlinck, the Duc d'Aumale, Jules Simon, Stéphane Mallarmé, hastened to recognize the value of the new force thus expressed. Italy and Spain responded to its influence. It touched the very well-springs of art and culture, little as the general public was aware of what was taking place. The time was ripe, however, for what Francis Grierson had to say. It was the dawn of the new age. Everywhere there was a surging of spiritual revolt against the deadening reign of the ultra-materialistic era of so-called "naturalism," and "scientific documentarianism" in art, of which Zola was the great protagonist. This movement had accomplished its work of correcting the extravagances of the morbid and ill-balanced romanticism that culminated in the 30's, and now in turn it was passing away before the tide of the spiritual renaissance.

This stroke, which produced such fundamentally important results in the Latin countries, was followed by the appearance of his first English book, "Modern Mysticism." Widely known as the French essays had made their author among the first-class intellects of Continental Europe, in England he was quite unknown as a writer. In England, too, as in Europe, materialism was rampant; although there also the Celtic revival, and other spiritual manifestations were making head. In 1901 appeared the second book of English essays, "The Celtic Temperament," which confirmed the first impression. It was now apparent that a new literary force of the first magnitude was affecting English art and thought at their sources. The younger generation was especially responsive. The innate, temperamental zest and youthfulness of Francis Grierson, and his faith in true progress, were duly prized. This deep freshness and youthfulness are remarkable when the writer's years and experience are taken into account; for how often do we not see writers become the victims of life, and not life's masters; how often do they not become utterly bored, jaded, cynical and disappointed and succumb to a pessimism which this new age cannot possibly accept. We can no longer be deceived either by credulous, self-hypnotizing ultra "optimists," or by crabbed, pathological "pessimists," with all their conflicting systems and "isms." No part of Francis Grierson's message—if one may use the word "message," that somewhat smacks of cant, in speaking of an artist so free from all traces of dogmatism and cant—is more welcome to the readers of today than his injunctions to disregard the tribe of Ism-ites.

For eight years after the appearance of "The Celtic Temperament" Mr. Grierson devoted himself to the composition of his next and greatest work, "The Valley of Shadows." It seems to me that this book is now effecting the same kind of influence in America that his other works produced in Europe. It would be a dubious compliment to an artist so quintessentially cosmopolitan to "claim him," as the phrase runs, as an American writer; nevertheless, his most plastic and impressionable period was passed in America at an epochal time and place, and his greatest work, "The Valley of Shadows," is a truly American book.

"The Valley of Shadows" is not a novel; but it exerts all the interest of moving incident, poetical atmosphere, and vital character-portraiture of the novel when at its best and highest development. It deals with the scenes and recollections of the author's early life in Illinois and Missouri. "A cosmopolitan life in the different capitals of Europe during a period of forty years has not sufficed to alienate the romance and memory of those wonderful times," he writes in his preface.

> In looking back I have come to the conclusion that the power displayed by the most influential preachers and politicians of the ante-bellum days in Illinois was a power emanating from the spiritual side of life, and I have done my best to depict the "silences" that belonged to the prairies, for out of those silences came the voices of preacher and prophet and a host of workers and heroes in the great War of Secession. . . . Swiftly and silently came the mighty influences. Thousands labored on in silence; thousands were acting under an imperative, spiritual impulse without knowing it; the whole country round about Springfield was being illuminated by the genius of one man, whose influence penetrated all hearts, creeds, parties and institutions.

Perhaps only creative artists can appreciate the magnitude and difficulty of the task Francis Grierson set for himself. To make audible the voices of silence! To embody the impalpable yet fundamental forces emanating from "the spiritual side of life!" For, just in proportion to the profundity of impressions does the difficulty of adequately portraying such impressions become. But although perhaps only poets may realize the hardness and arduousness of the solid, prolonged creative labors necessary to write a book like this, its splendid success is of a nature to appeal to and impress itself indelibly upon all readers who possess a spark of spiritual sensitiveness. Not bookish culture, but the true culture which even unlettered persons may have, the true culture which is that inherent quality of responsiveness to beautiful things, is the key that unlocks the abiding charm of "The Valley of Shadows." The book is as simple as the prairie land that inspired it, and it is brooded over, and interpenetrated, as the primitive prairies were, by the same charm, "created by beauty instead of awe"; and from its pages issue the voices of the mighty silences that saved the new world from destruction and laid anew the foundations of its national existence."

At a time like the present when there is such a restless stirring of all the hidden forces of life, expressing themselves in literature and in all the forms of art with great power, and in many cases with deplorable perversions of this power, it is a goodly thing to be able to chronicle the fact that a writer of such intensely artistic quality as Francis Grierson, one with such a unique order of experience, and one who has been accepted by the most cultured circles of the age, has turned explicitly toward that fixed point which modern society must possess if it is to save itself from whirling apart, namely, religion, the Church.

No book will be more eagerly awaited by those who are aware of its author's ability than the new book which will express Francis Grierson's appreciation of the power of the Catholic religion to influence American life for its betterment.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

The Irish Question

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"The Irish question" is not merely a racial interrogation, it is the voice of humanity crying down the ages, since the dawn of intelligence in man. It asks freedom for the individual to express himself in his own way. It demands for the small nation the right to exist of itself, for itself, and by itself. The Irish question is not to be dismissed by a lampoon nor answered with a machine-gun. Both ways have been tried with a like measure of success. Love of freedom is personified in this ancient race, which from the beginning of civilized history has occupied the little island, the outmost sentinel of the western world. The cry of the brotherhood of man has penetrated even to the frozen steppes of Siberia, and yet Great Britain seems to be deaf to that cry as far as Ireland is concerned. It does not realize that humanity speaks through the medium of the Irish people. The Irishman, demanding his rights, is still merely an obnoxious neighbor who insists on living in the humble hut which has sheltered his family for generations, and stubbornly refuses to tear it down.

England's Government is utterly unable to change her viewpoint. "Humanity," "the rights of small nations," "liberty of conscience," these phrases she tosses off with no apparent consciousness that any one will ever call her to task for not applying them to her treatment of Ireland. When pinned down to a definite reply, her naïve answer is that on account of Ireland's location she needs her. This seems to be England's unanswerable argument in defense of her violation of those laws of equity which she claims all civilized people should help her to uphold.

For 700 years the Irish have endured every sorrow that has ever fallen to the lot of a people: poverty, disease, famine, exile, religious persecution, and brutal ridicule. Their sons have been banished or conscripted, their daughters driven into menial service. The very names of their much-loved patron Saints have become synonymous with subjection and servitude.

Does it not argue for something fine and lasting in a people that they could come through this ordeal with an unsullied self-respect and a nature free from bitterness? That hope which never leaves the Irish heart is a spiritual uplift which banishes despair and preserves sanity. Ireland has a nation-wide poverty but not a national pessimism.

The Irish of today know that in Easter week, 1916, a little band of martyrs played a losing part, but in dying they stripped England bare of all pretenses before the eyes of the whole world. They were willing to die. They knew it was necessary in order to advertise the great cause of "Ireland's freedom" by setting up "a republic for six days." They died not for Ireland alone, but for the right of all small nations to exist. Irish loyalty to the ideal of freedom is not a stubborn determination of the will. It is something bigger, it is of the quality of the spirit. It is as much a part of the Irish as their ready wit and their whimsical humor. They are faithful to it because, being Irish, they cannot be otherwise than faithful to it. I contend that the answer to the Irish question is to be found in the heart of humanity itself. Has the individual, however humble, the right to stand forth a free man, or shall his liberty be curtailed by the material strength of his neighbors?

Brooklyn. MARY GENEVIEVE MANAHAN.

Catholic Sisterhoods and the Red Cross

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Two rumors on the relations of the Red Cross to our Catholic Sisters are receiving a wide circulation. The first is that Catholic Sisters, if accepted as Red Cross nurses, must wear civilian garb. The second, for which I believe Mrs. Bellamy Storer is responsible, is that "The regulations of the Medical Board of the Red Cross, which monopolizes all service for army and navy hospital attendance, make it impossible for any Religious Orders to become Red Cross nurses." Will you kindly tell me if these rumors have any basis in fact?

Chicago. J. W.

[According to responsible officials of the American Red Cross, these rumors are without foundation. On June 8 Mr. Festus J. Wade, a prominent St. Louis Catholic, President of the Mercantile Trust Company of that city, wrote to Mr. H. P. Davison, Chairman of the Red Cross War Council, that

> A rumor has gained some credence here that in the event that any of the Sisters of the Catholic Church might enlist for Red Cross work, they would be required to remove their habit and wear civilian clothes.

On June 11 Chairman Davison answered:

> I know of nothing that would justify a regulation to the effect that a Sister of the Catholic Church would be required to remove her habit and wear civilian clothes if participating in Red Cross work. Whatever the call, there is none commanding more respect. I am sure the rumor you heard is unjustified. It certainly is so far as the Red Cross is concerned.

On June 19 Mr. J. R. Walsh, Chairman of the Civic Committee of the Marquette Club, New York, wrote Chairman Davison:

> It has been stated that the Red Cross has made regulations which exclude the service of American nuns, notwithstanding their splendid service in the Civil War, and the recognition given their work by all fair-minded and public-spirited Americans since that time.

Mr. Davison at once replied by telegram:

> The stories in circulation of religious distinction and discrimination on the part of the Red Cross are malicious falsehoods whose source and purpose I cannot surmise. No regulations which would exclude the splendid work of the Orders of the Roman Catholic Church have been proposed or considered in the Red Cross councils, nor would they be considered. I am familiar with the records of the Catholic Sisterhoods in other wars. I have seen their work in this terrible conflict, especially in France, and my attitude is one of unqualified admiration. The American Red Cross will welcome and prize their service in the work it has undertaken.

On June 20 Father Blakely, of the AMERICA staff, submitted the matter to Hon. William H. Taft, Chairman of the Red Cross Central Committee, and to Miss Mabel Boardman, of the American Red Cross. Mr. Taft referred the letter to Colonel J. R. Kean, Medical Corps, U. S. A., Director-General of the Department of Military Relief. Colonel Kean's report is appended below. Miss Boardman answered, under date of June 20:

> I am sure there is some misunderstanding. We have a large number of Catholic nurses in the Red Cross, and there is no discrimination at all against them. The only thing we require is that the nurses should be graduates of a recognised training school for nurses, and among our nurses are many graduates of training schools connected with Catholic hospitals. The army and navy require that all nurses should be graduates of hospitals giving two or three years' training, and this is required of the Red Cross nurses who form the Army and Navy Reserve. I hope this satisfactorily explains the situation.

Under date of June 25 Colonel Kean wrote Father Blakely:

> I have received from Hon. William H. Taft, Chairman, Central Committee, your letter of June 20. I have seen Mrs. Storer's statement, which is doubtless due to a misunderstanding of the regulations for the Nursing Service. It is entirely possible for the nursing Sisters of the Catholic Church to be used in Red Cross hospitals, and wear their own garb. It has always been done in the past, and will, I imagine, always be done in the future. When they cannot follow the regulations for the Red Cross enrolments, it may be convenient to give them a separate enrolment, but it is certain the Red Cross will not fail to make use of so valuable a supply of experienced and disciplined nurses.
>
> In military service it may be necessary to make different arrangements for the services of the Sisters of the nursing Orders, so as to give them responsibility for certain hospitals, but this could be arranged. In the navy, I have been informed, arrangements have already been made for the use of one hospital where the nurses are members of a Catholic Order and their pupils.

On June 22, Chairman Davison telegraphed Mr. Wade:

> As I have previously stated to you and to many others, stories that the Red Cross has issued an order requiring the Sisters of Charity to discard their robes, and other rumors of like character, alleging religious discrimination, are absolutely without foundation. Please give my telegram denying these unjust and malicious reports the widest circulation. Officials of the Red Cross have been in conference with the superiors and representatives of the Catholic Sisterhoods, and have agreed on a basis of cordial work and cooperation. We welcome and shall highly prize their services.

Finally, on June 27, Mr. Eliot Wadsworth, Acting Chairman of the American Red Cross, addressed the following letter to Cardinal Gibbons:

> The question of the attitude of the American Red Cross toward utilizing the services of nursing Sisterhoods has been raised several times lately. It might almost appear from the form of some of these questions that a rumor was being deliberately circulated that the American Red Cross was in an unfavorable attitude toward allowing the Sisterhoods to assist in the care of wounded soldiers and sailors. During the Spanish-American war a number of members of Sisterhoods wore their garb while serving as nurses in military hospitals in Florida and elsewhere. Such a service is provided for by the rules governing the nursing service of the Red Cross.

Rule nine, of the duties of committees on nursing service of the American Red Cross, adopted nearly eight years ago, recites it is the duty of the committee to keep on file lists of Sisterhoods and other Orders, and women volunteers available for Red Cross relief work involving the care of the sick and wounded, either in time of war or calamity.

It seems advisable to state unequivocally to you at this time that members of the nursing Sisterhoods may wear their official dress while serving as nurses under the Red Cross, and that the Red Cross has no desire in any way to debar the Sisters on account of their dress, or on any other account, from serving their country as all other nurses will desire to do.

From these communications, signed by responsible officials, it is clear that the Red Cross not only denies any discrimination against our Sisters, but "will welcome and prize their services." —Ed. AMERICA.]

Archbishop Prendergast and Liberty Bonds

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of June 9, under the caption "Catholic Prelates and the Liberty Loan," in the "Home News" of the Chronicle, Cardinal Gibbons, Cardinal Farley and Archbishop Mundelein were mentioned as urging subscription to Liberty bonds. On May 22 the Philadelphia Inquirer carried on the front page a display story, which the Associated Press obtained, of Archbishop Prendergast's support of the loan. The Inquirer said in part:

> The Archbishop's attitude was made known by H. Wilson Moorehouse, of the Federal Reserve Bank Committee. "It will be the first time, I am informed," said Mr. Moorhouse, "that the Catholic Church has done anything of the kind. The fact that the Archbishop of Philadelphia has given us this assurance of course is significant of the attitude of the Church throughout the country, as I understand it." His Grace said last night that funds available from time to time would be devoted if necessary to subscription to the Liberty Loan. This patriotic measure of the Archbishop to invest in Liberty bonds was no surprise, as in a recent pastoral to the clergy and laity of the diocese after war had been proclaimed, he said in substance: "May we in this and all emergencies prove ourselves ever ready at the call of country to pledge our lives, our fortunes and our honor."

It would appear, therefore, that the first prelate, so far as Philadelphia was informed, to urge the purchase of bonds was Archbishop Prendergast.

Philadelphia. J. M. L.

"No Priests in the Trenches!"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The excellent letter, "No Priests in the Trenches," which appeared in the issue of AMERICA for June 30, should perhaps have stressed this important point: Our Catholic colleges are now sending to France large hospital units for service among French soldiers. As a consequence of this act of charity, French priests may be changed from the hospitals to the trenches by the infidel Government which has done all in its power to destroy the priesthood in France. By all means let the slogan be "No Priests in the Trenches!" But above all let us see to it that our charity, the charity of Catholic Americans, does not make it possible for blatant infidels, who would faint at the smell of powder, to wreck religion in fair France by killing off the priests, an object dear to their sordid hearts. Who will represent the matter to the proper authorities?

New York. FRANCIS RUSH.

Cannibalism Among Snakes

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the interesting letter, signed W. H. McClellan, S.J., in AMERICA for June 16 attention is called to a misstatement of mine regarding cannibalism in snakes. I must confess to a humiliating astonishment at myself for making the error, unintentional though it was. In explanation I would say that the error was not due to a "hasty inference," but wholly to an inadvertent misappropriation of the word "snake." In the sentence "Cannibalism is widespread in the animal world, and the male, be he mammal, bird, snake, fish, etc.," I was enumerating a few of the classes of animals of which some members manifest paternal cannibalism and used "snake" to represent the class "reptiles," which includes the orders of lizards, crocodiles, and turtles, besides snakes. And it was the crocodiles and turtles among reptiles that I had in mind when speaking of paternal cannibalism. But of course "snake" is not crocodile, nor lizard, nor turtle, and hence the word "snake" is inappropriate even in a general sense and I had no business to use it thus liberally. At the time of writing I had "reptile" in mind, but used "snake" instead. For of reptiles the turtles and crocodiles evince frequent paternal cannibalism. As for lizards and snakes, a few rare cases of cannibalism are recorded for the former, but I have no knowledge of paternal cannibalism for either from authors or from personal experience. So much for the correction, which I make gladly. I am grateful for having my attention called to the matter.

Incidentally, I would take exception to Father McClellan's teleological point that because of the low productivity among snakes nature would not expose the few young to the additional menace of a cannibalistic parent. As a matter of fact, the anomaly exists that where productivity is lowest and parental care is in compensation more highly developed, paternal cannibalism is often most pronounced. The most gruesome accounts of paternal cannibalism deal with mammals and birds where the number of young is usually less than six, as for instance some members of the cat tribe and certain water-fowl. In general the axiom, "Productivity offsets destructibility," holds true, but that does not justify the inference that a parallel decrease in destructibility accompanies a decrease in production of young. Animal males are opportunists and, although improbable according to available data, it would not be impossible that a snake should eat its young.

Columbia, Mo. R. A. MUTTKOWSKI.

The Crossed Knife and Fork

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At lunch the other day I "sharped" it a little, I fear, by telling a very genial, zealous Anglican, "St. Andrew was current long before Anglicanism came into existence." He had just explained the custom of the parallel knife and fork after meals as "an innovation of Puritanism against Anglicanism," which was wont to place knife and fork in the shape of St. Andrew's Cross; and I felt slightly averse to the calm implication that St. Andrew is an official crucifer of distinctly Anglican circumscription! Besides, I know the crossed knife and fork at the end of a meal to be of taprooted custom among rustic Pennsylvania Germans, Protestants included, who never so much as dreamed of Anglicanism. If so, the custom presumably belonged to the common medieval Church, or to its more conservative sequels in Protestant circles in or out of Great Britain. At all hazards, there is no Anglican patent on St. Andrew, for I most humbly make bold to invoke him, on particular occasions, as well for myself as in behalf of certain Anglican friends not yet aware of ubi Petrus, ibi Ecclesia, St. Andrew included.

Savannah. WILLIAM PRICE.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JULY 7, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID.

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions to the Mission Literature Fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Constitutions and Executives

THE spectacle of Mr. Carranza of Mexico in the rôle of a benevolent friend of the poor is truly diverting. As such he has been accepted by a number of American reviews and newspapers, noted for their uplifting tendencies, rather than for a sense of humor. Mexico's new Constitution contains some regulations, excellent in themselves, to improve the status of the laborer, by limiting the hours of work and establishing a minimum wage, and by laying down the conditions under which women and children may be employed. The criticism might be advanced that a constitution ought to be a set of fundamental principles, rather than a code of laws, but that may be set aside for the moment. What is of present interest is the question: "Will this new Constitution remain on paper, or will it really effect the reforms which, in theory at least, it contemplates?"

There was never a law that enforced itself, or a constitution that was self-explanatory. However wisely-planned, laws and constitutions remain dead letters, in the absence of an honest executive and a strong judiciary. In Mexico the judiciary seems to have fallen into a state of coma, while as to the ultimate purposes of Mexico's Chief Executive nothing much need be said. Time has made it fairly plain that wisdom and self-abnegation are not Mr. Carranza's main assets. The whole situation was summed up excellently by George Patullo in a recent number of the Saturday Evening Post:

> He [Carranza] and his followers are surely sour on religion. They go out of their way to jab it. . . . There is much good in the Constitution, but a deal of hostility to aliens, and clap-trap and trickery. The sad feature of it is, that the good will be a dead letter, but all the mischief will be worked overtime.

To state why "the mischief will be worked overtime," Mr. Patullo would probably regard as expatiating on the obvious. Without honest executives, any constitution may easily become an instrument of tyranny. Someone has said that Mexico's new Constitution means, first of all, "Mexico for the Mexicans." It seems something very near to calumny, to identify the Mexican people with the horde of bandits, who for the last few years have made Mexico an open house for blood and plunder.

Apostles of Democracy

JUST before election time, the friends of democracy are as good as they can be. For the rest of the year, their goodness is largely quiescent, for the victor is worthy of his spoils, and time in which to enjoy them.

In the city of New York, a community with interests more extensive than the interests of the majority of American States, a valiant committee of 250 small "d" democrats, have solemnly and publicly pledged their allegiance to the common people. The chief exponent of this venerable political clap-trap is a multi-millionaire, a director in thirty banks and corporations, most of them well lubricated with Standard Oil. The combined assets of these excessively democratic corporations total $2,000,000,000. Other signatories to this new declaration of the rights of man, are personal representatives of that well-known democratic organization, the Standard Oil Co., and of those at least equally democratic and benevolent institutions, the New York Central and Interborough Railways. Others, again, are the loyal defenders of expert "wire-tappers" and other some, to complete this democratic litany, are patrons of the universally discredited "baby farm," for abandoned or dependent children.

Happy, indeed, are the proletariat, in these mighty friends who, for the furtherance of the common welfare and with no eye on possible personal advantage, volunteer to perpetuate, under the guidance of a foundation, the present disgraceful condition of the city of New York. Yet, such is human perversity, it has been suggested by the trend of recent events, that there may be circumstances in which the happiness of the common people might be carried to a point higher than any contemplated by these 250 lower-case democrats. For instance, New York might be made reasonably safe against the murderer and the pander. Since January 1, 1916, 320 murders have disgraced New York. Since January 1, 1917, and by the time these lines are in print, the number will be greater, over 700 girls and young women have disappeared in New York. Many of the murder-victims were children. Of eighty-seven murder cases, the police know absolutely nothing. Nor can their records throw much light on the question, as to how many of the 700 young women who disappeared were ever found. One was found recently, not by the police, however, but by a woman-lawyer, and, as would appear, in spite of the police. Incidentally, she was found four months after she had been murdered, and three months and three weeks after the case had been "closed" by the police.

No doubt there are many guardians of the peace in New York, who can distinguish a hawk from a handsaw, but they are so occupied with social reform in its larger aspects, that they have little time for the investigation of such peccadillos as murder and rapine. They must study the principles of physics involved in tapping wires, a process in which they are egregiously stupid. They must act as the vile bodies of pathological experiment, as well as tramp from shop to shop, busy as a housewife on a bargain day, to ascertain the selling price of potatoes and corn meal. They must light streetlamps, and watch that these beacons of the night do their full duty. They must go to school for lectures on their 728 rules and regulations. They must count the passengers in the "L's" and subways. None of them has the gift of bilocation; wherefore crime thrives in New York.

The upshot of this riot of social democracy is that the police are forced to follow, almost to the letter, Dogberry's instruction to George Seacoal on the disposition of "all vagrom men." The apostles of democracy now seeking to perpetuate the reign of misrule will have it so.

Inconsistent Vegetarians

"SHOULD Candidates for Heaven Eat Flesh?" is the heading of a circular that a knot of vegetarians in this country are now distributing. The attention of "all thoughtful flesh-eaters" is called to some "fearful" lines entitled "The Song of the Slaughterman," and the leaflet closes with the following "prayer" composed by an Oriental bearing the sonorous name of "Labhshankar Laxmidas."

> I pray that all thoughtful flesh-eaters who believe that the merciful go to Heaven, and that the cruel go to Hell, may kindly realize the various diabolical cruelties inseparably connected with flesh-eating,—also the miserable condition of poor butchers who are obliged to kill, kill, kill thousands of poor, life-loving animals,—and may become vegetarians for the welfare of their own souls as well as those of others.
>
> Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God.

As the present world-war with its dreadful carnage is putting a violent end to the lives of millions of human beings, this seems of all times the least seasonable for propagating mawkish twaddle about the so-called "rights of animals." Moreover there are some old-fashioned folk who think that prayers for the conversion of those merciless flesh-eaters and wretched butchers could without serious loss be delayed till peace returns. All the belligerents, however, will doubtless welcome the fanatical vegetarian's assistance in persuading the people contentedly to do without their daily chop or steak.

Many stupid Occidentals will also wonder why Mr. Labhshankar Laxmidas's compassion goes out only to the "poor life-loving animals" and does not include the vegetables and flowers as well. For scientists of his type assure us that the mute, undemonstrative vegetables are quite as fond of life as we are ourselves, and time out of mind poets have melodiously maintained that flowers not only enjoy the air they breathe, but are pathetically sensitive to coldness and unkindness. What then shall be said of the zealous vegetarian who spares the frisking lambkin indeed, but most heartlessly and inconsistently devours raw the weeping onion or savagely makes a salad out of the protesting nasturtium?

The Church and Protestant Marriage

A GROSS misrepresentation of Catholic doctrine is being circulated by the Concordia Publishing House of St. Louis, in a pamphlet entitled "Trial and Self-Conviction," by A. L. Graebner. On page thirteen, the author says: "He [Pope Leo XIII] tells every Protestant married woman into her face that she is not really and truly a married woman at all, but a vile concubine, that consequently the babe at her breast is not a legitimate child begotten and born in true wedlock, but a miserable bastard." [Italics inserted].

This statement is absolutely false. Neither Pope Leo XIII nor the Church ever said anything of the kind. The doctrine of the Church, as is easily verifiable by any one who will take the trouble to consult the "Catholic Encyclopedia," is and has been that marriage between baptized Protestants, if there is no diriment impediment, is not only a valid contract of a very sacred kind, but is at the same time possessed of a Sacramental character which elevates it to a supernatural plane and gives it the power to confer Divine grace. The only exception created by the "Tametsi" decree, abrogated nine years ago, applied to cases of such rare occurrence as to be practically negligible, so far as Protestants were concerned. This exception obtained in parishes entirely Catholic in which the decree on clandestinity had been proclaimed and in which Protestants settled after its promulgation. This condition of affairs never existed in any part of the United States.

Pope Leo XIII explicitly teaches, in words which the author of the pamphlet himself quotes, that the marriage of baptized Protestants is not only true matrimony, but a Sacrament. "It is, beyond dispute," so speaks the Sovereign Pontiff in the Encylical beginning "Arcanum," "that in Christian Marriage the contract cannot be separated from the Sacrament, and therefore no true and legitimate contract can exist unless it is in the Sacrament itself. . . . Hence it is plain that among Christians rightful marriage is in and by itself a Sacrament." A glance at any book on theology would have shown the author who quotes the passage, that Christian Marriage means marriage between two baptized persons, and that it is not restricted, as he supposes, to marriage between Catholics. Where he got his information that Christian Marriage means marriage between two Catholics it is impossible to conjecture. Is crass ignorance or downright malice responsible for his perversion of the saintly Pontiff's clear doctrine? One hesitates to say.

Even though the calumniator disdained to look up Catholic theology, he must have remembered, if he had any knowledge of history, how Pius VII braved the anger of the Emperor Napoleon, and refused to sanction the dissolution of the marriage of the Emperor's younger brother Jerome with Miss Patterson of Baltimore, who was undoubtedly a Protestant. The Pope declared that he could not say Miss Patterson was not a lawful wife, without being "guilty before the tribunal of God and before the whole Church, of most grievously abusing Our sacred ministry." The truth of the matter is that the Church assigns to marriage between Protestants a far higher dignity, a stricter indissolubility, and a more elevated sanctity than is attributed to it by Protestants themselves.

One Triumph of Catholic Schools

IN these days of bustle and confusion when the lowering war cloud has obscured intellects and unleashed tongues, it is consoling to note that graduates and students of Catholic colleges see their duty clearly and are keen to do it. The reason for this vision and promptness of execution is not far to seek: it lies in the fact that our schools have done their duty by the country. They have held up before eager eyes the best American ideals and have exhorted the young men to cherish them as a precious heritage. As events proved, the lesson went home. The first call to war was answered by thousands of our stalwart youths who are eager to show their devotion to the country by giving their lives to it. College halls were literally emptied; where there had been hundreds of students one day, there remained but a corporal's guard the next day. All this is good, both for the colleges and for the United States, for the former because it vindicates them before the very eyes of a numerous, if blatant, set of revilers, for the latter because in the words of a distinguished general, the boys from Catholic schools can be turned into soldiers second to those who come forth from West Point. There are many lessons to be drawn from all this, but the most important of these is that wherever God is the head of the school, there the interests of the country are safe.

Headline English

ONE of the speakers at the conference on the value of classical studies held at Princeton last month sorrowfully remarked that nowadays the literary taste of the American people is being formed by the writers of our newspapers' headlines. The observation was a just one. For the majority of the busy men and women in this country limit their reading, to a large extent, to the headlines and the "lead" of the reporter's "story." Consequently the "cultural value" of the course they follow is not very great. Moreover, as the editors of our daily papers are largely responsible for whatever "higher education" grammar-school graduates receive, the strong influence exerted on young minds by the constant perusal of headline English should cause lovers of the "old ways" deep concern. For the language of modern headlines has certain characteristics that are unmistakable. It aims to seize instantly the reader's attention, to interest or startle him, and to give in the briefest possible form the substance of the news. Consequently but little discrimination is shown in the use of words, so-called "synonyms" multiply, "snappy" neologisms are are in high favor and syncopation and ellipsis are so ruthlessly employed that a headline's meaning is often a real puzzle. Indeed, the wording of a caption is determined, likely as not, by the compositor's clamor for a shorter line.

It is against the low literary and educational ideals of those who promote the use of headline English, and those who are content to admire it, that Professor Paul Shorey of Chicago University is directing his attacks in the Atlantic Monthly. In the current number he again protests against "The Assault on Humanism" that is being made by Mr. Flexner and President Eliot. The issue at stake, as he shows:

> Is the survival or the total suppression, in the comparatively small class of educated leaders who graduate from high schools and colleges, of the very conception of linguistic, literary, and critical discipline; of culture, taste, and standards; of the historic sense itself; of some trained faculty of appreciation and enjoyment of our rich heritage from the civilized past; of some counterbalancing familiarity with the actual evolution of the human man, to soften the rigidities of physical science, and to check and control by the touchstones of humor and commonsense the a priori deductions of pseudo-science from conjectural reconstructions of the evolution of the physical and animal man. . . .
>
> From their [the anti-classicists'] own point of view it is natural that they should deprecate with sullen jealousy the inoculation of the adolescent mind with standards and tastes that would render it immune to what one of them has commended in print as the "science" of Elsie Clews Parsons. The purpose, or, at any rate, the tendency of their policies is to stamp out and eradicate these things and inculcate exclusively their own tastes and ideals by controlling American education with the political efficiency of Prussian autocracy and in the fanatical intolerance of the French anti-clericalists. Greek and Latin have become mere symbols and pretexts. They are as contemptuous of Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, Racine, Burke, John Stuart Mill, Tennyson, Alexander Hamilton, or Lowell, as of Homer, Sophocles, Virgil, or Horace. They will wipe the slate clean of everything that antedates Darwin's "Descent of Man," Mr. Wells's "Research Magnificent," and the familiar pathos of James Whitcomb Riley's vernacular verse.

The contrast between the classicists and the promoters of the "new ways" in education has hardly been better put than that. Unless we would have all our young people grow up admirers and users of headline English, with all that such a habit connotes and implies, we must stand by the classics, for they have formed the greatest minds the world has seen, and centuries of fruitful use have proved their value.

Literature

THE SCIENCE OF ETHICS

A KNOWLEDGE of ethics is of immense importance to every man. Other sciences are honorable, lucrative or entertaining, as the case may be; but whether a man shall have an acquaintance with them, except in that measure which a liberal education demands, is a matter of personal preference. They are needful for the race in general that it may attain to that mastery of nature which is fitting in the lord of creation. If man, taken specifically, is to be the high priest of the world, gathering up the dumb worship of inanimate creatures and making them minister to the glory of the Most High, some men must make research into the secrets of the universe; subject the elements, with their actions and reactions, to patient investigation; tabulate and coordinate their laws, harness their forces, and compel them to subserve the interests of humanity. But no man in particular need do this, in order to attain the perfection ordained for him by a beneficent Providence. He can reap where he has not sown, he can profit by the labors of others. He can cross the sea in safety without bothering about compass or sextant, he can procure a habitable dwelling without any knowledge of mechanics. Unless his tastes lead in that direction, he will do better to leave to those who like it the pursuit and application of scientific knowledge, and engage his attention on other things not connected with the laws of matter.

There is, however, a science with which it is imperative that at least every educated man should be acquainted, and that science is the science of ethics. For every educated man should be able to grapple with the various moral problems which beset him individually, and feel assured of a satisfactory solution. Others may give advice, but the final direction of his acts, as human acts, so that they shall be in conformity with his dignity as man, rests ultimately with the individual himself. Where the moral life is concerned he and he alone must take control, he cannot delegate his work to others. Therefore if he would voyage without shipwreck into eternity, he cannot, at his peril, let ethics and ethical values remain an uncharted sea.

Moreover, as an educated man among his fellows, he will have to form his own opinion on current topics of interest and importance. He cannot safely trust his conscience to the pontiffs who fill the editorial chairs of newspapers and magazines. For whether fitted or not, these gentlemen, in spite of their shifting views, are the formulators of popular standards even on moral subjects. Those who are untrained in intellect may not be able to challenge the rectitude of the pronouncements of the press, but the educated man should be qualified to do so; it would be a shame for him and a derogation to his manhood, to take his attitude towards moral questions ready-made from irresponsible writers whose sole recommendation is their place on an editorial staff or a certain shallow cleverness or verbal dexterity. The educated man should fortify himself, therefore, with his own definite system of ethics, so as to be able, when occasion requires, to arrive at safe and independent judgments.

Revelation, it is true, and especially Christianity, has given a dogmatic concreteness to correct principles of action; so that those who are deeply imbued with the lessons of the Bible have a very practical and sure guide. But it is not always realized that the Christian dispensation, in part at least, is a reaffirmation of the moral principles which are demonstrable by reason alone. The Commandents, for instance, almost in their entirety, are more explicit restatements of the mandates of the natural law. It is a matter for gratitude that the tablets of the law, promulgated from Mt. Sinai, should have given an expression to the postulates of rational conduct in a form far surpassing in their compendious clearness anything previously known; but a man who by training and circumstance finds himself either able or obliged to form his own moral judgments, will not rest content with the mere precepts, negative or positive, but will wish to understand their inner reasons and their ethical foundations, and will strive to grasp the full code of principles that open the way to a better appreciation and a clearer solution of the many problems which did not exist in the days when the Bible was in the making, but which are constantly vexing present-day conditions.

At all times in the world's history men have been interested in the question of right and wrong, and a glance at the literature of the subject shows how large a portion of human energy has been devoted to its discussion. But as ethics has a very intimate relation with the several branches of philosophy, the view writers have taken of good and evil has been determined largely by their interpretation of the fundamental facts which lie at the base of all human existence. According to the attitude they have taken regarding the existence of God and the nature and destiny of the soul, they have laid down widely divergent theories of moral conduct. Naturally, therefore, there is a Catholic system of ethics. Not that the normal channel of the deductions of ethics is Revelation, but because there is a distinct system of Catholic philosophy, and a distinctly Catholic answer to the riddle of the universe, based entirely on data supplied by right reason as distinguished from perverted reason. Revelation acts as a negative norm to the moral philosopher, in that it warns him not to lay down principles that are contrary to revealed truth, for truth cannot contradict truth; it also points the way to legitimate conclusions and acts as a stimulus to find in reason the principles enunciated by faith; but its direction begins and ends with its influence as a corrective and a spur.

In other languages than English satisfactory treatises on ethics have long been available, in Latin especially there has been extended treatment both of the general aspect of the subject and its application to particular phases of human rights and duties. In the vernacular also there have been many intensive studies of special questions or special portions of the matter, and compendious text-books covering the whole field. But up to the present a complete, thorough and exhaustive development in English of the whole content of man's relations to God, to himself and to his fellow-men has been a desideratum.

This long-felt need has now been adequately and satisfactorily supplied by the Rev. Dr. Michael Cronin, the Professor of Ethics and Politics in University College, Dublin. How painstaking have been his efforts to make his "Science of Ethics" (Benziger) an accurate expression of Catholic principles is evidenced by the fact that no less than ten years elapsed between the appearance of the first and second volumes. Together they cover about 1,500 pages which leave little to be desired, and form what is undoubtedly the best complete work in English on the subject. It is a pleasure to recommend it enthusiastically. For although it makes no pretense at giving the final answer to every problem, it does provide such an answer for the problems whose solutions have been finally fixed, and as for the others it suggests solutions which always challenge attention. That the author does not shrink from meeting the questions of the day is clear from the fact that he deals with such topics as reprisals, air-raids, the use of poisonous gases, the sinking of passenger ships, rebellion, treaty obligations, the foundations of international law, strikes, the relations of labor and capitalism, referendum and initiative, and others of similar acute and immediate interest. It is safe to say that few subjects of current moral problems need remain altogether unsolved when this work is within reach, and that the opinion of its learned and scholarly author will have to be reckoned with in future discussions of ethics.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Work of St. Optatus, Bishop of Milevis, Against the Donatists. With an Appendix. Translated into English, with Notes, Critical, Explanatory, Theological and Historical. By the Rev. O. R VASSALL-PHILLIPS, B.A., Balliol College, Oxford. Priest of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $4.00.

The commonplace tribute paid by book-reviewers to their author that the public owes him a debt of gratitude for his work, is in the present case not only pardonable, but absolutely necessary. Father Vassall-Phillips is the first to have translated into English the treatise of St. Optatus against the Donatists. For the happy inspiration which led him to do so, for the scholarship and accuracy with which the translation is marked, every student of ecclesiastical history and of the Fathers becomes his debtor. With the exception of a French translation which appeared in 1564, it is extremely improbable, as the editor and translator himself remarks, if the treatise of the great Bishop of Milevis has ever appeared in any language but Latin.

While the masterpiece of Optatus is indispensable for the study of the Donatist error, it is peculiarly suited to the religious conditions of our times, and thus becomes a seasonable bit of modern and practical apologetics. Optatus is the historian of the origins of Donatism, the author informs us, but he is also the first Father to give us in a sustained and methodical form the argument from the Catholic side, not only against heresy or false doctrine, but against schism or separation from the Church. Optatus wrote his book as an answer to Parmenian, the Donatist Bishop of Carthage, and he himself tells us that he composed the work after the death of Julian, A. D. 363. In the revised edition given us by Optatus, there are seven books. The more interesting and vital chapters perhaps are the first, in which he describes the growth of the Donatist schism; the second, that asks: Which is the one true Church and where is it found? and the fifth, in which he shows the validity of baptism even when conferred by sinners. Here we find in the Fathers for the first time perhaps the statement of the doctrine that the grace of the Sacraments is derived ex opere operato, that is, from their own intrinsic efficacy and power as derived from the merits of Christ, independently of the worthiness of the minister. But every chapter of this masterpiece brings out some point of Catholic doctrine and always with clearness and power.

J. C. R.

The Holy Scriptures According to the Masoretic Text. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America. $1.00.

Catholic scholars welcome this new English translation of the Hebrew Bible. It is not the work of one man, as were the versions of the Jews Leeser, in America, Benisch and Michael Friedländer, in England. Foremost scholars of Israel have been at work on this new Jewish English Bible since 1892. The work proceeded slowly, until its reorganization in 1908 under the auspices of the Jewish Publication Society of America; and was then completed in seven years. The results are issued as the joint contribution of a board of seven. This board included Drs. Solomon Schechter, Cyrus Adler, and Max L. Margolis, the last being editor-in-chief, and preparing the manuscript for consideration at the various board meetings.

The order of the books of the Bible is naturally that of Jewish tradition; and the translation is colored by the Synagogue's accepted interpretations. Baer's text is followed; and where he fails, Ginsburg supplies. The English runs along with smoothness and with dignity, though some phrases sound a little harsh. Jacob's poetic farewell to his children begins:

> "Come, all ye sons of Jacob, and give ear; > Give ear to Israel, your father."

The new Jewish version has: "Assemble yourselves, and hear, ye sons of Jacob!" Messianic passages are not translated to a Catholic's liking. In the same farewell of Jacob, for example, occurs the prophecy:

> The sceptre shall not pass from Judah,
> Nor the ruler's staff from between his feet,
> Till that he come whose it is,
> And his be the obedience of the folk.

The Jewish translators render the third clause: "As long as men come to Shiloh." So, too, Isaias ix: 5-9 is translated in a manner to apply to Israel, and not to a personal Messias. Later volumes, to be issued by the Jewish Publication Society, will give what reasons impelled the translators, in these Messianic prophecies, to depart from the Hellenistic Jewish tradition of the Septuagint. And although Catholic scholars cannot admit of such departures, they will be interested in an authoritative statement of the Jewish reasons therefor. W. F. D.

The Soul of Ulster. By ERNEST W. HAMILTON. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00.

In this book of 188 pages the author, a one-time member of Parliament from North Tyrone, essays to portray for non-Ulster readers the spirit behind Orange Ulster's apparently implacable hostility towards any measure of self-government for Ireland. If Mr. Hamilton, as seen in his book, be typical of the Anti-Home Rule Ulsterman, then indeed the book is a revelation of "The Soul of Ulster," but in a sense undreamed of by the author. For a more one-sided book it would be hard to imagine; there is scarcely a page that does not require correction. Mr. Hamilton is a master of the art of confusing issues; while his grasp of logic is of the loosest. He exhibits undisguised and bitter contempt for the mass of the Irish people, and for all the history of Ireland not made by his own partisans. He quotes abundantly, but is willing to trust and quote any authority if sufficiently unfavorable to those he opposes. Apparently the Native Celtic Irish have no patriotism, no generous impulses, no lofty enthusiasms in any respect, even their clamor for Home Rule and their opposition to England being artificially aroused by priests or politicians and always for "sordid" motives.

His knowledge of facts or care in relating them may be gauged from the marvelous statement that the English originally came into Ireland in the rôle of benefactors at the request of Dermott McMurrough "to aid in expelling the Danes," then overrunning the land. For the author is quite oblivious of the fact that the Danes had been completely accounted for by the Great Brian more than a century and a half before! If on similar points not obscured by party passion he can write so untrammeled by facts, we may expect to find the "Massacre of 1641" handled as it is in the extremest spirit of fanaticism unrelieved by any acquaintance even with Protestant modern research. The sad rebellion of '98 is treated in the same bigoted way and Cromwell's hideous record is, of course, completely whitewashed. On the other hand there is no hint of Penal Laws, of persecution of the Irish Catholics, of Orange outrages, etc. Indeed one would never dream from Mr. Hamilton's history that the native Irish ever had a grievance.

The picture of the inevitable fate of Protestants under Home Rule, as painted by the author, is no doubt one devoutly believed in by uneducated Orangemen, but can men apparently intelligent and educated as is Mr. Hamilton, really accept it for a moment? Have they not before them the spectacle of an Ireland where the only evidence of religious rancor is in the "Orange North," and where the utmost harmony prevails wherever Catholics are in the lead? One has only to compare the treatment of the Protestant minority, one-fifth, of Dublin with that of the similar Catholic minority, one-fifth, in Belfast, and see the immense proportion, almost one-half, of lucrative elective offices filled by the Protestant minority in the Catholic city and the beggarly number, about one-fourteenth, of offices, and the meanest ones at that, allotted to Catholics in the Protestant stronghold. Moreover the enviable position of the Protestants whether in business or politics in southern and western Ireland, where they are the merest handful, is sufficient evidence as to what may be expected under Home Rule. Yet the extraordinary juggling and distorting of facts indulged in by the author will deceive the inexperienced American reader who has only Mr. Hamilton to guide him. The whole book is a striking illustration of what Home Rulers in Ireland have to contend with. If the apparently educated upper class of their opponents can hold such views, what must be the opinions of the rank and file of Orangemen?

J. F. X. M.

The Russian Revolution. By ISAAC DON LEVINE. With Portraits. New York: Harper & Bros. $1.00.

The Russians: an Interpretation. By RICHARDSON WRIGHT. New York: Frederick A. Stokes. $1.50.

The first of these books, despite its too sanguine expectations for the near future of Russia, has its value as an explanation of the underlying root-causes of the revolution, and its vivid portrayal of the dying struggle of a tottering dynasty. The main proximate factor which at length swiftly and quietly brought about the sudden fall of Nicholas and his government, may be found, according to the author, in the social awakening of the masses. This great social wave, which swept the country during the war, was due in great part to the Unions of Zemstvos and Towns which by their voluntary cooperation with the army put to shame the inactivity of the Government and gained the soldier's friendship and confidence. The soldier and his family befriended on all sides by these Unions began to mistrust the Government officials, who by their blunders evinced incompetency and even treachery. The detailed account of the activities of these Unions help to make the book interesting. Another good feature of the book is its brief portrayal of the individuals who standing behind the throne helped in its downfall. The author, however, seems to place too much confidence in the ability of those now in control to guide the country over the stormy sea which must be sailed.

"The Russians: an Interpretation" treats of the Russ from quite a different angle. This volume though quite pretentious in its title gives in a condensed form a substantial view of the Russian people. It cannot help but rearrange our misconceived ideas of the Russ, as regards his temperament, ideals, customs, religion, and skill in the arts and sciences. Considering our present relation with Russia and our possible commercial relations after the war, the book is of manifest value to Americans, as it endeavors to throw light on the Russian business man and his business methods. The historical outline of the nation's growth and the chapters on Russian literature, music and painting, though by necessity brief and incomplete, give the reader a fair estimate of Russia's intellectual power and artistic taste. The author's intimate acquaintance with the people of whom he writes makes the book at once both interesting and persuasive.

F. E. L.

Poems. By RALPH HODGSON. New York: The Macmillan Company. $0.75.

The poems in this little volume number only twenty-five, but all are of beaten, burnished gold. Without question, the young author is an artist of rare power and feeling, as can be proved by quoting almost any of his lyrical treasures, from the opening poem, beginning "The Gipsy Girl" with > ". . . The den of wild things in > The darkness of her eyes!"

till these two stanzas near the volume's end on "The Swallow":

> The morning that my baby came
> They found a baby swallow dead,
> And saw a something, hard to name,
> Flit moth-like over baby's bed.
>
> My joy, my flower, my baby dear
> Sleeps on my bosom well, but Oh!
> If in the autumn of the year
> When swallows gather round and go—

Mr. Hodgson's mystical poem beginning, "He came and took me by the hand," and his "Stupidity Street" have already been quoted in these columns, and those who catch the exquisite melody and vivid beauty of:

> Oh, had our simple Eve
> Seen through the make-believe!
> Had she but known the > Pretender he was!
> Out of the boughs he came,
> Whispering still her name,
> Tumbling in twenty rings
> Into the grass.
>
> Here was the strangest pair
> In the world anywhere,
> Eve in the bells and grass
> Kneeling, and he
> Telling his story low. . . .
> Singing birds saw them go > Down the dark path to > The Blasphemous Tree.

will be unhappy till they have read the rest of the poem. "Ghoul Care" is a good prescription for "the blues" and "The Bull" and "The Royal Mails" are two longer poems that are rich in the author's remarkable felicities of word-painting and rhythm. But there is nothing finer in the book than some of the lines in "The Song of Honor." For example:

> The song of kings of kingdoms when > They rise above their fortune Men,
> And crown themselves anew—
>
> The song of courage, heart and will
> And gladness in a fight,
> Of men who face a hopeless hill
> With sparking and delight,
> The bells and bells of song that ring
> Round banners of a cause or king
> From armies bleeding white . . .
>
> And song of fighters stern as they
> At odds with fortune night and day,
> Crammed up in cities grim and grey
> As thick as bees in hives,
> Hosannas of a lowly throng
> Who sing unconscious of their song,
> Whose lips are in their lives—

In Mr. Hodgson's "Poems" can be discerned the work of a sweet-voiced, pure-hearted singer whose lyrics will live.

W. D.

The History and Practice of Psychanalysis. By POUL BJERRE, M.D. Translated by ELIZABETH N. BARROW. $3.00; Contributions to Psycho-Analysis. By S. FERENCZI, M.D. Translated by ERNEST JONES, M.D. Boston: Richard G. Badger. $3.00.

In an elder day, before an unfeeling Government rudely interfered, that benevolent institution of the Southland, the Louisiana Lottery, was alternately the hope and the despair of the newly-liberated colored gentleman. As a lottery is designed on the canny principle that the promoters ultimately win, purely human efforts to "beat the game" are fated to a collapse, delayed, perhaps, but inevitable. In consequence, our true, but usually unacknowledged, brother was wont to seek aid at fonts fondly deemed rich in preternatural wisdom. One of these fonts was the left hind-leg of a jackrabbit, graveyard-ensnared in the dark of the moon; a split potato was another, while hoodoo-bags, witch-locks, and similar trinkets were in high favor with those of the race who, with some show of reason, might be called the illuminati. In general use, however, was a paper-backed volume entitled "Aunt Dinah's Dream-Book." By comparing his dreams with the interpretations suggested in this prophetic tome the blameless Ethiopian was encouraged to believe that he could lure the winning numbers from the dark depths of his unconscious self, thereby securing untold opulence for his house and unto all his progeny.

"Aunt Dinah's Dream-Book" reappears in productions of the type here noted, but not reviewed. The psychologist may find them interesting as examples of aberration, but as contributions to science neither can be taken seriously. Ferenczi, formerly a pupil and now a colleague of Freud, represents, possibly, the high point of credulity to which delusion can attain. Bjerre, who once sat at the feet of the same master, finally revolted against the extreme sex-obsessions of the school, to replace them by obsessions scarcely less objectionable. What is worth while in psychanalysis, "a method of using the memory to discover the hidden factors of conduct," has been pointed out more than once in these pages. In the hands of investigators, devoid of fanaticism, it may yet develop into a valuable instrument of mental reconstruction. Under the control of the Ferenczi school it has already been made, as Bjerre charges and Ferenczi admits, an incentive to shocking immorality.

P. L. B.

The Will to Freedom; or, the Gospel of Nietzsche and the Gospel of Christ. By JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, D. D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

These are the Bross Lectures for 1915, and volume 8 of the Bross Library. As the motto of the Bross Foundation is "Emitte lucem tuam et veritatem tuam," it is a little surprising that Nietzsche is the subject of the lectures. Nietzsche is pitch dark in his absence of light; and, as for the truth of the Gospel of Christ, it is not even counterfeited in the so-called gospel of Nietzsche. Moreover, we are surprised that, although Dr. Figgis does not accept the Nietzschian "Will to Power," he shows a sympathy with its author that is on a par with an American patriot's sympathy with Benedict Arnold or a Christian's attempt to veneer the deed of Judas Iscariot. The defense is that Nietzsche has an influence. What influence? Certainly not among those who accept the Divinity of Christ and the moral law! At most among those who hate the Christ and all He did and taught.

Nietzsche set himself head on in collision with Christianity. He writes in "Antichrist," "The Christian Church is to me the greatest of all imaginable corruptions. . . . The Christian Church has left nothing untouched with its depravity, it has made a worthlessness out of every value, a lie out of every truth, a baseness of soul out of every straightforwardness." In his hatred for Christ, he out-Voltaires Voltaire; and ends his "Ecce Homo" with the French atheist's infamous "Ecrasez l'infâme!" Starting with the anti-intellectual movement, he ran the gamut of romanticism, was captivated by the sentimentalism and pessimism of Schopenhauer, hailed Wagner as a neo-pagan in music, and saw a few things in the present order that warranted hope. In the end, there was nothing to approve, nothing save Nietzsche! "I am not a man, I am dynamite," he says in "Ecce Homo." So wrapped up in self-sufficiency is the "Overman," in his "Will to Power," that he makes Zarathustra ask: "If there be a God, how could I bear not to be one? Therefore there is no God." Only one explanation can be given, in charity and sympathy, when a Christian reads the ravings, railings, rantings of this bumptious Overman against everything and everybody else "Human, All Too Human"; and that explanation, not admitted by Dr. Figgis, is the disease which sent Nietzsche to an insane asylum before he was forty-five years of age.

W. F. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mr. Frank H. Spearman, the well-known novelist, remarks in an excellent paper on "The Mixed-Marriage Problem" in the Catholic Mind for July 8: "I have become convinced that mixed marriages for our young people are, for the greater part, wholly unnecessary, and that many of them now take place solely because of the lack of a little reasonable effort on the part of those directly and indirectly concerned." He goes on to indicate what measures in his opinion should be taken to lessen the number of such marriages. Mr. R. A. Muttkowski then proposes his "Remedy for Mixed Marriages." Father Dwight points out their perils, and Mr. Cecil Chesterton tells how he found "The Church Always Right." Those who have been following the "let-them-get-acquainted" discussion in our Correspondence department will be interested in this number of the Catholic Mind.

May's six most popular novels, according to the Bookman, were these: "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," Wells; "The Light in the Clearing," Bacheller; "The Hundredth Chance," Dell; "The Road to Understanding," Porter; "His Family," Poole, and "In the Wilderness," Hichens. All have been noticed in AMERICA.—"The Man in Evening Clothes" (Putnam, $1.50) is the story of a wretch who trades on his position in society and on the vanity of his woman friends to indulge a mania for stealing precious stones. As his successful thieving may lead silly readers to steal too, books of this kind are pernicious.

A third and revised edition of Father Noll's popular book, "The Fairest Argument" (Our Sunday Visitor, Huntington, Indiana), containing 400 pages of condensed information and argument on all important points of Catholic doctrine and apologetics, is sold at the very low price of twenty-five cents in paper or seventy-five cents in cloth binding. It is called "The Fairest Argument" because out of the mouths of non-Catholic witnesses it answers calumnies against the Church, her teaching, her clergy and her laity. Father Noll's own explanations, introducing the various chapters, are lucid and practical. Their purpose is to supply the precise information needed to meet the objections that are uppermost in the minds of non-Catholics at the present day. Such questions as the marks of the Church, her devotions, her Sacraments, the Sisterhoods, the supposed "Jesuit oath," the Bible, the Reformation, Catholic culture, and the loyalty of Catholics to their country, are among the topics treated. The book will be of great value to the priest, the public speaker, and to the Faithful in general. Catholics will find in it the answer to many of the misstatements they are called upon to refute in their daily life among non-Catholics.

A second and enlarged edition has appeared of "The Inward Gospel" (Longmans, $1.25), by Father Walter Diver Strappini, S.J., the contents of which are described as "familiar discourses originally addressed to some who follow the rules of St. Ignatius." "Charity Well Disciplined," "The Gift of Sickness," "The Grain That Dies," "A Working Partnership," "The Hand of God," and "Priesthood and Sacrifice" are particularly good chapters, and the asceticism taught in all the discourses is thoroughly workable and Ignatian.——As Canon Maguire says, in his new "Life of St. Adamnan" (Gill), it is a refreshing change to turn aside from the horrors of war and glance back 900 years at the success a great Irish ecclesiastic and statesman had in suppressing forever the barbarous methods of warfare pursued by our not-long-converted ancestors. That man was Adamnan, who to general readers, is best known as St. Columba's Boswell. But this little book will help them to appreciate the other phases of Adamnan's energetic and holy career; his apostolic missions, his literary works and his achievements in sociological undertakings.

The July Catholic World is rich in literary and critical papers. George Nauman Shuster writes on "Our Poets in the Streets," Brother Leo, F.S.C. tells "How Dryden Became a Catholic," and Francis O'Neill, O. P., contributes a sketch of "Stoddard, Psalmist of the South Seas." Cecil Chesterton examines "The Art of Controversy," as practised by Macaulay, Huxley and Newman, and shows that the Cardinal was not only a tactician but a strategist. Dr. Kerby's paper on "Theories of Compensation," and Dr. O'Hara's on "Organizing the Country for War," are timely, and in "Ireland Again" Shane Leslie admits that England and Ireland "are today more estranged than at any time since the Union," but he finds "in Archbishop Walsh's exulting and pulverizing phrase, 'Us Irish Bishops, Catholic and Protestant!'" a pledge of the internal harmony that may soon be Erin's.

The July Queen's Work announces the result of the Marian poetry contest which began a year ago. Out of the 300 poems submitted forty-two were considered good enough to pass on to the five judges of the contest, and their combined votes gave both first and second place to Mr. Joyce Kilmer. The winning sonnet is called "The Annunciation" and runs thus:

"Hail Mary, full of grace," the Angel saith.
  Our Lady bows her head, and is ashamed;
  She has a Bridegroom who may not be named,
Her mortal flesh bears Him who conquers death.
Now in the dust her spirit groveleth;
  Too bright a Sun before her eyes has flamed,
  Too fair a herald joy too high proclaimed,
And human lips have trembled in God's breath.

O Mother-Maid, thou art ashamed to cover
  With thy white self, whereon no stain can be,
Thy God, who came from heaven to be thy Lover,
  Thy God who came from heaven to dwell in thee.
About thy head celestial legions hover,
  Chanting the praise of thy humility.

The Queen's Work is now starting another Marian-verse competition, and it is suggested that some incident in the Blessed Virgin's life, or some story about her should form the subject-matter of the poems submitted, which must not be more than thirty lines long. A short-story contest is also announced, the "anonymous" competitors of which should keep their manuscripts down to 5,000 words.

"Women and Work" (Appleton, $1.50), by Helen M. Bennett, is a discussion of the problems which face the college-educated woman in the business and commercial world. The writer has had considerable experience in dealing with the question owing to the position she holds as manager of the Chicago Collegiate Bureau of Occupations. In many cases she gives good and practical advice and those who have to deal with the many-sided problems of which the book treats, will find it useful and suggestive. There are chapters on "College Training and Working Efficiency," on the "Psychology of the Girl as Related to Her Occupation," on the "Philosophic Temperament" and the "Scientific Temperament." These are undoubtedly to be taken into consideration and the author is justified in treating them fully. But there is a factor in the efficiency of the college-trained woman which does much to insure the highest grade, even of economic and social efficiency, namely, a virtuous and religious character. Of that little or nothing is said. Yet it cannot be neglected. Religious principles firmly held and consistently acted up to are one of the very strongest assets of the man or woman who wishes to become an energizing force in society.

The following stanzas on "Christ and the Pagan," by Father Tabb, are among the best of the selections in "The Oxford Book of English Mystical Verse":

I had no God but these,
The sacerdotal Trees,
And they uplifted me.
"I hung upon a Tree."

The sun and moon I saw,
And reverential awe
Subdued me day and night.
"I am the perfect Light."

Within a lifeless Stone—
All other gods unknown—
I sought Divinity.
"The Corner-Stone am I."

For sacrificial feast,
I slaughtered man and beast,
Red recompense to gain.
"So I, a Lamb, was slain.

"Yea; such My hungering Grace
That wheresoe'er My face
Is hidden, none may grope
Beyond eternal Hope."

BOOKS RECEIVED

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
Mental Antidotes for Many Ills. By George R. Wood. $1.00.
Benziger Brothers, New York:
Names That Live in Catholic Hearts. By Anna T. Sadlier. $0.50.
Boni & Liveright, Inc., New York:
A Miracle of St. Antony. By Maurice Maeterlinck. $0.60.
The Catholic Register and Extension, Kitchener, Ont.:
The Catholic Church in Waterloo County, Book I. By Rev. Theobald Spetz, C.R., D.D. $2.00.
Catholic University of America, Washington:
Fourth Biennial Meeting of the National Conference of Catholic Charities. Proceedings Published by Direction of the Executive Committee of the Conference. September 17-20, 1916.
The Century Co., New York:
Doing My Bit for Ireland. By Margaret Skinnider. Illustrated. $1.00.
George H. Doran Co., New York:
The German Terror in Belgium. By Arnold J. Toynbee; Pilgrims into Folly. By Wallace Irwin. $1.35; Those Times and These. By Irvin S. Cobb. $1.35.
E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
T. Lucretius Carus of the Nature of Things. A Metrical Translation. By William Ellery Leonard. $1.75.
The Field & Queen, Ltd., London:
The Crimes of Germany. Being an Illustrated Synopsis of the Violations of International Law and of Humanity by the Armed Forces of the German Empire. Preface by Sir Theodore A. Cook. 1 shilling.
Ginn & Co., New York:
English for Beginners. A Conversation Reader and Language Book for Foreigners and Other Beginners. Book One. By Annie Fisher and Arthur Deerin Call. $0.60.
Harper & Brothers, New York:
The Man Who Saw and Other Poems. By William Watson. $1.00.
B. Herder, St. Louis:
The Sacraments. Vol IV. By Rt. Rev. Msgr. Joseph Pohle, Ph.D., D.D. $1.50; Eschatology. By Rt. Rev. Msgr. Joseph Pohle, Ph.D., D.D. $1.00. Translated by Arthur Preuss.
Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Papers from Picardy. By Rev. T. W. Pym and Rev. Geoffrey Gordon. $1.50.
La Salle Extension University, Chicago:
Office Organization and Management. By Carl C. Parsons.
John Lane Co., New York:
Carry On. Letters in Wartime. By Lieutenant Coningsby Dawson. $1.00.
J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Church Advertising, Its Why and How. Compiled by W. B. Ashley. $1.00.
Longmans, Green & Co.:
Essentials in Modern European History. By Daniel C. Knowlton and Samuel B. Howe. $1.50.
The Macmillan Company, New York:
The Middle Group of American Historians. By John Spencer Bassett. $2.00.
The Mayer & Miller Co., Chicago:
Christopher Columbus in Poetry, History and Art. By Sara Agnes Ryan. Illustrated.
G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Chocolate Cake & Black Sand. By Samuel Milbank Cauldwell. Illustrated. $1.50; Some Personal Recollections of Dr. Janeway. By James Bayard Clark. $1.00.
Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
Letters and Diary. By Alan Seeger. $1.25.
The Sherwood Co., New York:
Effective Public Speech. By Harry B. Bradbury. $1.00.
Sully & Kleinteich, New York:
One Thousand Literary Questions and Answers. By Mary Eleanor Kramer. $1.00.
The University of Chicago Press, Chicago:
Truancy and Non-Attendance in the Chicago Schools. By Edith Abbott. and Sophonisba P. Breckinridge. $2.00.
H. W. Wilson Co., White Plains, N. Y.:
Unemployment. By Julia E. Johnsen. $1.25; Prison Reform. By Corinne Bacon. Together with a Discussion of the Prison of the Future. by Thomas Mott Osborne. $1.25.
Yale University Press, New Haven:
The Case is Altered. By Ben Jonson. Introduction, Notes and Glossary by William Edward Selin, Ph.D. $2.00.

SOCIOLOGY

A Model for Social Workers

"HUMAN 'natur'," as Mr. Squeers has informed us, "is a rum 'un." For instance, all of us act on principle; even those in our midst who act on the principle that it is absurd to act on principle, and this, because we all know that every human act must flow from some principle. If this sounds like a transcript from Mrs. Eddy, blame the error, current in this day, which says that what a man does is all important, while what he believes, is of no consequence whatever. This Toots-like apothegm might make an excellent slogan for a madhouse or a foundlings' home; otherwise, it is singularly inept. Toddlers, who have not as yet affirmed their Ego, and the insane, who can no longer do so, act aimlessly, without principle or forethought. Time will change the youngsters, and death will rectify the mind undone. But for the rest of us, what we believe is of the greatest importance, for it is belief that gives purpose, vigor, color, to our acts.

The Foundation of Faith

THUS it was his faith in God that made St. Francis Regis a purposeful and energetic social reformer. Out of his faith sprang love. He loved man, because in him he saw God's image, because he knew that in the great charter of Christian charity, the Incarnate God had proclaimed that He took as done to Himself, whatever is done for the least of His brethren. Through his study of the life of Christ, he saw that this image of God was, as a rule, more brilliantly reflected in the poor and the outcast, than in the great ones of this world. Giving the example of detachment in His own life, Christ had blessed the poor, and promised them the Kingdom of Heaven. Hence, the Saint concluded, although all men are to be cherished, inasmuch as all are images of God, yet the poor are to be preferred, since they represent more intimately the person of Jesus Christ Himself.

Without this strong practical faith, St. Francis Regis could never have conceived his remarkable plan of work among the poor, or have persevered in it. The only reward of his labor was physical suffering and obloquy, the latter made more keen by the fact that some of the opposition came from men, good but misinformed. "They represented that Regis was a Man of impetuous and turbulent Spirit: that he troubled the Peace of Families by his indiscreet Zeal: that he attacked the whole World." "I have put my Trust in God," was his reply, when in consequence of accusations made by "Persons of General Worth," his work seemed marked for destruction. "I leave to Him the Care of my Reputation. He knows what is suitable to His Glory. Provided that He be glorified what matters it?"

Personal Reform

THAT there is no phase of human life from which Almighty God may be safely excluded, was the basis of his social work. He set no great value on general exhortations, or in reform through legislation alone. True reform, he knew, came from the heart willingly subjected to saving influences. Legislation, certainly, might remove external allurements to disorder; and it was the plain duty of magistrates to keep these allurements within bounds, and in certain cases, to remove them altogether. But he hoped to make the community what it ought to be, by reforming the individuals who composed it. He was, therefore, assiduous in preaching the reception of the Sacraments, and never closed a mission without establishing a "Gild for Frequent Communion." By personal interviews, he sought to establish in every family, the salutary practice of morning and evening prayer in common, and to restore it when it had fallen into disuse. He passed many laborious hours in reconciling enemies, acting as mediator in discordant families, and in persuading litigants to withdraw or compromise actions at law. To assure, as far as might be possible, the continuance of religious duties, he formed sodalities and other pious organizations, which he placed under the care of the local clergy, and for which he often obtained—a point of no small importance—the special approbation of the civil authorities. These plans, he thought, would not only bring about the conversion of the erring individual, but would make his perseverance, in some sense, a matter of community interest.

For nearly ten years, from about June, 1631, almost to the very moment of his death in the midst of his labors in 1640, the Saint continued his personal work among sinners, and among the poor and the abandoned. In modern days, Dr. Healy has stressed, in his "The Individual Delinquent," the necessity of considering every case separately, if reconstruction is to be attained; and it has often been said, that this "intensive method" is the natural and peculiar fruit of modern sociological thought. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The "intensive method" is as old as the Catholic Church. Probably its best exemplification is in the confessional, where the sinner, alone with God's minister, acknowledges his guilt, and solemnly promises to reform his life, by using the means there clearly pointed out to him.

Sources of Power

TWO sources of the Saint's power, were his complete disinterestedness and the conformity of his life to what he preached. A passage in which Daubenton relates how he "broke a corner" in provisions, illustrates his utterly fearless spirit, and, incidentally, reads a warning to those who today would take a like advantage of circumstances somewhat similar:

> The Crop having failed the Year 1637, Corn held an excessive Price: and the whole Country suffered under an extreme Scarcity. The greatest Part of the Workmen were starved or near reduced to starve. The Idea of so many Calamities sensibly touched Regis' heart. . . . He represented to those who had laid up great Stores of Corn and waited the Rising of it to the highest Price, that it was unlawful to make an Advantage of a public Calamity, and grow Rich at the Expense of so many distressed Persons. To others, he remonstrated that they were obliged to redouble their Alms as the Necessities of the Poor increased: That the Obligation to give Alms in the present extreme Scarcity was much more indispensable: and that if they did not comply with that Duty, God would punish them as Murtherers of those who perished for Want of Assistance.

It would be difficult to place the duty of the rich towards the poor in a stronger light. The result of this plain speaking was that

> By his fervent Exhortations, Charity was everywhere revived. Some opened their Granaries and sold Corn at a Just Price: which gave the Burghers some Leisure to breathe. Others opened their Purses and gave him plentifully wherewith to relieve the pressing Wants of many.

Regis never wearied of telling the rich that God regarded them as stewards of the poor, and he on his part, gave to the poor the tireless service of a Saint. "No Company was so agreeable to Regis as the Poor: he visited only them: if he saw the Rich, it was merely to provide the others Relief."

"Uncapable to Yield"

TOWARDS the end of the year 1640, it became apparent that the Saint was sinking under the great burden of his labors. Nevertheless, shortly before Christmas, he set out to open a mission in the little town of La Louvesc. The weather was bitterly cold, and on his arrival after a journey on foot, it was apparent that he was in a dying condition. On Christmas Day, he found himself worse

> And tho in this declining Condition he preached three times and continued the remaining Part of the Day in the Confessional. The following day, the Feast of Saint Stephen, tho dying, he made three Sermons to the People, and pronounced them with greater Vehemency than ever. After the third Sermon, he endeavoured to return to the Tribunal of Pen> ance: but such Multitudes thronged the Church that it was impossible to break through the Crowd. He placed himself near the High Altar to hear Confessions over against a Window without Glass or Shutters: And here his Strength absolutely failed him. He swooned away: within a Quarter of an Hour he came to himself: and his great Soul being uncapable to yield, he heard the Confessions of some poor Country People who had followed him into the Church.

"His great Soul being uncapable to yield." In this scene, almost the last in the life of this devoted lover of the poor, we have the sublimity of that love, greater than which no man can have.

At the Gates of Eternity

THREE days later, simply because he could no longer drag himself into the church, the Saint was obliged to "take time," as was said of another busy Saint, "to die." Touching in its simplicity is Daubenton's description of these last hours.

> As they brought him a little while after some Broth, he desired to be nourished like the Poor, and would be greatly obliged to them, he said, for a little Milk. He begged the Curate to be carried into a Stable to have the Satisfaction of expiring in a Condition like to that of Jesus Christ, newly-born and laid on Straw, since he could not, like Him, die on the Cross. . . . He was never wearied with thanking God for the Favour He bestowed on him to die in the midst of the Poor and amongst raw Country People who had ever been the tenderest Objects of his Zeal. . . . Towards Evening, finding himself at the Gates of Eternity he was seized with exceeding Pleasure. . . . He calmly gave up the Ghost towards Midnight on the last Day of the Year 1640.
>
> In Fine, he expired, as may be said, in the Arms and Bosom of Poverty, on the Brow of a Mountain, in a borrowed House: and God permitted his Body to remain in a Village composed of some few Huts, that is, in the midst of the Poor, as an everlasting Pledge of his Affection to them.

St. John Francis Regis proved his devotion to what we now call the work of reconstruction, by giving his very life to it, dying in the midst of his labors, before the completion of his forty-third year.

Suiting the Means to the End

PRECEDING papers have sketched the main features of the Saint's social work. He was keen, after securing the essential reconstruction of the fallen, through prayer and the Sacraments, to seek and adopt the best means of the day, for their restoration to normal social conditions. He studied carefully the needs of the period and the circumstances of the people among whom his lot was cast; older methods, if found inadequate, he promptly discarded. Some of his own methods he would never employ, I am sure, if he were among us today. Suited to his own time, today they would defeat their purpose. He was neither a faddist nor a hide-bound traditionalist; besides being a very lovable, high-minded, self-sacrificing, and withal, a very human man, he was an exceedingly clear-headed Saint, with no thought whatever of himself, and very much thought of God and of his work for the outcast. The story of his life brings home with special insistence, as it seems to me, two lessons of primary importance in social work. The first is, that blessed, indeed, is the social worker who has learned that only through love can he attain to "understanding concerning the poor." The second is, that unless man's relations to Almighty God are considered as factors in the problem, social reconstruction is hopeless.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

EDUCATION

Penmanship in the Grades

HOW shall we begin to teach muscular-movement writing? Teachers must first learn the mechanics and pedagogy of the subject; they must acquire a comprehensive knowledge of the basic principles, through careful study of the printed pages of the manual. Pupils are close imitators; hence it is not enough that teachers should understand the subject theoretically. They must demonstrate in the writing they do before children, the style of penmanship they expect them to learn. They should keep constantly before the mind of the child that good writing is based upon healthful posture, the development of an easy rhythmic motion limited to the large tireless muscles of the upper arm, with a steadying rest on the larger part of the forearm near the elbow.

Principles Applied in Primary Grades

HABITS developed in childhood prevail through many years, even though great effort is made to eliminate those that are bad. It seems to me that the teaching of finger-movement in primary grades, in order that the little tots may learn to draw the letters precisely, is organically wrong, because the finger movement must be broken up and replaced by easy, rhythmic muscular movement before anyone can learn to write. It is equally true that the teaching of very large letters to primary pupils is wrong, because making these large letters necessitates the use of the whole-arm movement, without the steadying rest on the upper part of the forearm. Pupils who have been taught either finger or whole-arm movement in the primary grades, usually require from two to three years to overcome the finger and whole-arm movement habits. Thus, these two movements, when taught in primary grades, spell retardation. There is no longer any excuse for not teaching the basic principles of correct muscular movement writing in primary grades.

Thoughtful observation will prove to everyone the real value of muscular-movement writing during the elementary school life of the pupil; but entirely apart from this value we must consider, as of first importance, the health of the pupils. Thousands of schoolchildren develop each year lateral curvature of the spine; and it is probably true that the majority of these pupils might have been spared this misfortune had they been taught early the healthful posture and the easy, rhythmic motion which are necessary in the development of good muscular-movement writing. The pupil who writes with finger-motion not only twists his spinal column, but he contorts his body in other ways. He compresses his lungs, making free breathing impossible, and by viewing the writing at an incorrect angle and at too close range, impairs his vision. Muscular movement, on the other hand, compels an upright, healthful posture with straight spinal column, and lungs expanded sufficiently to permit and encourage free and regular respiration.

Four Requisites of Good Writing

PUPILS who are taught muscular-movement writing in the first two grades are able to write rapidly, easily and well in the third grade, and thereafter the process of development is rapid until in the fifth and sixth grades pupils almost reach ideality in the style of penmanship embodying legibility, rapidity, ease and endurance.

I do not think we can mention too often those four requisites of good writing. In these later days, some of the educators of the country, who are not in close touch with business interests, have stated that long-hand writing is no longer of very much importance, since the typewriter is doing so much of the office work that was formerly done with pen and ink. The typewriter has reduced to a minimum the drudgery of the office correspondence. It has supplemented long-hand writing, but has not supplanted it, and there probably has never been a time in the history of commerce when good long-hand writing was more generously appreciated by business men. Indeed, many recent investigations have proved conclusively that the stenographer, entry-clerk, bookkeeper, billing-clerk or general office-assistant who writes a good business hand is paid a higher salary than the clerk of equal ability in all things except penmanship is able to command.

Correlating the Subject

STOP and consider how many minutes a day, five days a week, and all the school days of the year, pupils use writing in correlation with other branches. Teachers have discovered that pupils who write automatically and well, with muscular movement, are able to write an entire page while pupils who sit in cramped positions, and use finger-movement, are writing but one short paragraph. The pupil who writes automatically and easily with muscular-movement is able to concentrate his mind upon the spelling of the word he is writing. In the spelling especially, our first impulse is usually more nearly correct than the afterthought, and it has been demonstrated over and over that pupils who write with muscular-movement learn spelling more readily than those who do not have the muscular-movement vehicle to carry the spelling.

It cannot be truthfully said that a teacher has taught before her pupils have learned; and so, in the teaching of muscular-movement writing, no teacher who conducts each day a good lesson in penmanship, and who then permits her pupils to sit in unhealthful postures, and use finger, wrist, or whole-arm movement in their written tasks, is really teaching muscular-movement penmanship. We all should emphasize the fact strongly and establish it as a dominant thought in the mind of every child, that the writing lesson is only for the purpose of teaching pupils how to write their spelling, their composition, and other school-work where handwriting is used.

We no longer hear, as an argument in opposition to the teaching of muscular-movement writing, that it is not a permanent style, that pupils will soon drift back to finger-movement when they leave school and are no longer under the direction of the expert teacher of penmanship. There are hundreds of thousands of young men and women throughout the United States whose example refutes absolutely the charge that muscular-movement writing is not a permanent asset. In social life and in business, these young men and women are using, daily, automatic muscular-movement as the means by which their thoughts are transferred to paper.

Good writing has been the stepping-stone for many boys and girls to positions of responsibility, trust, and large remuneration in mercantile institutions, but we are more interested in penmanship as a carrying power in educational work. Whether we admit it or not, writing is used and will continue to be used as the vehicle that must carry the big load in educational processes.

A Sister of Mercy.

College of Mt. St. Mary,
Plainfield, N. J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Catholic Educational Convention

"NEVER, perhaps, has there been a gathering in this city," said Bishop Dougherty, at the Church of the Holy Angels, in Buffalo, "with higher and nobler aims than this convention of the Catholic Educational Association of the United States." In eloquent words, he then outlined to the assembled delegates the object of their convention:

> You have come from the North and South, from East and West, with the sole purpose of increasing the effectiveness of your service to the Church and to the country by the training of our youth in the ways of true knowledge and of Christian virtue. You have assembled here with a sincere desire to have a correct valuation placed upon your work, to face the difficulties of the modern educational world, and to combine and coordinate your forces so that the army of Catholic educators may go forward in unbroken ranks to win in the future victories more brilliant than those won in the past.

Unwonted enthusiasm was displayed at this fourteenth annual meeting of the Catholic educators. Special gratification was expressed in the resolutions over the prompt response of Catholic collegians to the President's appeal for the defense of the country. Parents, moreover, were petitioned that out of the spirit of patriotism they should not fail to keep their children at school during the coming year, even though this should imply a real sacrifice on their part. This is a point strongly insisted upon likewise by the United States Commissioner of Education, since in the near future, owing to the war, there will be more need than ever of thoroughly trained and educated men. Great stress was furthermore laid upon the duty of providing a Catholic education for every Catholic child. This was not only incorporated into the resolutions, but was the very keynote struck in Bishop Dougherty's sermon at the opening of the convention: "Let all Catholics realize," he said, "that they are seriously obliged to give to each child the opportunity for a rounded Christian education, from the primary grades to the university, from the simplest foundation to the highest point of professional excellency."

Billy Sunday's Catholic "Trail-Hitters"

THE number of Catholic trail-hitters in the Boston revival meetings conducted by Billy Sunday was 1,381, according to the indisputable evidence of the blanks filled out and signed by them; but thereby hangs a tale. The cards were all duly and respectfully forwarded to the Catholic authorities, who immediately instituted a rigorous investigation into each single case. The following are the facts ascertained:

Signers for curiosity and fun	372
Unable to verify because of changed address, etc	298
Insufficient address on cards	205
No such person at address given	195
Not practical Catholics	66
Non-Catholics	46
Deny being present and signing cards	36
No such address	35
Request of employer	23
Converts	6
Not responsible for actions	6
Perverts	4
Unable to give any explanations of their actions	4
Went with Protestant friend	3
Went to hear sermon on temperance	2

The remaining eighty names were those of children, in whose regard the following facts were gathered:

Curiosity and fun	57
Unable to verify because of changed address, etc	16
Taken by Protestant friends	4
Not practical Catholics	2
Never attended	1

In the words of the official organ of the Boston archdiocese, "Further comment is unnecessary."

Who Is to Pay the Cost of the War?

IT would be amusing, if the matter were less serious, says the Christian Herald, to notice the alacrity with which those who have reaped, and still are gathering the greatest profits from the war, are anxious to shift their portion of its cost upon posterity. It is an easy patriotism, the Protestant journal remarks, to buy untaxed Government bonds, but a rather disagreeable business to give up good money and receive nothing, except a mere tax receipt in return.

> That the war thus far has been and is of immeasurable benefit financially to this generation in this country is seen in the enormous mushroom fortunes springing up on every hand. It is clearly in evidence that these reapers of war profits have abundant ability to pay a just share of the war cost. They are getting their advantage out of the war, whether posterity ever gets any or not.

Present wealth should be made to pay its just share as we go along. Wealth should be held no more sacred against conscription than bodies are. While men who have nothing but their lives to give are drafted, the dollars should be drafted too.

The last three years in this country have been epoch-making so far as big business is concerned. The exports have increased from $2,465,884,149 in 1913 to $4,333,658,865 in 1916. For the ten months of the fiscal year ending April 30 the total exports were $5,167,000,000. This excess war trade has yielded and is increasingly yielding enormous excess war profits, which may very justly be made to bear a considerable share of the excess war cost. A careful estimate has shown that the profits of 1916 in excess of the average for the last three years before the war amount to some $3,500,000,000. At this rate, and the rate is increasing, every 10 per cent of tax on excess war profits alone would yield $350,000,000.

The profit-bloated munition-makers, dealers in army and navy supplies, food pirates and holders of foreign certificates, who were so insistent upon our participation in the war, should now be drafted into paying their share of war's tremendous cost.

It is not fair, as the paper rightly says, that general business —which is profiting little and in many instances is seriously injured by the war—and particularly the mass of the people who in general are reaping nothing but suffering from our entrance into this conflict, should be made to bear its burden, and that these dazzling profiteers should be left almost untouched. Least of all should the meager private incomes, barely sufficient to sustain families, be heavily taxed. As for shifting the burden on posterity, because posterity will be benefited by the war, this supposition, as the editor correctly argues, is a pure assumption which no one can prove.

Catholic Preparedness at Bayou Lafourche

RACE-SUICIDE and birth-control have no votaries among the good Catholic people of Bayou Lafourche, in Louisiana, as the Rev. Albert Biever, S.J., can testify. Closing a mission with the usual blessing of the children of the parish, he promised a medal to each of the little ones and a rosary to every mother of seven children or more. "It is meet and just," he said, "that the noble mothers of these numerous, beautiful and healthy children should also be publicly honored and rewarded. Let them come up to the altar and receive their rosaries as a memorial of this wonderful ceremony." The next moment the missionary, holding out a handful of rosaries, found himself standing bewildered before a throng of eager mothers crowding to the altar-rail. Says the Times-Picayune of New Orleans:

> The mothers of seven children were few, but the mothers of twelve, fourteen, eighteen, nineteen and twenty children were in the great majority. One good lady asked for three rosaries, proudly proclaiming that she was the mother of twenty-one children. The missionary, not expecting such a heavy demand for his rosaries, asked Rev. Father Jan, the pastor, to take down the names of the children, promising to fulfil his contract in the near future. More than 200 names were written down and handed to Father Biever. From the figures recorded it was ascertained that 300 children were born to twenty-five families.

Here is a living refutation of much that for years has been taught by the Satanic school of modern birth-restriction. Fittingly Father Biever concluded his address with the beautiful words of the Psalmist: "Behold thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the Lord. His wife shall be as a fruitful vine on the side of his house and his children as olive plants around about his table." It is interesting to note that at Bayou Lafourche, not far from Larose where the mission took place, Chief Justice White was born.

What We are Doing for Pagan Children

THE grand total of the contributions to the Holy Childhood Association for the past year has been $67,147.08. This splendid organization for the salvation of the abandoned children in pagan lands is gradually becoming better known in our country. Were the wish of the Holy Father heeded, that "The Holy Childhood be established in every school and college of the United States," and were every child in our Catholic schools enrolled, as the Holy See desires, the annual contribution from this source alone would be $180,000. The fullest appreciation of this great work has been shown by the archdiocese of Boston, which gave $7,838.59. In general there is great need of popular education upon this important subject. "It seems that the mission boards, home and foreign, have discovered the Sunday school," a character introduced into the Epworth Herald, is made to remark. "Time they did, too. The Sunday school has been providing half a million dollars or more of missionary money every year, from the monthly missionary collections, if I get the report straight." Evidently we have still a great educational task to perform before the mission collections from our Catholic schools will even remotely approximate such a sum. A cheerful sign in the Holy Childhood report are the many donations of five dollars each for "the purchase of a heathen child." Over 500,000 dying infants are annually baptized in the missions supported by the Holy Childhood and nearly 600,000 are reared and educated in the Catholic Faith.

A New Sulpician Seminary

PLANS for an elaborate structure, which is to serve as the new Sulpician Seminary, and is to be erected at Washington, D. C., have been drawn up by Messrs. Maginnis and Walsh, the architects of the highly artistic buildings of Boston College. The halls of the old St. Mary's Seminary are overcrowded with students, many of whom must at present be lodged outside its walls. Everywhere there is need of a greater number of priests, and the war will even increase this demand. It is right and timely, therefore, that a new seminary should be erected, even under the stress of the existing national crisis. Today the halls of St. Mary's shelter clerical students from forty-one American dioceses, and her alumni are scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land in the service of Church and country. When St. Mary's Seminary at Baltimore was erected years ago, said the Very Reverend Edward R. Dyer, president of the institution, in a recent interview, the Sulpicians looked to France for their support. This they can no longer do :

> No, we cannot look to France, like our predecessors, but this new foundation has already enlisted, and in the future doubtless will enlist the sympathy of many a Catholic man and Catholic woman throughout the country, because the scope of the Seminary knows no State boundaries. It is a national institution. While Catholics listen to their parish priests, or spend their evenings in reading Catholic literature, which nourishes and defends their faith, don't you think they frequently recall the Seminary where so many of these speakers and writers received and formed their habits of sacerdotal fitness? And are not the Catholic laity thus stimulated, both by what they find edifying in our alumni, and by what they find at times amiss, to help by any means in their power these clerical schools in which they recognize the real fountain heads of Catholic life?

St. Mary's Seminary has given priests to almost every diocese in the United States. At the head of its graduates stands the venerable Cardinal of Baltimore. One or more bishops of Albany, Boston, Hartford, Pittsburg, Wheeling, Wilmington, Baltimore, Richmond, North Carolina, Charleston, S. C., Mobile, New Orleans, Dallas, Santa Fe, Detroit and Dubuque received their first seminary training in its classes. The first student on its list was Stephen Badin, ordained by Bishop Carroll in 1793, and the third was Prince Demetrius Gallitzin, the famous missionary of western Pennsylvania. Yet we trust that the great work of the Sulpicians in the United States has so far made its beginning only, and that with the new school a still more glorious record will be established for these devoted teachers of our future priests.

Growth of Mormonism in the United States

MORMONISM has registered a considerable growth during the past year. According to the annual report of the Utah Gospel Mission of Cleveland there are now 254 Mormon organizations outside the Utah district itself. This implies an increase of fifty-four establishments. Mormonism has likewise been remarkably active in contributing towards the support of its missionaries, who received $2,625,000 last year. This, it is figured, provided each of the 1,600 missionary agents with the generous allowance of $1,841. The principal growth of Mormonism, to judge by the number of new organizations established, has been in Kentucky. Missouri and Georgia are next in order, but there has been a wide distribution of the new institutions throughout a large portion of the United States. The great impetus given to Mormonism during the Civil War is used by the Utah Gospel Mission as a special reason for renewed efforts during the present war. It is quite consistent for the evil of Mormonism to flourish in our modern civilization, side by side with the popular divorce courts, since in principle the two are very nearly related.

Training Camps for the Soul

"A RETREAT is a training camp for the soul," says the retreat leaflet from St. Mary's College, St. Mary's, Kansas. "Are you registered and drafted in Christ's army? Have you mobilized and organized your soul forces? Have you trained them for efficiency in daily battle? Do you know your enemy and where he is intrenched?" The retreat is the greatest spiritual opportunity offered to the laity. It prepares them for life's battle as well as for Christ's final call into eternity. A long list of laymen's and women's retreats for the summer months have already been published in AMERICA. Our attention is called likewise to the English and French retreats for women of all classes which are given throughout the entire year at the Monastery of the Precious Blood, Manchester, N. H., and in the houses of these same Sisters in Brooklyn and at Portland, Oregon. The number of retreats and retreatants is rapidly multiplying everywhere, and it is evident that the Catholic laity is learning to appreciate the great gift offered them in these spiritual exercises. "Quest of truth and the will to win" are the only requirements.

"The Dark Ages That Ended on the First of August, 1914"

"WHAT is it, within the English Church, that, tried in the balance of the awful test of war, has been found wanting?" asks the American Anglican organ, the Living Church, in the issue of June 23. Putting its finger upon what it considers the cardinal defect, it answers: "We should say that it was the defect of Anglican coldness." Then follows the remarkable confession that it was all a dreadful mistake to have discarded the Catholic doctrine of the utility of prayers offered for the dead, and at the same time is expressed a longing for Catholic devotion to the Blessed Sacrament. The word "Catholic," indeed, is not breathed, yet it is in the Catholic Church alone that Anglicans can find that final peace and unity for which they yearn and can practise in all truth and perfection these consoling devotions. The editor writes:

> That the Anglican religion has not, in fact, gone to the heart of the English masses is evident from the superficiality of the religion of the soldier to which we have already alluded. The tommy who has gone out from such a parish as St. Alban's, Holborn, has an enthusiastic, intelligent religion that sticks to him when he is suddenly deprived of the props that he had at home. But the soldier from the average Protestant parish of the English Church has gone into war with no religion really stored in his heart. He has suddenly shown up the coldness of the religion in which he grew up. He is a standing witness to its inadequacy, and to the inefficiency of the English Church.

He then specifies the first revolt that has taken place within the Anglican Church, or as we should rightly say, its first approach towards the religion which it had mistakenly discarded:

> The first was a revolt against the coldness that stood in the way of direct prayers for the dead. Mothers whose sons were torn from them to die on French or Mesopotamian battlefields were not interested in the hair-splitting arguments of Protestant schoolmen. They rose in revolt against the coldness that had refused or greatly limited such prayers, and threw themselves and their dearest ones whole-heartedly upon the mercy of Almighty God. A Sunday morning congregation dressed in crepe is a very different phenomenon from the congregations of four years ago. The conventional coldness of the Sunday morning service of those years that now constitute a past epoch, such as never will return to us, has broken down. If the Church could not aid these mothers in their grief; if she could not lead and direct the prayers that were flowing from the mothers' hearts, whether long-surpliced or magpied relics of the days of Anglican coldness liked it or not, then so much the worse for the Church. Mothers in bereavement find access to Almighty God in language that has not passed the scrutiny of houses of convocation. And all England shoved the academic exponents of Anglican coldness aside and began praying for her dead—praying real, genuine prayers that flow from the heart; we can easily forecast that she never will stop.

The second revolt consists in a longing for a restoration of the full devotion to the Blessed Sacrament. This they will seek in vain until they are united to that Mother Church whence of old they were torn and which has not ceased to yearn for their return. Again the Anglican editor writes:

> Let the apostles of Anglican coldness shut themselves in their studies and produce triumphant proofs that Cranmer or some other dead and buried genius of that coldness did not make provision for the reserved sacrament. Mothers don't care. The age in which we live began in the year 1914. Relics of other ages have no business in our age. Museums of pre-historic specimens are interesting but we do not clothe them with the duties of war councils.
>
> The sick and wounded of today are going to have the Blessed Sacrament administered to them. The bereaved are going into chapels of the Blessed Sacrament to pray. Churches and clergy that do not provide these facilities must expect to be relegated to the company of the ecclesiastical equivalent of the great auk. Bishops that will sympathetically help to guide and direct this new phase of the revolt against Anglican coldness, and to prevent abuses of it, will be gratefully followed as fathers in God by their loyal children. Scholars who conscientiously believe that Reservation is unlawful in the Anglican Churches may well direct their efforts now into the channels of making it lawful. . . . Never again will Churchmen consent to have their religion circumscribed as it was in the dark ages that ended on the first of August, 1914.

Why not recognize that the one Church which has perfectly answered all the needs of the year 1917, as of the first century of Christianity, is the one only Catholic, Apostolic Church, which never called for any change of doctrine, whether in the days of the Roman Caesars or of the great world-war, because it alone is the Church that Christ built upon Peter, with the promise of His abiding presence, a promise irreconcilable with doctrinal error, "even to the consummation of the world"?

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

JULY 14, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Aspects of the Mexican Propaganda

Eber Cole Byam

What Ireland Wants

Raphael O'Kelly

The American Indian

Philip Gordon

Zionism and the Future of Palestine

A. Hilliard Atteridge

Practical Suggestions on Church Music

Harold Becket Gibbs

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS for JULY 14, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 14

PAGE

CHRONICLE 339-342

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Aspects of the Mexican Propaganda—What Ireland Wants—The American Indian and Catholicism—Zionism and the Future of Palestine—Practical Suggestions on Church Music 343-351

COMMUNICATIONS 351-352

EDITORIALS

A Warning in the Name of Patriotism —Are We Civilized?—Mohammedan New York—Catholics in War—Prison Barracks —The Cardinal and the President—Exit the Gloater—Mercy and Justice.....353-355

LITERATURE—Jane Austen — Reviews — Books and Authors.....356-359

ECONOMICS—Why Not Tax Our Charities?.359-360

EDUCATION—Drawing in the Grades.....360-361

NOTE AND COMMENT.....361-362

The Catholic Mind

Issue for July 8, 1917

THE MIXED MARRIAGE PROBLEM
A Remedy for Mixed Marriage
The Danger of Mixed Marriage
The Church Always Right

ONE of the perils confronting the Church today is the constantly increasing number of mixed marriages. How they can be discouraged and the remedies to be used to avert their disastrous spiritual consequences are pointed out in this issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. It is a seasonable number owing to the constant need for such admonitions and especially on account of the social exigencies arising from summer-vacations.

You cannot afford to be without these useful little pamphlets.

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers)

Send us your Subscription at once.

$1.00 Per Year
Single numbers 5 cents each
For Parish Book Racks $4.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS 59 East 83rd St. New York, N. Y.

Who's Who

THE REV. PHILIP GORDON, contributor of "The American Indian and Catholicism," is one of the descendants of the celebrated Chippewa chieftain Hole-in-the-Day. He was born and reared in northern Wisconsin, attending first the district schools, then the St. Mary's Mission School on the Bad River Reservation in Wisconsin. From there he entered St. Thomas College, St. Paul, and completed the six-year classical course. After a year at the St. Paul Seminary, Father Gordon finished his philosophical studies at the American College, Rome. His theology was taken in the Royal University of Innsbruck, whence he returned to America and was ordained to the priesthood at the Sacred Heart Cathedral, Superior, Wis., in 1913, at the age of 27, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Koudelka. Following ordination, Father Gordon took a course of one year at the Catholic University, and is now completing his second year as general field agent for the Indian Missions.

HAROLD BECKET GIBBS, Mus. Doc. of the Papal College of Music, Rome, author of "Practical Suggestions in Church Music" in this number of AMERICA, was born in England in 1868 and educated in London, Paris, Brussels and Cologne. For many years he was associated with the late Harry Bainbridge Briggs, founder of the Plainsong and Medieval Music Society, in propagating Gregorian music in Catholic and Anglican centers in Great Britain. Mr. Gibbs was a devoted disciple and pupil of Dom Mocquereau, O.S.B., both at Solesmes and on the Isle of Wight. Converted in 1903, he came to the United States in 1905 to assist in the church music reform in the dioceses of Covington and Cincinnati. Mr. Gibbs is at present a member of the faculty of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the Rev. Francis Cassilly, S. J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at all times. -:- -:-

Cloth 25 cents
12 Copies $2.70
50 Copies $11.50
100 Copies $22.00

Paper 10 cents
12 Copies $1.00
50 Copies $4.00
100 Copies $7.50

Postage extra

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 14
WHOLE No. 431

JULY 14, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—On the war-front in France there has been considerable activity during the past week, but no marked progress has been made. The British have advanced a short distance on a front of a third of a mile southwest of Hollebeke; the Germans gained but subsequently lost some positions on the Chemin des Dames east of Cerny; they also continued their offensive in the Verdun sector and succeeded in taking some of the French trenches on the slope of Hill 304. The Russian offensive which has extended in desultory fighting to many points from Riga to the Dniester has been concentrated in Galicia from the vicinity of Zloczow to a point south of Brzezany, where the Russians, according to Petrograd, attacked on a front of about twenty miles, captured the towns of Presovce, Zborov and Korshiduv, forced the Austro-Germans to retire to the west bank of the Little Stripa, occupied Koniuchy, Lavrikovce and Travatlaki, and are advancing from three sides on both Zloczow and Brzezany. The Austro-Germans have made a number of counter-attacks, but have failed to retake the captured territory. Petrograd describes the battle as an important victory, Berlin calls it a sanguinary defeat.

Bulletin, July 2, p.m., July 9, a.m.

The War Revenue bill has been reported to the Senate by Senator Simmons, Chairman of the Senate Financial Committee. In its final revision the graduated excess profits tax was somewhat modified. The new provisions are as follows: 40 per cent on excess profits over 150 per cent and under 200 per cent; 45 per cent on excess profits over 200 per cent and under 250 per cent; 50 per cent on excess profits over 250 per cent. According to the estimates of the Financial Committee this increase will yield an additional $18,000,000. The entire bill provides for an increase in taxes for war purposes of $1,670,170,000. This sum, however, according to the Treasury Department, will fall short of meeting the expenses of the war for the ensuing year by approximately $600,000,000. The Committee believes that the Treasury will be able to meet the situation by issuing Panama Canal bonds, if this be necessary before the next regular session of Congress.

War Revenue Bill

The first of the Administration Food bills, technically known as the Food Supply bill, which, since its passage by both Houses has been in conference for the purpose of adjustment of differences, is now in a fair way to come before Congress in the near future for a final vote. The conferees have agreed to adopt the Senate amendment providing for the commandeering of seeds. The section of the bill which provides for the buying and selling of seeds by the Government has been altered so as to include governmental direction of the sowing of seeds.

The Food Bills

The second of the Administration Food bills, which goes by the name of the Administration Food bill and was recently passed by the House, after receiving a majority vote in the Senate Agricultural Committee, was reported favorably to the Senate and has been under discussion throughout the week. A number of changes in the House bill were recommended by Mr. Hoover, some of which were accepted by the Committee. The Senate bill, as now amended by a vote of forty-two to sixteen, includes governmental control not only of food, feeds and fuel, but also of other necessities, notably steel, iron, lead, copper, platinum, hemp, jute, sisal, petroleum, cotton, wool, and their products; hides, skins, [illegible] ments, and fertilizers and their ingredients. Other amendments, which have been accepted by the Senate, still further enlarge the President's requisitioning powers, include the licensing and anti-hoarding sections, but exempt farmers, gardeners, stock-raisers, and farmers cooperative associations, from the control of the Administration. Among the amendments offered but not yet passed is one, of a very sweeping character, which proposes to give the President power to commandeer men and property whenever it shall be deemed necessary to do so for the conduct of the war; and another providing for the purchase of supplies for the United States and the Allied Governments by the board created by the bill, which board is to be responsible to Congress.

The only part of the bill which has been subjected to prolonged discussion was the prohibition section. The Senate Agricultural Committee reported favorably on the incorporation of this measure into the Administration Food bill, and finally accepted the Gore amendment in preference to the amendment framed by Senator Chamberlain, writing it into the bill in practically the form published last week. The debate opened with the consideration of this amendment, for which, however, Senator Robinson offered the following as a substitute:

The Prohibition Measure

That from and after thirty days from the date of approval of this act no person shall use any food, fruits, food materials or feeds in the production of distilled liquors or spirits, except for governmental, industrial, manufacturing, scientific or medicinal purposes.

Any person who wilfully violates this section shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years or both.

Senator Myers at once offered an amendment to this amendment, and proposed that the manufacture of malt and vinous liquors should be legislated against no less than the manufacture of distilled liquors. His amendment was defeated by a vote of fifty-two to thirty-four. The effort to enact complete prohibition of distilled liquor was crystallized in the amendment of Senator Cummins, which was passed, a vote of forty-five to forty forbidding the release of alcoholic beverages from bond, and another vote of sixty-eight to ten barring the importation of distilled spirits from abroad.

No distilled liquors or spirits now in bond in the United States shall during the existing war be withdrawn to be used as a beverage. Nor shall there be imported into the United States during the said war any distilled liquors.

Senator Reed tried to effect a compromise by proposing that the President should be authorized at his discretion to permit the withdrawal of distilled spirits from bonded warehouses. His amendment was defeated by a vote of fifty-two to thirty-four. As violent opposition was made to the Cummins amendment when it came up for reconsideration, on the ground that it amounted to a virtual confiscation of 220,000,000 gallons of whisky and would seriously derange business conditions, Senator Smoot offered an amendment by which the President would not only be authorized but directed to take over for the Government the entire stock of distilled liquor which shall be in bond at the time of the passage of the bill, full price being given to owners. The Smoot amendment passed by a vote of sixty to twelve. Action was then taken on the Robinson amendment into which both the Cummins and Smoot amendments were incorporated and which in its last form read as follows:

That from and after thirty days from the date of the approval of this act no person shall use any foods, fruits, food materials or feeds in the production of distilled liquors, except for governmental, industrial, manufacturing, scientific or medical purposes, nor shall there be imported into the United States during said war any distilled liquors, provided that the President of the United States be and hereby is directed to take over for and on behalf of the Government of the United States all distilled liquors that are held in bond at the time this act goes into effect, and he is hereby authorized to pay to the owners of such liquors the actual cost of the same plus a profit not exceeding ten per cent.

And provided, further, that the collection of all excise tax on distilled spirits in bond at the time of the passage of this act shall be suspended so long as this act is in force and the distiller, in event that said distilled spirits shall be taken over by the Government as herein provided, shall be discharged from all obligations for any and all taxes levied and assessed against said distilled spirits, provided, however, that the owner of the distilled spirits shall not withdraw any part thereof without the payment of the excise tax in force.

Any person who wilfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The Robinson amendment in this form finally passed the Senate by a vote of forty-five to thirty-six.

One of the effects of the bill, as it at present stands, will be to impose on the Government the necessity of expending about $200,000,000 for the purchase of the distilled liquor. It will also mean the elimination of about $210,000,000 which would have been collected in revenue according to the existing law, and about $210,000,000 which it was proposed to collect in a supertax according to the proposed War Revenue bill.

Aviation Bill

An Administration Aviation bill has been drafted and submitted to the House Military Committee. The measure makes provision for the immediate construction of 22,625 aeroplanes and 45,250 engines, at a cost of about $363,140,000, and the formation of an aviation corps of 75,000 men. Under the terms of this proposed legislation the President would be given power to organize this corps and to draft men for air service, should such a step be necessary.

Other Items

On July 5 the new Russian Ambassador, Boris Bakhmetieff, was received by President Wilson as the first permanent diplomatic representative of the Russian democracy. He assured the President of the adherence of his Government to the alliance against Germany and received in return the President's assurance of the confidence of the United States in the new Russian Government, his admiration for the way in which it is meeting all requirements, his sympathy with its noble object to ensure the people of Russia the blessings of freedom and equal rights and opportunity, and his faith "that through its efforts Russia will assume her rightful place among the great free nations of the world."

Secretary Lansing on July 3 received the Rumanian Patriotic Mission, which has come to the United States with the purpose of inducing Rumanians to enlist in the American army and to fight for the allied cause. Mr. Lansing assured the visitors that the United States looked with sympathy on the mission and expressed the Government's gratification at what Rumania is doing in the war.

The President has issued a proclamation establishing a qualified embargo upon the exportation to foreign nations of food-grains, meats, fuel, and the most important of war materials. This regulation is to take effect July 15.

Canada.—On July 6 the second reading of the Conscription bill passed the Commons by a vote of 118 to 55.

A number of English-speaking Liberals joined Premier Borden, giving the Government some twenty more votes than it usually polls on important problems. Before the vote was taken Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed a referendum, but the motion was defeated by forty-nine votes. A resolution of the French Nationalists from the Province of Quebec moving for a six-months' postponement of the measure was lost by a majority of 166. An amendment for more adequate provision for dependents of men at the front was voted down by a poll of 115 to 55, the Premier insinuating that the amendment would interfere with the second reading. In opposing conscription Sir Wilfrid Laurier is upholding the Liberal ideal while Premier Borden is pursuing a policy which he foreshadowed on December 27, when he said:

Conscription

> You have asked for an assurance that under no circumstances will conscription be undertaken or carried out. As I stated to you at our interview, I must decline to give any such assurance. I hope that conscription may not be necessary, but if it should prove the only effective method to preserve the existence of the State and of the institutions and liberties which we enjoy I should consider it necessary and I should not hesitate to act accordingly.

In introducing the bill on June 11 he declared:

> There are only two alternatives, to let our forces dwindle from four divisions to three, from three to two, and perhaps from two to one, or to bring aid by other means than an appeal for voluntary service. That is the problem which confronts Canada today. . . . I am in a position to assure the House and the country that the need of reinforcements is urgent, insistent and imperative. . . . The effort of the United States is only at its beginning. It is Germany's hope to win the war before the power of the United States can become effective. More than that, it is her confident belief.

The bill, it is thought, will quickly pass into law, to be followed, in all probability, by some "passive resistance," if not by occasional riots.

China.—"The Emperor Hsuan Tung was restored to the throne of China last night" was the news sent from Pekin on July 2. It was General Chang Hsun's coup d'état. The Emperor, who was deposed five years ago by Yuan Shi-Kai, and is now a boy of eleven, was conducted to the imperial palace by General Chang Hsun and enthroned there. He then issued an edict in which he explained how he relinquished sovereign power some years ago but that he is now assuming the administration of affairs again to keep the country from disintegrating and to save the people from suffering. The Emperor goes on to say that President Li Yuan-Hung "memorializes us to take over the Government, stating that he was forced by the troops during the first revolution to become the nation's head. He bemoans his defects as head of the Republic and asks us to punish him. We recognize his mistakes, and also his merits. We hereby appoint him a duke of the first class." The edict then announced that China's new Government will be based on the following principles:

Chang Hsun's Coup

> The country shall be administered according to the constitutional laws promulgated by the late Emperor. Expenses of the imperial household shall remain the same as those fixed by the Republic. Blood princes shall not be allowed to interfere in politics. There shall be no difference between Manchu and Chinese. Marriage between them is allowed. All foreign treaties and contracts shall remain in force. The stamp tax and other petty taxes are abolished. The Republican criminal civil code is abolished and that introduced the first year under Hsuan Tung's Government is reinstated. Political offenders are pardoned. The wearing of queues is optional.

The Emperor made these Cabinet appointments:

> Grand Secretary (equivalent to Premier), Gen. Chang H-[illegible]; Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lian Tun-Yen; Minister of Fi[illegible], Chang Chen-Fang; Minister of War, Lei Chen-Chun; Mi[illegible] of Interior, Chu Chia-Pao; Chief of the General Staff, Wang Shih-Scheng; Guardians of the Emperor, Hsu Shih-Chang and Qung Yu-Wei.

Little disorder attended the restoration of the Manchu dynasty. The first intimation foreigners in Peking had of General Chang Hsun's move was the appearance of strong detachments of his soldiers who mingled with the soldiers of the capital, and then the monarchy was proclaimed. But the Republicans of the South were not ready of course to accept the Manchus, so fighting began on July 5 at Lang-fang, some thirty-five miles from Peking, in a battle between 5,000 of General Chang Hsun's troops and 20,000 Republicans. Tuan Chi-Jui, commander-in-chief of the Republican forces, issued a manifesto denouncing General Chang Hsun, and charging him with selfish ambition. He promised the imperial troops favorable terms if they would lay down their arms. Fifteen provinces were said to be supporting Tuan Chi-Jui, and the small force General Chang Hsun had behind him seemed to make the Emperor's cause hopeless. News came on July 5 that the advance on Peking of the northern and southern Republican armies, under Tuan Chi-Jui, the former Premier, and General Feng Kwo-chang, the former Vice-President, respectively, had commenced.

Republican Opposition

Republican military and naval leaders met at Shanghai on July 5 and passed a resolution constituting that city the Republic's capital. A telegram was sent to President Li Yuan-hung, who had escaped from his palace to the Japanese legation, inviting him to come to Shanghai, but official dispatches received on July 8 at the Chinese legation at Washington announced that the Republic had been firmly re-established at Nanking with Feng Kou-Chang, formerly Vice-President, as President of the Provisional Government, President Li Yuan Hung having retired in his subordinate's favor. Governors of all the military provinces have refused to join General Chang Hsun and have asked Premier Tsan Chi-Jui to lead the expedition against the monarchist forces. Two Republican armies have been sent against General Chang

Hsun. The abdication of China's youthful Emperor is reported to have followed a defeat of his troops, and General Chang Hsun is said to have resigned command of the army which has been dwindling as the Republican forces neared the capital. On July 9 Premier Tsan Chi Jui, leader of the Republicans, was preparing to besiege Peking. He announced in a manifesto that the lives and property of foreigners would be safe, and he was reported to be forming a new Republican cabinet.

Ireland.—On Friday, July 6, Lloyd George announced in the House of Commons that the Irish Convention would meet in Dublin, July 25, to deal with preliminary business, including the selection of a chairman. The Government has suggested Henry E. Duke, Chief Secretary for Ireland, as presiding officer pro tem. At this date the nominations for the Convention are not complete and, as a consequence, the Government has refused to make known its fifteen candidates. The outlook for the final success of the Convention is not bright. T. P. O'Connor, though certain that Home Rule is at hand, is not keen on the assembly. He said recently in an interview granted to newspaper men:

The Convention

> I am neither hopeful nor despondent. I do not think anybody can give an accurate forecast of what so uncertain a thing as a gathering of such heterogeneous elements can turn out to be. Nor do I at all accept the idea that the convention is the end any more than the beginning of the struggle for Home Rule. In some respects it might be said that the struggle for Irish self-government is over. Anybody who wants to defeat self-government for Ireland now has to fight, not Ireland, but the world. The world has spoken; the cause is decided. The when, the where, of Home Rule alone remain important things that must settle themselves, and quickly, now that the principle of Irish self-government has been adopted with the sanction of the entire world, and with that of practically all England, almost as much as of all America. I refuse, then, to say that if the convention failed, that would do anything worse than mark another milestone on the road to which there can be only one ending.

Commenting further on the subject, he remarked:

> What I think the convention ought to do is for the Nationalists to offer freely, without even being asked, every possible safeguard against the apprehensions, unfounded but sincere, which the Orangemen entertain of interference by the Dublin Parliament with their liberties, civil or religious. I would be willing, for instance, to increase the representation of the urban districts; that would do good all over Ireland, for I see some danger in a mere farmer parliament; it might be too conservative. An increase, however, of urban representation would give more additional members to Ulster than to the rest of Ireland.
>
> I would also give larger representation in the Senate to the Unionist forces of the country. Finally, I have heard a suggestion that there might be in Ulster and in the south of Ireland provincial councils for dealing with purely local affairs, both these councils, of course, being subject to the National Parliament in College Green. I don't quite like this suggestion, but it has the backing of several very important men in Ireland and in more than one party. I would, in short, give the Orangemen any fair concession, but no Irish Nationalist can now accept, even temporarily, the partition of Ireland in any shape.

In regard to the binding force of the decision of the majority on the Government and on the minority, Mr. O'Connor declared:

> The convention has advisory, not legislative, powers; what recommendations it makes must afterward be accepted by the Government, be put by them into a bill, and passed through the houses of Parliament. On most of the questions submitted to the convention, I believe there will be little difficulty in coming to an agreement. The one crux of the problem, now, as for the last three years, is Ulster, or rather, Orange Ulster.

As to partition, Mr. O'Connor was not sure that the Orangemen would demand it. Irish-Americans, Tories in England, the labor section of the Ministry, Protestants in the South, and some, too, in the North, were against it, and in view of this, perhaps, the Orangemen will not press the question too far.

Discussing the defeat of partition, Mr. O'Connor affirmed:

> Either the Orangemen will bow before this, or carry on their opposition to it outside the convention. In the latter case I think the Government might very well be compelled by English as well as by Irish opinion to use such pressure on the Orangemen, such as appeals to their patriotism at an hour when the Allies are fighting for the liberties of Europe, as would compel or persuade them to throw in their lot with the rest of their countrymen.

That partition will be entirely unwelcome to the vast majority of the Irish throughout the world is undoubtedly true. They will look upon it as another form of the odious ascendancy of the minority.

Spain.—The situation in Spain still continues difficult though not alarmingly acute. The basic difficulty is undoubtedly economic. Spain's large export trade with Russia, Germany and Austria-Hungary has been ruined, while her commerce with the other countries at war has been greatly reduced. The Spanish people have made progress towards a partial solution of this problem and were it not for the food crisis would have met with a fair measure of success the test put upon them. As a result of the exportation to the Allies of raw material the cost of living has risen enormously, causing untold dissatisfaction. In Madrid, Barcelona, Bilbao, Seville and Valencia prices have risen 150 per cent. This rise has not been met by an increase in salaries; moreover some industries have limited their operations, thus making the difficulty worse. Herein is Spain's greatest difficulty. True, as in every other neutral country, there is division of opinion about the war, but this is a minor point, because of the fact that it has not set party against party or class against class. Thus the Duke of Alba, a Conservative, and many of his friends, are pro-Ally, while the Radical, Soriano, is pro-German. In other words, it cannot be said that any one party or class, as such, adheres to any particular side. The King still continues popular, not only with the masses but with the army, principally, it is said, because he admits the existence of grievances and has done his best to remedy them.

The Basic Difficulty

Aspects of the Mexican Propaganda

EBER COLE BYAM

THE Mexican Review is a monthly publication printed in Washington, under the powerful protection of Mr. Carranza's powerful friends, and supported by the bloodstained pesos wrung from peaceful Mexicans by Mr. Carranza's bandit hordes. The paper announces itself as "A Journal Devoted to the Enlightenment of the American People in Respect to the Hopes, Ambitions, Beneficent Intentions and Accomplishments of the Constitutionalist Government of the Republic of Mexico." How nearly it approaches that ideal is best determined by a careful perusal of its pages, which, to those who know Mexico, brings a conviction that the ink used in its printing has been expended in emulation of the cuttlefish, and is intended to befog rather than to enlighten readers.

If the names of the writers who contribute a few of the leading articles are not sufficient to warn people of the venomous nature of the publication, the articles themselves do not fail to disclose the socialistic virus with which the contributors reek. In addition to these articles each number contains several columns of short paragraphs intended to demonstrate the social, political and industrial progress effected by the Carranza administration. Then follows the consequent justification of the Villa-Carranza revolution. The people now ruling Mexico realize that the American people must be kept from knowing the truth about Mexico, at all costs. The facts once known to Americans, the rule of bandit governments in Mexico would come to an end.

Among the illuminating paragraphs published in a recent number of the Review appeared the following: "Because of the inauguration of direct steamer traffic between the ports of the State of Tabasco and various points in the United States, the cultivation of bananas in the State named is receiving a great stimulus."

Here is a positive statement permissible only when justified by exact information which, under the circumstances, should be easily obtainable. If then, the statement is at variance with the facts, the writer is guilty either of gross carelessness or of a deliberate untruth uttered with a deliberate intent to deceive. In either case the Mexican Review is placed in an unenviable position.

In order that a clear understanding may be had of the actual condition of affairs prevailing in the district mentioned in the paragraph we must go back a few years and briefly review the development of industry in Tabasco and northern Chiapas.

Previous to 1890 these districts were practically in the lethargic condition that had prevailed since the Conquest. They did not produce much beyond their immediate needs, which were extremely modest, being limited to little more than the bare necessities of food and clothing and shelter. These required hardly a month's labor, in the year, to provide. Those families whose culture demanded articles of foreign manufacture procured these luxuries by the exchange of a limited quantity of raw materials, such as hides, corn, cocoa and lard. The supply of labor was superabundant, though extremely intermittent because of the lack of a stimulus to steady toil. Farm laborers received four Mexican dollars a month, house and food and the privilege of cultivating as large a field as they desired. They were also permitted to keep all the domestic animals their rudimentary sense of thrift might suggest. As the great majority of the people were engaged in agriculture, foodstuffs were exceedingly cheap; as a consequence no great encouragement was given to that industry.

This region is sparsely settled and tropical. It possesses a soil unequaled in fertility and enjoys a climate and rainfall which make irrigation unnecessary and permit planting and harvesting every day in the year. Being tropical, it has no attractions for the Mexicans of the colder highlands, and the Mexican Government could induce none of its citizens to migrate thither. Hence, vast stretches of fertile plain and forest remain vacant for want of inhabitants.

During the 90's the attention of American and German investors was called to this fertile place and efforts were made to establish a number of plantations for the cultivation of coffee and rubber. The Germans began first by establishing coffee plantations on the mountain slopes of northern Chiapas. Several years later, attracted by the success of the Germans, Americans began planting rubber along the foot of the mountain slopes. During these years the usual difficulties confronting pioneers were met and vanquished, and the district was just on the verge of success when the revolution broke out and smothered prosperity.

Under American and German stimulus the demand for labor became so great that wages increased from four Mexican dollars a month to seventy-five cents and one dollar a day, and the value of foodstuffs increased in proportion, to the great pecuniary advantage of the natives. The whole life of the region was quickened by the injection into its commercial veins of several thousand dollars daily in cash.

These "pernicious speculators," when passing to and fro, had not failed to remark to the natives that they should plant bananas for the American market, assuring them that the rich soil of their farms, the proximity to water-transportation and the nearness to the American market would mean good prices for the fruit and constant and copious profits. The leaven at last began to work; some more "pernicious speculators" established a steamer line to carry the fruit, and then the money began to roll in. Shipments rapidly increased; other steamers were added, and, before long, a small district was receiving over 1,000,000 American gold dollars yearly for its bananas. The greater part of the production was in the hands of native planters with small fields. Most of these natives had never seen 100 Mexican dollars at one time in their lives. Imagine their emotions at receiving 200 or 300 American dollars a month for their fruit.

This district is a great delta and the river system gravitates to the port at the mouth of the Grijalva. As soon as the business gave promise of being serious, the Mexican Government made a contract with an American firm to cut a canal at the mouth of the river so that steamers of deep draft might enter the river and load, thus avoiding the necessity of loading the fruit at sea, a process both expensive and wasteful. This seemed to make the banana business entirely secure and the whole region looked forward to increased and constant prosperity.

With the triumph of the Villa-Carranza revolution, the dredging at the river mouth ceased; the I. W. W. agitators made it impossible to load any fruit, any way, and the banana ships sailed away and have never been back.

On June 1, this year, a small tramp steamer arrived off the port, loaded with a trifling 600 tons of freight that had accumulated over an extended period during which there had been no steamer at all for that port. She loaded a few bananas in the open sea, the first fruit to be shipped in over two years! And that was four months after the Mexican Review said that the "inauguration of direct steamer traffic" was giving the banana business a "great stimulus."

The entire contents of the Mexican Review might be analyzed to disclose like elements of crass neglect of facts, its paragraphs and numerous articles all carrying some seed of thought intended to bloom into an opinion favorable to the socialistic Mexican revolution. Numerous passages, masquerading under the guise of news items, recite incidents intended to illustrate that every man in authority is a brute, that every man possessing a dollar is a thief, and these illustrations are applied not to Mexico alone, but to the United States.

Through some friendly oversight in the Post Office Department, this publication, which can have few bona fide subscribers, finds its way unsolicited to the editorial desks of a large number of American publications.

Working in combination with this publication are other instruments of propaganda, and these, in combination with utterances from high official sources, have controlled, to an amazing degree, the news and editorial expressions on Mexico, and molded American opinion to the Villa-Carranza liking.

This vicious propaganda is sustained by the millions wrung by blackmail and murder from the unfortunate Mexicans, and, to a considerable extent, from American farmers, through the corrupt hemp monopoly. It can, therefore, afford to indulge in that ceaseless repetition which is essential to successful advertising; for the Mexican revolutionary propaganda is an advertising campaign from which its promoters have already reaped enormous financial benefits.

The American people are indirectly responsible for the frightful conditions prevailing in Mexico, conditions that make the wretched German occupation of Belgium appear trivial by comparison.

Did Americans know the truth and appreciate the sordid motives behind the Mexican revolution, and the lamentable results consequent upon it, they would rise in honest indignation and demand swift retribution.

Therefore, it is vitally necessary for the self-preservation of Carranza, Alvarado, and their ilk, to deceive the American people and to tell them, incidentally, how by the "inauguration of direct steamer traffic . . . the cultivation of bananas . . . is receiving great stimulus."

What Ireland Wants

RAPHAEL O'KELLY

AMID all the horror of the world there is perhaps but one nation that can look out upon the panorama of blood and fire with other feelings than simple dismay. That nation is America. To the American citizen, in addition to the sorrow and sympathy which he has so wholeheartedly shown since the outbreak of the European war, must be permitted two other emotions, hope and pride. The world is headed for democracy. The once iron-ruled Russia must give hope. This indorsement which in a time of heart-searching trial the universal conscience of the world is about to set upon the principles and ideals of the United States, must make Americans rejoice. To have formulated and set up the American Constitution for Americans alone would be matter sufficient to justify the pride of any nation, but to have formulated a theory of government, and with no other force but the cogency of example, to have caused the adoption of that theory across the world, is matter for every sane feeling of exultation.

It has taken some hundred and odd years for the ideas of the Declaration of Independence to germinate in foreign soil. They have at last blossomed and borne fruit as a republic in Russia at least. But even in those countries which are not republican, in Serbia, Rumania, Belgium, Italy and the rest, where the rallying cry of the people has been "the rights of small nationalities," we can see how far the American ideal "no government without the consent of the governed" has developed. And then there are rumors of change in Spain and even in Germany.

There is one European country, however, where the principles of the American revolution met with an immediate appreciation and acceptance: I mean Ireland. If they have not fructified there, it is through no fault of hers. In every generation, isolated and cut-off from the world, alone, she has offered up the lives of the best of her children in futile protest to vindicate her creed.

In the stress of the present great conflict this is a fact which, though never disputed, is often overlooked. We hear of the restoration of Belgium, Serbia and Rumania. The whole world feels, and rightly, that their integrity should be restored. But for one reason or another, Ireland the country that more, infinitely more, than all these countries put together, has contributed to the establishment and maintenance of American ideals and practices, is more or less forgotten. The explanation for this seems to be that removed, as we are, from the councils of the nations, living, as we do, under the shadow of gross calumny that misrepresents conditions for a sinister purpose, we are considered a wild, turbulent people, inhabiting a barren island. Few people seem completely convinced that Ireland could support herself. This impression is ludicrous. To demonstrate my contention I shall make use of this table:

Country	Area	Population
Rumania	50,717 sq. miles	5,957,000
Bulgaria	37,320 " "	4,329,000
Portugal	34,000 " "	5,016,000
Greece	24,973 " "	2,632,000
Serbia	18,000 " "	2,494,000
Switzerland	15,964 " "	3,737,000
Denmark	14,848 " "	2,757,000
Holland	12,562 " "	5,853,000
Belgium	11,369 " "	6,694,000
Ireland	32,352 " "	4,459,000

If we compare these countries we shall find that from the point of view of area Ireland is larger than most of them. Belgium, for instance, is just about as large as Munster, one of the four provinces of Ireland. In population Ireland is now fifth, having fallen from 9,000,000 in 1845 to 4,459,000 in 1917. In about fifty years Ireland's population has been cut in two, a perfectly unique phenomenon in the history of Europe.

If, then, Belgium has a right to freedom, why not Ireland? If Belgium, one-third the size of Ireland, can support a population one and a half as large as Ireland's, why cannot a richer and more fertile country like Ireland, support herself? I think these are reasonable questions which must appeal to any sane man. But, it may be asked, does Ireland want freedom? There are people who in all sincerity ask that question. I shall answer it with another query. Is there in the whole history of the world one single case, where a civilized, self-conscious racial unit, living within well-defined natural boundaries, desired anything but the freedom preordained for it by God, when He flung around it the barrier of His ocean or the rampart of His hills?

The parallel between Ireland and America is not fanciful. The two names were linked together commonly enough by Englishmen, during the American War of Independence. Of course since the days of Henry II Ireland has repeatedly reiterated her claim to freedom, basing it at first on the evident and natural ground that she is a distinct racial unit. But later on, to the original and fundamental claim, were added the claims of a persecuted, plundered and oppressed people. America, halting dead upon a matter of principle, broke into open revolution and proclaimed, and fortunately was able to maintain, her independence, before she was subjected to the fate with which she was menaced. But Ireland had for three centuries been subjected to that fate, when, just as America was on the verge of war, Mr. Rigby, once Secretary to the Duke of Bedford and then an English member of the House of Commons, exclaimed, during a debate on certain commercial reforms proposed for the Irish, that "the Parliament of England had a right to tax Ireland in all cases whatsoever, as well as America." It was a very happy expression indeed. It suggested identity of grievance and identity of resistance. In both cases there had been violent aggression, in both cases the right assumed to dictate legislation, in both cases there was taxation without representation, in both cases the people flew to arms—in the case of America the triumph was complete, but for Ireland the fruits of the long and hard-fought battle have yet to be won. It was America, however, that gave to Ireland's struggle for freedom a much more definite and tangible form. From that day on the Irish desired not only independence, but a republican constitution modeled on the American ideal. It was for this that Tone, Fitzgerald, Emmet and the Fenians of '68 laid down their lives, for this too that every succeeding generation of Irishmen has toiled and suffered.

Hence, in his fight for the restoration of Belgium, Serbia, and Rumania, the American should remember that before Rumania, Bulgaria, Portugal, Serbia, Switzerland, Denmark, Holland and Belgium were, Ireland was, and that Greece was restored to independence after 2,000 years. As the American rejoices in the complete emancipation of Russia, we ask him to remember not only the revolutions which have been successful, but also the revolutions which have failed. It was the ideals which are dearest to every American that led Pearse and Plunkett and Connolly and McDonagh and scores of others to their death. They died to vindicate the principles for which America stands. Will not America, who has the power to do so, vindicate their death, by demanding freedom for Ireland, a country that has done so much for these United States?

The American Indian and Catholicism

PHILIP GORDON

IN a conversation with a white man a Chippewa chief uttered these sentences as a lament and an indictment, "We used to live in the open air and were healthy. You told us to live in houses. We became sick. Now you tell us to live again in the open air. The white man has many minds."

His words are true. The Indian is in a transition period due to external influences; no longer the red man of old, he is not yet the white man of today. Overwhelmed by a relentless civilization, his war-bonnet has disappeared, his tomahawk lies buried in the earth now trembling with the tramping feet of the nation's army; his war-whoop has been succeeded by the mighty roar of artillery; buckskin coats, moccasins, leggings and embroidered belts, all are but relics of the irrevocable past. Scarcely ten per cent of our entire 300,000 or more enrolled Indians are Indian in the popular meaning of the term.

That sturdy aboriginal race proverbial for physical endowments and stolid endurance of privation and suffering has passed from our midst; the child of nature, keen of eye, enduring, strong and brave is no more; the "most formidable savage ever encountered by colonists of European stock" is gone. No longer, as Columbus described them, "very gentle, ignorant of evil, not given to murder or theft" are the present-day remnants of the vanished race. The process of civilization has been at work, four centuries of contact with the white man have left their mark. A celebrated theologian once characterized Protestantism as the "heteroclite amalgam of omnigeneous philosophical elements." The same description might well be applied to the descendants of the old Indians, for not only have those peculiar traits that once stamped them as strong men been eliminated from their character, but other qualities, colorless, without distinction, and for the most part signs of deterioration and weakness have been evolved.

It is a truism that Catholicism above all other religions fits in best with the nature of the original and uncontaminated Indian, for in the true Church he can satisfy his inherent longing for communion with the "Great Spirit," communion that blossoms forth in sensible consolation and peace of heart. The Church's Sacramental system, at once an instrument of grace and a wondrous symbolism of a healthy intercommunication between earth and heaven, strikes the reverent Indian immediately as true.

His mental attitude already disposes him strongly to embrace Catholicism. There is no rude uprooting of primitive beliefs, no radical upheaval of inmost attachments, but a simple purification and easy transference of his spiritual loves, howsoever crude and ungainly, to a new type of godly Presence. From the worship of Manito hidden in the towering mountains or lurking in the dark, primeval forests the Indian mind passed with ease to the latria of Christ in the consecrated Host. Propitiation of the outraged Deity, studied reverence for the dead, an intense feeling of personal responsibility and direct obligation to a multitude of overseeing spirits, pave the way and fit his intellect for assent to the doctrine of the Atonement, the veneration of Saints, and the Saviour's provision for regenerating sinful man, prayer and the Sacraments. The practice of Confession is for him, one of the least difficult of all the Church's institutions.

The strong inclination which impels the normal Indian to bring his religion into every action and to make his daily occupations of Divine purpose, has only to be diverted to the service of truth, and the Indian becomes as good a Catholic, at least in intention and in effort, as he had been faithful to the demands of untutored savagery. The wholesale conversion of the Indians in Mexico and South America and in portions of our own country and the persistence of Poor Lo in the Faith are matters of history. Where the missionaries failed or succeeded poorly, other reasons than hostility to the Faith must be sought. Generally in such cases, priests arrived after the Indians had been debauched by traders and adventurers. In some instances, too, the sufferings and failure of the priests were due to political circumstances and civic mismanagement of Indian affairs. The truth is that the conversion of Ireland without martyrdom is no longer unique. It has been matched by the bloodless and complete conversion of more than one entire Indian tribe.

With the recent transformation of the Indians, dating from 1875, into poor imitators of white men, for the most part of the lower and coarser type, the Catholic Church has had to face a new problem. In the modern Indian, who has retained little of the primitive and unsophisticated character of his ancestors and has developed many of the undesirable traits of the white man, the Catholic missionary has to do with a difficult subject. Add to this the mental obfuscation superinduced by the flood of rival Protestant missionaries, preaching mutually contradictory doctrines, and united only in opposition to the Church of the Ages, and one may well imagine that the present-day Catholic mission is beset with anxiety and hardship. So suddenly has the Indian of old and simple type disappeared and so quickly has he been succeeded by the new and almost impossible generation that in certain portions of the mission field, notably in Oklahoma, which has over 100,000 Indians of whom less than one-half of one per cent are Catholic, the Church's apparent failure must be attributed in all likelihood to the very abruptness of the transformation.

Adjustment in methods of evangelization to new attitudes of thought requires both time and patience. Today the Church deals with an Indian largely degenerate, physically weak, mentally bewildered, broken in spirit and without hope or trust in the pale-face. To susceptibility to tuberculosis in various forms, an unnatural appetite for strong drink, and an increasing habit of petty deceit; to scant appreciation of the obligation of fulfilling promises, and a peculiar, fretful jealousy, which readily gives rise to serious dissensions and at times to extreme bitterness, he unites an overwhelming confidence in the blackrobe, a childlike confidence in his every statement, heroic constancy in the Faith—and this at times in the midst of extreme and long continued sinfulness—and a deliberateness and slowness in affairs of the soul that make religion seemingly unimportant and mechanical. Saturated with an ancestral reverence for nature but imbued with an acquired American sense of business minus the pell-mell features, the Indian today is a weird mixture most difficult to handle and very hard to understand.

The modern Indian is poor in the things sternly required for American life. He lacks ambition. He has no physical stamina worthy the name. He never lives for the morrow. Money to him has little value except for the satisfaction of passing whims and fancies. He rarely supports his missionaries and never worries if his church burns down. The new church edifice will surely be better than the old. Most sad to relate, the modern Indian has little appreciation, or perhaps he merely hides it, for his greatest benefactors. Witness the Choctaws, to take one of many examples. Although the number of Choctaw Catholics is barely three hundred, thousands of dollars are spent in Choctawland annually, but they are cold, apathetic, indifferent, dull-eyed, apparently utterly ungrateful.

The Catholic Church might well be congratulated on the fact that the transition of the Indian from the tribal estate to the body politic has not been marked by a serious defection from the Fold. The present-day red man is one who could easily fall away were it not for a stubbornness which he exhibits in all things that pertain to the old Faith. An apparently unnamed sense of fidelity to eternal truth guides the groping Indian-white man, and is the hope of the priests who are conducting a difficult work under new conditions.

Zionism and the Future of Palestine

A. Hilliard Atteridge

A BRITISH ARMY has gradually made its way along the old coast route from Egypt to Syria, laying a desert railway behind it as it advanced. Without the railway, only a small force could have marched by this old-world track between the waterless desert and the salt-sea margin. When Napoleon, then General Bonaparte, made his march into Syria from Egypt, he was able to take only 13,000 men with him. The railway has enabled a considerable force to be concentrated and supplied upon the frontier of the Holy Land, and as I write, it is intrenched along the Wadi Ghuzzeh, facing the Turkish army which is defending Gaza. Naturally, this British march into the borders of the Promised Land has given rise to many speculations as to the future of the country, speculations all based upon the assumption that, after the war, Palestine will no longer be under Turkish rule.

The question of the future of Palestine is a very complex one. Jerusalem is a Holy City, not only for all Christendom, but also for the Jews and for the Mohammedan world. Indeed, its ordinary Arab name is "El Kuds," the Holy Place. Since the days of the Crusades, the Arab and the Turk have held the city, but on the whole, they have faithfully observed the conditions agreed upon, when the last of the Crusaders handed it over to the great soldier, Sultan Saladin, who allowed free access to the holy places, to the pilgrims of western Christendom. In the Russian Church, the pilgrimage to Jerusalem has within the last hundred years become almost as important as the Mecca pilgrimage is to the Mohammedan. There was an organization by which every year thousands of Russian peasants were able to make the pilgrimage, and at Jerusalem there were huge monastic establishments which served as hostels for the pilgrims.

The nineteenth century also saw the beginning of an organized movement of the Jews towards Jerusalem and the Holy Land. Before this, the Jewish population of the country had been steadily declining. The Jews had been, on the whole, well treated by the Mohammedan rulers of Palestine, but there was a steady drift of the population towards the busy commercial cities of the Mediterranean, and later towards western Europe. In Palestine, there was not much opening for business and the modern Jew is a good business man rather than a small farmer content to draw a mere living from a patch of land in his native country. But there were always, among the Jews, a group of idealists, whose ambition was the repeopling of the Promised Land by men of the Jewish race and religion. Some seventy years ago, a movement began in Russia for the emigration of Russian Jews to Palestine. At that time, and for long after, the condition of the Jewish race in Russia was anything but a happy one. The Russian rabbis who organized the movement, proposed to settle peasant Jews from Russia and Rumania on land which could be bought at a very moderate price in Palestine. The movement led to no great results. But in 1870, a Jewish association, with its center in France, the Alliance Israelite Universelle, with a view to improving the condition of the Jewish colonies, decided on the establishment of an agricultural school near Jaffa. The farm colony was actually founded there in 1878, and it is interesting to note that the well-known British philanthropist, Lord Shaftesbury, cooperated in the movement, his help, and that of other Englishmen, being given on account of the sympathy they felt for the persecuted Jews of Russia.

A few years later, the Russian persecutions of the Jews became suddenly acute, and in many of the cities there were organized outbreaks of massacre and plunder against the unfortunate people. It was at this time that Cardinal Manning took a leading part in the movement in London to assist the Jewish refugees from Russia, and received a vote of thanks from the leaders of the Jewish people in England and France. Large numbers of the refugees emigrated to Palestine, and within ten years more than thirty farm colonies were founded in various parts of the country. These colonies were much more successful than might have been expected, for large numbers of the refugees were townsmen, unused to field work, and though the Jewish race is proverbially wealthy the available capital for equipping the colonies was never large. There was a drift from the colonies to the towns, especially to Jerusalem. In 1914, on the eve of this great war, it was estimated that there were about 100,000 Jews in Palestine, but of these only 11,000 were on the land. They formed about one-seventh of the whole population of the country, and large numbers were to be found among the 85,000 inhabitants of Jerusalem and the immediate neighborhood.

A remarkable feature of the movement was the revival of Hebrew, as a spoken and written language. It was taught in the local schools, and used in the books and papers circulated among the Jews of Palestine. The movement, in fact, had developed from a mere philanthropic effort to find a refuge for the Jewish refugees amid congenial surroundings, into something of much larger scope. In the latter part of the nineteenth century, the Zionist movement had begun among the Jews, first attracting the support chiefly of a number of literary men. Its object was the restoration of Zion in the form of a self-governing Jewish colony, preferably in the Promised Land, but if that proved impossible, in some other country. At one time, the hopes of the Zionists seemed to center largely on the establishment of such a colony in the highlands of British East Africa. But such a scheme could not possess the attraction of a settlement in Palestine itself. At the annual Zionist congresses, held now in one country, now in another, projects for the resettlement of Palestine were discussed. It was only the wildest dreamers who ever spoke of a general return of the Jewish people to their own country. To any such Utopian dreams there were the obvious objections that the immense numbers of them were doing far too well in other countries ever to wish to settle down in a village or town between the Jordan and Mediterranean. And as one critic of such schemes remarked, if the whole Jewish race were settled in Palestine tomorrow, a considerable emigration would begin the day after. What more practical men proposed was a steady increase of the Jewish settlements, with the hope that, at some future time, they would become so important as to warrant some kind of local self-government being given to them, under an international guarantee.

But now, with an invasion of the Holy Land in progress, and politicians and journalists busy with conjectures as to what the future of the country is to be, the Zionists are urging that the time is coming for the reestablishment of a Jewish State in the Holy Land, with, of course, guarantees for Christian access to the Holy Places. The proposal has, however, revealed a wide difference of opinion amongst men who have the right to speak, as leaders of the Jewish people. Many of these have openly protested against the Zionist proposals.

The line they take is this. They argue that at the present moment, Jews are given the full rights of citizenship all over Europe and in America, because it is recognized that their race and religion does not prevent them from completely identifying themselves with the people among whom they live. And they suggest that, if there were anything like an organized Jewish State, either in Palestine or elsewhere, but especially in Palestine, the mother-country of the race, they would no longer be regarded as Englishmen, Frenchmen or Americans, but as foreigners. Men belonging to this Jewish State, but living beyond its boundaries, would be open to the suspicion of regarding the Jewish State as having the first claim on their allegiance. The conjecture may be hazarded that this view will prevail. The creation of a Jewish State in Palestine would raise too many difficult questions for the undertaking to commend itself to practical politicians. As for the Jewish point of view, it is puzzling to know how the link with the past would ever be taken up. Only a poetic dreamer would suggest a revival of Jewish kingship, and it is equally difficult to imagine a republic, with rabbis and politicians playing the part of the priests and the judges of the days before the kingdom. Whatever form a Zionist State might assume, it would be like the putting of new wine into old bottles, against which Jewish proverbial lore gives the same warning as the well-known words in the Gospel.

Whatever the result of the movement may be, all well-wishers of the Jewish race will doubtless rejoice, if the spread of Zionism helps to make the scattered remnants of Israel more religious. As there seems to be little hope of their conversion to Catholicism in our day, the stricter observance of the ancient law God gave the Jews would be highly desirable. It is those children of Israel who have become agnostics and unbelievers that are a menace to our Christian civilization.

Practical Suggestions on Church Music

HAROLD BECKET GIBBS, MUS.DOC.

IT is not intended in these two articles to bring forward any old or new arguments for or against the famous Motu Proprio of Pope Pius X on church music. This was given to the Catholic world as long ago as 1903 and some of us, perhaps, remember that its "most scrupulous observance" was enjoined on all. The present Sovereign Pontiff has naturally endorsed the commands of his saintly predecessor, but the Catholic musical world, as a whole, is apparently waiting for further orders from the "powers that be" ere the general restoration of the best traditions of church music is everywhere effected. In the meantime, however, there are gratifying reports of many isolated instances where a serious application of those commands has produced good results, and it is here proposed to offer some practical suggestions to those who feel in duty bound to observe this "Judicial Code of Sacred Music." To those who still maintain that the thing is impracticable one would venture to quote Cardinal Manning, who, in a letter to one of his clergy in 1868 on a similar topic, said: "It would be enough to say that what the Church everywhere does cannot be impracticable." And conditions are much more satisfactory now than during his reign at Westminster.

No pastor or choirmaster can possibly set about this task unless he has taken the trouble to "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest," the contents of this Encyclical. Is it necessary to add that this should be done in the light of Catholic tradition? Why should it be so difficult to obtain copies of this legislation? It surely ought to be in the hands of all. It is interesting to note that, at the Papal College of Church Music in Rome there is a special and prolonged course of study dealing exclusively with the legal and artistic aspects of this document.

Those who read it once find it entertaining, those who read it a dozen times understand it, whilst those who read it a score of times appreciate it and frankly admit it to be indisputable, unassailable and practical to a degree. It is difficult, therefore, to believe that there exists a parish where it cannot be carried out in all essential details.

The first and foremost demand is the "re-establishment," not introduction, mark you, of the Gregorian Chant and congregational singing. This has been clearly proved to be everywhere possible; and the best unisonous music in the world—all will surely admit that if congregations sing at all they must sing in unison—is the Chant. History proves its immortality. That music which we inherited from the Temple, which survived the persecutions of the first three hundred years of Christianity, which developed into the Chant, as we now have it, and which provided the musical subjects for the display of the colossal genius of Palestrina is now proclaimed "the highest model of all sacred music."

One of many interesting letters received tells of a country congregation that always sings the "Proper" as well as the "Ordinary" of the Mass. In going into detail it is recorded: "We always sing the Gregorian 'Alleluias' and the children love them." This refers to the gorgeous melodies of the Alleluias contained in the Gradual, which are very quickly learned. Another report reads: "The Gregorian Mass taught to my congregation in 1895 is still a great favorite." And this in a parish of seventy souls, all told. In such parishes there is no official choir. The people do it all for themselves and when present at low Mass make all the responses, etc., together. The late Welby Pugin, as long ago as 1850, wrote, "At Minden the 'Habemus ad Dominum' rose from more than 2,000 voices of faithful worshipers." Nor is this peculiar to Germany alone, although one must admit an unusual willingness of this people to "take a more active part in the ecclesiastical offices, following the ancient custom."

The first step to be taken, in order to produce similar results is to provoke the enthusiasm of the people. This can well be done by the clergy who have done far greater things in their parishes than the mere "restoration" of that form of public worship which prevailed for so many centuries throughout the Catholic world.

The difficulty as to books can easily be overcome. The "Kyriale" can be had for twenty-five cents in either Gregorian or modern notation and this contains 30 melodies to the "Kyrie," 18 to the "Gloria," 4 to the "Credo," 21 to the "Sanctus," and 20 to the "Agnus Dei," exclusive of the "Mass for the Dead." This book will gladly be purchased by the individual, and it makes not the slightest difference if half the congregation use the Gregorian, and the other half the modern notation, as the practical results are identical. This is getting close to the dearest wish of Pope Pius X, who is reported to have expressed a desire that more Missals might be seen in the hands of the people. As the movement takes root and congregational singing becomes the rule, it has been noted that many of the congregation prefer to purchase their complete Gradual outright, and this contains all that is to be sung at Mass on every day in the year.

Regular practices are absolutely necessary, as it would be most unreasonable to ask the people to join in the singing when it takes a choir several weeks of careful practice to learn the self-same music. Practice and Benediction one evening a week would accomplish wonders.

One does not forget that the usual outcry is that there are no teachers to be had. If the organist knows the rudiments of modern music it will not take him long to discover those of this ancient music. Just as poetry and prose can be reduced to single syllables, from which both spring, so modern music and Gregorian Chant can be likewise reduced to the rhythmic unit, which is either strong or weak, not long or short. Free rhythm does not imply free from rhythm, as some would have us believe, but merely consists of groups of two or three pulses occurring at irregular intervals. A metronome works as truly for Gregorian music as for modern music, but there is this difference: in modern music a pulse can be divided into two or more fractions, but in the Chant this can never be. Each note must have its pulse to itself, whether it be attached to a strong or weak syllable, and at the discretion of the choirmaster there may be a contraction or relaxation of the time whilst the pauses, especially at the full bars, may be most effective. Ruskin says: "There's no music that I know of in a rest, but there's the making of music in it." This equality of note and consequent equality of syllable makes the work of the choirmaster easy, and good results are soon apparent. But, when you begin to tell a body of singers that such a note or syllable is long and give no specific time-value for their guidance, chaos must inevitably result. As prose is to poetry so is Gregorian to modern music. The rhythm of both is the same, but the grouping of rhythms is different, and then only in two forms, viz., binary and ternary.

As to the pronunciation of the Latin, the Roman is urged as being the most musical and it is the official pronunciation of the Church. The retention of the various Protestant pronunciations—the Elizabethan being formally abandoned at Oxford in 1904—seems undesirable, and not one of them can be termed euphonious. Whilst some may think this a matter of small importance, it is more than significant that Cardinal Wiseman considered it of the greatest importance, and took the trouble to issue a lengthy letter on the subject, giving the most minute directions as to every vowel and consonant after the Roman manner, claiming that this was the pre-Reformation and Catholic pronunciation of the Church's language. The choirmaster especially would doubtless value such uniformity, whilst the singers would find their task greatly facilitated. The purer the vowel the purer the tone. Take care of the vowel and the tone will take care of itself. The length and consequent purity of the Roman vowels is freely acknowledged by all.

To return to the subject of public practices, it is suggested that the Responses be first taken "which must always be in the one Gregorian plainsong without any organ accompaniment"; then to the "Credo," which need never change, as we remember that the original melody (Nos. 1 or 2) did duty for upwards of 1,000 years, and was the delight of the people; then the "Kyrie" and "Gloria," and "Sanctus" and "Agnus Dei." After the Elevation, a Latin hymn or prose in honor of the Blessed Sacrament may be sung, as the divorce of the "Sanctus" and "Benedictus" refers only to figured music, and not to the Chant, as is evidenced by the single bar occurring in the official edition of the chant. The Gradual is as much an official book as the Missal and cannot be altered. In short, success is assured if there be an evident willingness on the part of all concerned, from the pastor to the humblest parishioner. Let us always remember that chant was originally intended to be sung, and not to be listened to, and its utilitarianism cannot be denied. All art is primarily utilitarian.

A most important point to be remembered is that the people should be urged to sing quietly, with restraint, smoothly and, as it were, with the cream of their voices so that the effect produced be that of perfect unity, and "one voice glorifying God." Let them make as much music as possible with as little noise as possible. As to expression, time and tune are the basis of all true musical expression and when these are allied to a musical pronunciation there results the highest form of expression most appropriate to the worship of the Most High.

In churches where there is an official choir its presence at all these practices would greatly assist matters. In such churches it might be well for the choir to sing the Gregorian music exclusively for six months before the congregation enters upon its duties. During this time the public practices would be continued, and at the end of this period of preparation the two bodies might combine forces in the Responses and in the Ordinary of the Mass, whilst the choir alone would sing the Proper to the authentic melodies. The various speeds at which the different parts of the Mass should be taken must depend largely upon the acoustic properties of the building. Nor must contrast be forgotten, whilst it must always be borne in mind that the Offertory is the "slow movement" of the Mass and accompanies the deliberate preparation and offering of the "Oblation of Bread and Wine."

It should be the first thought of the choirmaster to do all that is ordered before any outside matter is introduced. He should take care to provide each man and boy with a Gradual, not one for every two, and it is astonishing to discover how quickly they learn to find their way about this official text-book. This would be the only requirement, as to the Mass, during the first year.

It is pleasant to read that "an ecclesiastical function loses nothing of its solemnity, when it is accompanied by no other music than the Gregorian plainsong." It has been observed that the choir soon learns to love and revel in the melodic delights of the Propers, especially the Graduals and "Alleluias," the boys singing the former and the men (and boys, as to the jubilations) the latter. The repetition of the Gradual is necessary in order to complete this, the oldest form of "Aria da Capo," in spite of the claims made for Alexander Scarlatti.

Now that the instruction of the parochial schools in the arts of singing and of Gregorian music has become more general, and happily compulsory in some dioceses, we may confidently anticipate an ever-flowing stream of practical enthusiasm in the direction here outlined. A list of those churches where the school children sing all the week-day Masses is being compiled and already includes nearly 500.

In conclusion, I have happened upon the following, which more than suggests our attitude towards the Chant: "We may remark that this conservatism, if we may so call it, of the Church is not confined to Plain Chant. The same may be said of the language, the style of her offices, the dresses of her clergy and religious orders, and many of her rites, ceremonies and customs. The Chant is therefore no stranger than any other part of the Church system; and that system being what it is, the antique character of the music seems in every way suited."

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

M. E.'s letter on the social aspect of the life of students in Catholic colleges is capital, because it betrays the weakness of his position. His chief argument comes to this: Protect vocations to the priesthood by isolating college boys as much as possible. In answer I retort that vocations which need such nurture are not worth a candle. Then, too, are Catholic colleges built and sustained for candidates to the priesthood only? If so, they are sad failures. If not, why should boys who have no intention of taking Holy Orders be dragooned into preliminary discipline for that Sacrament? M. E. lisps sweetly about mother's sons and the Divine voice. But alas, for speculation! Many mothers would leap with joy over a priestly son, but nowadays our sons do not reciprocate. What then shall we do? Send them to colleges where skirts are anathema, and later witness their marriages to stout Protestants who carry a club in each sleeve? Not much. M. E. had better cease thinking the ideas of a Trappist.

Baltimore. S. E.

The Poor in Ancient Greece

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We often hear it stated, in more or less definite terms, that the virtue of charity, and particularly civic or social charity, was either unknown or at best very little cultivated in pagan days. Such statements would have to be supported before we could accept such an indictment of paganism, but the following verses throw light on an important period in ancient Greece. They are taken from the Iliad (XXII, 490 sq.), and describe an incident belonging to a period, roughly speaking, 1,000 years before our Christian era; yet it was an age of developed pagan civilization. Andromache, Hector's widow, is lamenting the lot of her son, Astyanax:

> . . . Orphanhood cuts off
> The child from every comrade of his youth,
> Hangs down his head, and bathes his cheek in tears.
> Sore with need he accosts his father's friends,
> Plucks this one by the sleeve, this other's hem,
> Till one in pity hold out a tiny cup
> To moist his lips, yet stints the thirsty mouth;
> The wealthy drive him from their laden board
> With savage blows and words yet more unkind:
> "Off, no sire of yours is in our company."
> The timid child is fain to hide his tears
> Upon a widowed mother's lap. . . .

These words, it is true, are put by Homer on an anxious mother's lips, but they seem to represent the poet's calm and reasoned description of an actual state, for so vivid and graphic a vision could not leap so naturally, so spontaneously, into even an anxious mother's mind unless it were grounded very largely on experience of actual facts. If such things could be true of the green wood, of great Hector's son, what must have been done in the dry? Historical evidence of a far later date seems to show that not even then had concern for the poor and defenseless become a pagan trait.

So, while we are prepared to admit that there is no true educational culture worth the name without the literature, laws and art of Greece and Rome, we thank God for the Christian concept of charity that has given life its crowning glory by making it man's noblest and most pleasurable employment to minister to Christ in the persons of the orphan, the widow, and the helpless.

St. Louis. C. B.

Jefferson's Geometric Tax

To the Editor of AMERICA:

For the next decade at least, we must expect that our great discussions between members of Congress, politicians, and the people generally will be on the question of taxation, and what classes are to pay it. The cry that the profit-makers must pay it will not down, and the ultimate result will be that some form of taxation must be laid so that these taxes upon profits shall remain where they are put. To satisfy this demand, I beg to offer the principle of the geometric tax, first advocated by Thomas Jefferson in 1785, by myself since 1892, and by Bishop Vaughan of London in 1911, in his book "Faith and Folly."

In Washington's administration, Hamilton defeated, with the help of President Washington, the plans for national taxation supported by Jefferson, and instead of laws made to decentralize concentration, the people, as consumers since 1791, have been compelled to bear the burden of paying the taxes to support the Federal Government. These taxes have principally come, during the last 126 years, from the tariff, and the taxes laid upon alcohol and tobacco. These taxes in future will give us no more than twenty-five per cent of the amount now annually needed; and the great question is, what sort of taxation shall we determine upon to fill the gap? The geometric tax upon profits, the tax of Jefferson, is bound to be considered and its theories investigated, because it will not only provide the Government with an income of from $600,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, but will also be the means of preserving to all Americans that true form of an equal opportunity which the Constitution guarantees. This great sum of money, taken wholly from the profit-makers, with no power given to shift it upon the backs of the poor and middle-classes of our people, represents no form of confiscation of wealth now accumulated. In fact, it preserves all such wealth to its owner, but forbids untrue and dishonest wealth to lay tribute upon the toiling masses, by constantly raising the cost of living above and beyond wages and salaries.

What seems to be needed most is that distribution may take place before concentration begins. We must now reconstruct the economics of the American nation. Private rights must be respected, but corporate earnings must be so distributed that capital may receive its share, labor may receive all it earns, when exerting earning power, and that the consumers pay no more than is just, to the other two of the tripartite productive and consumptive power in industrialism.

We have lived a full century under the Hamiltonian thought of centralization. It has brought to us a concentration of injustice; and I greatly fear, if continued, will bring discontent, despair, anarchy, civil war and ruin. The time is opportune to develop the Jeffersonian theory of distribution and I believe the American people are now ready to discuss it.

New York. JOHN W. BATDORF.

Missionary Needs in Mindanao

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you be so good as to thank the many patrons who have come to my assistance through your appeal in my behalf? No sooner had the notice of my needs appeared in AMERICA than letters and papers and magazines began to pour into Cateel from many quarters of the United States. I am very grateful, and I beg you to assure the good people who have sent me Catholic literature that I shall always be very thankful. Surely American charity is very Christlike. The money subscriptions have not been so generous, amounting in all to thirty dollars; but I have not lost hope that in good time more will be forthcoming.

It would help the good Lord's work if some of your subscribers would assist me to buy, or would send me, a motor-boat or a detachable motor for a boat or canoe. The difficulties of travel by land, owing to the state of the roads and the necessity of crossing rivers in flood, are so great that it was almost impossible for me to get to confession from December to April. I usually walk nine hours to confession. This year I walked for twelve hours. On my last trip to Bagagna I was swept away by the current when trying to ford a river, and besides losing my watch and the food I was carrying, I lost my pack and umbrella, and had to make such efforts to save my life that when I at last reached safety I found the blood coming from my mouth. Another of my mishaps was to get caught in the mud, from which I was extricated only by the assistance of two boys. A horse has almost as much trouble as a man. I mention these things merely to show how hard it is to travel by land. For myself I do not care, but I am greatly hampered in my work and find it impossible to visit the various parts of my mission, in which I have to care for 5,000 Christians and innumerable heathens, with that frequency which is not merely advisable but imperative if I am to keep alive the spark of faith. A motor-boat would enable me to travel by water and greatly facilitate my missionary labors. Another hindrance is the fact that I am obliged to teach school. For fifteen dollars a month I could get a good teacher to take my place. This would leave me free to do other work.

Then, too, I should build a college in which to secure a Catholic education for the girls. I propose to engage Filipino Sisters, who are doing a world of good throughout the islands, to take charge of it. A conservative estimate for the number of pupils who would enter the college is 250. I have already bought a plot of ground for the Sisters out of my miserable income, and a gentleman has donated a piece of property for the college; but I have absolutely no funds with which to erect it. The sum of $2,500 would make a splendid beginning.

My church also has to be rebuilt. I can still live in my convento, but the church is impossible. I am ashamed that our Saviour has a worse house even than myself. The Catholic Church Extension Society of America has sent me $500 for the purpose, and at the suggestion of Rev. James Mellyn, S.J., the St. Catherine Guild of Teachers in Boston has written to ask me if I would accept $500 under conditions. Of course I would do so only too gladly. I am informed that these good people have already collected $100 for me.

The church and the college are necessary, if I am to make headway in my efforts to preserve and spread the Faith. After a period of persecution, Catholics are now securing justice under the administration of Mr. Carpenter, the Governor of Mindanao, who is favorable to religion and wishes to secure peace and concord. The officials he appoints are fair, and the chief men of the municipality have lost their animosity against Catholicism. Our parochial schools are again frequented, and men are again seen at religious services. But the evils of the régime which began in 1904, when Americans unworthy of the name ruled as despots over this simple people, preached complete emancipation from everything that was old, assisted heretical churches, maligned the old Spanish missioners, and in many ways hampered the work of the present missionaries, have left their mark. The public school was the occasion for many a difficulty, and civil marriages spread rapidly. At present, although conditions have improved, there is much ignorance, many irregular unions exist, bad and unchristian customs prevail, superstition is rife, paganism is rampant, and organized opposition to the Church is carried on by Protestants. American Catholics, I hope, will help me. I am off now to gather grass and twigs to repair the roof of my house before the rainy season sets in.

Cateel, Davao, P. I. JOSÉ GRIMAL, S.J.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JULY 14, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.
Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.
Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions to the Mission Literature Fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

A Warning in the Name of Patriotism

THE United States of America has taken a truly momentous and awful step, and every man, woman and child whom this country claims as her own have of necessity taken the step with her. It is a step which calls for high sacrifice. We are asked to pour out the blood of our youth; far less than this but still worthy of count we are requested to render up with two-handed generosity the blessings of peace, to part with hard-won savings, to retrench honest luxuries, to face frugal living or even the pinch of want. All this out of a trustful devotion to what is summed up and symbolized in the flag that is now flying everywhere. It is less than half correct to invoke as the sole motives for this sacrifice the wrongs which we have set out to right or the saving principles that we would propagate. These things would lie within the duty or the capacity of few, if any, mere individuals to address themselves to. But the complete and final motive for which we are asked to sacrifice, to suffer and even to die is loyalty to our Government.

If this is so true is it not equally true that the Government should be deeply conscious now of its sacred trust and duty? Do not the State's duties to the individual grow more hallowed when the individual is asked to part with so much that the State may live and triumph? When the citizen freely yields up a goodly measure of his liberty to sinew the nation's armies and a goodly measure of his possessions that the war-chest may be filled, should not the meager half that is justly left him be secured by the State's redoubled watchfulness and more rigid law?

When there are found at a critical time like this men or combinations of men vile enough to segregate for their own gain huge quantities of the staples of life, coining dollars out of the famine of the masses, to deal with such treachery should be the State's prompt and instant concern. It should lie nearer the State's heart than any battle triumph on land or sea, any elimination of the submarine or crumpling of the Hindenburg line. To say that slackness or long delay or half-measures in this matter would breed such dreadful consequences as a popular madness which writes its sentiments in ruined cities and uprooted laws: this is not to say the worst. For there would develop on our nation's banner a stain so disfiguring that it would be hard to recognize that banner, harder still to salute it, and hard beyond endurance to suffer and die for it.

Are We Civilized?

BEFORE war came, we were wont to preen ourselves upon our civilization. We had a high opinion of our culture, our financial ability, and of our general excellence. Nor did we harbor any doubt as to the power that had made us a paragon among nations. It was education. War has made us humble, which is only another way of saying that war has shown us the necessity of looking at things as they really are. We have begun to question how much of our civilization is real, and how much is veneer. Point is given this research by the riots that have recently disgraced East St. Louis.

There is some consolation, but not much, in the reflection that this reversal to barbarism was occasioned by a difficult labor problem, rather than by race-hatred. In all probability, the same bloody scenes would have been enacted, had the imported workingmen been native white Americans instead of southern negroes. The outstanding and depressing feature of the whole affair is, that a typical American city has witnessed exhibitions of hatred and revenge to which only the raids of an African tribe on an unprotected village can furnish an adequate parallel.

Clearly, if we have based our civilization on education, we have built upon a quicksand. No other country in the world spends so much upon its schools and colleges, and no other country in the world is the stage of an equal amount of strife and savagery. Education alone is an insufficient barrier against passion, and the education upon which we have poured out millions is essentially false. "For nearly ten decades," writes a Protestant professor, Dr. Carl Holliday, in the current School and Society, "the new education has toiled with unsparing pains and with colossal confidence, and has produced—a cultured pagan!" Dr. Holliday is overly optimistic. The pagan is only too obvious, but the culture is not in evidence. Trained intellects and weak wills make for violence, crime and disorder, leaving small place for even the lesser natural graces. The plain moral is, that the community which closes the door of the school against Almighty God has only itself to thank, if clever rascals instead of sober citizens are its heritage to posterity.

Mohammedan New York

ONCE again the history of a sordid New York crime has been written in the blood of a young girl, and the consequent commotion is "according to the card."

There are interviews and counter-interviews, charges and counter-charges, and politicians are wielding their clubs with the usual vigor and effect. In the resultant confusion citizens are apt to overlook the fact that the revolting murder is but a symptom of the Mohammedan exploitation of women, introduced into Gotham by aliens who have made the name of the city a byword, even in the suburbs of Constantinople. It is obvious that if women are more or less scandalously exploited in theaters and dance halls for the amusement or lust of those who can buy pleasure or sin at twenty dollars a sitting, they will also be exploited in lowly places by men to whom an extra crime is as an oath to an ancient mariner. The atmosphere of the costly pleasure house finds ready lodgment in inferior places, and the decadent "high-brow" becomes a norm of conduct for wights whose lack of money is compensated for by keen wits or physical strength. The women of New York will never be safe so long as the metropolis tolerates disgraceful scenes in which city officers, semi-nude girls, popping corks and jazz bands are features. Such incidents constitute a degradation of womanhood itself, and the moral support given them by men who should set good example to the chaste and unchaste alike, is a disgusting and disheartening scandal, offensive to the nostrils of all to whom a woman is something better than an object of passion. If women are exploited on the stage, they will be exploited off the stage. Men's practical attitude towards them is determined by a viewpoint, and in these days of naturalism the viewpoint is fixed in great measure by the example of prominent folk, especially by the conduct of those who are supposed to be typical citizens. It is a sorry event therefore to learn from the cleanest and most conservative of our papers of the presence of public officials at a Bacchanalian orgy in which a "host of stage beauties are deprived of almost all their clothes" and a sorrier event to read that one such man was "one of the 150 who were there at 2 o'clock" in the morning. This is a real social sore, one of the sources of the prevalent corruption which every now and then exhibits itself in a shocking crime.

What will be done about it? Men will continue to talk under cover, but some day perhaps women will take the matter into their own hands.

Catholics in War-Prison Barracks

ONE of the things that has helped to bring home the reality of the part the United States is to take in the war is the fact that the Government is already making preparations for the internment of prisoners. The Government declares that "its business is to be ready ahead of time." A detail of these arrangements is of especial interest to Catholics. The statement authorized by the War Department is in part as follows:

> The Hague convention requires that war prisoners shall enjoy complete liberty in the exercise of their religion. To provide for this, there is a chaplain of the Regular Army on the staff of the commandant of each war prison barracks, who has general supervision of the religious matters connected with the prison, and services are authorized for all prisoners so desiring where churches of special denominations are located in the vicinity of the places of internment. A representative of the international committee of Young Men's Christian Association is also accredited to each war-prison barracks and, in conjunction with the barracks chaplain, assists in the athletic and social affairs of the prisoners.

As a large proportion, perhaps not less than forty per cent, of the Germans engaged in fighting are Catholics, it behooves the Church, like the Government, "to be ready ahead of time." The places of detention are at present three in number and are located at Fort McPherson, Ga.; Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., and Fort Douglas, Utah. We may be certain that the ecclesiastical authorities, within whose jurisdiction these places are situated, are already planning that "Catholic churches shall be among the 'churches of special denomination . . . located in the vicinity of the places of internment.'" It is surprising to find that a Knight of Columbus is not associated with the chaplain in the care of prisoners, since it has been stated at Washington that this organization has been put on a par with the Young Men's Christian Association in matters relating to war. Doubtless the representative of the latter association will make every endeavor to be strictly impartial, but it will be difficult, in spite of the best will in the world, for an officer of that association to be in marked sympathy with Catholic needs, seeing that it does not regard the Church as Christian. Yet Catholic prisoners will, in all probability, outnumber those of any evangelical church.

The Government, as is clear from its statement, is eager to treat prisoners with every possible consideration. One of the most obvious ways to effect this would be to accredit to each barracks a Catholic, either a layman or preferably a priest, and put him on a par, if not with the chaplain, at least with the representative of the Young Men's Christian Association. No doubt the President and the War Department would see the justice and advisability of such an arrangement, and would provide for it, if the matter were brought to their attention.

The Cardinal and the President

FOR the most part, Newman was content to leave the valuation of his teaching and his work to the judgment of "the sure future." There is more humility and charity in this position, to which Newman frequently retreated, than is apparent at first sight. Newman knew perfectly well, as he has stated in a famous letter, that there was no touch of infallibility in anything that he did or wrote. He thought he was right, but always admitted that he might be wrong. Furthermore, he was ready generously to credit his critics with the same good purposes which he recognized in himself. Occasionally, however, the overt acts of his opponents left no doubt as to their unworthy aims, and then the interests of the Church induced him to reply. The rejoinder was never commonplace controversy. It always supplied the Catholic apologist with invaluable assistance, and it usually added something to the sum of English literature. But had he consulted his own inclinations the great Cardinal would never have departed from the philosophy, thus expressed in the simple language of common sense:

> If I were to try to read, much less answer, all the attacks made on me, this shop might as well be closed for any other business. I do the best I know how, the very best I can; and I mean to keep on doing it to the end. If the end brings me out right, what was said against me will not amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, ten angels swearing I was right would make no difference.

In his singleness of purpose, as well as in the burdens put upon him by unworthy opponents, the man who wrote these words was akin to Newman. His name was Abraham Lincoln.

Exit the Gloater

THE gloater is never happier than when among the ruins, actual or anticipated, of another's fortunes. God made him, and therefore let him have the reverence due to man. But when he turns his repulsive attention to the reverses, real or alleged, of the country whose authority he must in conscience reverence and obey, one is sometimes tempted to regard him as tainted with the guilt of constructive treason. But the impulse is only a temptation. As defined by the Constitution, "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." The gloater, as a rule, is far too careful of his skin to levy war against anything, and his character is usually such as to make him an impossible source of comfort to any nation, not completely dissociated from civilization. Hence the gloater of the common or garden variety, is indictable as a common nuisance, an offense to eye and ear, rather than as a traitor.

The determination of his precise status may be left to authorities on the Constitution, but in the light of recent events, it seems likely that these learned brethren will soon be obliged to class him as an extinct species. There is little left for him to gloat about. He gleefully prophesied that the Federal military census would enroll hardly enough men to rout a kindergarten, and the results of that census exceeded all expectations. He had no doubt that the $2,000,000,000 Liberty loan would be a complete failure, and the country answered by trying to lend the Government more than $3,000,000,000. He announced that the loan would be taken by a small band of plutocrats, endeavoring to escape the income tax, and was met by the official report that the subscribers numbered nearly 4,000,000. Next he turned his attention to the Red Cross, and stated that its request for $100,000,000 would be answered by a condemnatory silence, showing that the "heart of the country was not in the war." At the last reckoning, these voluntary contributions totaled more than $114,000,000. When it became known that our troops had embarked for France, he stated with ill-concealed joy that the U-boats would sink every transport. On July 4, the Secretary of the Navy announced "the safe arrival in France of every fighting man and every fighting ship."

Decidedly, these are bad days for the gloater. May he soon pass from our midst, unsung, unmourned. He is not much of a peril, but like gnats, bats and soap-box orators, he may be, and often is, a real nuisance.

Mercy and Justice

THAT our courts should temper mercy with justice is a proposition from which no good man and true will dissent. No longer do we try the defendant in Star Chamber sessions, or hang him on mere rumor and suspicion. Rather than subject one innocent man to unmerited punishment, we will suffer twelve undoubted criminals to go unwhipped of justice. But have we stopped at twelve? So far have we pushed this benign theory that it now seems opportune to review the path over which we have traveled, and to ascertain whither it leads. May it not be well to ask that our courts now temper their mercy with a little justice?

There is reason to fear that what we have thought to be mercy is not that virile virtue, but its weak counterfeit, sentimentality. Today, there is scarcely a promising development in court procedure which has not fallen under its blight. The Children's Court, an admirable institution in theory, has perhaps, saved itself, in spite of its friends. Still, if editors are to be credited, here and there the court's ill-advised clemency makes it a powerful, if unwitting, contributor to the spread of youthful delinquency. "I want to make this court," a successful judge once remarked, "a place that a boy simply hates to come to a second time." The probation system for minor and adult delinquents, if wisely applied and vigorously administered, will certainly save many a first or second offender. But it will certainly fail if a weak court allows a defiant culprit to regard probation as an indulgence of open guilt and a plenary absolution from merited punishment. "The disease that afflicts us," writes Judge Marcus Kavanagh of Chicago, "is want of respect for the law," and this lack the Judge traces, in part, to the inability or unwillingness of officials to enforce the law and to the practice of "coddling the criminal."

> During the last five years, there has arisen in this country, and especially in this State [New York] a disposition to coddle criminals. You cannot do that without belittling crime in the eyes of the criminal. I warn you that three-quarters of the crimes in this country today are committed by paroled criminals who were paroled before they were cured.

Perhaps we can secure mercy and justice in their proper proportions, only by remembering that the community has rights, quite as undoubted as the rights of any criminal.

Literature

JANE AUSTEN

SIR WALTER SCOTT once said of Jane Austen, the centenary of whose death will be observed on July 19: "The big bow-wow strain I can do myself, like any now going, but the exquisite touch which renders ordinary commonplace things and characters interesting from the truth of the description and the sentiment is denied to me." And indeed, while making allowance for the characteristic modesty of the great-hearted Sir Walter, a more striking contrast could hardly be than that between his crowded, colorful, animated and dramatic scenes and the quiet and secluded environment in which Jane Austen's people move and have their being. The outstanding feature of her work is the art which conceals art; and if we wished to institute a comparison we should go to another field of literature and call her a prose Tennyson, that is to say, an exquisite artist dealing with a finely ordered universe.

The world which Jane Austen knew and which she presented in her novels was the world of ladies and gentlemen, living for the most part lives of material ease in an atmosphere of high breeding where gentility was the rule and all crudity was frowned upon. Manners was the sine-qua-non of that world, and their perfection its ideal; and so these characters of hers move about serenely, speaking in low and carefully modulated tones self-possessed, restrained, graceful, fastidious.

Now, though of course all the characters do not measure up to this humane standard and we have for contrast such boorish figures as Mr. Collins in "Pride and Prejudice" or such vulgar ones as Mrs. Elton in "Mansfield Park," it might be supposed that all this would be rather tame stuff for the purpose of the novelist. And yet so close is her observation, so vigorous her grasp, so artful her arrangement, that soon wide differences appear between these polished and apparently similar people of hers; and presently we are following their fortunes with as keen an interest, as absorbed an attention, as we ever gave to tales of derring-do or to the story of the good apprentice.

"To love her is a liberal education," was Steele's encomium on a lady of his acquaintance; and surely the remark can be applied in all its fullness to those gracious and sensitive creatures, the heroines of Jane Austen. From the incomparable Elizabeth Bennet to the shy and modest Fanny Price they all have a certain rare note of genuine charm, of fineness, to which no masculine reader at least can be immune; and even when we meet with the somewhat priggish Emma Woodhouse we feel that beneath all her self-assurance and complacency and in all her officious and ill-fated schemes of match-making there is an essential worth of character that will win Knightley—and us—in the end.

That Jane Austen's heroes are not quite equal to the naturalness and lifelikeness of her heroines is often said; but this is to say nothing more than that their creator was a woman. Moreover, it is a difficult feat to duplicate perfection, and it is probable that if her Elizabeths, her Fannys, and her Emmas were not presented with such supreme excellence of reality, we should not be so alert to the shortcomings of her Darcys, her Edmunds, and her Knightleys. Even as it is, however, these men, and especially the last, are far from mere puppets or lay figures necessary for the evolution of the plot. They have definite characters, opinions, tastes of their own, and quite personal ways of thinking and of acting.

But, after all, a novelist chiefly shows his capacity by those so-called secondary figures who are to fill up the scenes, afford the basis of action, and in general give the sense of stir and movement of actual life; and it is here that Jane Austen has achieved her most triumphant effects. Who that has once met them will ever forget the garrulous and likable Miss Bates, the ridiculous Mr. Collins, the dryly humorous Mr. Bennet and his silly and fatuous wife, the mean and servile Mrs. Norris, the valetudinarian Mr. Woodhouse? These and numerous others stand out with all the distinctness of flesh and blood; and it is one of the main merits of their creator that she never degenerates into caricature. Her characters, idiosyncratic though they be, are never labeled; they have no grotesque physical marks or mannerisms, no obvious tricks with which to announce their presence. They are eminently natural.

Mark Twain once complained that though Meredith throughout "Diana of the Crossways" was continually mentioning the wit and intellectual brilliance of his heroine, yet after reading the book through and carefully examining the speeches she actually made he could find no grounds for Meredith's obsession on that subject. Jane Austen does not tell us her characters are witty or intellectual; she really makes it appear that they are so. Here, for instance, is Mr. Bennet replying to the banal observations of his wife. She is bemoaning the fact that after his death the house in which she has lived for so many years will descend to another and she will be turned out of her old home. "My dear," he says, "do not give way to such gloomy thoughts. Let us hope for better things. Let us flatter ourselves that I may be the survivor."

In her minute knowledge of her characters whereby she gives us not caricatures, not grotesques, but portraits, Jane Austen has been likened by Macaulay to Shakespeare; and there is another point in which she bears resemblance to that supreme creator, and that is the enduring freshness of her appeal. We can read her again and again, she never palls. And this we think is due largely to an intellectual trait as rare in English as it is piquant, namely, irony.

Now, irony is a quality which does not seem indigenous to English letters; it has an alien smack, whether of ancient Greece or modern France; but irony like everything else has its kinds, and when we come to examine that of Jane Austen we find a delightful difference to those foreign varieties: it is not gloomy, it is not pessimistic, it is not bitter. Hers is a smiling, a good-natured irony; and it is by virtue of it she is preserved from those sentimental pitfalls that lie in wait for the female novelist. Though the central situation of all her novels is a love-affair, she is never mawkish, never sugary-sweet. She knew the full value of suggestion and of a restraint which has more power than it shows.

To instance which particular novel of Jane Austen's is "the best" is one of those vexed and vexing problems with which critics like to tease themselves and the public; and it is a problem especially difficult where, as here, all the work is of so even a texture. "Pride and Prejudice," "Mansfield Park," "Persuasion"; the judgment wavers between them; until the critic, suddenly aware he is ignoring the claims of Emma and Mr. Knightley, Miss Bates and Mr. Woodhouse, Catherine Morland and General Tilney, the Thorpes and Mrs. Allen, and many another diverting personage, is forced in the end, like Cicero on Demosthenes, to give his vote to "the longest."

Jane Austen with her "little bit (two inches wide) of ivory on which I work with so fine a brush" made as near an approach to absolute perfection as can be met with in English literature; but even with perfection, it seems, fault may be found, and so her critics have attacked her on two grounds: the first being that she is not "heroic," that her characters are never transfigured by an ideal enthusiasm, by any great or tragic passion; and the second, that the little world she immortalized was after all but a set of genteel idlers, whose lives were vapid and who had no influence on humanity at large. The second is really an answer to the first. Jane Austen struck no attitudes, scaled no empyreal heights of thought or emotion, because the people she delineated did not do so. This comfortable and private world was the only world she knew and no doubt it was the one she loved; and she lavished upon its presentation all the resources of her marvelous art. She might, it is true, have disowned that world or lashed it with all the satiric scorn of a Byron; but in that event she would not have been the Jane Austen who looked on all the trivialities, the meannesses, the absurdities of the every-day life about her with so discerning and so kindly an eye.

JOHN BUNKER.

BOOK REVIEWS

Hamlet, an Ideal Prince. By ALEXANDER W. CRAWFORD, Professor of English in the University of Manitoba. Boston: Richard G. Badger. $1.50.

In this volume Professor Crawford offers us studies of "Hamlet," "The Merchant of Venice," "Othello" and "King Lear." His object is to point out the meaning of the plays themselves, and consequently the signification of the characters by whom the story is told and the plot unraveled. The working principle is an excellent one, and very simple; namely, to let Shakespeare speak for himself. It is possible to read a preconceived notion into almost any text; and Shakespeare has been called the father of many an intellectual child which he would not acknowledge. "It is high time," writes the author, "for us to permit Shakespeare to be the author of his own dramas, and to regard him as at least as good an interpreter of life as his critics. . . . Let us conclude that Shakespeare, like other great authors, probably said what he meant, and meant what he said."

Secondly, Professor Crawford warns us against the mistake of making Shakespeare only a modern dramatist. He is an Elizabethan. There is an absolute literary value in his plays, as in the work of all great writers; but he wrote primarily for his own time, and cannot be fully understood and appreciated unless this fact be kept in mind. Finally, the correct procedure is not to work out the meaning of the drama by trying to understand the character; but, e contra, to get at the nature of the character by the way he carries out his part in the development of the plot.

In a measure, the theater of the sixteenth century played the part of the newspapers and magazines of our own times. And though it is safe to assume that the craving after knowledge of what was going on in the world was as keen with the Elizabethans as with ourselves, yet printed news, rumors, stories, were not at one's beck and call then as they are now. There were stirring events abroad, and at the theaters one could find a sort of exchange for news and reports. What the audience looked for on the boards, however, was a good story exposed by characters worthy of the theme. Professor Crawford develops his thesis well, and the essays will be both interesting and suggestive to students of the great dramatist.

F. J. McN.

The Church and Science. By BERTRAM C. A. WINDLE, M.A., M.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., M.R.I.A., K.S.G. President of University College, Cork. St. Louis: B. Herder. $3.00.

The latest work from the pen of Sir Bertram Windle contains within four hundred pages the chief points of contact between religion and science, as science is understood by its most modern and authoritative champions. In his first chapter the author states the scope, postulates and limitations of science, and in the following chapter the field and purpose of religious teaching. Four chapters treat of the difference between "facts" and "theories." These are among the best chapters in the book. They unfold the author's method in apologetics, as, in truth, the clean-cut line between fact and theory is the last word to the oft-repeated charge of conflict between science and religion. No fact can conflict with revealed truth. The author of both is the same Divine Truth. It may take years to determine the fact from the theory, and it is very distressing for the pseudo-scientist to have to wait for years. The distinguished President of University College, Cork, is such a thorough scientist that in treating most lucidly many modern scientific theories, he constantly inculcates caution against elevating them, without due deliberation, to the category of facts.

It is difficult to overestimate the value of this book in the field of Catholic literature. Every topic is handled with clearness, accuracy and precision, and in a spirit thoroughly loyal to the Church's teaching. The book should appeal to a great variety of readers as its interesting chapters cover the chief topics in which Catholic teaching touches upon physical science, or as the layman loves to say "modern science." Sir Bertram Windle says in his preface: "This is not what is commonly called a work of reconciliation; it is rather one of delimitation and explanation. Its first object is to present an outline of the attitude of science today towards various problems, physical and biological, and to show how very few of these come in any way into contact with dogmatic religion. . . . Another of the objects of this book is to show how wide a range for speculation the Church permits, even for example on such a subject as the interpretation of the first chapter of Genesis. . . ."

The author does not attempt to deny that the theories of certain men of science are opposed by the Church. The point that is never lost sight of, and is clearly driven home to the reader, is that they are theories as yet unproved. Many such theories have been put forward in the past and will continue to be put forward through the years that are to come, only to find their way into the realm of abandoned ideas. Witness the Darwin vogue of the last century in favor now only with the Sunday-supplement scientist, and with those whose education is molded by a magazine cover. Sir Betram Windle says well: "The believer in Christianity may possess his soul in patience, well aware that no theory which is really in opposition to revelation can be true."

G. C. T.

Twenty Minutes of Reality: an Experience. With Some Illuminating Letters Concerning It. By MARGARET PRESCOTT MONTAGUE. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $0.75.

If true literature be a leaf out of life, embodying in beautiful form the best one has seen and savored—"vu et vécu," according to René Bazin—this little volume, though subtly unwholesome in content and effect, is not without some claim to literary distinction. As a child the author was "afraid of world without end, of life everlasting," and in maturer years could conceive no state of bliss proof forever against boredom. During convalescence, moreover, after a surgical operation she suffered the most acute mental depression from the seeming discovery in the black abyss of unconsciousness under the anesthetic that there was no God, or else He was indifferent to human suffering. One cloudy March day, however, from her bed on a hospital porch she suddenly "saw into reality," and for about twenty ecstatic moments beheld life for the first time "in all its young intoxication of loveliness, in its unspeakable joy, beauty, and importance," with a wonderful feeling of rhythm as well. Yet what that importance was she avers she did not grasp. But the fear of eternity was gone; it was not an altogether "uncaring reality" that she had seen thus face to face.

This experience, doubtless wholly due to physical conditions of convalescence, presents many emotional phenomena characteristic of Protestant "religious conversion" or "illumination," but the spiritual concepts are much less sharply defined than among the Evangelicals of an elder day. The vague mysticism recalls rather the temper and tendencies of the Emersonian Transcendentalists, and even of the more modern mystic and pantheistic sects. Corroborative testimonies, strongly suggestive of Jakob Boehme, Swedenborg, and Mme. Blavatsky, are appended in a sheaf of letters from other like-minded "witnesses of the unseen," "spies who have seen the Promised Land, comparing their bunches of grapes on their return."

From the days of the Gnostics down to the modern adepts in "cosmic consciousness" and other cults of the occult such fanciful, esoteric intuitions issuing in transports of delight, while purporting to confirm a faith in God and enforce Christian ideals, have proved, in fact, pernicious hallucinations, vain, illusory substitutes for the objective revelation of Christ to His Church. Though references to "wild joy" and ecstasy abound in these pages, the "illumination," after all, if not pagan, is a cold, dry light. Quite other, it would seem, is the "lumen vultus tui, Domine." One misses altogether the tender, personal note of Catholic devotion, the benignitas et humanitas of Christ, the intimate consolations so familiar to friends of the Sacred Heart. Still, the chastened restraint of style, the gentle, King James cadences, the fitness of polished phrase may perhaps reflect some "Sabbath calm of soul" concordant with that wondrous rhythm the author had discerned in all existence. G. H. D.

The Rural School from Within. By MARION G. KIRKPATRICK, B.S., Ph.D., Kansas State Agricultural College. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.28.

A Schoolmaster of the Great City. By ANGELO PATRI. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25

Education and Living. By RANDOLPH BOURNE. New York: The Century Company. $1.25.

The first two of these volumes deal with the actual experiences of teachers in the classroom. The third endeavors to propose a theory of education suited to the requirements of the present day. Judging from the unconscious revelation of self given to the reader in Mr. Kirkpatrick's interesting study of "The Rural School from Within," it is easy to gather that the author is a kindly, sympathetic and practical teacher. Everywhere throughout the work there is a sense of balance and order and a keen appreciation of the fundamentals in education. Mr. Kirkpatrick has a true concept of the aims and purpose of the rural school, and he realizes its shortcomings, just as well as he is willing to confess his own mistakes in the management of his classes. He is open to religious influences, realizes the necessity of watching over the morals of the children, though he does not feel entirely free to insist upon the necessity of religious education. In the last words of his volume he lays down a principle which gives an insight into the spirit of his work, for he maintains that no teacher can accomplish the noblest work in his office of trainer of the young, unless he has come face to face with the Teacher who said "Suffer the little children to come unto Me."

Like Mr. Kirkpatrick, Mr. Angelo Patri knows children and loves them. "A Schoolmaster of the Great City" is the narrative of the actual experiences of the author with the children of New York. Mr. Patri has a high conception of the purpose of the school. But, high as it is, it is entirely inadequate for the truest ends of education. As principal of one of the Gary schools of the metropolis, he is entitled in a way to speak for the system in an official capacity. He sees in the public school a great strong institution whose purpose is to mold and fashion the rather complex individualities of the children of all races and creeds entrusted to it into something like an efficient social unit. He would try to humanize the school. He is evidently a kindly and warm-hearted man, in some educational matters logical and keen-sighted. But, though it may not be astonishing that in his official capacity he may not teach religion in his school, it seems hard to understand that there is scarcely a word in his book of the influence of religion on the child, and that one element should be so rigidly kept in the background, and practically left unmentioned, which alone can truly humanize the pupil. With all his interest in the children, the author can never accomplish the best results, unless he remedies that one central defect of his system.

Mr. Randolph Bourne reprints in "Education and Living," the papers formerly published on this subject in the New Republic. He sees in the public school "the most interesting and most hopeful of our American enterprises." According to him it is one of "the few rational things" we have. The school fascinates him "because there is almost no sociological, administrative or psychological truth that cannot be drawn out of its manifold life. It is the laboratory for human nature." In the view of Catholics, a school should, of course, be something far nobler than that. They are quite willing to recognize that, as far as is possible, the children in the school should not only be prepared for the problems of their present life, sociological, industrial and commercial, but that they must above all, perfect themselves, their own natures, and that completely from every point of view. Mr. Bourne, following the philosophy of education propounded by John Dewey, would socialize, and democraticize education. If education goes no further, it is truncated and shorn of its crown. At the bottom of the theories put forward by Mr. Dewey and Mr. Bourne there is a misunderstanding of the inherent dignity of human nature. We must, of course, adapt the education of our children to their surroundings, we must prepare them for life. But there is a life of the soul with its spiritual yearnings, its responsibilities, its destinies projected far beyond the range of mere social service. Of these Mr. Bourne takes no account. His book thus suffers from a radical defect. J. C. R.

Burns: How to Know Him. By WILLIAM ALLAN NEILSON. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.50.

This latest volume of the splendid series, explanatory of the great authors, although written by a Scotchman, presents a sane appreciation of the bard of Scotland. "Bobbie" Burns is regarded by his countrymen with a species of idolatry that is difficult for a foreigner to understand. And so this present volume, "How to Know Him," not too laudatory, and yet fully appreciative of his genius, is most welcome. There is a great deal to be known about Burns, the poet; of the man just enough should be known to understand his poetry. For Burns is the poet of the heart and the emotions, of moods and feelings. "He could utter pathos almost intolerably piercing and overwhelming remorse; gaiety as fresh and inspiring as the song of the lark; roistering mirth; keen irony; and a thousand phases of passion."

After a vivid biographical sketch, Professor Neilson considers the main aspects of his work, the monumental part he played in refurbishing old and creating new Scottish songs, his epistles and satires, by which he first became famous, his descriptive and narrative compositions. Not many are aware that Burns had a command of the purest English style, which he displayed in letter-writing, and that these letters are only a little less remarkable than his songs in dialect. Without slighting the keen appreciation of the author's notes, probably the best thing about the book, is the happiness of the selections. The admirer of Burns will here find all of his old favorites, together with a large number of poems which he may have overlooked. It is a great convenience to find the Scottish words and phrases of the poet translated into English on the margin of the page. F. X. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In "Doing My Bit for Ireland" (Century, $1.00) Margaret Skinnider gives the interesting story of her share in the Easter week revolt. She is a Glasgow suffragette, a teacher of mathematics and acted as dispatch-bearer and as sharp-shooter during the Dublin uprising, conscientiously donning her green uniform each time she took up a rifle. From a loophole cut in the sloping roof of the College of Surgeons, the author brought down more than one British soldier, for she had been taught to shoot straight by the Countess de Markievicz, whom she warmly admires. Miss Skinnider was wounded while setting fire to a building, and after leaving the hospital succeeded in reaching this country. The book gives a lively, first-hand account of how the uprising was organized and carried through, and some striking pen-pictures of the participants.

In an interesting paper, called "My Impressions of America," contributed by Count Ilya Tolstoy to the current Century, he remarks:

> In my country [Russia], as in the other parts of Europe, nobody need have any difficulty in finding book-stores in small towns or in large cities. Here one can find a cigar-store, a drug-store, all kinds of shops where luxuries can be purchased, but the seeking of a book-shop is often a very hard quest. Even in New York it is hard to find a real book-store where the attendants know their authors and can help one select the books that one needs on any subject. There are some, but none too many. They can be counted on the fingers of one's hands. In smaller cities the task of finding books is a hopeless one. There are a few stores where books are sold; but what books? Novels mostly, the average ephemeral romance; magazines with too many ill-conceived articles containing little upbuilding criticism of public life, much ill-digested information; and newspapers which afford little of intellectual value, being mostly mediums of advertising. American literature is yet poor. The good magazines are few when compared with European reviews. The inheritance of mankind, the universal literature, is hardly known here. There are translations in sets, richly bound, but cheaply produced, and too often done by hack writers who do not even understand what they translate. They are bad translations, as a rule, but costly. Poor people are not able to buy them.

Thoughtful observers must own that what the Count says is true. As a people we seem to have little love for solid reading; our taste in literature is by no means fastidious, nor is the spread of "bone-dry" prohibition, whatever else it does, at all likely to change saloons into corner book-stores, where thirsty minds will flock for refreshment.

Two more volumes of the Pohle-Preuss series of dogmatic text-books "The Sacraments, iv" (Herder, $1.50) and "Eschatology" ($1.00) have been added to this scholarly and substantial presentation of Catholic doctrine. The former volume gives us a clear exposition of those vital dogmas and practices of the Church, Extreme Unction, the unity and indissolubility of Marriage, the Church's control over that Sacrament and a thorough discussion of the celibacy of the clergy. The second volume treats of the last things, death, judgment, the resurrection of the flesh, purgatory, heaven and hell. To these a short chapter on chiliasm is added. For the scholar who wishes to push the study of his religion further afield than the actual text in the series of books carries him, a list of readings from the great classics of theology and its kindred sciences is appended, in which the widest horizons are opened. Dr. Pohle and Mr. Preuss have done a fine piece of work. Intellectually and spiritually, the task accomplished by them is of the utmost value. Brevity combined with comprehensiveness, method and clearness of presentation and soundness of doctrine everywhere mark these treatises.

The June number of Studies, "an Irish Quarterly Review of Letters, Philosophy and Science," offers its readers this table of contents: "The Social Problem in Cork," Alfred J. Rahilly; "Divergent Ideals in Russian Education," T. Corcoran; "Recent Irish Poetry," Katharine Tynan; "Pearse, MacDonagh and Plunkett: An Appreciation," Arthur E. Clery; "The Mineral Resources of Ireland," Henry J. Seymour; "Evolution and Degeneration in America," James J. Walsh; Poetry: "A Litany of Saints," T. B. Rudmose-Brown; "Thanksgiving," J. W. A.; "Easter," J. E. Canavan; "Love on a Day," M. St. J.; "Bagdad Under the Arabs," Edmund Power; "Canon Sheehan: A Reminiscence and an Appreciation," John D. Colclough; Chronicle: "Reform of Classical Education," Henry Browne; "Brother Potamian," James J. Walsh; and some excellent book-reviews. "A Litany of Saints," from the French of the Abbé Louis le Cardonnel, is a beautiful poem about "the Abbesses whom the old stories show Dim-visaged in the mist of long ago," but is too long to quote; the author of the interesting paper on Canon Sheehan regards "Mariae Coronae" as that writer's best book and regrets his having assayed novels instead of ascetical works; the study of Cork's social condition shows that that city's slums are as bad as Dublin's, and that 354 families that were investigated were found to be living daily on three pence half-penny apiece. The first of the following poems is called "A Little Boy in the Morning," which Katharine Tynan quotes from Francis Ledwidge, and the second is J. W. A.'s "Thanksgiving":

He will not come, and still I wait.
He whistles at another gate,
Where angels listen. Ah, I know
He will not come: yet if I go,
How shall I know he did not pass
Barefooted in the flowery grass?

The moon leans on one silver horn,
Above the silhouettes of morn,
And from their nest-sills finches whistle,
Or, stooping, pluck the downy thistle.
How is the morn so gay and fair
Without his whistling in the air?

The world is calling, I must go.
How shall I know he did not pass
Barefooted through the shining grass?

I thank Thee, God, for Death and Hell,
Those awful creatures of Thy hand
That serve my utter need so well
And help me in Thy grace to stand:

For Death, who bids me come away
And tells me here's no lasting rest,
That life's a caravanserai
And I a night and morning's guest:

For Hell, whose fires of gloomy red
Threat desolating wrath to be,
If I should love a thing instead
Of Him that made the thing and me.

O pallid Death! an hour shall pluck
The pall aside that shrouds thy face,
And I shall see thee, wonder-struck,
So full of joy and lovely grace.

O house of longing, fierce and vain!
About thy straitened walls there shine,
Like sun-gleam past a wintry plain,
Soft radiances of love Divine.

ECONOMICS

Why Not Tax Our Charities?

CAREFUL students of Mr. Dooley will recall the monograph in which the eminent philosopher discusses the subject of "Hanging the Aldermen." "Nawthin' cud be happyer," he says, quoting Hogan, "thin th' thought iv cillybratin' th' season be sthringin' up some iv th' fathers iv th' city where th' childher cud see thim." But, in spite of their demerits, this sight is rare, and the ultimate reason, perhaps, is assigned by the philosopher who chooses the alderman to stand for id genus omne: "'Tis har-rd to hang an aldherman annyhow. Ye'd have to suspind most iv thim be th' waist."

Mr. Dooley's Dochney

ODDLY enough, when I first read the current "Report" of Mr. Leon Wallstein, New York's Commissioner of Accounts, my mind, or what serves me in that useful function, went back to the Sage of Archey Road and the aldermen. Not that I propose Mr. Wallstein as a candidate for hanging. On the contrary, I bow in wondering admiration before the genius that can conceive the marvelous graph prefixed to this report, in which every city activity is represented as centering in an island-like Mayor, completely, yet tactfully, surrounded by the Commissioner of Accounts. Furthermore, as rumor runs, Mr. Wallstein is an industrious young man, although his efforts in the latest police scandal do not seem to win the affectionate admiration of the Governor of the State, who has recently said harsh but obvious things on the want of legal fitness involved in the investigation of one city department by another. Perhaps the Governor has not yet seen Mr. Wallstein's famous graph, which shows clearly the pre-eminent place of the Commissioner of Accounts.

However this may be, Mr. Wallstein is set upon reducing the tax-rate of New York. That is an ambition, overvaulting perhaps, but laudable. He suggests that a lowering could be brought about by taxing hospitals, refuges, parochial schools, day nurseries, foundling homes, orphan asylums, churches, and similar notorious malefactors of great wealth. This plan recalls the policy of Mr. Dooley's Alderman Dochney. "Th' las' ordhnance he introduced," remarks Mr. Dooley, "was wan establishin' a license f'r churches, and compellin' thim to keep their fr-ront dure closed an' th' blinds drawn on Sundah. He was expelled fr'm th' St. Vincent de Pauls, an' illicted a director iv a bank th' same day."

Private Holdings in New York

THE proposal to tax private institutions seems dear to the mind of Mr. Wallstein. On November 27, 1916, he issued a voluminous report on "City Aid to Private Institutions." In the letter of transmittal to the Mayor, the statement is made that "the total assessed value of the exempt property of these private institutions in 1915, was $380,952,910." Moreover "the private institutions receive financial aid from the City amounting to approximately $13,902,629.73." What Mr. Wallstein euphemistically calls "aid" was in reality part-payment for services rendered the City. But let that pass. Of this "financial aid," $7,218,397.10 represents "exemption from taxes." With these figures in hand, Mr. Wallstein argues that had this exempt property been taxed, the result would have been "a reduction of 7.7 points in the tax-rate."

Of the exempted property, forty-two religious bodies held a valuation of $268,049,925, while the holdings of "non-sectarian organizations" were rated at $96,340,485. Mr. Wallstein calculated the value of the Catholic and Protestant Episcopal Church property at $103,067,195, and $69,108,525, respectively. These large sums made a deep impression on the Commissioner's mind, and he repeats them in his "Annual Report" dated March, 1917.

A non-critical analysis of the financial assistance which the City renders to charitable, religious, educational and kindred private institutions was completed, demonstrating that the City contributes aid to these institutions, amounting to approximately $14,000,000 annually, and that if the exempt property of these institutions, assessed at $380,952,910, were taxable, a reduction of 7.7 in the tax-rate would be effected.

Mr. Wallstein's fondly hoped for reduction would be "effected" for just about one year, for the next tax-rate would necessarily include the cost of the activities ordinarily supported by private organizations. How many parochial schools could afford to pay this tax? How many orphanages or hospitals, Catholic or non-Catholic? If closed, the tax-payers would be obliged to found and support at a higher rate, new institutions to do their work.

Taxing the Parochial Schools

TAKE the parochial schools, to begin with. The assessed valuation of the land and buildings of the New York parochial schools is about $30,000,000. If the average rate of $1.80 per $100 of value be assumed, the amount which the City would receive in taxation from these institutions is $540.000. The effect of taxation, however, on the New York parochial schools would be to close their doors, and the children under their care would naturally pass into the public schools. The annual per capita cost in the New York public elementary schools is about $40. We thus have the simple proposition that the City of New York might receive in taxation from the parochial schools, possibly for a few years, the annual sum of $540,000. After closing them by this exaction, the City would be obliged to expend for the 100,000 children now in the parochial schools, the annual sum of $4,000,000 for tuition alone. The absolute total expenditures would, of course, be much greater. Either the children would be housed in the old buildings, bought by the City, or in new structures, equal to the present parochial school valuation of $30,000,000. The total annual cost to the City would thus be:

Interest on original cost of plant, $30,000,000 at four and one-half per cent	$1,350,000
Repairs, up-keep. depreciation at five per cent on two-thirds valuation	1,000,000
Tuition, at present rate	4,000,000
Total	$6,350,000

In other words, Mr. Wallstein suggests that the City pay out at least $6,350,000, for an indeterminate period, in order to collect for a few years, annual taxes to the value of $540,000. This means, if it means anything, that the City is asked to spend eleven dollars rather than relinquish its grasp on the one dollar honestly and intelligently devoted to charity. How this wildcat finance will reduce the tax-rate "7.7 points" is not clear.

The City and the Private Hospitals

BUT the tax-exemptions granted the private hospitals may, perhaps, strengthen Mr. Wallstein's contention. The Commissioner calculates that the valuation of all private hospitals, dispensaries, and sanitaria was, in 1915, $38,575,825. This would "yield" a tax-return of $728,295.86. The latest figures at my disposal show that in 1913 the expenses of these institutions were $5,880,283. Of this sum $4,784,181 was met by private charity. For its public charges the City paid $1,096,102, less than one-half the amount it would have paid for similar work in its own hospitals. These figures do not indicate that the private hospitals are money-making concerns. They do prove, however, that the institutions are performing a function which the City cannot well assume. New York depends, to a greater extent than other large American cities, upon its private hospitals. In 1913 the capacity of the private institutions, having relations with the City, was 16,545, and of the public hospitals, 6,610 beds. Of 114,453 emergency ambulance calls, 72,219 were answered by the private, and 42,234 by the public service. Furthermore, the amount of work done without charge by the private hospitals is very great. The Presbyterian Hospital, for instance, does about sixty per cent of its work without recompense. The New York Hospital, holding its charter from George III, is another excellent example of the New York private institution. In 1914 it cared for 64,376 patients. The cost for maintenance was $729,913.43, and eighty per cent of its work was free. In 1913 Bellevue, the City's largest hospital, cared for 23,000 fewer patients, at a cost of $862,053. In 144 years of beneficent work the New York Hospital created an equipment in buildings and accessories to the value of over $12,000,000, every penny of which was paid for without recourse to the City. To cripple an institution of this character would not be financial wisdom, but the act of a barbarian.

City and Private Expenditures

TO suppose that the City can displace the private institutions, thereby reducing its tax-rate, is delirium. The per diem rates of payment to the private hospitals in 1913, retaining this year as the only present available basis of comparison, was for medical cases, $1.00; for surgical cases, $1.10; for tubercular cases, $0.80; an average of $0.97. The per diem per capita cost in the public hospitals for the same year was $2.01, an advance of more than 100 per cent. As expressed by the Hon. Herman A. Metz, former Comptroller of the City of New York, for 1,217,732 days in the private hospitals, the City paid $1,132,621.10. If treated in the City's own hospitals the cost would have been $2,285,242.20. That the City can reduce the tax-rate "7.7 points" by an initial expenditure of nearly $40,000,000, which would be necessary in case the private institutions were obliged to close, and by a maintenance cost twice as great as under the present arrangements, may be clear to Mr. Wallstein. To the ordinary citizen, however, the process looks like paying $100 to collect fifty.

To estimate in dollars and cents the value of the churches to the community seems to border on simony, and may be passed over for the present. Touching the orphan asylums and homes for foundlings in New York, Mr. Wallstein assesses them at $40,900,955, and calculates that they ought to "yield" $788,274.96. Since the expenditures of these institutions are largely in excess of their incomes, it will be readily seen that as a humorist Mr. Wallstein possesses possibilities which have been seriously underestimated. Others, however, may think a plan to tax orphan asylums too much like stealing candy from a child, or robbing a blind man of his pennies, to be humorous; and this, probably, is the accepted view. When New York seriously proposes to make the lot of the self-sacrificing guardians of these dependent children harder than it now is, we may believe that the debacle is near.

"It Costs Too Much"

THE splendid letter in which Dr. Butler of Columbia University defends the principle by which private institutions for the furtherance of religious, charitable and educational purposes are relieved from taxation may be dismissed as inspired by sentiment. More to the point are the words spoken by former City Comptroller Metz before the New York Constitutional Convention of 1915:

> This is not a question of politics. It is a question of civic economy and sound sense. I do not propose to smite the hand that lifts my burdens, but to thank God, and let it alone. The proposition to tax these institutions is thoughtless, an hallucination, a scandal, a madness, an affront to intelligence.

For the present, then, the question raised by the spirit of secularism, "Why not tax our charities?" may be met by the answer, "It costs too much." There are other reasons, founded on high principles of morality and good government, but these have no appeal to the new Cæsarism, now striving to make the State supreme in every department of human activity.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

EDUCATION

Drawing in the Grades

DRAWING is one of the most interesting and most instructive of the courses of the primary and grammar grades. Its connection with writing is well known, but it possesses other and independent advantages. It is the first step to design, and the improvement of design is very necessary for the maintenance of some of our manufactures. It is essential to many occupations; it encourages and develops observation, cultivates the graphic memory, exercises the imagination in the construction of design, cultivates the perceptive faculty, and gives a delicacy of manipulation which is very valuable. It develops esthetics by raising the taste of the people. Works of art may and often do become objects of enjoyment, where the drawing faculty has been cultivated, whilst habits of care, neatness and accuracy are produced which must react upon the general character. Drawing is thus both utilitarian and humanistic.

Order of Lessons

THE general lines of work as indicated in the courses of study in the elementary schools may be summed up under the following heads: Nature drawing and color; constructive drawing and design; pictorial drawing and composition; plant drawing and decoration.

Nature drawing and color for all years should be given in September and October because these months are rich in nature material. Grasses, berries and fruits are abundant. The sequence in plant drawing is as follows: (1) Movement of growth and direction, as expressed in line. (2) Branching, as expressed in angle and division of spaces. (3) Proportion of parts, as expressed in mass, or relative size of flower and leaf and stem. (4) Massing of plants, as expressed in silhouette, accuracy in growth and proportion within a given space. (5) Foreshortening of parts rendered in two values. (6) Appearance of the whole as rendered in values, with great care in observation. (7) Structure. (8) Textures. (9) Beauty.

The sequence in color is as follows: (1) Spectrum color. (2) Standard hues. (3) Value. (4) Intermediate hues. (5) Scale of intensity or chroma. (6) Complementary hues. (7) Harmonies of neighboring colors. (8) Harmonies of complementary colors.

Constructive drawing and design should be given in November, December and January. In the lower grades, the constructive drawing is reduced to a minimum. In the intermediate grades, it receives more attention and requires greater precision. In the upper grades, it demands the utmost accuracy of which the pupils are capable. Constructive terms should be made familiar from the beginning through correct use. The problems in design in the lower grades should be selected with an eye to the interests of children, and all constructive work should be of immediate practical value. For this, the various civic and religious festivals will furnish hints.

Pictorial drawing and composition should be given in February and March. Pictorial drawing should begin in simple mass and outline, and proceed along the line of the child's interests, playthings, objects of daily use, domestic animals, with the representation of the object's peculiarities in form and position. Do not aim to focus the attention of the pupils upon the proportion, the relative widths and heights of objects, before the third grade. After that the teacher should lead them to record the effects of distance and of foreshortening. After the fifth grade, children must begin to develop accurate and skilful use of brush and pencil. Drawing should become as common a means of expression as language. Pictorial drawing should be more vital, more genuinely useful to the pupils, and more evidently a necessity, as part of the school work, than we have commonly conceived it. The aim of pictorial drawing in the primary grades should be to lead pupils to acquire facility in graphic expression, and the subject-matter should be determined largely by other school studies.

Plant drawing and decoration should be given in April, May and June. Drawings should be in harmony with the season. Nature is awakening; buds are swelling; the song of birds is in the air; the months are rich with new life. Nature-study and plant and bird-life can be combined. Careful observation and analysis should be made of native forms and colors, so that children may be led to enjoy the beauty of the springtime. In the primary grades, Easter is sure to be the center of interest, and Arbor Day and Memorial Day should also be observed. In the early grades, the work should follow the season and the calendar, and there should be no formal course in representation and design. Small children can practise the elementary processes incident to decorative design, as the tinting of their paper by means of the flat-wash, working to an outline, and the placing of one unit in reference to others. Beginning with the fourth grade, the pupils should learn something of what constitutes a decorative design, a surface-repeat, a border, a bilateral unit and a rosette. These items may be taught in connection with the study of flowers, birds and insects of the spring. The three fundamental principles as given in the study of nature are "recognition," "adaptation," and "utilization." These three apply also in the study of nature and design. Recognition of the flowers, and their colors is the first step; conventionalization or the adaptation of the nature motive, the second; and utilization or the application of the design, the third. In the upper grades, a simple study of historic ornament is of value in showing correct applications of nature's principles.

Practical Suggestions

DRAWING lessons in grammar grades should occupy from twenty-five to thirty minutes every day. In many schools, drawing alternates with penmanship, the class drawing one day, and writing the day following. This plan, while it does not give as much time to drawing as might be desirable, does not detract from the advancement of the pupil in penmanship; on the contrary, it has been observed by many teachers that the training given in seeing and reproducing form in drawing assists children very materially in learning to write. As a general rule, not more than one object should be studied and drawn at a lesson. This does not mean that only one picture should be made, although to make one good, thoughtful drawing of many of the subjects suggested will occupy the time usually allotted to a lesson. The object to be drawn should first be studied by the entire class. It may then be drawn on practice paper by all pupils; or on the blackboard by some, and on practice paper by the others. When this has been done, the entire class may proceed to draw it in their books as a record of their best thought and effort. No one should be permitted to draw ahead of the class. Should there be some with ability to proceed more rapidly than the class, they should be given supplementary work in drawing from the object, or in drawing on the blackboard.

Vitalizing the Subject

THE teacher should not feel compelled to use only the drawing period for that subject, nor that time for drawing alone. The school period spent in drawing plants and animals as a part of the nature study work may in reality be the best kind of a drawing lesson. In brief, the drawing and manual training should be made of practical use throughout the child's school life that it may assert its educational value as a common means of expression. It should be utilized as a help in other studies; observation in nature and object drawing should lead to a keener mental attitude in language; the study of design should mean neatness and order in the written work; construction-work may be used in arithmetic; and again, the arithmetic should be used in constructive design, nature study, in nature drawing, and geography in illustrative drawing. In other words, the drawing should be made of vital importance to the child, for his mental, physical and spiritual development.

A Sister of Mercy.
College of Mt. St. Mary, Plainfield, N. J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Benefits of Daily Mass

THE Boston Evening Transcript's "Listener" recently published this communication from "a valued correspondent":

> Did, or didn't I tell you what I think of a truly beautiful story of our occasional choreman, a simple West of Ireland peasant, with little education but a sound natural mind, and a heart of gold? It is a "Listener" story, even though it magnifies the R. C. Church. My wife, in her blind Protestant way, asked him if he went to church, and he answered gravely that he hadn't missed a Sunday for twenty years, adding that his daughter, a girl of thirteen, rose at six every morning to attend early Mass. At my wife's expression of surprise he said: "You know, ma'am, it helps to keep you nice and quiet all day long." I wish Protestantism afforded something to keep me nice and quiet all day long.

In his "The Path to Rome" Mr. Hilaire Belloc, it will be remembered, confirms the testimony of the "Listener's" gold-hearted Irishman, for he gives four causes for "The pleasing sensation of order and accomplishment which attaches to a day one has opened by Mass."

Infant Mortality and Low Wages

AN excessive death rate among babies in Manchester, New Hampshire, is reported by the Children's Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor. The report is based on interviews with mothers, and includes all babies whose births were registered during a single year:

> Of all the babies studied, one in six, 165 per 1,000, had died during the first year of life. There were wide variations in rate between different groups of the population, according to the father's earnings, the employment of the mother, the congestion of the home, and the way in which the baby had been fed.
>
> Nearly half of the 1,643 babies had fathers whose earnings were less than $650 a year, and more than one-eighth of the babies had fathers earning less than $450 a year. Only one in sixteen (6.4 per cent) had fathers earning as much as $1,250. The death rate among the babies in the poorest families was more than four times as high as among those in the highest wage group.

Many of our State legislators would do well to read this report, for among their number were Solons who were for dragging the children into the fields and the factories at the first blow of the bugles. Our war toll in manhood's suffering need not be increased by outraging the rights of the little ones.

Medieval Monasteries and the Y. M. C. A.

"SO many slurs and never a compliment!" exclaims a correspondent, sending a clipping from the Globe and Commercial Advertiser of New York. In the excerpt transmitted to us the writer speaks of the danger of immorality in the soldier's life and describes it as the "worst thing about war." So, too, it is. But this was meant only as an introduction to a panegyric of the Y. M. C. A., which the writer "padded out" by a timely reference to the immorality of Catholic monasteries. "In the first place," he moralizes, "'It is not good that the man should be alone,' now, any more than it was before Eve arrived in the Garden; and any womanless place of congregation is apt to slump. Even the history of the medieval monasteries is not pretty reading." Why that unhistoric and unscientific innuendo about a subject of which the writer is evidently in complete ignorance, except for such unsavory information as has filtered down to him through poisonous layers of anti-Catholic prejudice? The comparatively few historic instances of laxity are the merest exceptions to the glorious record of those "medieval monasteries" which were the hallowed sanctuaries of purity and holiness as well as the homes of learning and the refuges of all in poverty, need and distress. The counsel of permanent virginity would never have been given by Our Lord had it been impossible, though it was meant for those only who could take it. He Himself gave us the example in His own life. As for the Catholic soldier in the trenches or the camp, God's grace will not be wanting to enable him to preserve his purity inviolate. Sufficient for him are prayer, watchfulness and the Sacraments. There can be no objection against Protestant praise of their own Y. M. C. A., but it should not be accompanied by slurs against the religion and institutions that Catholic soldiers hold more dear than life.

Patriotism's Power

IN his opening address at the Catholic Educational Association's convention last month, Bishop Shahan epitomized Catholic patriotism's motive power:

> Wherever, the world over, our American flag must fly, there will it wave over Catholic soldiers and sailors, nurses and helpers of every kind, loyal and true to all that it stands for, and counting life itself a pleasing sacrifice in the eyes of God, a sacrifice of gratitude for all that we have here inherited through our Catholic ancestry in the way of liberty and happiness, such liberty and happiness as the world hitherto never dreamed of. Now it is this very love of our American fatherland which fills us with concern for the future of its great and holy ideals of political and religious liberty. We are persuaded and all history bears us out, that true patriotism is anchored in religion, and that no other influence known to man can overcome so surely selfishness and indifference to the common welfare. When great crises come upon a nation, and everyone is called quickly and unhesitatingly to take his or her part, to rally round the symbol of the nation, then indeed does religion cast the high light of a divine will on the whole situation. Conscience, enlightened by religion, bids each one realize that he or she stands for all. Our Government then stands to us in the place of God, and in the words of Cardinal Gibbons, "Our legitimate laws are invested with a Divine sanction by an appeal to our consciences."

Love of God and love of country, the lessons of Catholic teaching from the days of St. Paul and before, bear fruit when patriotism is put to the test. Both loves are found by the child at school or they are not found at all.

International Labor Conference

AT Leeds, England, on July 1, delegates representing the trade union federations of England, Italy, Belgium and France, met in conference to draft a series of minimum labor standards to be incorporated in the final peace treaties. The Conference stood for guarantees to be based on the following principles:

> Right to Work: Right of Coalition. Every workman, no matter to which nationality he may belong, ought to have the right to work wherever he can find employment. Every workman, wherever he is employed, should enjoy all the trade union rights which the native workman enjoys, particularly the right to participate in the administration of his union. No workman should be expelled on account of his trade unionist activities. No alien workman should be paid a lower rate of wages than the normal or prevailing rates of wages, or be made to work under worse conditions than those prevailing in the same locality or district for workers of the same trade or the same specialty.
>
> Emigration and Immigration. The migrations of workmen shall be organized and based on national labor exchanges. There should be in every country a special commission on emigration and immigration, consisting of representatives of the Government and of the organizations of employers and workers of the country. The recruiting of workmen in a foreign country should be permitted only if the commissions of the interested countries, whose duty it is to examine into the question as to whether the demand for and the extent of such a recruiting really correspond with the needs of an industry or a district, and whether the labor contracts are in full conformity with the above-mentioned conditions of labor and the rate of wages, have favorably reported. The recruiting emigrants should be under the control of the labor organizations of the country of emigration. The execution of the labor contracts should be under the control of the labor organizations of the country of immigration.

A social insurance clause applies to workmen irrespective of nationalities, and a child-labor clause prohibits the employment of children under fourteen years of age in industrial, commercial or agricultural labor. Boys and girls under eighteen are not to be employed in night work. No working day is to exceed ten hours, and eight hours shall be the working day in mines, factories and unhealthful industries. A weekly rest of a day and a half is made compulsory.

Chilean Nitrate Fields

AN instructive account of Chilean industries is contributed to a recent Bulletin of the Pan-American Union by William A. Reid. While the country's central and southern provinces are described as productive agricultural regions, the dry lands of the north have even a greater industrial value. For the first time in nearly half a century a shower of rain fell upon these barren tracts some few years ago, an event which caused equal astonishment and dismay. Whether at peace or war, the world calls loudly for the product of these desolate wastes, Chile's greatest revenue-producing lands, her nitrate fields. The peculiar Chilean nitrate is no less esteemed for preserving life than destroying it, for the growing of grain than the making of ammunition.

> As one enters the nitrate region from Coquimbo, Antofagasta, Iquique, or by other lines of railway extending inland from the seaports, the most noticeable features are the absolute barrenness, the sun-parched earth, and the vast rocky areas. The rise from the sea is abrupt; but once upon the table-land at about 3,000 feet altitude the pampa stretches north or south for many miles, with the towering Andes forming the eastern wall. Nitrate occurs on this shelf-like area from six to sixty miles from the coast, and it is through this region that the Chilean Longitudinal Railroad has been constructed, with many "nitrate roads" winding downward to the various seaports. Were it not for the dust-raising blasts which the 170 or more nitrate officinas or plants cause to be set off, the atmosphere of the region would probably be clearer than in any part of the world. As one travels horseback across the pampa beyond the railways here and there in the distance great particles of earth and stone are constantly shooting skyward. Drawing closer to one of these plants or to the area where laborers are employed by hundreds or thousands, the traveler notes the brown and parched appearance of everything; indeed, the dust, breezes, and sunshine have bronzed man and beast to a degree bordering on the picturesque. The latter feature is even more pronounced when we meet nitrate officers, brown as berries, clad in khaki, with great sombreros, boots and spurs—outwardly the rough and uncouth man of the desert, but inwardly the educated and cultured gentleman who usually welcomes the stranger from the outside world with open arms, provided he holds proper credentials.

It is estimated that the increase in the world's crops due to the use of Chilean nitrate must be valued at more than $200,000,000 a year. The capital at present invested in these fields is about $150,000,000, and it is thought that there is in Chile a sufficient quantity of nitrate to last the world for 200 years. Despite the devastating war this favored country is said to be enjoying unusual prosperity.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

JULY 21, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Simplicity and Complexity in Religion

J. D. Tibbits

An Air Raid on London

A. Hilliard Atteridge

War's Witness to Christianity

F. A. Fadden

The Y. M. C. A., the K. of C. and the President

Edward F. Garesché

Literature and Twaddle

James J. Walsh

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS for JULY 21, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 15

PAGE

CHRONICLE 363–366

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Simplicity and Complexity in Religion—An Air Raid on London—War's Witness to Christianity—The Y. M. C. A., the K. of C., and the President—Suggestions for Church Music 367–374

COMMUNICATIONS 375–377

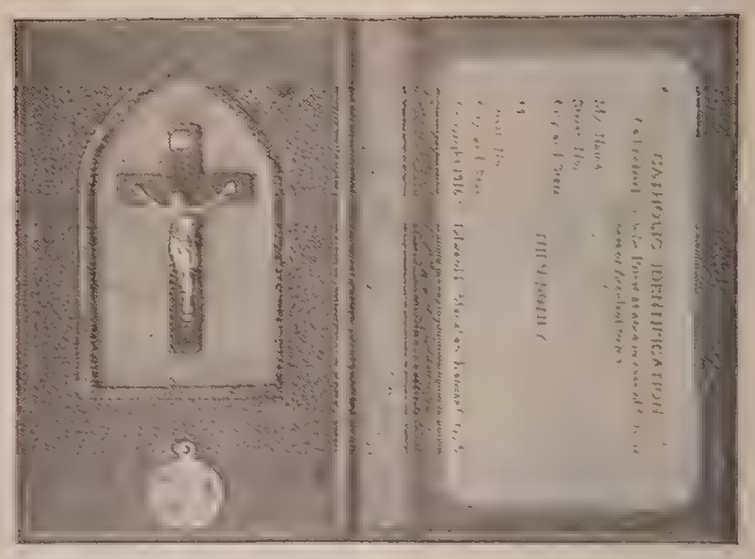
EDITORIALS

"Catholic Disaffection"—An Agnostic Over Night—Justice for Anarchists—Entertaining the Congregation—Praise and a Warning—"Patriotism Not Enough".....378–380

LITERATURE—Literature and Twaddle—Attainment—Reviews—Books and Authors—Books Received 381–383

EDUCATION—In the Village Smithy.....383–385

SOCIOLOGY—Who Is My Neighbor?..... 385



NOTE AND COMMENT..... 386

Who's Who

THE REV. F. A. FADDEN, contributor of "War's Witness to Christianity" to this number of AMERICA, was born in Scranton, Pa., in 1885, educated at St. Thomas College (B. S.), Scranton, Pa., and Holy Cross (B. A.), Worcester, Mass.; studied theology in St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, N. Y., and at the Catholic University (S. T. L.), Washington, D. C., ordained to the priesthood Sept. 23, 1911, curate at St. Elizabeth's, New York City.

Read AMERICA and Keep Up with the Best Current Thought

The Catholic Identification Booklet

PRICE POSTPAID 25 CENTS

For all Catholic men in military or other dangerous walks of life. This is a necessity for all Catholics. It is a safeguard against remaining without spiritual help among strangers, the Catholic Identification card telling them to call nearest Catholic priest. Has a booklet containing instructions how to assist the dying. On the back is a prayer before the Crucifix. It contains a Crucifix and scapular medal and is an unostentatious volume, leather bound like a card case.

This booklet only has episcopal authorization. It has the imprimatur of John Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York, and the endorsement of numerous other clergy. Like all valuable religious articles, it has poor and unauthentic imitations against which we caution the public. To be sure of the right one, see the following on the bottom of the Identification card:

THE W. J. FEELEY COMPANY
10 EAST 50TH STREET, NEW YORK CITY
Manufacturers and Distributors

The Catholic Mind

Issue for July 22, 1917

AMERICAN CATHOLIC HISTORY AND RELIGION
THE AMERICAN ARCHBISHOPS' PROTEST
LUTHER AND LUTHERANISM
THE DANGER OF "MOVIES"

THE value of the study and knowledge of American Catholic History for the exaltation and preservation of the Faith is shown in the paper by Father Tierney, the first, in this issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. The other articles, the protest of the American Hierarchy against the new anti-Catholic Constitution of Mexico; an authoritative list of readings on Luther, and a warning about the dangers of "movies" make up a selection judiciously combining interest and variety.

You cannot afford to be without these useful little pamphlets.

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers)

Send us your Subscription at once.

$1.00 Per Year
Single numbers 5 cents each
For Parish Book Racks $4.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS 59 East 83rd St. New York, N. Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 15
WHOLE No. 432

JULY 21, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—During the week the Germans gained a spectacular but unimportant success in Flanders. They drove back the British near the Belgian coast a third of a mile on a front of two-thirds of a mile, compelling them to retire to the west bank of the Yser River, between Lombaertzyde and St. Georges. It was thought at first that the German attack was the prelude to another effort to reach Calais, but the offensive soon spent itself without having seriously affected the general situation. Nothing else of a grave character has taken place on the western front.

Bulletin, July 9, p.m.-July 16, a.m.

Shifting their offensive in Galicia from the sector north of the Dniester to the territory which lies south of the river, the Russians crossed the Bystritsa and advancing seven miles captured Jesupol and a number of adjacent villages. About the same time they crossed the river further south, seized Ciozov and pushed forward to the Lukovitsa River. Two days later they had driven back the Austrians about fourteen miles along the south bank of the Dniester and taken possession of Halicz. The same movement carried them, further south, across the Lukovitsa and Lukva and brought them to the Lomnica. Here the Austrians attempted to stop their advance, which had now covered some twenty-five miles on a front of twenty-five miles, but finding themselves unable to do so, withdrew to the west bank of the river, where they made a desperate effort to save Kalusz, but failing in their object they abandoned the city.

The Russian Offensive

Meanwhile the Russian offensive had spread south as far as the foothills of the Carpathians, and was now developing on a front of fifty miles. West of Stanislau the Russians took Novica and, further south, Perehinsko, on the Lomnica, west of Bohorodczany. In twelve days the Russians have advanced more than forty miles and have driven a salient deep into the Austrian lines with a rapidity that not only menaces their positions along the Zlota Lipa and the Carpathians but also indicates a serious disorganization of the Austrian armies. In Mesopotamia the Turks have defeated the Russians and occupied Khanikin. This means that the Russians are no longer cooperating closely with the British.

The War Revenue bill, recently reported to the Senate, has been recommitted to the Financial Committee. This step, which was taken on the motion of Senator Simmons, Chairman of the committee, was rendered necessary because the prohibition section of the Administration Food bill automatically removed from the Revenue bill the taxes on distilled liquor by which the Financial Committee proposed raising $400,000,000, and at the same time calls for an additional sum of more than $200,000,000 to be expended in purchasing distilled liquor in bond. The Financial Committee has announced that revision of the Revenue bill will be delayed until final action on the prohibition question has been taken.

The War Revenue Bill

The Administration Food bill is at present in a serious tangle. That portion of the prohibition section, which fixes the price to be paid for the distilled liquors that the President is directed to commandeer, is now generally admitted to be unconstitutional, because it is an assumption on the part of the Legislature of an authority which belongs to the Judiciary alone. On the other hand reconsideration of the measure is impossible under parliamentary law until the bill has been committed to conference, because it was voted under a unanimous-consent agreement.

The Administration Food Bill

There has been manifested in the Senate a growing disinclination to extend Governmental control beyond the provisions contained in the original scope of the bill, and it is now predicted that in its present form the bill will not pass, unless the supervision be restricted to food, feed and fuel. The Senate has agreed to vote on the bill on July 21. It will then probably go to conference for revision.

On July 11 the House passed without the formality of a roll-call the Trading-with-the-Enemy bill which, confers on the President the authority to punish commercial intercourse with Germany or her allies. The purpose of the bill is to reduce to a minimum the commercial benefits which would accrue to Germany from business transacted in the United States. It provides among other things for the use in this country of patents owned by Germans. The proposed espionage features which had been appended to the bill as an amendment and which made it a criminal offense to communicate to any enemy, or ally of any enemy, in an manner, "any letter, document, writing, message, picture, diagram, map or other device or form of communication," were stricken out of the bill before it passed.

Trading-with-the-Enemy Bill

The Administration Aviation bill, which was introduced, on July 6, in the House by Mr. Dent, Chairman of the House Military Committee, and then referred to the committee, was reported favorably on July 14 after hearings had been given to experts on the subject. In order to facilitate its passage, it was planned at first to separate the bill calling for the creation of an air-fleet from the appropriation necessary to organize it, but discussion showed that there was practical unanimity on the matter, and when the bill came up in the House it called for an appropriaion of $640,000,000, more than one-half of which sum provides for the construction of aeroplanes and engines, and the remainder for manning the fleet, for ammunition and supplies. The personnel of the fleet will consist of about 75,000 men. The bill passed without serious opposition or material amendment and almost without debate. Broad powers are conferred on the Army Department to expedite the building and operation of the fleet, which more than any other branch of the service is expected to bring about the defeat of the German armies. Previous to this vast sum just voted $68,000,000 had been appropriated for aviation.

Aviation Bill

In preparation for the carrying out of the selective draft, Secretary Baker announced on July 13 the number of men to be conscripted in the first drawing and the quotas to be furnished by each State. His order follows:

The Selective Draft

By virtue of the authority vested in him by an act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the military establishment of the United States," approved May 13, 1917, the President of the United States has ordered the aggregate number of 687,000 men to be raised by draft for the military service of the United States in order to bring to full strength the organizations of the regular army and the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the military service of the United States, and to create the national army, and has caused said aggregate number to be apportioned to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia as set forth in the schedule hereto appended.

The quotas assigned by the President for the several States are: Alabama, 13,612; Arizona, 3,472; Arkansas, 10,267; California, 23,060; Colorado, 4,753; Connecticut, 10,977; Delaware, 1,202; District of Columbia, 929; Florida, 6,325; Georgia, 18,337; Idaho, 2,287; Illinois, 51,653; Indiana, 17,510; Iowa, 12,749; Kansas, 6,439; Kentucky, 14,236; Louisiana, 13,582; Maine, 1,821; Maryland, 7,096; Massachusetts, 20,586; Michigan, 30,291; Minnesota, 17,854; Mississippi, 10,801; Missouri, 18,660; Montana, 7,872; Nebraska, 8,185; Nevada, 1,051; New Hampshire, 1,204; New Jersey, 20,665; New Mexico, 2,292; New York, 69,241; North Carolina, 15,974; North Dakota, 5,606; Ohio, 38,773; Oklahoma, 15,564; Oregon, 717; Pennsylvania, 60,859; Rhode Island, 1,801; South Carolina, 10,081; South Dakota, 2,717; Tennessee, 14,528; Texas, 30,545; Utah, 2,370; Vermont, 1,049; Virginia, 13,795; Washington, 7,296; West Virginia, 9,101; Wisconsin, 12,876; Wyoming, 810; Alaska, 696; Hawaii, none; Porto Rico, 12,833.

In the foregoing computation each State was given credit for the number of men it has in the National Guard and also for all those who have volunteered for the Regular Army since April 1. The Governors of the several States have been instructed to assign to each district within their State its just apportionment of the State quota. Local exemption boards to the number of 559 have been appointed by the Governors to draw up lists of those registered on June 5 in the various registration districts within their exemption district, and to assign to each name a number. The numbers on the several lists that correspond to the numbers drawn at Washington will determine the men selected for military service.

That the Government is leaving no stone unturned in its efforts to safeguard the effective prosecution of the war is being made increasingly evident with each new measure adopted at Washington. One of the chief concerns of the Administration at present is to conceal the movements of American shipping. To secure this the President by a proclamation dated July 14, has prohibited German insurance companies, engaged in the transaction of business in the United States, from continuing the business of marine and war risk insurance either as direct insurers or as reinsurers. All individuals, firms and insurance companies in the United States are likewise forbidden to insure or reinsure against marine and war risks with such companies. The reason given by the President for his action is that:

German Insurance Companies

The nature of marine and war risk insurance is such that those conducting it must of necessity be in touch with the movement of ships and cargoes, and it has been considered by the Government of great importance that this information should not be obtained by alien enemies.

Payment on existing contracts is to be suspended during the war except in the case of vessels now at sea.

Out of the maze of conflicting reports which have obscured the situation in Germany during the past week two events of importance may be stated with certainty. The German Emperor has issued the following imperial decree:

The German Crisis

Upon the report of my State Ministry, made to me in obedience to my decree of April 7 of the current year, I herewith decide to order a supplement to the same, that the draft of the bill dealing with the alteration of the electoral law for the House of Deputies, which is to be submitted to the Diet of the monarchy for decision, is to be drawn up on the basis of equal franchise.

The bill is to be submitted in any case early enough that the next elections may take place according to the new franchise. I charge you to make all necessary arrangements for this purpose.

(Signed) WILLIAM.
(Countersigned) BETHMANN-HOLLWEG.

In spite of its vagueness, this decree, which bears the date of July 13, promises a measure of the electoral reform which has been so insistently demanded for some months and is a step forward toward the democratization of the Empire.

As the decree, which bore the signature of Count von Bethmann-Hollweg, was a marked concession to popular demands, and as it had been repeatedly asserted that the Imperial Chancellor had the full confidence of the Kaiser, the announcement, made officially on the following day, of the resignation of the Chancellor, after eight years of uninterrupted tenure of office, came as a considerable surprise. The meeting of the German Crown Council, the first that has taken place during the war, pointed to events of a serious character; it was also generally known that the Crown Prince was out of sympathy with the Chancellor and opposed to the demanded reforms. Nevertheless, notwithstanding rumors, it was not expected that the resignation of the Chancellor would be accepted. The unexpected has actually happened, and not only has Von Bethmann-Hollweg retired but his successor, Dr. Georg Michaelis, since 1909 Under Secretary of State in the Department of Finance and since 1916 Prussian Food Controller, has been appointed in his place. The Prussian Minister of War, General von Stein, has also resigned. Count Brockdorff Rantzau has succeeded Dr. Zimmermann as Imperial Foreign Secretary. The appointment of the new Chancellor is significant, because he is a man of the people, being the first "vonless" minister to occupy the post since the German Empire was proclaimed at Versailles by William I; he is also known to hold decidedly liberal views, and as a consequence it is believed that he would not have accepted the Chancellorship unless he had received from the Kaiser pledges of his willingness to accept parliamentary reforms of a marked democratic character. No change in the Government's attitude toward the war is anticipated.

China.—General Chang Hsun's attempt to restore the Manchu dynasty has ended in failure. On July 10 he was reported to have withdrawn his troops into the Imperial City and the Temple of Heaven, the most sacred sections of Peking. This accomplished, he began to negotiate for guarantees of his personal safety. Sixty thousand Republican troops with seventy heavy guns were said to be surrounding the capital, making hopeless the dictator's escape. In response to the foreign diplomats' request that he should disarm his soldiers, General Chang declared that they feared a massacre if they laid down their arms. According to despatches that came July 12, 3,000 Monarchist troops had surrendered, fighting was going in in the forbidden city and a big fire was raging there. On July 13 it was reported that quiet had been restored in the capital after a complete Republican victory over General Chang's army. He was said to have taken refuge in the Danish legation and to have declared his intention of fighting the Republicans to the end. Several of the Emperor's ministers and generals were arrested.

Monarchist Movement's Collapse

The Republican Government at Nanking announced the confirmation of General Feng Kou-Chang as President and Tuan Chi-Jui as Premier, according to the Constitution. It was decided to banish from Peking the Emperor and the Monarchist princes. It is hoped that the Republican movement against General Chang will unite the hitherto discordant elements in the party and give China a stable government. The question now at issue seems to be whether the military or the progressive factions are to control the country. The military governors who rule their provinces almost like dictators secured the dissolution of Parliament, but the southern Republicans will hardly allow them to hold their preponderating influence. If a compromise is successful, a new parliament may be called and another constitution may be drawn up.

News came on July 15 that Peking was occupied by the Republican forces after the surrender at Fung Tai, on July 12, of a Monarchist army of 10,000 men. General Chang Hsun's retreat in the Temple of Heaven was bombarded, his soldiers offering a desperate resistance. The dictator then made good his escape. Order has been restored in the capital, and the Republican headquarters are to be established there. On July 14 the State Department at Washington received the following communication from China's new Provisional President:

> Whereas, President Li Yuan-Hung is unable, for cause, to perform the duties of his office: Now, therefore, I Feng Kuo-chang, do hereby proclaim to all whom it may concern that in pursuance of Article V., Section 2, of the Presidential Election law, I have, on this day of the seventh month, July 6, 1917, respectfully taken up the duties of the office of the President of the Republic.

On July 16 the situation in Peking was reported to be "entirely quiet."

Ireland.—The Irish Weekly Independent notes that in the last two years there has been an immense decrease in the number of Irish emigrants. In 1895 48,703 men, women and children left Ireland for foreign shores; in 1915 there were but 10,659 emigrants; in 1916, 7,302.

Emigration

The total for the first five months of last year was 2,146, made up of 845 males and 1,301 females. The total for the first five months of this year was 1,265, made up of 525 males and 740 females.

This means a net decrease of 1,265 emigrants this year compared with the corresponding period of last year. There is a decrease in the number from each province as follows: Leinster, 136; Munster, 165; Ulster, 633, and Connaught, 331. It is further interesting to note that considerably fewer emigrants left Irish ports this year for England, Scotland, and Wales. Comparing the figures for the first five months of this year with the corresponding period of last year, we note a fall from 1,294 to 749, a decrease of 545.

This would be hopeful news, were it not for the fact that the war is now working more injury to Ireland than emigration did in the past.

The East Clare Election

The election to Parliament of a Sinn Feiner, Edward de Valera, a leader in the Easter insurrection and very recently a prisoner in an English jail, has caused a commotion both in Ireland and in England. De Valera stood for East Clare, vacated by the death of Major Redmond, and was elected by nearly 3,000 majority over the Nationalist candidate, Patrick Lynch, sometime Crown Prosecutor. The victory of Sinn Fein is all the more significant, because, a short time ago, East Clare was a Nationalist stronghold. Added significance is had in the fact that De Valera, who was born in New York of an Irish mother and a Spanish father, adopted the program of Easter week, 1916, as his platform and invited the electors to vote for an Irish republic of sovereign and absolute independence. According to Unionist and Liberal papers this election will probably wreck the Nationalist party and will nullify the work of the Convention. In their opinion Ireland has spoken, through East Clare, for absolute freedom, in repudiation of Mr. Redmond's program. A Dublin dispatch says:

> It is believed here that the result of the East Clare election will interfere with the arrangement for the assembling of the Irish Convention, as it is considered to represent a feeling of lack of confidence in the good faith of the Coalition Government and a belief that the Irish party went too far in its consideration of the Government's war difficulties and received no adequate recognition of the party's reasonable attitude.

The Dublin correspondent of the Times declares that the Government must deal with a new and powerful party, for "It is probable that no Nationalist seat in the House is now safe outside Dublin, and perhaps not even there." The Daily Chronicle, forgetful that England is also participating in American gold, asserts that Sinn Fein is moving to success by means of American money. The Daily Telegraph remarks that the Irish members of Parliament, of every shade of political opinion, agree that the East Clare election has both discredited the Nationalist party and made clear to all that the only way to settle the Irish trouble is to establish an Irish republic. The London Times comments as follows:

> The program of the successful party is quite frankly revolutionary, anti-English and separatist. There is not and never can be the slightest question either among Englishmen or among serious Irishmen of accepting the wild program with which the new member and his friends have won their seats in Parliament.
>
> There is all the more reason therefore why the best elements in Ireland should go forward and review the situation together with a determination to agree. If they should fail the responsibility for good government will remain where it is today. To refuse the effort at this day would be the counsel of sheer despair.

The Daily Independent of Dublin thinks "Five out of every six electors who supported the victor did so out of sheer disgust for the cringing, crawling policy of the Irish party and the blundering tactics of their leaders." According to the pro-British Irish Times,

> The Sinn Fein policy, so far, has developed on destruction and bitterness pregnant with menace to the peace of Ireland, yet this policy triumphed over the memory of a devoted soldier and swept the Nationalists out of a seat held without opposition for twenty years.

The Express is of the opinion that the election is the most portentous thing in modern Irish political history, and believes that the "Nationalists can do little at the Convention but record their pious opinions."

Russia.—On July 12 the Finnish Diet passed the second reading of a bill which virtually establishes the country's independence. It was planned to put the measure into force "by simple declaration," that is to say, without Russia's sanction. The act would be a formal denial of Russia's sovereign rights over Finland. The new law, which the Socialists are chiefly responsible for, proclaims that Russia has lost all authority in Finland, except in the army, the navy and in the field of diplomacy. All other privileges of the Grand Dukes of Finland are now claimed for the Finnish Diet, which assumes the right to execute the law, to convoke and prorogue the legislature, and to appoint a supreme executive. The Governor-General is practically superseded. M. Tokoi, Vice-President of the Department of Economics of the Finnish Diet, declared that the projected Finnish war-loan might be raised if a guarantee were given that it would not be used to further imperialistic designs but only to meet the expenses arising from the revolution and from the support of the Russian garrison. He also declared:

Finland's Independence

> We make no claims in the domain of foreign policy or of war, and we do not desire any change in our relations with Russia until the end of the war, but we must immediately receive internal autonomy, which should be guaranteed internationally after the war.

Finland's move has caused considerable disquiet in Petrograd. C. Tcheipse, President of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, went to Helsingfors, the capital of Finland, in the hope of settling the differences with Russia, and Premier Lvoff summoned home the Cabinet Ministers who were with the army. The Premier's Socialist colleagues say that in principle they sympathize with Finland's move, but M. Lvoff and the other Ministers maintain that Finland must defer action till the Constituent Assembly meets. The Ukraine, a district composed of several large provinces in southern Russia, is also reported to be working out statutes for autonomy without waiting for the meeting of the Constituent Assembly. The Ukrainian National Assembly explains, however, that it does not desire separation of the district from Russia, and in Petrograd a compromise was hoped for which would also satisfy Finnish demands, thus avoiding severing the country from Russia.

Simplicity and Complexity in Religion

J. D. TIBBITS

IT has been frequently alleged as an argument against Catholic theology that by it the approach to religion is made by far too difficult and too technical. Those who make this allegation are never tired of drawing a vivid contrast between what they conceive to be the extreme simplicity of the Gospel story and the highly developed system which characterizes the Church. As illustrating this disparity they urge that St. Paul with all his depth and skill in dialectic would have found the "Summa" of St. Thomas quite beyond him, while St. Peter would not only have been incapable of producing the Encyclical "Pascendi," but would have been equally incapable of understanding it.

It is admitted, of course, that what these critics are pleased to call "scholastic Protestantism," fell into the same error. The Thirty-nine Articles, though there is an element about them not wholly unchildish, were certainly not addressed to children. The more logical Westminster Confession was yet far beyond the man in the street. And though the Oxford movement made so strong an appeal to primitive sources, it must needs make its prospective converts, to some extent at least, theologians, historians, antiquarians, mystics and esthetes, before it can conduct them, with anything approaching adequacy, to the threshold of the Faith.

It is true that the New Theology has addressed itself to the problem of reducing Christianity to its lowest terms. It has succeeded only in reducing it to its lowest depths. It began by annihilating dogma, because dogma demanded explanation. It has ended by annihilating reason, because reason demanded dogma. So learned a man as the late Dr. James D. Martineau expended much labor and erudition in the attempt to show that early Christianity was a very simple affair. It is, however, by no means a simple affair to read Dr. Martineau's books, and there is always the feeling that the approach to so simple a thing, as he conceives it, should be just a little less complicated than he has apparently been able to make it.

Writers of this class, who aspire to become the efficiency experts of theology, appear to be quite forgetful of one important fact, and that is that the simplest and most evident propositions become complicated the moment they are made the objects of speculation. Thus, such fundamental truths as the existence of the material universe or the freedom of the will, are sometimes doubted or even denied by thinkers of certain schools. But they are doubted or denied as objects of speculation only. No one doubts them in real life. The determinist is as quick to appeal to the courts, and to employ the best counsel as other men. The idealist, despite his idealism, raises his umbrella when it rains. There is a manifest inconsistency between thought and action. Yet those men are the very first to ridicule scholastic philosophy because of its complication. That it is complex is obvious enough, but it is equally obvious that not only can I perform no rational act, but that it is impossible for me to engage in the simplest business transaction without assuming the fundamental truths upon which scholastic philosophy rests. I may, however, be very successful in business, and at the same time a very poor philosopher. It is not at all necessary that I should be both, any more than it is necessary that I be a theologian in order to be a Christian. But to reject the notion of substances and causes because a whole literature has arisen to explain them, is as absurd as to reject grace and the Sacraments because they cannot be reduced to a formula.

It has been pointed out that Mr. Sunday's scheme of religion, though quite at variance with that of the new theologians, is, in this respect far more successful; and that by him the intellectual process is at a very minimum. This may, in a way, be true, but it is to be remembered that those who surrender themselves to Mr. Sunday's eloquence, are carried over all possible stumbling-blocks on a wave of emotion; and emotion, whatever else it may be, is not speculative. And even when Mr. Sunday is drawn into conflict with opinions radically different from his own, his method seems to be to meet them with ridicule and with indignation. He hurls invectives at the higher critics and scorn at the evolutionists. To sit in judgment upon him is far from my thought; but it is of interest to note how impossible it is for him to isolate his faith from opinions which do have bearings upon it. It may please him better to dismiss them with a phrase of slang than with a scientific treatise; but his very method is proof of the problem which presses upon him, and proof, too, that his faith is not quite so simple as he would have it seem.

The truth is, that to reduce religion to a formula is to empty it of its content; and to empty it of its content is to destroy its vitality. A very great part of the value of religion lies in its power to affect individuals. To crystalize it into an abstract sentence such as, "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," or "the life for others," is simply to limit its application to the taste. And although with some it might become an impelling power, it is perfectly evident that with none could it ever become a constraining power. It might make good men better. It has no means at its disposal for making bad men good.

But is it true that the complexity of the Catholic system is a stumbling-block to those who are within her pale as well as to those who are at her threshold? Paradoxical as it may sound, the fact appears to be that it is because of this very complexity that she is possessed of a simplicity and directness which is found in no other religion. A striking illustration of this occurred many years ago in my own experience. A moral question presented itself to me in the course of a legal transaction. I was forced to act in one of two ways, and whichever way I might choose seemed to work injustice to some one. I naturally consulted a priest as to what my duty was. I received not only a direct reply, but the most conclusive reasons for it, all of which was so very convincing as to make me wonder that it had not already occurred to me. From mere curiosity I propounded the same problems to a number of Protestant theological students, and to at least one Protestant minister. In nearly every instance the answer was wrong, and in every instance the reasoning. The contrast impressed me not a little. Here was the Catholic Church with her complicated system of dogma, reducing a concrete problem to the utmost simplicity, and there, on the other hand, were the disciples of theological simplicity rendering the same problem more complicated than the whole Catholic system itself. And as with morals, so with all religious truth. To attempt to sum it up in however concise a sentence is to make its concrete application impossible; and as, after all, men are to be saved in the concrete, it is the concrete that counts.

Whatever, then, this school of theology may gain by its sweeping economy of intellectual effort, is more than offset by its wholesale sacrifice of the definite and the tangible. Its value lies chiefly in its unwitting demonstration that the advantage of knowing one's own mind is as true of religions as of individuals; and in its striking illustration of the fact that ambiguity is not necessarily synonymous with efficiency.

An Air Raid on London

A. Hilliard Atteridge

I DO not know what account of the noon-day air raid on London, on June 13, has appeared in the American press. Judging from reports I have seen of the earlier Zeppelin raids, in American newspapers, I imagine that the natural desire of the newspaper man to write "a good story" has led to extravagant accounts of damage done. I visited some of the districts that had been attacked, immediately after the raid, and while the ambulances were still removing the wounded. These attacks, whether by night or day, have sufficiently horrible results. But it is easy to exaggerate them. Considering that London with its suburbs covers an area of at least 150 square miles, with some open spaces, but is mostly a closely-built and densely-inhabited mass of great towns that have grown together into a huge capital, the marvel is that the damage was relatively so small. A few fires were started which were immediately extinguished. A few buildings were damaged, most of them slightly; a good deal of glass was broken in the immediate neighborhood of the explosions. Out of a population of 6,000,000, there were about 100 deaths, that is about one in 60,000. In no case was any damage done to factories or warehouses, or to any establishment that could be described as having a military character. So far as material results go, the raid was a futile performance. The aeroplanes engaged and the explosives they used represent valuable war material which might have been employed with some effect on the fighting fronts, but were in this case used to damage a school and a few shops, and kill and wound a number of civilians.

The only imaginable way in which the attack could be considered to have any bearing on the war would be as an effort to produce what is described as "moral effect." Besieged towns are sometimes bombarded in order to terrify the inhabitants into forcing the military commandant to surrender. But such bombardments are a continuous shelling, day and night, of people crowded together into a small space. Even so, they are generally ineffective, and no besieger ever yet expected to force a surrender by throwing a few shells into a place in a bombardment lasting for about ten minutes. This is what the air raid amounted to. As to its effect on the Londoners, there was certainly no panic, and after it was over, the general feeling was simply one of mere irritation against the enemy. In the days before compulsory service was introduced, every Zeppelin raid on London was followed by a rush to the recruiting offices. Instead of making people more anxious for peace, such outrages are powerful stimulants to the war-spirit. There is evidence of this in the talk, sometimes very wild talk, about reprisals of the same kind against German cities. So far our Government has resisted this outcry, and wisely perseveres in the policy of using our splendid air corps for serious military operations on the fighting front.

Aerial bombardment is one of the ugly novelties of war rendered possible by the development of aircraft in the last ten years. Long before this development took place, attempts had been made to use the old drifting balloons for the purpose. Thus as early as 1849 the Austrians used drifting balloons to bombard Venice during the insurrection of that year. They gave up the practice when they found the balloon had an awkward trick of drifting back sometimes and dropping its bombs on their own lines. But even under modern conditions, effective aerial bombardment is an extremely difficult operation, so difficult that the game is hardly worth the candle. In the second year of the war it seemed for a while that the Zeppelin might be effectively used in this way at night. It flew high enough to be fairly safe from anti-aircraft guns, and it could carry a considerable load of high explosives. It had the further advantage that, with stopped engines, it could drift slowly over the place attacked. At first it was supposed that in the darkness it was fairly safe from aeroplane attack, and that the division of the balloon into a number of separate compartments secured it against being brought down by machine-gun fire, even if an aeroplane attacked it. But the Zeppelin ceased to be a serious means of attack and Zeppelin after Zeppelin was brought down in a mass of flames. The Zeppelin has still its uses for scouting purposes, but in a bombarding raid it is a greater danger to its own crew than to the place it tries to attack. This is a solid gain, not only for the Allies in the war, but for the world generally. It makes these horrible night attacks all but obsolete, and one may safely predict that they will play no part in the war of the future.

But what about attacks by aeroplanes in the daylight? Here again, the difficulties of the attack have increased enormously since the war began. Anti-aircraft guns and gunnery have been so improved that the aeroplane must fly at a great height. In the days before the war at flying exhibitions there were bomb-dropping competitions. A target was marked out on the ground and the airmen dropped dummy bombs upon it. They made very fair practice, but they flew at a height of only 500 or 600 feet. To fly at this height in war would be to court destruction. The improvement in anti-aircraft guns has forced the airmen to fly higher and higher. In the attack on London the German aeroplanes were at least two miles above the city, perhaps higher. Their engines could be heard, but they looked like mere specks in the sky. They kept at this height, not only to avoid gun-fire but also to diminish the chance of attack by British aeroplanes. An airman takes some time to climb to the height of two miles in the air, and this would give the enemy a better chance of getting away without having to fight. But flying at two miles height means that the aeroplane can carry only a reduced quantity of bombs, and anything like aiming is out of the question. The bombs are dropped with a remote chance of hitting something it is worth while to destroy. The probability is that the bomb will imperil only civilian life and property. From a moral point of view, this is one of the reasons why such attacks should be ruled out of the permissible weapons of honorable warfare. In a bombardment by the ordinary methods of naval and land warfare it is quite legitimate to take the risk of accidentally killing a few civilians, while destroying an enemy's batteries, arsenals, etc., or shelling his troops. But no honorable soldier or sailor would order fire to be opened where the chance of doing effective military damage was remote, and there was a practical certainty that numbers of civilians would lose their lives. But this latter is the condition of aeroplane bombardment from a great height. It is for the honor of the British Air Corps that in their raids on German arsenals, depots, etc., and railway junctions behind the front, they always take the risk of flying low, for the purpose of confining the attack to its military object and avoiding as far as possible damage to the civil population. This may mean the loss of some of our aircraft, but the risk is chivalrously taken by our airmen.

But to do this over a well-defined center of population with anti-aircraft guns mounted and aeroplanes ready to ascend, would mean the certain destruction of the attacking force. So, in a raid on a great city, the airmen must fly at such a height that the chance of a useful result from a military point of view is a small one, and the operation is costly, even if no aeroplanes are destroyed by the defense. Costly explosives are largely wasted without result, and the aircraft themselves are injured by the prolonged flight at a high altitude. The life of an aeroplane is about three months under ordinary conditions; after that, it has to be scrapped, or reconstructed. To sum up, the conditions are such that material damage in a military point of view depends on a mere chance, and the so-called moral effect of producing panic and the desire for a patched-up peace is not produced, but, on the contrary, air raids seem to produce the opposite effect, and at the same time it must be noted that such raids mean the withdrawal of airmen and aircraft from the fighting zone where they have a real possibility of seriously affecting the course of the operations.

These considerations suggest the prospect that air raids directed against great centers of population outside the actual fighting zone, may be, sooner or later, recognized as things to be relegated to the class of the obsolete barbarities of war. The argument that they are, from the military point of view, bad policy is likely to prove more effective in this direction than humanitarian considerations. At the Hague Conference of 1899, when aerial navigation was still little more than a dream, it was agreed that the dropping of bombs from balloons should be vetoed for a term of years to come. At the second Conference, in 1907, when the dirigible balloons and the aeroplane had been invented, an attempt was made to renew the prohibition. All that was agreed was that "the bombardment by any means whatever" of undefended towns, villages, etc., should be forbidden. But this was accepted only by about half the Powers represented, amongst them, the United States, Great Britain and Austria. But France, Russia, Germany and Italy did not sign the agreement, and the very words of the Convention made it ineffective, in case of a war in which a non-signatory Power was engaged. And at the same time, the word "undefended" was given such a restricted sense as to make the agreement almost useless. Thus it was laid down that the mere existence in a town of factories and stores that could be used for the service of an army or navy, brought it into the class of "defended" places, and laid it open to bombardment. It is clear that even if the Hague Conventions were strictly observed, they would afford little protection against this new horror of war.

The best hope for its abolition lies in its being so very difficult to carry out a really effective aerial bombardment. It is a gain to the world that during the war the powers of defense against it have so rapidly increased as already to have made night bombardments all but impossible, and severely to handicap aeroplane attacks by day. Once it is recognized that such attacks are more costly to the attacking force than dangerous to the place attacked, there will be a prospect of a Convention for their abolition being not only signed by the Powers, but also observed in the wars of the future.

War's Witness to Christianity

F. A. Fadden

THE world presents an unusual and inspiring spectacle as a result of war; on all sides there is a widespread, spontaneous readiness to sacrifice. Calamity which ever discloses unsuspected possibilities has opened the treasures of the world, not treasures of gold, these are mere coincidents, but treasures of manhood and character. The world-war has given us a glimpse into the souls of men, and what we have seen there reassures us that men at their best recognize the existence of things greater than the world, that when the climax comes they are ready to accept the world only for what it is, a stepping-stone to higher things.

It is not always that we find the majority of men at their best. The normal condition which confronts us is different. Life's by-paths frequently lead men far afield from eternal truths and from the essentials of manhood. When sacrifice results from absolutely free choice, sacrifice is often discarded. Hence religion frequently pleads in vain. Religion is antagonistic to low interests. Men do not want it, not because they do not recognize its worth, but because they are not willing to pay the price it exacts, self-sacrifice. But men as a class, just as each man individually, eventually come face to face with dreadful reality. When they do, they usually meet the crisis with calmness and dignity. Big issues make big men, or rather prove that men are always more than they appear, great creatures, God's creatures, superior to time or materiality. The eternal spark flares up on the threshold of eternity. Inevitably, impending death finds most men resigned to die. This is the ultimate triumph of the soul. It is the victory of eternity. It is an open and practical and undeniable confession that men belong to another world and that they are willing when the time comes to go where they belong.

When the time comes! Living under a sudden and unexpected strain, our generation has been thrown unmistakably against the inevitable climax of time, the impending possibility of relinquishing all that it has for something which it apprehends as dearer than itself. We are facing demands upon our resources, our very lives perhaps, demands the full meaning of which we do not completely understand because we have never experienced them before. This dreadful business of war, the unbending sacrifices it entails, the prospect of bloodshed and death, these things are all so new and so terrible than we can scarcely realize that they are here. Our common life hitherto has been so even and sustained, its pleasures and pains so usual and expected from time to time, that the prospect of a disaster like a world-conflict staggers us. We have read of such things in history, but after all we have been as men delightfully apart from history. We have heard of bravery and chivalry in years gone by, we have thrilled over distant battles and saddened at the picture of devastated battlefields. In the world's long story we have seen nations crumble and their successors arise, we have seen civilizations flourish and decay, we have seen many die that many might live, but it has all been like wonderland to us. Our day has been a ceaseless blossoming of tranquillity. We are like rich children to whom successful parents have left an inheritance of ease, and, as children, we have playfully hoped to pass through life and never feel the touch of those great issues which have stirred men's hearts in the past and which will stir them over and over again until the end of time. We have wondered what life would bring as we progressed, and in a flash we have found ourselves face to face with the sternest reality of life, the prospect of losing it and losing it while we are still apparently secure in the strength and vigor of manhood. How could we have hoped to escape this? How could we have hoped to slip through life and never feel the pressure of that law of sacrifice which superintends the development of all life? The day of universal peace has not dawned. There can be no universal peace here in the sense in which men childishly crave it. Nature heals quickly, it is true, but this is the process of the education of nature. There is virtue in a scar. Why, it is only a few years since our Civil War, and men now so foolishly refer war to the Middle Ages. There will be war while man is what he is, a creature to be tried, to be educated, to be developed, a creature whose mission it is to pass through the ashes of life and time to the bosom of God in eternity.

So we are quickly making up our minds. Manhood is stronger still than all the material charms which make life so attractive. This generation no longer looks upon itself as a child. It is now a man and the eternal problem of manhood is vividly before it. Varied and conflicting emotions crowd our souls as we take up this task of proving our manhood. The true meaning of life on earth, with its joys and sorrows, is beginning to dawn upon us. The Way of the Cross shines with a new and fruitful light now, as we recognize in our own hearts a conscious intuition of the sublime mystery behind it. We are learning to think, we are learning to love, we are learning to sacrifice. Christ is right, the Martyrs are right, the Church is right. There is but one way to live and men at their best openly confess it. "He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world, keepeth it unto life eternal."

With the increasing realization in men's minds today of the necessity of adhering strictly to Christian principles it is incredible that some should blame the horrors of war on the presumed failure of those very principles. In certain quarters it is loudly proclaimed that Christianity has not stood the test and war is advanced to prove it. Once again Christ is brought to judgment, the verdict has been rendered and the dirge is about to be chanted. Christianity has failed and the predominating laws of our life and civilization must be readjusted. When the bloodshed is over and men, weary of carnage, settle down again to the more profitable and more human occupation of living, the change will be effected. So goes the unending argument of every age.

Whatever of falsehood and sham the wayward impulses of men may have led them at various times to accept, it is certain that today, when they are at their best, no open fallacy can flourish amongst them. Their actions now constitute the test of Christianity's failure or success. There are some in the world who will not believe the judgment of God; if not, let them believe the judgment of men, of the majority of men. God told us years ago what was best for the world and today men of their free choice are telling us exactly the same thing. God instituted Christianity to superintend the growth and development of human nature. Even unto eternal happiness He knew the needs of man, his possibilities, his end. He knew better than man that he thrives best who seeks the least to gratify himself. Growth bespeaks cultivation, attention, application, stern discipline over self. Where men allow their selfish interests to predominate, where pleasure and personal profit overrule the law, there is no real advancement, there is only decay. Christianity with its insistence on sacrifice, its training in sacrifice, the relinquishing of everything, if need be, for the sake of Christ, brings out the best that is in men. That is why the best that is in men testifies in turn to the undying truths of Christianity. Human nature itself cries out in witness to the wisdom of God who created it and knows it better than it knows itself. It may seem almost irreverent to say that the judgment of men can confirm the judgment of God, yet that is the situation at this moment. The truth of Christianity is exemplified on all sides by men of every creed, of varied education, of countless walks of life. In the presence of the great crisis men recognize the process, the only process, through which the world can improve. The State is preaching the necessity of sacrifice, the Red Cross is preaching the necessity of sacrifice, everywhere we hear the same encouraging cry. There is a reason for man relinquishing his oxen, his farm, his wife, if need be, for the sake of a great cause. The grain of wheat must die to bring forth fruit.

If Christianity has failed, what then can supplant it? God knew what He was doing when He instituted it. Men today prove by their actions in the presence of the emergencies of war that God knew what He was doing when He instituted it. Whether we appeal to God or to man we are confronted with the same fact, true manhood is attained only through self-sacrifice. To the task of living and dying in this Christian faith, then, let men devote, with renewed confidence, all their energies. There are worse things than war. No one ever reached Paradise through peace with dishonor.

The Y. M. C. A., the K. of C. and the President

EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

IN our last article we alluded to the report that the President had extended to the Knights of Columbus the same official approval as an agency for work among the soldiers as he had formerly given to the Young Men's Christian Association. This is entirely in accord with the best traditions of the nation, and it serves to strengthen the contention that the Government of the United States has the right and, to some extent, the responsibility to pay for service wherever it finds it, irrespective of the fact that the organization or individual who offers the service is consecrated to this or that religious denomination. It may be profitable at this juncture to say a word more on this question, made timely by the approval of religious societies for service in war-time. Some of our religious institutions are giving valuable help both to the State and national Governments in so many ways, and it is such a burden on our people to support at once public institutions by taxes and religious institutions by voluntary contributions, that if the States and the nation ought to pay for the service of the religious institutions, it were well to bring out the principle as clearly as possible. Besides, Government assistance would make for the greater efficiency of the religious institutions themselves, and thus directly benefit the commonwealth.

Two distinctions should be clear from the beginning. First we mean merely to establish the principle, not to urge in all cases its practical application. It must rest with the Hierarchy and with the superiors of religious establishments to decide whether in this or that case application should be made for aid from the Government. Secondly, in the brief space of this article, we do not mean to treat of existing legislation or of constitutional provisions in the various States themselves. We shall attempt to indicate only the spirit of our national Constitution and the attitude of our commonwealth. Local legislation and the Constitution of individual States may be changed, and they should be changed wherever they are not in accord with the general principles of our Government.

We have quoted, in a previous article, the provision of the Constitution concerning freedom of religious worship: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This provision, it will be observed, is prohibitory, and designed to protect the interests of religion by ensuring its free exercise according to each man's conscience. In the case of Reynolds vs. U. S. (98 U. S., pp. 162-164), Mr. Chief Justice Waite gives an interesting sketch of the historical development of this principle, in which he shows that before the adoption of the Constitution efforts were made in some of the colonies and States to legislate "not only in respect to the establishment of religion, but in respect to its doctrines and precepts as well. The people were taxed against their will for the support of religion and sometimes for the support of particular sects to whose tenets they could not and did not subscribe." It was for the protection of the people against such efforts, and to ensure freedom of worship that the Constitutional Amendment above quoted was inserted, and by it, in the words of Mr. Jefferson, "Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion." But the attitude of the Government as fixed in this provision and in the decisions of the courts interpreting it, is to be one not of neglect, still less of hostility toward religion. It may rather be described as an attitude of benevolent impartiality. "All religions are tolerated" says Judge Caldwell, in the case of Swann vs. Swann (21 Fed. 299) quoting from other decisions, "and none is established. Each has an equal right to the protection of the law, whether Christians, Jews or infidels. . . . The State protects all religions but espouses none."

It is further clear from the decisions, that it is the spirit of our commonwealth to favor and help religion in general, while maintaining a strict impartiality among the various forms. While the law does not enforce religious duties and obligations as such," the Judge continues in the decision above cited, "it has a tender regard for the conscience and convenience of every citizen in all matters relating to his religious faith and practice." "The State protects all religions." Not an attitude of severe and studied indifference, but a careful and friendly impartiality is indicated in these decisions as the proper attitude of our Government toward religious organizations. To favor religion wherever it is possible without violating the strict impartiality enjoined on the Government by the Constitution, is moreover the part of reason and of common sense. Our nation is not an irreligious nation. In the public documents, in the prayers which open every session of Congress, in the appointing of chaplains both in the army and navy, in the motto on our very coins "In God We Trust," in the language used in the proclamations of our Chief Executive, and in the dealings of our Government in general, the disposition has always been plain to favor and protect religious practice. It is the spirit of the American Constitution and of our commonwealth to favor whatever promotes the worship of God, but in such a way as to show no partiality for one religion over the other. No one who studies the official documents of the nation and the decisions of the courts can reasonably judge otherwise.

It is therefore the true spirit of the American Government to pay for services received by it from religious organizations, wherever such service is of a character for which the Government is in general authorized to pay. Moreover the beneficent disposition of our country toward religion would rather incline it to show especial favor to religious organizations, not as to distinct denominations, but as to an influence which makes mightily for good citizenship and sound morals. It is timely to emphasize this principle, so strongly brought out in the recent action of the President in approving the Y. M. C. A. and the Knights of Columbus. And it would be extremely desirable that the Government should extend the practical workings of the principle to other fields of action as well. Aside from the question whether they wish this sort of help or not, the spirit of our American institutions is in favor, for example, of rewarding the Catholic Indian schools for their splendid services to the Government in taking care of its charges. The same may be said of similar services rendered to the Government by other Catholic organizations. They should be recompensed in kind, not as coming from any particular denomination, for that would be in contravention of the spirit of the Constitution, but as being a definite and valuable service rendered the Government, and as tending, from their connection with religion in general, to strengthen good citizenship and fortify public morals.

Since our State and city governments are in great part modeled on the national, and are an application of the same principles of equity and democracy, it is to be expected that they also in their dealings with religious institutions, should carry out the same fair and just policy indicated in the President's action toward the Y. M. C. A. and the Knights of Columbus. Where service appreciable in money is rendered the city or State, and which the State or city would otherwise have to pay for from the public funds, it is only right and proper that the religious institution rendering the service should be recompensed and rewarded, not indeed as a denominational body, but as a servant of the State or city, doing that which is deserving of a material reward. The accidental circumstance that the institution rendering this service is of a religious character should rather be an argument in favor of granting payment for services rendered, since our Government, while maintaining an attitude of strict and beneficent impartiality, yet favors religion as such, and is desirous that all its citizens should have opportunity and encouragement to do their duty to God. We should stand squarely on this principle and emphasize it strongly at this time.

Many of our Sisters, for example the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, are taking care of the wards of the city in great numbers. Not only are they not rewarded for this, but in many places they are actually taxed and made to bear the double burden of caring for these public charges, and of paying taxes on the very property used to lodge them. We do not claim for these institutions any help or subsidies on the ground of their religious character, but we do maintain, and most earnestly, that the valuable services they render the State or city should be recompensed in kind, and that the unfortunate and un-American discrimination made against them on the ground of their religious character should be done away with.

One may repeat literally on this subject the announcement of the President as stated in his decree concerning the Y. M. C. A. They are "prepared by experience, approved methods, and assured resources, to serve especially" and to help the wards of the State or the city. "It seems best for the interest of the service that" they shall "continue as a voluntary civilian organization; however the results obtained are so beneficial and bear such a direct relation to efficiency, inasmuch as their activities contribute to the happiness, contentment and morale" of the city's charges, that "official recognition should be given" to these organizations as a "valuable adjunct and asset" to the service of the State or city or nation.

At this momentous time the President of the United States, by his official action, has once more confirmed the principle we are striving to establish. May the enlightened intelligence of our public officials carry this equitable, patriotic, and thoroughly American principle into every department of the national, State and city government!

Suggestions for Church Music

HAROLD BECKET GIBBS, MUS.DOC.

THE "reestablishment" of the Gregorian Chant and the "restoration" of the Polyphonic Schools of Church Music are the two great ideals set by Pius X. No choir which has not been raised on the Gregorian Chant can ever expect to give convincing interpretations of polyphony. As in the Chant, so in this kind of music, individuality must be eliminated and a choir that has been singing the Chant for one year or more, and that exclusively, can now enter the realms of polyphony with perfect security. Whilst there are many great composers of this music of many melodies, the Holy Father mentions the great "Prince of Sacred Music," Palestrina, as bringing it to "its highest perfection." Many appreciations have been expressed of the works of this great master, one of the "Seven Lamps" of Music, but those of Rockstro and Wagner are probably the best. The former says:

> It is difficult to form a just idea of this most perfect music, without hearing it actually sung, as Palestrina himself intended it to be sung, by a tolerably numerous choir of unaccompanied voices. The amount of learning displayed in its construction is almost incredible; yet, the effect produced upon the hearer is that of extreme simplicity. The reason of this is obvious. Ingenuity and learning are everywhere made subservient to beauty of expression; and beauty of expression, to devotional feeling.

The latter declares:

> Here the rhythmus is only perceptible through the interchange of chord successions, while it does not exist as symmetrical divisions of time. The time divisions are so intimately bound up with the essence of harmony, which, in itself, is timeless, that the laws of time are of no assistance for understanding this kind of music. The single time-division only shows itself as the most delicate variation of a primary harmonic color, which is displayed to us through the most varied progressions, without our being able to perceive any sign of fixed lines in the changes. And since this harmonic color is not contained in a given space of time, we obtain, as it were, a timeless and spaceless picture, an entirely spiritual revelation, through which we are affected with indescribable emotion, since it represents to us more clearly than anything else, the inmost essence of religion, free from all dogmatic ideas.

The difficulties of Palestrina and his contemporaries have been greatly exaggerated. Each part must be learned separately and practised separately, for each is a complete melody in itself and is consequently full of melodic interest. Even when he writes in the harmonic style he does so melodiously, and one cannot fail to observe that all these great men, including the classic trio of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, three more of the "Seven Lamps" of Music, studied counterpoint thoroughly and were in consequence immediate masters of the lesser science of harmony, as we now use that term. Nowadays we teach that art which had its birth many centuries later as the foundation of composition, and the greater art comes as an afterthought. If counterpoint were thoroughly taught in the first instance, it is doubtful if harmony would cause the slightest trouble, for the former begets the latter. Witness the ease with which the classic masters pass from the polyphonic to the monophonic styles, and Palestrina is as easy and attractive in a series of simple chord successions as in his more elaborate flights. Most churches possess "the requisite means" for the performance of polyphony, and all that is required is a willingness to study and practise this much-neglected style of music.

The third and last species of music to be employed in Divine worship is referred to as follows:

> As modern music is principally consecrated to secular matters, the greatest care must be exercised in admitting only those compositions into the church, which contain nothing secular, which are not reminiscent of motives employed in the theater, and which are not composed, even in their outward forms, on the model of secular forms.

As the Chant gave birth to polyphony, so polyphony has given birth to that style of composition known as the polyodic school where the voice parts are written after the polyphonic style but with an independent organ accompaniment, which makes an extremely attractive type of church music much to be commended. From Viadana to the present day there have been composers who have given such treasures to the Church.

As to other types of modern compositions it is safe to say that as counterpoint is the oxygen of harmony, so a work which is entirely devoid of contrapuntal effects is one which soon wears out. A choir should be careful to build up a repertoire of those compositions which are beautiful, and as we are assured that "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever" so we shall never tire of those works which possess the essential features of a healthy immortality. Besides, the frequent repetition of beautiful music is bound to have an educational effect upon the worshipers, and, in course of time the atmosphere of our churches will be fraught with that devotion which is as clinging to the soul as the imprisoned odor of incense and wax is to the olfactory sense. There is scarcely any need to do more than mention the emphasis that is given to the exclusive use of the Latin language at all liturgical functions. There must be no "alteration or transposition of words," no "undue repetitions," no "suppression of syllables, and always in a manner intelligible to the Faithful, who are present."

When sung to figured music the ordinary parts of the Mass "ought to exhibit unity of composition" and "it is therefore forbidden to compose them as separate pieces, with the result that each of these separate pieces forms a musical composition in itself, which can be detached from the rest or replaced by another." It is generally admitted that "patchwork" Masses are undesirable, unconvincing, and disconnected, and as much so as if the celebrant wore a white chasuble, the deacon a red dalmatic, and the subdeacon a green tunic.

As to psalmody, which is the foundation, the germ, the seed of all Church music, this alone would easily furnish ample material for a complete article. The oft-repetition of the tunes upon the soul produces an indescribable emotion which seems to have been anticipated by Plato when he said, "The movement of sound so as to reach the soul for the education of it in virtue, we know not how, we call Music." These simple "movements of sound," these simple undulations, inflections, call them what you will, "never pall upon the ear and have a perennial freshness which no modern melodies possess." And here again let there be a perfect equality of syllable and a slight holding back at the mediation and ending. The pause at the colon should be long enough to enable everyone to take a full breath, and should be a conspicuous feature of psalmody. Even as late as Cardinal Wolsey's time he, in his visitation questions, asked if the "sober and reverend pause be made in the middle of each verse." At the end of the verse there should be no pause, as the antiphonal method of chanting does not demand it. A choir that has not known the beauties of psalmody can rarely ever appreciate those of the Gregorian Chant of later ages, whilst, as before insinuated, the choir that has not known the joy of singing the Chant can never fully appreciate the entrancing beauties of Palestrina.

A repertoire, therefore, of a dozen Masses, exclusive of the Chant, is all that is required for the average church, and if these be well chosen and perfectly prepared, there need be no feverish haste on all the great feasts to produce a new work. Never blend the different styles at the same service and, as far as possible keep to the same "schools," for such changes in Divine worship are as aggravating as those of modern costume. A choir that begins this "church music reform," as it has wrongly been styled, for it is merely a work of "restoration," with the permissible forms of music rarely succeeds. It is beginning at the wrong end. Let the rule be first observed, and then the exception, and the rule is the Chant.

As to Benediction the regulations of the various dioceses differ. In this we are first of all bound to sing a salutation, not necessarily the "O Salutaris," to the Blessed Sacrament. A motet in the vernacular or Latin must follow, and then the "Tantum Ergo." The traditional melody to the "Pange Lingua" is greatly to be urged so that, when there is a procession of the Blessed Sacrament the entire congregation may take part and the procession need never again pass "through the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault" in the presence of a silent people.

The personnel of the choir is a matter to be regulated by the pastor and choirmaster. Women are no more permitted in the choir than they are in the sanctuary, but in congregational singing they are of the greatest use. The spiritual and official obligations must be clearly defined ere the enrolment begins. Their first duty is to lead the praises of God in which the people should take part. From the simple "Amen" to the "Missa Papae Marcelli" the same interest should be manifest in all. The constant training of boys is regarded by some as a nuisance, but it must be borne in mind that such a continuous method is bound to have most excellent results for their future. It is reported that in one parish alone this has resulted in five vocations to the priesthood, whilst similar results are being met with elsewhere. The usual objection to the unsuitableness of the boy-voice is probably due to a faulty method of training. Even the great Handel was content to employ boys exclusively in all his oratorio choruses. Twelve to fifteen boys, four altos, five tenors and six basses, may be considered as a fair balance for an ordinary choir. We are aware that there was a time when the Papal Choir consisted of six voices of each part, but it would be difficult to find such perfectly balanced voices nowadays. This, however, must be decided by the choirmaster. The church choir must be a living parochial organization and be generally available. A paid quartet is a luxury.

An eminent organist once remarked that the church organs were now being built on such a large scale that it would soon be necessary to build churches to accommodate them. The rich diapason tone of olden times is rarely to be met with, whilst the up-to-date organ rather resembles a young orchestra. "The music proper to the Church is purely vocal." "As the vocal part ought always to predominate, the organ should merely support it, and never overpower it." An organ of medium size is all that is necessary. The organist must "preserve all the qualities of true sacred music enumerated above." A prelude of a devotional and anticipatory nature before the service is considered to be in good taste, whilst a postlude is equally effective. Some, however, maintain that the entrance of the celebrant and assistants commences the service and their exit ends it, and decline to provide musical accompaniment to the hurried footsteps of the retreating congregation. But these are matters to be decided by the organist himself. It would seem that wedding and other marches taken from operas are positively forbidden because they are "reminiscent of the theater," but there are many charming "voluntaries" equally appropriate for such times of rejoicing. Funeral marches before or after funerals are forbidden, whilst the use of the organ at these functions is only tolerated as a support to those choirs who are unable to sustain the pitch alone, and should cease when the voices cease. The same rule applies to Lent and Advent, excepting on Gaudete and Laetare Sundays at Mass only. Might one be allowed to urge the closing of the organs during these times? There is no finer "tonic" for a choir than to sing the whole of Advent and Lent without the organ, and the consequent improvement at Christmas and Easter is most marked.

The last ideal set before us is for each diocese to have its own Schola Cantorum and now that Rome has set the example in this direction we may expect to see this country imitate it at no distant date. The cost of such an institution is far less than one would suppose, and one has merely to examine the balance-sheet of the Pontifical Institute in Rome to learn of the probable cost, allowing, of course, for the difference in cost of living between America and Italy.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six-hundred words.

The Pope's Allocution

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I find this delightful cable from Rome in a New York newspaper of recent date: "The Pope delivered an allocution dealing mainly with religious matters."

How extraordinary!

Did he say nothing about bimetallism?

New York. HENRY HOWARD GALE.

Perennial Youth

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Talking of the perennial youth of the classics, what could be more up to date than old Horace's:

Qui didicit patriae quid debeat et quid amicis,
Quo sit amore parens, quo frater amandus et hospes,
Quod sit conscripti, quod judicis officium, quae
Partes in bellum missi ducis, ille profecto
Reddere personae scit convenientia cuique!

These lines from the "Ars Poetica" do not apply strictly, of course, to the present crisis, but the pagan poet would smile at their accidental pertinency.

Washington, D. C. EDWIN J. ANWEILER, O.F.M.

"No Priests in the Trenches!"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read with keen interest the communication headed "No Priests in the Trenches!" in your issue of June 30. Now is the time to follow up the suggestion with action. If the letter were printed as a circular to be signed with the sender's name, the Catholics of America could flood Washington with protests that would have their effect.

New Haven, Conn. S. C. D.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If his satanic majesty reads AMERICA he must have smiled rather grimly a few weeks ago when the appeal was printed about the priests in the trenches. Cui bono! He must have known that such appeals are always in vain. A few correspondents will send in a communication on the subject, possibly at a few meetings of Catholics the colloquial "Say" may introduce the topic, and the whole matter will be closed. Cui bono indeed! Who ever heard of Catholics in this country, or, for that matter, in any country, uniting in an effective protest? A caricature of a certain Congressman is passed through the mails, a protest follows, and the caricature is barred from the mails. Pope and priest, and anything Catholic, are ceaselessly, shamelessly, reviled and slandered, yet the mail remains accessible for this purpose. A few Jews are discriminated against in Russia, and forthwith we refuse to renew a treaty with that country till justice is done to the sons of Israel. Priests and religious are unjustly banished from France and Mexico, two republics, by the way, and our country is seeing blind. A Protestant nurse is endangered somewhere in Asia, and our man-of-war with $250,000 in its hold, hastens to the rescue. Hundreds of Catholics and many priests and religious are ruthlessly murdered, or suffer a worse fate than death, in Armenia and Mexico; and we placidly cry out: "All's well with the world!" Cui bono indeed!

Mere man needs an outlet for his feelings, at times, and his poor wife, or his children, or, in their absence, a servant becomes the victim. Society is much like mere man; it too needs someone to serve as a scapegoat. And who ever heard of a more ideal scapegoat than the Catholic body? The country is on the verge of bankruptcy. What of it? Expel the Catholic priests and religious, confiscate their property, and the coffers of the State are replenished. When everything has been stolen, let them come back, so as to make a repetition possible. A politician sees his political star waning. Why fret? He raises the battle-cry against the blood-sated Dragon of the Seven Hills; and, lo and behold, his battalions reassemble, and again his star has become one of the first magnitude. Unpleasant rumors have disturbed the City Hall or the State Capitol. Why worry? The next issue of the daily press horrifies the public with harrowing tales about Catholic charities; laws are immediately passed for the thorough inspection of such dangerous places as the dwellings of peaceful Sisters and the homes of the Good Shepherd; and public attention is diverted from real evils. That it has happened again and again makes no difference. The world wants to be humbugged and bedeviled, let it have its fill. Can we be blamed when, on reading such a sanguine appeal as that about the priests in the trenches, we shrug our shoulders and say: Cui bono? Ah, yes, if the Grand Knight of the K.C's, and the High Chief Ranger of the Foresters, and the supreme rulers of the other Catholic fraternities were to send an executive order to their various jurisdictions, prescribing that protests be sent by all the voters belonging to the courts or councils to the central Government at Washington . . . but is this even intrinsically possible?

Baltimore. B. L.

Catholic Workmen and the Holy See

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Federation of Catholic Workmen in Holland have sent the following address to the Holy Father:

> The Federation of Catholic Workmen in the Netherlands, counting 50,000 members, pressed by the miseries of the cruel war that has broken out in Europe, kneel down at the feet of your Holiness to express their sincere gratitude for the efforts which your Holiness has made from the first day of your Pontificate to restore peace among the nations, to alleviate the sufferings of the wounded and captives, to relieve the heavy burden of the people living in districts occupied by hostile armies, and especially of the laboring classes who suffer more than others from the dreadful calamities of this bloody conflict.
>
> In these sad and deplorable times we address your Holiness, convinced that the welfare of the nations rests in the hands of the common Father of Christendom, convinced also that the Catholic laborers, who thankfully remember the benefits which they owe to the teachings of the Holy See in matters relating to the labor question, have placed their hopes in their common Father that permanent peace, so long desired, may speedily return to the world.
>
> Holy Father, we promise that the Catholic workmen of the Netherlands will not cease to pray that our dear Lord may bless the efforts of your Holiness in restoring peace among the nations and we appeal to the Catholic workmen of all countries to place their confidence in the intervention of the Holy See and to use all their influence with the Governments of their countries for the restoration of peace.

The example of the Catholic workmen of Holland ought to be imitated by all Catholic societies throughout the world.

West De Pere, Wis. G. RYBROOK, Ord Praem.

The Red Cross and the Sister's Garb

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My letter of June 2, which you printed, seems to require further explanation. The Catholic Women's Association which was organized "to work for the country in its hour of need" belongs as a body to the National League for Woman's Service. In a circular of the League there is the following declaration: "The National League for Woman's Service is working in close cooperation with the Red Cross, and all registrations for medical, nursing and hospital supply work are referred immediately to that organization."

Acting according to this regulation, I wrote to Mr. Taft early in May, asking if 870 Sisters of Charity and 117 Sisters of Mercy, members of the Catholic Association and of the League would be permitted to become "enrolled" as Red Cross Nurses.

Mr. Taft referred my letter to Mr. Eliot Wadsworth who replied by sending me two circulars of the Red Cross, A. R. C. 161, entitled "Instructions for Nurses Called upon for Service in Military Hospitals," and A. R. C. 159, April, 1917, called "Nursing Service."

The first paragraph of 161 reads: "Red Cross nurses will be selected for temporary service in military hospitals either directly from Red Cross Headquarters through Base Hospital Units for Army and Navy Detachments, or by local Committees on Red Cross Nursing Service. If not enrolled they must in all cases become enrolled." Then follows a description of the distinctive uniform which every "enrolled" Red Cross nurse must wear. Of course this regulation excludes Sisters from serving as "enrolled Red Cross Nurses." That was my question, and the answer.

In order to make sure that my interpretation was correct, I consulted Mr. George Hoadly in regard to the two Red Cross circulars A. R. C. No. 161 and A. R. C. 159, the only ones sent to me by the Red Cross authorities, or quoted by them in their assertion that the Red Cross admits members of the Catholic Sisterhoods as nurses in military hospitals. Mr. Hoadly's professional opinion is as follows:

Harmon, Colston, Goldsmith & Hoadly
Attorneys at Law
St. Paul Building
Cincinnati, Ohio, July 3, 1917.

Mrs. Bellamy Storer,
2412 Upland Place,
Cincinnati, O.

My Dear Mrs. Storer:

Replying to yours of July 2, my opinion given you was, of course, based upon the documents which you submitted to me, which I assume are all that are in existence relating to the subject. You are entirely at liberty to use my opinion in the manner desired. I return you the enclosures and I see nothing in them to change the opinion already expressed to you and which I may here repeat. There is nothing in any of the circulars or papers which have been submitted to me which in any way contemplates the undertaking of nursing by any Sisterhood or Order as an organization, nor is there anything which in any way contemplates that the members of any such Order or Sisterhood, when engaged in nursing for, or under the auspices of the Red Cross, would be permitted, whether so engaged as an Order, or as individuals, to wear the garb or habit of the Order of which they are members. I do not say that such a provision does not exist. It certainly cannot be found in any of the papers you have submitted to me.

Sincerely yours,
GEORGE HOADLY.

Let us hope that these regulations may be changed.

Cincinnati. MRS. BELLAMY STORER,
President of the Catholic Women's Association.

Retreats for Laymen

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for June 9 there appeared an interesting article on laymen's retreats. While it was quite enlightening and encouraging to one interested in the spread of this great movement, not a few New Englanders were disappointed to find no mention of the great retreat house of the Passionists at Brighton, Mass. The spot is ideal. Located within four miles of the center of Boston, the Monastery of Blessed Gabriel is situated on a great eminence which affords a commanding view of the city and adjoining territory for many miles. Gazing down from that spot, one feels in very truth lifted up above the things of earth: he is alone, in silent communion with God.

During the last six years an ever-increasing number of men have retired within these hallowed precincts to imbibe new strength from the fountain of grace. In this time, the retreat movement has gained great headway in Boston and its vicinity. In 1916 thirty-six retreats were given at Blessed Gabriel's, and for 1917 thirty-nine have been listed. A unique feature of these retreats is found in the variety of organizations represented. Retreats are arranged for any group that desires to attend. Thus there are retreats for lawyers, doctors, teachers, post-office employees, telephone workers, the Catholic Union, Knights of Columbus councils, etc. A novelty this year is to be a retreat conducted solely for converts.

The benefits obtained from these retreats are so manifold that past retreatants have banded themselves into a strong organization known as the Promoters' Guild for Laymen's Retreats. This body is composed of about 1,500 men, each of whom pledges himself to make a retreat at least once a year. The number of promoters constantly returning and, by their enthusiasm, bringing their friends, swells the volume steadily. If the number of retreatants continues to increase, there will be need before long of a new retreat house separate from the monastery. A past governor, our present mayor and prominent judges and business men have been numbered among the throngs of laymen who have spent a week-end at this blessed spot.

Boston. EDWARD W. JOYCE.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

More than one sympathetic comment will doubtless be called out by A. R.'s communication in your issue of June 30, even when a different point of view is expressed from that of your correspondent. My purpose is, however, only to voice surprise that in this day and generation there should remain any father—or mother, either—who retains control over a son or daughter twenty-eight years of age. I remember with "old country" folk a man of fifty was yet considered a "boy" from whom obedience was exacted, but nowadays, within the scope of my own knowledge and observation, any real parental authority is the exception, not the rule. There are scores of Catholic parents who instead of being the heads of homes and families are nothing more to their children than lodging-house keepers and purveyors of table-board. I do not mean to complicate an already complex problem, but I wonder whether mixed marriages and their attendant evils are not due to relaxed rather than over-rigid parental authority.

Brooklyn. C. M. B.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The letter of M. E. in AMERICA of June 23 offers an interesting defense of the other side of the subject, "Let Them Get Acquainted." But the letter destroys its purpose, and goes beyond its implicit premises. Its argument baldly put is: Catholic Colleges with strict prohibition of all social intercourse between the sexes are a prolific source of vocations to the priesthood; and ninety-eight per cent of mothers of boys in our Catholic schools ardently wish in their hearts that a boy of theirs, nurtured amid such safeguards, may eventually become a priest. What will become of all those vocations if social activities are allowed ever so little to encroach upon the old traditional methods that have been so long in vogue in our Catholic colleges here in America? Of course, M. E. will loudly protest against such an interpretation of his letter. But a cursory reading of it with a modicum of intelligence leaves that impression, despite the author's protest that he does not wish to argue the "pros" and "cons" of the case. Why did he write the letter at all if he does not wish to put one side of the case?

M. E. says that the letter-writers "seem to think that the mixed-marriage problem is the greatest question in the world." Well, it would be hard to say what is the greatest question in the world, but certainly a question that touches the preservation of the Catholic home is pretty near the greatest question for the Catholic Church. There is probably nothing that generates infidelity more surely than mixed marriages. Statistics prove that a greater per cent of the offspring of mixed marriages give up the practice of religion than of Protestant unions; and this although Protestantism is becoming increasingly weak in its convictions. M. E. goes on to say that his opponents "seem to think that college authorities can settle it by putting dances and five o'clock teas in the curriculum." Facetiousness is never argument, although it often passes as such with the unthinking. No sane person but would approve M. E.'s position as put by him. But do his opponents think as he says they do? One or two seem to, I admit; but the others would indignantly repudiate the insinuation, and would wonder what system of logic M. E. has learned. They do not believe, any more than Frank H. Spearman and the editor of AMERICA, that all mixed marriages will be eliminated from the world by acquaintances among Catholics.

Another statement of M. E.'s is altogether beside the mark. He says: "Let us ask them to consider that the widespread evil of mixed marriage does not find its chief or most numerous offenders among college men and women. These are, I say it confidently, though not with statistics at hand, only as two to ninety-eight." True; but what has that to do with the discussion? The question is not what percentage of all Catholics enter mixed marriages, but what percentage of college men and women do so. The percentage among them is, to put it conservatively, large enough to make us desire that some means be taken to reduce the number. Is it not a strange comment on Catholic education that young men and women who are supposed to have obtained the benefits of advanced Catholic training should, nevertheless, be such frequent offenders in a practice so unreservedly denounced by the Church? Here is a fact, argue about abstract theories as you will. That fact should be faced in the light of actual conditions in this country. Will M. E. deny that opportunities for our young men and women in colleges and academies to get acquainted, provided they are duly regulated by the schools, are likely to help meet the evil? For instance, suppose the example of Boston College, cited by M. E., were more universally followed?

M. E. again says, and this is the backbone of his plea, ". . . there are ninety-eight (mothers, in opposition to two of the others who plead for more opportunities for social acquaintance) just as zealous, in their hope that a ward or child of theirs may hearken to the Voice," calling to the priesthood. "And blessed are the home and the college which fosters opportunities for hearkening to the call of that Voice." Yet in the preceding paragraph he cites the example of Boston College, "whose school of arts, together with its high school, numbers nearly 2,000 students, alert in all the excellences of academic performances, and in the forefront of athletics, continually (italics inserted) showing a round of social hours, brilliant and distinguished in every way. Yet Boston College, thank God, sends more candidates, in proportion to its size, to the Church, including both the secular and the religious priesthood, than any other college in the country, omitting, of course, the little seminaries." Perhaps M. E. can explain by what system of logic he can oppose "ample opportunities for getting acquainted" on the score of fostering vocations to the priesthood, and yet cite Boston College in a way that proves it is not hampered in attaining the very object that M. E. has rightly at heart.

But it is the supposition underlying his plea which will not stand exposure. That supposition is that Catholic colleges have as one of their primary ends to foster recruiting for the priesthood. M. E. will deny that such is his supposition. But will a logical mind that peruses his letter listen to any such protest? Now Catholic colleges are not instituted to foster recruiting to the priesthood, but to train men and women for the responsibilities of Catholic life. St. Ignatius Loyola, who first organized Catholic education under the direction of a Religious Order, was led to do so from the desire to train the Catholic mind from boyhood, so as to insure a sturdy Catholic laity. The idea of thus providing "recruiting stations" for the priesthood does not seem to have entered his mind. The matter of increasing the ranks of the priesthood is a work of Divine Providence, and will be safe so long as the words "I will be with you until the consummation of the world" will hold good. Long before colleges were established "which foster opportunities for hearkening to the call of that Voice," there were numerous priests to carry on the work of the Divine Master.

The best way to foster vocations to the priesthood is to promote genuine Catholic homes filled with Catholic atmosphere, and anything that tends to eliminate mixed marriages will promote the existence of such homes. Moreover, there are Catholic colleges in the country that have adhered far more closely to the old traditions, and in which one would have imagined that in them, if anywhere, "opportunities were fostered for hearkening to that Voice" of vocation, still the vocations from such colleges are in a remarkable small number. Again, it is a noteworthy fact that day-schools generally give more recruits to the Catholic priesthood than boarding-schools. But who will deny that day-scholars have far more opportunities for social activities than those in boarding-schools, where "opportunities for hearkening to that Voice" are so sedulously guarded? I dare say that even M. E.'s favorite Boston College, with all its "continual round of social hours," gives more to the priesthood than formerly, when it did not permit such "innovations."

It seems to me that all this goes to show that the efficient means of fostering vocations to the priesthood are genuine Catholic families in which the spirit of the Church holds sway. As for the statement that ninety-eight per cent of good mothers who silently hope that "a ward or child of theirs may hearken to the Voice . . . in a college which fosters opportunities for hearkening to its call," I dare say that ninety-eight per cent of Irish mothers, who still retain Ireland's old spirit, have such a noble hope; but I doubt that the same can be said for ninety-eight per cent of all the mothers of the country, to their shame be it said. I know that in certain parts of the country far removed from the good Catholic Irish of Boston, the inverse ratio is rather the truer average. I admit that this is due to a weak spirit of Catholicism; but it is just such a weak spirit of Catholicism that Frank H. Spearman hopes to improve in his plea for more ample opportunities for good Catholic young men and women in our colleges and academies to get acquainted. In a word, if colleges and academies do their part in facilitating unions between thoroughly trained Catholic youths and maidens, the Catholic priesthood will have ample recruits. Catholic Ireland is the most prolific of all the countries in vocations to the priesthood, despite the ample opportunities its young people have and have always had to get acquainted. "Getting acquainted" amid Catholic influences does not prevent vocations, but it does promote good Catholic unions. I am as anxious as M. E. to see vocations fostered; but I am also anxious to see something done that will remove the reproach which I have often heard made, "N. married a Protestant, although he (or she) was educated and even graduated from the Catholic college or academy."

The question arises, "Who is to settle just what opportunities for getting acquainted should be granted our young people while at school?" Certainly not individual parents, who have nothing but a few years of experience of their own to draw upon, an experience, moreover, which is often biased by ideas which they have unconsciously picked up in an un-Catholic atmosphere. It is the directors of our Catholic schools themselves, and notably the clergy in our Catholic colleges, who have had experience in dealing with souls, who have to decide the question. It would be interesting to have the faculty of Boston College, which has been so successful with "its continual round of social hours," give to Catholic America its ideas on this subject.

St. Louis. E. B. G.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.
Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.
Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions to the Mission Literature Fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

"Catholic Disaffection"

IN the goodly town of Ipswich in the State of Massachusetts, dwells a writer of letters to New York newspapers, one Mr. Erving Winslow. Twelve inches or so beneath a head somewhat befuddled by provincialism, a timorous heart beats wildly in the erstwhile placid Winslow bosom. "Trouble is ahead!" gasps the Sage of Ipswich, trouble aroused by mobs and draft riots.

> Alas! today among those who have the ear of Irish-Americans are many, including one great prelate of the Roman Catholic Church at least, who are responsible by their indiscreet speech for disaffection among its members.

Now not far from the goodly town of Ipswich lies the goodlier town of Boston, which by reason of Puritanic contempt of the natural law, is largely populated by Catholics. Even though habitually lulled into somnolence by large draughts of the justly celebrated soothing-syrup which bears, by accident, his name, it is just possible that in occasional waking moments, Mr. Winslow has heard of Cardinal O'Connell, the Archbishop of Boston. But such utterances of the Cardinal as these, he seems to have missed, or, possibly, he considers them "indiscreet":

> The one thing now that is necessary, and the only thing that will stand firmly through all the varying vicissitudes before us, will be this principle: Our country is now at war, and we are bound before God to render it our fullest assistance.

And is Ipswich, Massachusetts, so barred from communication from the outer world, that no news has come to it of the great letter of the American Archbishops to the President of the United States, or of the inspiring pastorals of his Eminence, Cardinal Farley, the Archbishop of New York? St. Paul is a western see, in the heart of a land of darkness, and doubtless is not recognized by this Massachusetts Brahmin. Nevertheless, the rest of the country has applauded the patriotic deeds and speeches of that soldier of the Civil War, the Most Rev. John Ireland, Archbishop of St. Paul. Baltimore is nearer home. Does Mr. Winslow batten in ignorance of the many speeches, letters and pastorals of a prelate whom the whole country delights to honor, his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons? And, if it be permitted once more to turn our indiscreet and disaffected faces towards the West, is Mr. Erving Winslow so deeply buried in the solitudes of Ipswich, Massachusetts, that he has heard nothing at all of the letters of the Archbishops of Chicago, Cincinnati, and San Francisco?

"Disaffection among its members!" The sum of Mr. Winslow's ignorance grows apace and grows appalling. Holy Cross College is not on the other side of the moon, nor is that "little bit of Oxford," Boston College. When war came, hundreds of young students, Americans everyone of them, tarried not to write to the newspapers, but left the classrooms of Boston and Holy Cross, to serve their country. Their action was not singular; they had imbibed patriotism with their Catholic mothers' milk. Has Mr. Winslow heard nothing of the boys now in the field, once students of Georgetown, child of that Revolutionary patriot, Archbishop Carroll; of the Catholic University, of Fordham, Manhattan, Notre Dame, Loyola, Detroit, Marquette, St. Louis, New Orleans, St. Thomas, St. John's, Gonzaga, Creighton, Santa Clara, and a score of other Catholic colleges, beacons of liberty, burning from New England to the Pacific, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Canadian line? Does he know nothing at all of regiments in his own State, in New York, in Illinois, composed almost entirely of Catholics? Has he not heard that although Catholics form a bare one-seventh of the country's population, the War Department has ruled that, in order to minister to hundreds of thousands of Catholic soldiers, at least one-third of the army chaplains must be Catholic priests?

"Disaffection among its members!" If this be disaffection, may God fan the flame into a consuming conflagration, for in such disaffection alone is the safety of our beloved country to be sought.

An Agnostic Over Night

A LADY in the West became an agnostic over night and wrote to tell AMERICA all about it. Her reasons implied and stated are clear: She is an Austrian by blood, and the Church does not prevent wars.

In this instance, blood, no doubt, gave rise to emotions that swept the lady into sadness and perhaps into gentle despair. But why into agnosticism? Did it prevent the war? Lo, the battle is on, and men perish by the thousands.

Let that problem pass, it pales before the second reason set down in the letter. But does it? Is the second motive stronger than the first? Hardly. It is founded on a false supposition. The Church has no warrant to prevent war. On the contrary there are circumstances under which she would be bound by virtue of her office as teacher and defender of truth, to put the stamp of approval upon arms.

But this war is unjust! In the premises the objection is irrelevant. It leads away from the general principle that the Church must prevent war. War is not this war, there have been and will be other wars, quite distinct from this war. But granted that this war is unjust. Where does the injustice lie? With the Central Powers? What part has their leader, Lutheran Prussia, with the Catholic Church? Does the injustice rest with the Allies? How long is it since their chief, England, or their great purveyor of men, Russia, or even France, broke with Rome? It were better grace, but poor logic still, to hurl anathemas at Lutheranism, Anglicanism, the Orthodox Church or agnosticism than to renounce Catholicism.

The Church does not prevent war, hence a lady of Austrian blood became an agnostic.

Years ago the Son of Man warned and rewarned Jerusalem that if it did not hearken to His Word, the enemy would come upon the city and ravage it: the enemy came, and the destruction and carnage were great beyond measure. Where the blame? With Christ? With His Word? No, with perfidious Jerusalem only.

But then the lady did not become an agnostic because the Church does not prevent wars, nor yet because the Church did not prevent this war. The cause of her lapse is within her soul. May she find it!

Justice for Anarchists

LONG a menace to any community afflicted by their sordid presence, Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman will no more disturb the peace and dignity of New York. A free and unrestricted trial made somewhat notable by the defendants' brazen insolence towards a long-suffering court and their studied contempt for American institutions, has ended with the imposition of the law's maximum penalty, a fine of $10,000, two years' imprisonment, and the prospect of deportation at the expiration of sentence. Loudly proclaiming that they asked for nothing but justice, they have obtained what they sought.

It need hardly be said that no constitutional guarantee was on trial in this celebrated case. The clear issue was the lawfulness of conspiracy to obstruct the law, and in no sense was rightful "free speech" involved. Yet for many years it has been plain to impartial observers, that in this country the easy limits of free speech have been stretched to a degree which sooner or later would provoke, and apparently justify, attacks on the very foundations of all government. On the screen and the stage, in the press and from the forum, in professors' chairs and on street corners we have tolerated under the alleged sanction of "free speech," open incitements to the violation of law, both human and Divine. With war at our gates, and with Federal convictions secured against notorious exploiters of anarchy, who have long found lawlessness an easy way of making a living, it is hoped that our too lax public opinion will swing back into the zone of sanity.

Under our form of government ample constitutional provision for the repeal of laws distasteful to the majority is at hand. Any citizen is free to advocate by petition and in peaceful gatherings the repeal of measures which in his judgment are inimical to the best interests of the community. This freedom to assemble and petition the Government for the redress of wrongs, is essential to the maintenance of our republican institutions, and evil the day which abrogates it. But no advocacy may lawfully include treason or sedition. As Judge Mayer well said in his charge to the jury:

> This is a republic founded on the principle of obedience to law. It can remain a republic only as long as the law is obeyed. For people who would destroy this Government by nullifying its laws, we have no place.

As a corollary, it may be added that with the departure of Goldman, Berkman, and others, convicted last month, the birth-control movement has lost some of its most ardent advocates. Treason to God and nature frequently works out in treason to country.

Entertaining the Congregation

THERE could scarcely be a more striking indication of the bankruptcy of popular Protestantism than the fact that a book called "Church Advertising, Why and How," has recently been published to meet what is presumably a "crying need." The twenty-one papers in the volume were read before the "Church Advertising Section of the Twelfth Annual Convention of the World's Associated Advertising Clubs," and a number of the speakers were ministers with D.D. after their names. Though one of those who addressed the gathering cautioned his hearers against giving "the impression that it is necessary to force members to go to church," and against making "people think that you must beg outsiders to come," most of the speakers insisted on the importance of systematic and aggressive advertising if the church's pews are to be kept filled. The preacher, moreover, must "deliver the goods," he advertises. "A crowd lured by a startling topic will expect to be stirred by the sermon, and will regard itself as 'buncoed' if it doesn't feel thrills." So the conscientious will of course take care to meet their hearers' expectations.

A Methodist minister of New York who, most fittingly, is "President of the Church Advertising and Publicity Departmental," then told his less practical and rather old-fashioned confreres just how to "put it over." One "Sunday night attraction" he used, for instance, was a lecture on the development of airships, "while the pastor followed with a message on 'Faith's Wings.'" Next Sunday there was a "remarkable motion-picture of a romance built round a submarine," and as the U-boat came to the surface the thoroughly up-to-date pastor preached on "Submarine Sins." On the first Sunday of July he would hold a "Snow Service" with "movies" of the Arctic regions, and he took care that a "pile of snow, together with a block of ice" in which fruit and flowers were frozen, "were placed on the table before the pulpit." On a subsequent Sunday every worshiper received a duly advertised rosy apple. Here are some other methods by which this highly modern preacher made piety attractive to his congregation:

> Last spring Secretary Josephus Daniels came over from Washington and answered critics concerning the navy. Judge Ben Lindsey was highly popular to a great company as he related Juvenile Court incidents. Other speakers, such as the late Mayor Gaynor, Mayor Mitchel and various city commissioners, have also been invited in. Hans Kronold, the most noted 'cellist, and W. D. Hinshaw, a grand-opera basso, were other features. When the "Giants" were on the verge of capturing the pennant, a baseball service was arranged. Statements concerning their indebtedness to religion were secured from Herzog, Snodgrass, Fletcher, Chief Meyers, and other conspicuous players.

"Apt subjects will draw listeners," was one of the speaker's concluding remarks. No doubt. But it would be interesting to know how many of his listeners and spectators were worshipers. Matters have come to a sad pass when Christians can be lured to church only by a flamboyant advertisement that promises they will be amused and entertained there. If the object of preaching is to turn sinners into penitents, the "popular" services conducted by that New York minister must be somewhat unsatisfactory.

Praise and a Warning

ONE in whom the fine old phrase and finer reality, "gentleman and scholar," is amply verified, Mr. Ralph Adams Cram, has recently startled New England by advocating State aid for private secondary schools. Mr. Cram has in mind, particularly, the parochial schools of the Catholic Church; but he would not exclude any worthy educational institute. Their results, he recognizes, are of immense value to society; yet, under the present system, they must do this work, which the State confessedly cannot accomplish, under the grievous burden of a double tax. It is as if the State were to say, "I know that you are training boys and girls to be good fathers and mothers, assets to your communities, and that you are training them in a manner which I cannot parallel. Therefore will I make your work very difficult, and in some places, quite impossible. You must pay dearly for the privilege of aiding me." Mr. Cram has not weighed the product of the private schools in the balance of sentiment, but of fact.

> As a professor in a technical institution where I come in contact with upwards of 200 young men in my own department, in the course of a year, I can say that the products of the private schools, and specifically of the Roman Catholic parochial schools and colleges, compare at least favorably with their fellows of a different educational experience. This is true of character, as well as I can judge it in three years of personal acquaintance. When it comes to a question of clear constructive thinking and clean-cut incisive expression, the products of the parochial schools generally stand first.

Gratifying as is this recognition of the work of our schools, upon which some pseudo-Catholics who send their children to non-Catholic institutions look with ill-bred disdain, we shall do well to ponder upon this warning, spoken by a friendly critic:

> I am not giving a blanket-vote of confidence to the private schools and the parochial schools, for all of them fail in certain directions, and many of them are vitiated by their effort to follow the popular lines in vogue in the public schools.

Happily, the Catholic schools which ape the extremes of secular educationists are exceedingly few, and are growing fewer. Some forms of foolishness resist counsel, and can be cured only by the sharp remedy of failure.

"Patriotism Not Enough"

PATRIOTISM is a virtue, loved of God and man; in these days there is small danger that we forget it. Our peril lies another way. We may forget that hatred is a deadly sin. "Standing as I do in view of God and of eternity," wrote that brave woman, Edith Cavell, "I realize that patriotism is not enough. I must have no hatred or bitterness towards anyone."

Our virtues may become vices by excess, if they are not founded on principles sanctioned by the Divine Model and Law-Giver, Jesus Christ. The Son of God hated the deeds of the sinner, as only Infinite Goodness can hate malevolence, but He did not hate the sinner. He would not call down fire from heaven, as His hasty Apostles wished. It was not His will that the sinner die, but that he be converted and live; and what He preached, He practised to the end. On Calvary, the first words framed by His parched lips were a prayer, that the ingrates who had brought Him to this shameful death, might find mercy with His Eternal Father. The legions of Heaven at His disposal, did not beat to the earth the recreant priests and gibing Pharisees, but suffered them to look with impunity, upon Him whom they had pierced. The sublimity of Calvary passes all understanding, transcends all imitation, yet it gives us the principle to be translated, as far as human frailty will bear us, into our lives. We must hate injustice and abhor iniquity; but we must also remember, that those who persecute us without cause are to be forgiven, even as we hope to be forgiven, to be loved, because He bade us love even our enemies.

Every Catholic knows the measure of his obligations as a patriot. His country may ask him to give his life, that she may live. He does not doubt, nor does his country, what his answer will be. The bones of his fathers, whitening on every battlefield of the Republic, guarantee his complete devotion. With confidence may we invoke the protection of our Father in Heaven over our beloved land, for our cause is just. Yet "patriotism is not enough." Without charity, we are nothing. Let us press forward in our great task without bitterness, without recrimination, with malice towards none, with charity for all.

Literature

LITERATURE AND TWADDLE

THE sketches of the late Jack London published a few months ago emphasize the fact that it was after reading an account of a storm in one of Mr. Joseph Conrad's books that the American novelist, then a very young man, "found himself" and wrote a similar description in a successful competition for a newspaper prize. He then proceeded to take up writing as a vocation and succeeded admirably at it, provided that ability to make money by writing and to attract many readers represents success. However that may be, the story tempts one to make a comparison between the published work of Mr. London as we have it and Mr. Conrad's, that is, if in Virgil's phrase it is allowed to compare small things with great. For Mr. Conrad is perhaps the one man writing fiction in our day whose work has a serious claim to be literature. There was surely never so much fiction written as in our time, and it would seem that in the very quantity of it there must be considerable sterling quality. But not only literary critics, but the very writers of present-day fiction are agreed that almost no one in our time is writing anything worth while. Not long since a number of the most prominent writers of best-selling novels in this country and in England were asked to name their six favorite novels. The number of votes for each were taken and averaged in order to determine what group of novels was the most popular among our novel writers. To the surprise perhaps of youthful enthusiastic readers of the popular story-writers of our day, the average age of the "favorite novel" of these authors of "best-sellers" was not 1916 nor even 1910 nor 1900, but almost a century ago, 1819. Not a single novel written in the twentieth century was mentioned at all. The only story of our generation that was on the list was one of George Meredith's written some thirty years ago. I may say, moreover, that when George Meredith's book appeared it was not a best-seller, and it may be suggested with all due deference to youthful enthusiasm that whenever a novel is a best-seller, it does not rank high as literature. The very fact that it appeals without delay to a very large number of people, demonstrates almost to a certainty that the book is concerned with such trivial, superficial, ephemeral interests that it can have no serious significance.

Mr. Conrad is one of the few men now doing really serious work in fiction and, needless to say, he does not write best-sellers. I doubt if any of his books has ever been on that list. They have too much to do with the minds of his characters and with the thoughts that dominate them, to be popular. For most things that are popular in our day are not thought-provoking but sense-satisfying. We do not go to the theater to see plays any more, but to see "shows," as we frankly call them. Nor do we go to see great pictures, for the attendance at the Metropolitan Museum is shameful in its scantiness and a disgrace to the community. The attendance at the "movie shows," however, where people go to see cheap trivial pictures which tell them superficial stories that may arouse the imagination but never provoke thought, is so large as to be an unending source of surprise even to the managers of film-halls. Great pictures provoke thought just as a Shakespearean play does. But we do not want to be made to think, we only want to see and hear and feel.

Mr. Jack London was more read than Mr. Conrad, because you do not have to think to read London's books. You need only let the words flow in and they show you a series of pictures and provoke a set of feelings, but do not disturb the mental faculties so deeply as to arouse thought. They stir the imagination, the fantasy, but not the understanding. It is very probable that this organ of fantasy is largely physical in its basis. It has almost none of the qualities of the higher powers of the mind. It sees pictures, recalls pictures, even sometimes slightly modifies pictures, but never creates them, and hence it is a very easy faculty to use. Moreover people now think much more of their bodies than they do of their minds. They prefer very clean bodies to clean minds. Indeed they apparently waste very little time about the idea that the mind should be clean. They are much more intent on exercising their bodies, and getting into good condition than on exercising their minds. Reading of the Jack London order gives a certain amount of occupation to the senses and the fantasy, but Conrad's stories require thought and exercise of mind.

The incidents in the two sets of novels, those of Mr. London and Mr. Conrad revolve about the same sort of people situated in quite similar circumstances. The adventures are very much the same, but in Mr. London's novels the incidents are everything, while in Mr. Conrad's the characters are everything. In the one set of books the weaving of the plot is the most important quality of the stories. In the other set the development of the characters is the all important aim of the writer. The value of the books is just in proportion to the difference in value between these two interests. Human beings are infinitely more valuable than things, and are of inestimably more significance than the incidents which happen to them. Men mean much more than their environment. In direct ratio then to the value of their subjects is the value of the books. A quantity of talk about happenings is not much more than trifling. On the other hand the description of how human beings are affected by their surroundings is literature.

The distinction between Mr. London's work and that of Mr. Conrad is worth while emphasizing because it contains the gist of the whole problem of modern reading and what is called modern literature. The proper interest of mankind is man, not things. Things are ever prone to usurp the place, indeed they are always intruding themselves on men and sometimes bolstering up their claim for attention very speciously, but they do not represent anything like the same significance as human interests. One is reminded very much of a passage in one of Mr. Conrad's greatest books, "Nostromo," in which he shows how avarice may dominate a number of lives until it crushes the humanity out of them. One of the characters says to the new owner to whom the gold mine which is the center of the avarice in the book has been passed on: "There is no peace and no rest in the development of material interests. They have their law and their justice, but it is founded on expediency, and it is inhuman; it is without rectitude, without the continuity and the force that can be found only in a moral principle."

There are many people who ask what literature is. The answer to the question is perhaps contained in those sentences from Conrad. Literature concerns life, human life in its moral aspects, because that is the only thing worth calling human. Other things may get into literature, but only in as much as they touch life and influence its moral side in some way do they really belong there.

After they have read a book people want to know if it is literature. Well, the criterion for the answer to that question is: Have you been interested in what happened in the book or in the people to whom it happened? Has the deepest part of your interest regarded the way the story's characters reacted to the incidents or to the succession of the incidents? Have the characters remained quite unchanged, though the incidents varied greatly, and were the people the same at the end as they were at the beginning? In that case you have been reading twaddle and not literature.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

ATTAINMENT

Let me go back again. There is the road,
O memory! the humble garden lane
So young with me. Let me rebuild again
The start of faith and hope by that abode:
Amend with morning freshness all the code
Of youth's desire; remap the charted main
With tuneful joy, and plan a far campaign
For prouder marches in ambition's mode.

Ah, no, my heart! more certain now the skies
With joy abide. The cage of tree and sod,
Horizons firm that faith and hope attain,
Far realms of innocence in children's eyes,
And hearts harmonious with the will of God,—
These might I miss if I were back again.

MICHAEL EARLS, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Adventure of Death. By ROBERT W. MACKENNA, M.A., M.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

This dainty volume of some 200 pages is a study of death, suggested indeed by the present dreadful conflict, but embodying the author's reflections of many years as physician and philosopher. In the opening chapters death, to rob it of its terrors, is represented as the great adventure of life, and there are agreeable anecdotes of those who met death fearlessly. The author's experience as a physician is then requisitioned to prove that whatever may be the preliminary state of the moribund, the actual moment of death is almost universally free from pain and terror, religion being the chief caster-out of fear.

It is refreshing to find the book so outspoken in its condemnation of euthanasia, which, so it says, springs from selfishness or cowardice, and is open to all manner of abuse. "Medicine is and ought to be the art of healing, not of dealing death." But it is the last three chapters of the book that will have the strongest appeal. "What life gains from death" opens up delightful vistas of thought, e.g.: If no one died, the world would be over-peopled; there would be no room for new lives; consequently no children; and a world without children would be a black inferno. Immortality then furnishes the theme for the finest portion of the book, for while from the point of view of logic or metaphysics it could be improved, from the literary and esthetic viewpoint it is excellent. The Catholic will miss the note of supernaturalism, to him of course so inseparable from such a topic as death. Though Dr. Mackenna does not strike this note, he is religious withal, having, though a scientist, a reverence, more than expressed, for the theologian. On the other hand, he has only scorn for the "pseudo-science of the barber's shop or the raucous orator of the street corner, . . . the truly great scientific investigator is usually a man of reverent mind. A Paine or a Strindberg will deny where a Kelvin or a Lister will keep silence in reverent expectancy." Specimens of his method are:

> Matter and energy are his [man's] servants . . . The servants are indestructible; shall the master be destroyed? Surely reason can make but one answer, which is that mind also is imperishable and must persist. . . . The loftier a man's ideals, the less opportunity is there of seeing their attainment in this life. "The man with the muckrake" can get out of life all that he seeks after; the pure soul of a Sir Galahad, with ideas of absolute truth and absolute goodness, cannot attain its goal this side of the grave. If there is any justice in the scheme of things, as we know there is, surely the high ideal will not be penalized.

The book seems called forth by the appalling death-roll in Europe. May the war give it a welcome to American readers. In a land where belief in immortality is apparently waning, it will do good.

J. F. X. M.

Papers from Picardy. By T. W. PYM and G. GORDON. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.50.

This is a thoughtful book by two Church of England army chaplains. It is made up of papers written during the summer and autumn of 1916, when the fighting was hot along the Somme. As men dedicated to the spiritual welfare of the soldiers the writers treat of topics that few war-books contain, for instance, the effect of war-conditions on morality and religion, the good and bad results of discipline, and the prospect of a new England after peace has come. Mr. Pym's reflections on self-discipline are good. He holds that it is the duty of the churchmen and clergy of England to build up in the English nation the quality of self-discipline which he finds sadly wanting at home, always, and at the front, when the men are not under orders. He well remarks:

> Where we affect to take discipline into our own hands, we must be like the Roman Church much stricter and more consistent. The Church like the army is a system. We have therefore in the Church those very features that appeal to the soldier. But we cannot expect him to recognize the discipline of the Church unless its own officers respect that discipline more than in the past we have given any appearance of doing.

While many will not agree with the deductions drawn from the experience of these chaplains, nearly all the book's readers will take pleasure in the frank manner in which these men who have been at the front deal with the bad, as well as the good results, that trench-life and war-conditions bring about. The authors say that it is their unshakeable conviction "That Christ alone holds the key to the social and individual problems which the war is forcing on our notice."

G. C. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The contents of the July 22 Catholic Mind are quite varied and interesting. The number opens with the address on "American Catholic History and Religion" which Father Richard H. Tierney delivered last March in New York at a meeting of the United States Catholic Historical Society. He urges that throughout the land tablets be set up to commemorate the early achievements of the Church in this country. Then follows the text of the protest that the American Archbishops made against the new anti-Catholic Constitution of Mexico. The secular press, it is said, could find no room for the document. The authoritative list of readings on "Luther and Lutheranism" which the "Catholic Encyclopedia" offers is also given and the number ends with Professor Max Drennan's observations on "The Dangers of 'Movies.'"

"Child's Life of Mary, Queen of Scots" and "Child's Life of Abraham Lincoln" (Catholic Book Co., Wheeling, W. Va., $0.25 each) are illustrated volumes of a new "young folks series." They were written by Mary Marget MacEachen for little boys and girls who do not like long sentences. The author succeeds in filling her young readers with love and admiration for the characters she describes——"The Village Shield" (Dutton, $1.50) by Ruth Gaines and Georgia Willis Read, is the latest addition to the "Little Schoolmate Series." It is a story of present-day life in Mexico with most of the political disturbances omitted. It is hard to believe that the idyllic conditions and gentle characters of this volume can exist along with the Mexico of which we have lately heard so much. Though the authors seem to be in sympathy with Padre Francisco and the work of the priests, their knowledge of a priest's duties and religion are somewhat vague and imperfect.

"What Luther Taught" (America Press, $0.15 a copy, $10.00 a hundred) is a clear and scholarly booklet containing seven papers on the heresiarch's doctrine by Fathers Husslein and Reville, associate editors of AMERICA. Going for their material to the "reformers's" own writings and conversations, and to the works of Janssen, Denifle and Grisar, the authors give an irrefragable exposition of Luther's teachings under the captions: "Luther and Freedom of Thought," "Luther and the State," "Luther and Religion," "Luther and Social Life," "Luther and Education," "Luther, Slaves and Peasants" and "Luther and Woman." The pamphlet is also a brief and unanswerable refutation of the threadbare calumnies against the Church to which Luther and his followers have given currency. As the promoters of the Luther tercentenary celebration in this country, notwithstanding the fact that we are at war with Germany, still hope to convince the public that the heresiarch was a great benefactor of the human race, "What Luther Taught" will show how baseless is their claim.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Apostleship of Prayer, New York:
Manual of the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Compiled from Authentic Sources. $0.25.

Benzinger Brothers, New York:
Life of St. Ignatius of Loyola. By Father Genelli; Life of Mademoiselle le Gras (Louise de Marillac) Foundress of the Sisters of Charity; Women of Catholicity. By Anna T. Sadlier. $0.50 each; The "Summa Theologica" of St. Thomas Aquinas. Part II. By Fathers of the English Dominican Province. $2.75; Leaves of Gold. Compiled by Fiona McKay. $0.50.

The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
Someone and Somebody. By Porter Emerson Browne. Illustrated by Clarence F. Underwood. $1.35.

The Catholic Book Co., Wheeling:
Child's Life of Abraham Lincoln; Child's Life of Mary Queen of Scots. By Mary Marget MacEachen. $0.25 each.

The Century Co., New York:
Inside the British Isles, 1917. By Arthur Gleason. $2.00.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
One Young Man. The Experiences of a Young Clerk Who Enlisted in 1914, Fought for Nearly Two Years, Was Severely Wounded, and Is Now on His Way Back to His Desk. Edited By J. E. Hodder Williams. $0.75.

E. P. Dutton Co.. New York:
Helen of Four Gates. By an Ex-Mill-Girl. $1.50; Soldiers' Spoken French. By Helene Cross. $0.60.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Breviarium Romanum, ex Decreto Sacrosancti Concilii Tridentini Restitutum, S. Pii V Pontificis Maximi Iussu Editum; Aliorumque Pontificum Cura Recognitum, Pii Papae X Auctoritate Reformatum. 4 vols. $8.00.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
The Book of Camping. By A. Hyatt Verrill. Illustrated. $1.00.

John Lane Co.. New York:
The Red Planet. By William J. Locke. $1.50.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Letters of Arthur George Heath. With Memoir by Gilbert Murray. $1.25; In War Time. Poems. By May Wedderburn Cannan. $0.90; A Scallop Shell of Quiet. Introduced by Margaret L. Woods. $0.60; Sermon Notes. By the Late Mgr. Robert Hugh Benson. Edited by the Rev. C. C. Martindale. $1.25; The Upbringing of Daughters. By Catherine Durning Whetham. $1.75; The House Fly. A Slayer of Men. By F. W. Fitzsimons, F. Z. S., F. R. M. S., etc. $0.35.

The Macmillan Company; New York:
The Life of Algernon Charles Swinburne. By Edmund Gosse, C. B. $3.50; The English-Speaking Peoples. Their Future Relations and Joint International Obligations. By George Louis Beer. $1.50; Fairhope, the Annals of a Country Church. By Edgar Dewitt Jones. $1.25; Experiments in Educational Psychology. By Daniel Starch, Ph.D. $1.00; My Mother and I. By E. G. Stern. $1.00; The Empty House. $1.40.

Oxford University Press, New York:
Italy Mediaeval and Modern; a History. By E. M. Jamison, C. M. Ady, K. D. Vernon and C. Sanford Terry. $2.90.

The Poetry Review Co., Cambridge:
George Edward Woodberry. A Study of His Poetry. By Louis V. Ledoux. $1.00.

The Polish Book Importing Co., New York:
Political History of Poland. By Edward H. Lewinski-Corwin, Ph.D. $3.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Over the Top. By an American Soldier Who Went. Arthur Guy Empey. $1.50; The Monks of Westminster. Being a Register of the Brethren of the Convent from the Time of the Confessor to the Dissolution. With Lists of the Obedientiaries and an Introduction. By E. H. Pearce, M. A. $3.00.

G. Schirmer. New York:
Vocal Art-Science. By Frank E. Miller, A. M., M. D. With a Foreword by Gustav Kobbe. $2.50.

Scott, Foresman & Co., New York:
Our Country in Story. By The Franciscan Sisters of the Perpetual Adoration, St. Rose Convent, La Crosse, Wisconsin.

The Torch Press, New York and Cedar Rapids, Iowa:
The Sublime Sacrifice. A Drama of the Great War. By Charles V. H. Roberts. $1.25.

University Museum, Philadelphia:
Sumerian Grammatical Texts. By Stephen Langdon; Lists of Akkadian Personal Names. By Edward Chiera; Sumerian Liturgical Texts. By Stephen Langdon.

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago:
Recreation and the Church. By Herbert Wright Gates. $1.00.

EDUCATION

In the Village Smithy

NOT since he left his village, more than a generation since, had he looked upon a smithy, and he came upon it on East Sixty-Eighth Street in the City of New York. Surely time and nature had been kindly thus to leave it, darkened with the smoke of the forge, among the tenements of the Middle East Side, a reminiscence of a former, simpler day. But there it was, and through the gloom of its dim recesses, like stars flashing across a dark sky, the sparks flew from the anvil to the tune of cheery music from the sledge.

> And the children coming home from school
> Look in at the open door. . . .

But not in Manhattan. There the parallel is broken. Flocks of children were coming home from school, but not one stopped to listen to the roar of the bellows, to regale his ears with the grateful hiss of the iron in the cooling tub, to feast his eyes on "the large and sinewy hands" of the smith. For they were twentieth-century children, and city-bred children to boot, intent upon other interests. So they hurried by; some to engage in the marts of small trade by peddling newspapers, others to keep an engagement at the Municipal Playground, or perchance, at the locally popular moving-picture theater.

CHANGING INFLUENCES

A TEAR for the lost visions of youth, and, by anticipation, a requiem for the smith, whose shop, no doubt, will soon make way for its natural successor, a most prosaic garage. Times have indeed changed, when the children coming home from school no longer pause to look in at the open door of the smithy! Perhaps this displacement, in the mind of city childhood, of old by new interests, is indicative of the changes that have come upon many influences affecting the growing generation. Are they learning elsewhere, if not in the school, these children who never knew a real childhood, that

> Thus at the flaming forge of life
> Our fortunes must be wrought;
> Thus on its sounding anvil shaped
> Each burning deed and thought?

Perhaps, but homes and schools are among the agencies that have changed. No longer is the simile of the forge and anvil in favor with our trusted pedagogues, our indulgent parents. Love is the power that moves all things today, they argue, and through love must the little one be led to find the work in harmony with his being, and induced to move along his self-chosen line of personal development. It is very beautiful, this theory, but its adoption is one reason, perhaps, why today there are so many juvenile delinquents and why, from time to time, outraged groups of business men arise to enquire in a pained tone, why reading, writing and arithmetic have been suffered to lapse into a desuetude, certain but not innocuous.

LIMITED ANARCHY

IN an address to the New York State Teachers' Association nearly two years ago, former President Taft, speaking in his dual capacity as pedagogue and authority on constitutional law, wisely suggested that a school should not be a republic. In theory, at least, this republic derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, and it does not seem safe to base school law on this dictum of political wisdom. Most children of school age are notoriously anarchistic. They may love their teacher, and they do occasionally, not as a teacher, but as one who, having wandered into the meshes of a tyrannical system, unexpectedly retains some few amiable and human qualities. Left to their sincerest and most native impulses, they would rend the whole fabric of education, with as little compunction as Mr. Leonard D. Abbot, exclusively on paper and by word of mouth, would put an end to the Government of the United States. Yet, on analysis, a "republic" connotes not a weak, but a strong government. It cannot be republican in anything but name, unless its citizens have learned not only to submit to authority, but to regard that authority with a certain degree of reverence. Proceeding from this concept, it would seem that some of our schools would be greatly improved by the assumption of an out-and-out republican form of government. As now conducted, they certainly do not teach obedience, and they appear to look upon reverence as a kind of weakness, incompatible with true self-respect. Their present regime, an attempt to synthesize the maximum amount of personal liberty and initiative, with just enough restraint to bar the pupil, should he proceed to eject the teacher or fire the schoolhouse, is described with some difficulty. Perhaps it is best named by saying that it is a limited anarchy.

"Soft" Education

MR. TAFT was further pleased to suggest that too many American children do precisely what they wish. They have little discipline at home, and at school they are not compelled to apply themselves seriously to their books. Thus from both the natural fonts of knowledge and training, they imbibe a certain contempt, or at best, a real lack of appreciation for the necessity of submission, and of hard intellectual work. This is an old song, chanted, no doubt, in the ears of the first schoolmaster, yet it is no more possible to indict our whole educational system than it is to indict a whole people. There are so many exceptions that the critic will be slow to ascribe to our schools in general, faults that on closer examination may prove to be purely local. But with all due allowance made, it would seem that indictment of "softness" brought against American educational methods rests on facts of almost daily experience, noted by men and women of many professions. It may be true that under the new regime our pupils run to the schools with bright and happy faces, and that they enjoy themselves hugely from eight in the morning until four in the afternoon, in tasks largely self-chosen and of dubious educational value. If the school were synonymous with a play-house, the pleasure of the child would be a sufficient guarantee that a school of this kind was accomplishing all that could be reasonably expected. There is sound sense, however, in the assumption that the principal purpose of the school is not to amuse the pupil or simply to keep him occupied, but to train him. Judged by this criterion, the results of our public education are scarcely commensurate with the time and money spent upon it.

"Preparing for Life"

IF the school is to train for scholarship, the pupil must be brought to know the necessity of intellectual labor, and even of that unrelieved and apparently purposeless mental toil that seems mere drudgery. If the school is to make him a good citizen, it must impress upon him the necessity of subordinating his likes and dislikes to a common authority, legislating for the common good. Labor has always meant effort, and because we are mere men, still retaining the effects of original sin, effort usually calls for sacrifice. These are qualities not acquired in a moment, and acquired with extreme difficulty unless a beginning has been made in youth; but they are qualities imperatively demanded, if the boy is to become an asset to the State instead of a liability. The weakness of much of the "new education" in these precise points was admirably set forth in an editorial published in the Columbia State last September:

> If our lives never brought us face to face with duties other than "interesting," never imposed sheer drudgery upon us, never challenged us with knotty problems to be solved properly only by plain old-time hard thinking, then possibly the new theories would work. But the children of today are going to run against endless things to do that require disciplined will-power and a long ingrained habit of attacking and overcoming the dullest, most forbidding sort of every-day problems in life. What preparation for this is it, to ease them along in their young days, let them sidestep drudgery in studies, fill them full of the notion that it is the world's business to be "interesting" in all that it assigns them to do? . . . Keep some rough places in school life, require more or less hard work, and thus develop driving power.

This is not popular doctrine today, but by that very fact is its necessity made manifest. "Learn, nor account the pang," counsels Browning, "dare, never grudge the throe." In this spirit of "welcome each rebuff," Charles Francis Adams used to think that a boy's dislike for a study was a very good reason why he should be constrained to apply himself to it. "But," comments the editor of the Chicago Tribune, "our training nowadays leads us inevitably to the conclusion that we need not beat down obstacles or break through them. If we lie down before them without making an effort, and die in our tracks, that is all that is expected of us."

Johnny and Marianna

IT would be folly to expect much more from the boy who has been weakly allowed to reject studies which he finds difficult, and to choose such mental occupations only, as he may find congenial. This is not a caricature in these days when electivism is an accomplished fact in our academies and even in many grade schools. The school and the home are the boy's world during the most impressionable years of his life. It is nothing short of cruelty to give him a practical philosophy which must afterwards be essentially reconstructed to meet the demands of actual life, whether his ambition prompts him to become a coalheaver or a doctor of philosophy. Johnny has no taste for anything so low as vulgar fractions; he cannot even add. The conclusion drawn by the fond parent is not that Johnny shall be compelled to concentrate upon arithmetic, but that he shall be allowed to dabble with dry-batteries, since he has "a real gift for electricity." Johnny spells like Josh Billings; therefore he is allowed to throw his dictionary out of the window, and devote himself ad lib. to shop-work, for which he has "a perfect genius." The truth is that Johnny has a perfect genius for getting away from work, and his fond parents, with the aid of our present complacent school systems, are training Johnny to become a worthless shirker. Marianna-in-the-Eighth-Grade can concoct impossible brews and pottages in the school's model kitchen. She can, partly, trim feminine head-gear that is even more impossible. She can weave small rugs, the like of which were never seen on land or sea. She can mess up canvasses that would cause a futurist to curl up and die from envy. But her grammar is of a piece with her cooking, she adds up figures like Copperfield's Dora, and she punctuates on the bias. Her one small head cannot hold everything, and as Mr. Michael Friedsam, president of the New York mercantile house of Altman, has asked, "How can we expect our boys and girls to know the essentials when almost fifty per cent of their time in school is devoted to the recreational 'studies' which come under the head of 'fads and fancies?'"

Similar conclusions were reached by the Committee on Commercial Education of the New York State Chamber of Commerce, in a report dated April 26, 1917. To mention that this Committee has yielded somewhat to the magic spell woven by the highly-Rockefellerized Mr. Abram Flexner may not be amiss; however this may be, the conviction was recorded that "the charges of general inefficiency along the [New York public school] graduates were real and not imaginary."

> The mass of graduates did not have a working knowledge of the subjects taught, and had lost, or never acquired, those traits of personal habit and character that are essential to all business, and without which education must fail. The traits referred to are truthfulness, accuracy, thoroughness, promptness, cleanliness, politeness, and the like.
>
> These traits and habits should be concomitants of all education. . . . Their lack showed that some fundamental error existed.

How hopeless is the prospect for improvement may be gathered from the fact that this Committee finds the only remedy in the adoption of the mixtum-gatherum which in New York is dignified by the name of the "duplicate school method."

And Now "Concentration"!

ADDRESSING the Association of Urban Universities last winter, the New York banker, Mr. Mortimer L. Schiff, remarked, "One of the greatest faults that has come under my observation is that our young people have not been taught to concentrate. It is a pity that more stress is not laid on this factor in our schools, as, in my opinion, there can be no real efficiency without it." No teacher argues that training must be dull before it can be effective, and concentration is taught more readily if the pupil can be led to take an interest in a subject of real educational worth. Yet if our boys and girls are allowed to choose their studies because they promise to be "interesting," and to drop them simply because they find them "hard," they will never learn the truth of the poet's words that our fortunes must be wrought at a flaming forge. You cannot make steel at a cold blast-furnace. No more can you form character by the soft and spineless methods called, by a grievous misuse of words, "education."

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Who Is My Neighbor?

THERE was a time and an occasion when the framer of this question was merely half-hearted; he was partially poised for information and, to a certain extent, inclined to temporize. Now it is asked in a satirical sense with the intention of attracting to one phase of our lives the attention of the readers of AMERICA.

It is true that the question might have been more exactly put in this form: Where is my neighbor? Yes, where is he? Have I any in the good old-fashioned sense of the term? Am I not, surrounded though I may be by the 200,000 people of a thriving, throbbing, thrilling and thrilled Middle-West city, alone? Am I not more or less marooned in a sea of humanity, a stormy, shifting sea with whose moods I cannot successfully get acquainted because of their infinite variety?

Not Homes but Houses

THE American home is suffering from the operation of the inverse ratio. The more active, the more exacting our life becomes, the smaller the American home becomes. It has worked itself away from the ancestral home by degrees to the small city house, to the apartment, to the flat, to the suite, to the hotel room, to the "Murphyized" single room, where "Things are not what they seem." I venture to say that out of the 200,000 dwellers in the city of my nativity, 100,000 have no enshrined home-associations as their grandfathers had. I would venture further and say that less than that number would even wish for enshrined home-associations. They have no homes in the literal sense of possession. They have given years of their lives to the acquisition of that most easily exchangeable of assets, money. They have no house, they own no land, and mayhap have brought no children into the world. By means of a small monthly or weekly payment they have managed to get a place in which to stay the greater part of their time, but that place is not theirs. The fact of the matter is, to put it rather crudely, these thousands, by paying in dribs and drabs, provide places for themselves to stay a few hours at a time. We may have never thought about this. But an experimental trip with a shifter-from-place-to-place will be illuminating.

The Flat Dweller

HENRY Who-earns-five-dollars-a-day goes forth at 7:40 in the morning and catches the 7:41 at the corner. He pays the conductor five cents and is allowed the shelter of the car until he reaches his office at 7:55. Here he stays until the sun crosses the meridian. The inner man calls and his plaint is answered in terms of the restaurant bill of fare. Henry is allowed to tarry here a reasonable length of time because he is a purchaser. The meal fitly capped with a stogie, Henry goes forth into the streets of his city and my city for a stroll. It costs him nothing to indulge in this form of relaxation, for he does not stay. Were he to tarry, he would be urged to move on; and a disinclination to obey this urgent advice would lead to his arrest for loitering.

After all, this would be quite proper, for the city is not his and, after all has been said, it is not my city. Back to the office until 3:00, into the car, and out of it into the main lobby of that specific flat-building which bears his name in its row of mail-boxes. Henry is at home in this row of dwellings, and row, rhyming with hoe, by the oddity of the English language, may also be pronounced to rhyme with now. He ascends to his layer of the structure and there is greeted by his wife—merely by his wife and nobody else. Though this is what Henry is accustomed to call home, it is also—no paradox or epigram intended—an apartment. Henry may stay here without let or hindrance because he has paid his tariff thirty days in advance. His staying privilege is assured for that length of time.

Machine-Made Homes

IF Henry lives in one of those modern apartments which have been liveried and buttoned and servanted by efficiency, he becomes the temporary possessor of a mechanical contrivance, the like of which the world never saw until the dawning of the twentieth century. Tables, chairs, and similar furniture, are not his; neither are they what they seem to be. When the gloom of night comes on, transformation after transformation changes the uses and appearances of entire rooms. Morning light witnesses a precise reversal of the evening process.

Now, there is not the slightest objection to the advantages of modern appliances. Their day has come never to depart. It is useless to bemoan the comforting travel of the ox-cart when the automobile whisks the dust onto our doorsteps, and sends its perfume into our street windows. The gist of the matter lies in the fact that all that Henry sees about him, all that he uses, everything that enters into his daily life, save his clothes and his wife, is not his. His departure from this apartment and his return to it daily, mean nothing in association, save that his appearance is natty, and he says hail or farewell to his wife with a husbandly kiss. All other things are passing; they are temporary; in fine, they do not belong to him. He could leave them at any time, and no regret would fill his heart, for he could get others, perhaps even more efficient, for an equivalent payment. His life is a mechanical thing; it depends on machinery, and the machinery depends on others who own or operate it. He is not interested in the mechanism of the living process unless the dumb-waiter fails to respond, or the elevator boy loses himself in a book, or the plumbing persists in responding after demands have been satisfied. Henry, to sum up, is simply not concerned with those things which are not his.

Interest and Association

ASSOCIATION is not a cumulative and humanizing process, unless it is backed by ownership. To claim my heart's-core interest, a thing must be mine. To mean something to me, a home must be my home, or it is likely to be a house, a dwelling, or a place-to-live-in. I am enlivened to the very depths when something that my father, or my grandfather owned, comes into my possession. It carries a world of value which would mean nothing to the auctioneer on the block, but I am satisfied with it because it has meant something to others, and it is now mine and means something to me. I admit and regret that this is not a common sentiment. If it were I would know where my neighbors were.

EDWARD F. MOHLER, M.A.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Federation of Labor and the Switzerland Conference

PRESIDENT GOMPERS, of the American Federation of Labor, declined to send delegates to the labor conference to be held in Switzerland in September. This conference was favored by delegates from trade unions of Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Germany, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria. Mr. Gompers sent the following cablegram in answer to the invitation that came to America from President Lindquist of the Stockholm conference:

> The executive council of the American Federation of Labor, in session, after due deliberation upon invitation received from you and from Oudegeest of Amsterdam, Holland, to send delegates to a conference proposed to be held at Stockholm September 17, decided that we regard all such conferences as premature and untimely and as leading to no good purpose. We apprehend that a conference such as is contemplated would rather place obstacles in the way of democratizing the institutions of the world, and hazard the liberties and opportunities for freedom of all peoples. Therefore, the American Federation of Labor with its 2,500,000 members cannot accept invitations to participate in such a conference. If an international trade union conference is to be held it should be at a more opportune time than the present or the immediate future, and in any event the proposals of the American Federation of Labor for international conference should receive further and more sympathetic consideration.

This cablegram was transmitted to the labor federations of France, England and Holland.

Red, White and Blue Book

THE Red, White and Blue Book, "How the War Came to America," has been issued by the Committee on Public Information at Washington. It contains twenty-three pages of historical matter with the addresses of the President to the Senate and to the Houses of Congress. The position of the United States in 1914 is summarized as follows:

> (1) The Monroe Doctrine. We had pledged ourselves to defend the New World from European aggression, and we had by word and deed made it clear that we would not intervene in any European dispute. (2) The Freedom of the Seas. In every naval conference our influence had been given in support of the principle that sea law to be just and worthy of general respect must be based on the consent of the governed. (3) Arbitration. As we had secured peace at home by referring inter-State disputes to a Federal tribunal, we urged a similar settlement of international controversies. Our ideal was a permanent world court. We had already signed arbitration treaties not only with great Powers which might conceivably attack us, but even more freely with weaker neighbors in order to show our good faith in recognizing the equality of all nations both great and small.

The pamphlet outlines the events leading up to the entrance of the United States into the war. The state of affairs at the time of the delivery of the President's war message is explained and the course of the President and the nation justified by the recital of facts now known to all.

Tuberculosis as Deadly as War

AT the last session of the New York State legislature an important statute on tuberculosis was enacted. The attention of county Boards of Supervisors was called to this law by Governor Whitman, in his capacity as Chairman of the State Council of Defense:

> The experience of all European countries since the beginning of the present war has shown that the increased prevalence of tuberculosis constitutes one of the most serious problems of the war. The French authorities estimate that 150,000 men have been returned from the trenches with active tuberculous disease. The conditions in Austria-Hungary and Russia, and to a somewhat less extent in Germany, have been similar. In view of this situation and of the certainty of our being required to provide for our own tuberculous soldiers returning to their homes, the legislature has felt that every locality in the State should undertake to do its part and should provide accommodations for the care of its own tuberculous soldiers as well as its own tuberculous citizens. It may be noted in this connection that all of the institutions for tuberculosis existing in France before the war have been taken over solely for the care of tuberculous soldiers.

It is reported that as many Canadians have been killed by tuberculosis since the beginning of the war as have been killed in battle. Yet tuberculosis is a preventable disease.

Children's Play

THE report of the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor contains a plea for the continuance of public provision for recreation for the young people of our cities. The Chief of the Children's Bureau, Miss Julia C. Lathrop, made her appeal on patriotic grounds:

> An English authority has lately pointed out the demoralization to boys and girls caused by the breaking down of clubs and the withdrawal to the army of recreation leaders, and he has traced much of the increase in juvenile delinquency in England to the chaos in recreation activities which has prevailed since the war. This is a good time to remind ourselves that the continuance and development of all types of innocent and healthful recreation in every community offer a call to patriotic service for many who cannot go to the front. The strain and anxiety which are certain to grow in this country for an indefinite period ahead of us need to be counterbalanced by greater community effort to provide opportunity for wholesome play.

The need of safeguarding our children from well-meaning patriots who would burden them with farm labor or industrial work during war-time can be seen from the hysteria that seized upon some of our legislators at the beginning of the war. Before the war was five weeks old, four States gave officials or commissions power to suspend the labor laws during the war-period and only the Governor's veto saved the labor laws of New York State. To weaken the children of today is to harm the nation for the years to come.

Large Families and Longevity

THE Journal of Heredity in its July issue gives a report from Dr. Alexander Bell that will be disheartening to the preachers of birth-control:

> Those who preach birth-control are responsible for the idea that large families are an evil. This idea is false and dangerous. For the sake of eugenics it is important that it be not spread. . . . In Dr. Bell's table 2,964 individuals are dealt with. In 41 "only child" cases, a majority died young. The bigger the family the better off are its members, if survival beyond the age of twenty be the measurement. Small families make the poorest showing under all conditions; their members are handicapped at all ages. The larger families, those around ten children, make the best showing at all ages, few of their members dying young and many living to old age. If superior parents want a large family they ought not to be discouraged by the widespread but false idea that every child beyond the second or third is likely to be progressively handicapped. The really important factor in determining a child's vitality is not the number of brothers and sisters who have preceded him, but the kind of stock he comes from.

While the viewpoint adopted applies equally well to the stock-farm, here is crushing proof against the blatant birth-control advocates who constantly appeal to nature, while ignoring nature's God.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

JULY 28, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Conscription in Canada

George E. Roe

The "Via Media" Repaved

William H. McClellan

The Tradition of Holiness

Blanche M. Kelly

The Brave Sons of France

Barbara de Courson

The Red Cross and Its Antecedents

Thomas F. Meehan

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS for JULY 28, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 16

PAGE

CHRONICLE 387–390

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Conscription in Canada—The "Via Media" Repaved—The Tradition of Holiness—The Brave Sons of France—The Red Cross and Its Antecedents.....391–398

COMMUNICATIONS 399–401

EDITORIALS
"Rum, Romanism and Rebellion"—Doing Our Bit—How Shakespeare Puts It—Political Parties and Plutocrats—The Chaplains' Aid Association—Imitating the I. W. W.—A Dinner of "Yarbs".....402–405

LITERATURE—First Aid to the "Liter'y"—Reviews—Books and Authors.....405–407

EDUCATION—The Gary School in Politics..407–408

SOCIOLOGY—The Rural Apostolate: Catechism 408–409

NOTE AND COMMENT.....409–410

The Catholic Mind

Issue for July 22, 1917

AMERICAN CATHOLIC HISTORY AND RELIGION
THE AMERICAN ARCHBISHOPS' PROTEST
LUTHER AND LUTHERANISM
THE DANGERS OF "MOVIES"

THE value of the study and knowledge of American Catholic History for the exaltation and preservation of the Faith is shown in the paper by Father Tierney, the first, in this issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. The other articles, the protest of the American Hierarchy against the new anti-Catholic Constitution of Mexico; an authoritative list of readings on Luther, and a warning about the dangers of "movies" make up a selection judiciously combining interest and variety.

You cannot afford to be without these useful little pamphlets

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers)

Send us your Subscription at once.

$1.00 Per Year
Single numbers 5 cents each
For Parish Book Racks $4.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS 59 East 83rd St. New York, N. Y.

ST. MARY'S COLLEGE and ACADEMY

ST. JOSEPH CO. NOTRE DAME, IND.

Recognition by the Indiana State Board of Education

College—Standard; Normal Department—Accredited; Academy (High School—Commissioned) CREDITS accepted by the leading Universities

An institution where your daughter is assured of all the benefits of an exclusive school, while surrounded with all the comforts and protection of home life. St. Mary's is devoted to the development of the highest type of womanhood in the girls entrusted to its care.

Many features of this school of high ideals, its broad campus and well equipped commodious buildings, cannot be touched upon in the limited space of this announcement. The President, therefore, cordially invites correspondence from parents having daughters to educate, and will take pleasure in mailing an illustrated catalog and descriptive literature. Address the President.

ST. MARY'S COLLEGE and ACADEMY St. Joseph County, Notre Dame P. O., Indiana

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 16
WHOLE No. 433

JULY 28, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—On the British front in France there has been practically no activity. Further south, however, the Germans have made a number of vigorous assaults on the French lines from St. Quentin to Verdun; in none of these did the Germans gain any permanent advantage. In the Verdun sector the French advanced about three-quarters of a mile on a front of about two miles between the Avocourt Wood and Hill 304.

Bulletin, July 16, p.m.-July 23, a.m.

During the week the Russians in Galicia south of the Dniester have come to an abrupt standstill, and their efforts, for the most part unsuccessful, have been mainly concerned with holding the Lomnica River against strong counter-attacks by the Austro-German armies, which have been heavily reinforced. The Russians succeeded in taking several towns near Halicz, but were subsequently obliged to retire from them. Later they were forced to evacuate the town of Kalusz and to withdraw from it to the east bank of the Lomnica; they also lost Novica. The Russians have also been in serious difficulties north of the Dniester, where the Austro-Germans were at first partially successful in a battle fought east of Brzezany. Later, however, they attacked the Russians on a twenty-five-mile front in the same sector and drove them back west of the city of Tarnapol. It is said that the ineffectiveness of the Russian defense at all these places was due in large measure to the disorder prevailing among their troops, and in some instances to their actual refusal to fight at crucial moments.

The Administration Food bill, already passed by the House, was finally passed by the Senate on July 21 by a vote of 81 to 6 in the very much altered form given it by the bipartisan conference. The bill will now go to conference of the two houses in which the differences between the Senate and House drafts of the measure will be settled. It is expected that the House conferees will accept the Senate form of the bill without serious difficulty. The prohibition clause, which constitutes the thirteenth section, in that part which is admitted to be unconstitutional, will probably be amended so as to read "reasonable compensation" instead of the present wording, which fixes the price to be paid by the President for the distilled liquors which he is empowered and directed to commandeer.

The Administration Food Bill

An important addition to the first section was made by directing the President to appoint a board of Food Administration, consisting of three members, each of whom is to receive a salary of $7,500 a year, and one of whom is to be a farmer, actually engaged in the cultivation of the soil. The President's appointments are subject to confirmation by the Senate. Another important amendment, incorporated into the bill as the twenty-third section, provides for the appointment by the respective houses of a joint committee of the Senate and the House, consisting of ten members, three Democratic and two Republican Senators, and three Democratic and two Republican Representatives. The work of the Committee is as follows:

> It shall be the duty of said Committee to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditure of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress and the contracts relating thereto made by officers of the executive departments, on request, to keep said Committee fully advised as to such expenditures and contracts.
>
> Such Committee shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war with a view to safeguarding expenditures and shall report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress.

The bill confers on the President the power to control food, feeds and fuel, including gasoline and kerosene, and in particular to regulate, when necessary for effective prosecution of the war, production, transportation, distribution, apportionment and storage of coal and coke, to fix prices and establish wage rates for operators of such industries. It authorizes him to direct the Board of Food Administration to determine a fair price for wheat with a minimum price of two dollars a bushel, from the date of the passage of the bill up to July 1, 1919. It prohibits the use of a food, food materials or feeds in the production of distilled liquors, except for Governmental, industrial, manufacturing, scientific and medicinal purposes, and directs the President to take over for the Government all distilled liquors in bonded warehouses and to forbid the importation of distilled liquors during the war. It appropriates $2,500,000 for the rent and salaries of minor officials employed in the proposed food control and $150,000,000 for its general operation.

The Aviation Bill

The aviation bill, which carries with it an appropriation of $640,000,000 for the creation of an air fleet, passed the Senate on July 21 without a roll call. The two amendments which had been offered were rejected and the bill goes to the President in the form given to it by the House. Senator Hardwick's amendment, which proposed striking out the clause authorizing the President to make use of the selective draft to bring the aviation corps up to its full strength, was defeated by a vote of 66 to 12. The other amendment which was offered by Senator Owens and provided for the establishment of a Government commission to supervise the expenditure of the appropriation was also defeated. Details of the plans for the building of the airships and its personnel are not known, but it is stated that about 22,000 aeroplanes and 100,000 men will compose it. During the first year it is hoped that about 3,500 airships will be built and manned.

The Selective Draft

The second step towards raising the armies of conscription began last week in Washington when Secretary Baker blindfolded, took from the urn containing 10,500 capsules, each containing a number, the number 258. Seven other high officials also drew numbers, and then the clerks settled down to the work of drawing the remaining numbers. General Crowder drew the last, which was 3,217. The drawing has prepared the way for determining the order in which the 9,650,000 men who registered on June 5 shall be called to the colors. As a preliminary to this drawing, 4,557 local exemption boards had arranged alphabetically the names of the registrants in their districts, and assigned to each a number. The drawing at Washington determined the order in which men holding these numbers are to be summoned to military service, supposing they are found to be physically qualified and have not been granted exemption.

Most of the remaining work of selecting the first army of conscription devolves upon the State authorities. After the Governors have assigned to each exemption district within their States the number of men it must furnish to take its share in making up the quota that must be furnished by the entire State, a list will be made up for each exemption district containing twice as many names as will be actually required to make up the quota of that district. All those on that list must report for medical examination to test their physical fitness for military service, and they will be rated as accepted or rejected. Those who are accepted, if they claim exemption, must submit their case to the exemption boards. The final list for each district will be made up in the order in which the numbers were drawn at Washington. Thus all those holding the number 258, not declared physically unfit and not exempted, will be the first on the list.

Dr. George Michaelis, the new German Chancellor, called Field Marshal von Hindenburg and General Ludendorff into his first conference with the Reichstag leaders on July 16, the Crown Prince having left Berlin the day before. On July 20 the Reichstag voted without discussion the third reading of the bill providing for a war credit of 15,000,000,000 marks (before the war equivalent to $3,750,000,000), the minority against the measure being independent Socialists. The Reichstag also voted the majority peace resolution by a vote of 214 to 116, with seventeen not voting. The resolution reads:

The Reichstag and Peace

> As on August 4, 1914, so on the threshold of the fourth year of the war, the German people stands upon the assurance of the speech from the throne: "We are driven by no lust of conquest." Germany took up arms in defense of its liberty and independence and for the integrity of its territories. The Reichstag labors for peace and a mutual understanding and lasting reconciliation among the nations. Forced acquisitions of territory and political, economic and financial violations are incompatible with such a peace. The Reichstag rejects all plans aiming at an economic blockade and the stirring up of enmity among the peoples after the war. The freedom of the seas must be assured. Only an economic peace can prepare the ground for the friendly association of the peoples.
>
> The Reichstag will energetically promote the creation of international juridical organizations. So long, however, as the enemy governments do not accept such a peace; so long as they threaten Germany and her allies with conquest and violation, the German people will stand together as one man, hold out unshaken and fight until the rights of itself and its allies to life and development are secured. The German nation united is unconquerable. The Reichstag knows that in this announcement it is at one with the men who are defending the Fatherland; in the heroic struggles, they are sure of the undying thanks of the whole people.

Chancellor Michaelis in his first Reichstag speech declared that no parley was possible as long as the Entente Allies demanded the cession of any German territory. He defended the U-boat war on the plea that England by her illegal blockade had forced the undersea boat into Germany's hand, and amid the cheering of the members he declared that the Empire would use the submarine for the purpose of shortening the war. Peace only that guaranteed the inviolability of German territory could be acceptable. The German press was divided in its opinion of the Chancellor's speech, while the London and Paris press were unanimous in declaring that an early peace is now out of the question.

Ireland.—The Cork Weekly Examiner editorially analyzes the statement made recently by the Rt. Reverend Dr. Cohalan, Bishop of Cork, with regard to the coming Convention. The Bishop, says the Cork journal does not exaggerate the meaning or the importance of the assembly. Dr. Cohalan simply states that a convention has been offered by the Government, and is being formed to frame a constitution for Ireland, which would be accepted by North and South. He deals with the allegation that the delegates are not representative of the present feeling of the Irish people by pointing out that even if a new election took place, a minority nearly equal in number to the majority would assert that their views were not represented. He admits that the constitution of the convention may not be perfect, but thinks that it is better to give it a fair chance and reserve criticism until its recommendations have been made. Dr. Cohalan also indicates that the Convention will be engaged in highly technical work, not ordinary administrative work, and while its opponents are assailing its representative character, the men from the North are studying constitutional questions, so as to drive a better bargain.

The Bishop of Cork and the Convention.

In speaking of the policy of the Sinn Fein, the Bishop classifies under these four heads, the various positions possible under it: (1) Physical force, (2) abstention from Parliament, (3) attendance at Parliament, and, (4) representation at the Peace Conference on behalf of an Irish republic. The first, he rules out. Abstention from Parliament, the prelate affirms, would mean that Ireland would be governed without being represented. This would entail taxation without check and the passing of measures detrimental to Irish interests. The third possible policy, Sinn Feiners going to Parliament, would mean only a change of representation and would require a United Ireland behind Sinn Fein, a condition not yet reached in the country. The fourth possible Sinn Fein formula, an appeal to the Peace Conference, to secure an Irish republic, would mean, according to the Bishop, discarding the substance and attempting to grasp at the shadow.

By an order in Council the Government has prohibited either by publication or by speech the giving of any report of the proceedings of the Convention. Only reports officially authorized will be allowed to pass. Offenders are liable to punishment under the Defense of the Realm Act. On the day preceding the order, the Factionist, the Sinn Fein organ, was suppressed by the Government and its plant seized by the police. This seizure followed that of the Kilkenny People, a weekly Sinn Fein paper conducted by Edward T. Keane. It is felt that the suppression of the journal on the eve of the parliamentary election to replace Patrick O'Brien, Nationalist, is likely to assist the Sinn Feiners and prejudice any Constitutionalist candidate.

Mexico.—On July 20 our State Department announced that it had released for shipment into Mexico 2,700,000 rounds of ammunition bought some time ago by the Carranzistas and held in Texas. The request for the release was made by the Mexican Ambassador, Bonillas, and was supported by our Ambassador to Mexico, Henry P. Fletcher, who had come from Mexico to confer with President Wilson and Secretary of State Lansing. The reasons for lifting the embargo were set forth by the State Department in these words:

Embargo Lifted

> The Mexican Government represented to the Department of State that it was in urgent need of the ammunition and that it was absolutely necessary for safeguarding important lines of communication and to afford protection in the outlying districts to American and other foreign interests engaged in the production of war material essential to the United States at this time. Therefore, in response to a request from the Mexican Government, the Department of State has informed the Mexican Government that it will release for shipment into Mexico 2,700,000 rounds of ammunition belonging to the Mexican Government. This ammunition was ordered and paid for by the Mexican Government prior to the embargo on the shipment of arms and ammunition into Mexico, and has been held in storage on the border for more than a year and a half.

The Carranzista papers were enthusiastic in their praise of this act of the United States. The editorials, together with the statement of our Government, show that Carranza has little or no power in Mexico. The bandits are both numerous and active, especially in the vicinity of large cities. Villa is reported to be near Monterey and other chiefs are also in the field. Dispatches of July 20 reported an engagement between Mexicans and a small American border-patrol. Some 500 shots were exchanged across the Rio Grande, at Ojo de Agua, eight miles southwest of Mission. No blame is attached to Carranza on account of this skirmish. In fact, report has it that the First Chief is anxious to placate American opinion in order to get a loan of $100,000,000 from the United States. On July 14 there was a significant article on this subject in the Washington Post, to the effect that a group of Americans and Mexicans, residing in Washington, in the pay of Carranza, are striving to bring about the loan. Shortly after this statement appeared our Department of State denied, for the second time, that the United States intended to lend money to Mexico.

Since the beginning of his Pontificate, his Holiness Benedict XV has been keenly interested in Mexican affairs. He has followed events closely and has a remarkable grasp of the great problem, especially as it affects the interests of morality and religion. He has recently given new evidence of his zeal in the cause of righteousness by this letter to the Mexican Hierarchy:

The Pope and the Mexican Hierarchy

> To the Archbishops and Bishops of Mexico
> Benedict XV Pope
> To Our Venerable Brethren, Health and Apostolic Blessing.
>
> By many a testimony you are well aware of the deep solicitude with which Our mind, from the beginning, has regarded the trials to which the Catholic Church has been subjected in your country on account of the political convulsions and disturbances; and you know that, despite the great distance which separates Us from you, We are sharing your distresses and sufferings. The motive for addressing you on this occasion is your recently published protest against the new political Constitution of Mexico, promulgated at Querétaro on the fifth of February of this year. Indeed, we have read over and over, and as carefully as the gravity of the subject demands, the document published by your common consent. We see shining forth in it, just as We fully expected, your earnest endeavor to defend the Divine rights of the Church, your effort to safeguard the faith of your peoples, an effort so much the greater as the waves that tossed you about grew the more violent, and your deep-seated love of your country, whose prosperity, as you rightly assert, cannot be separated from the reverence due to the ancient religion. While your remonstrance abounds with sentiment which every fair-minded person must approve, every one must admit that it is based on many solid reasons, for some of the prescriptions of the new law utterly ignore the sacred rights of the Church, and others directly oppose these rights. Therefore, in protesting against the injury inflicted on the Church and the wrongs committed against Catholic interests, under the firm conviction of your duty, you have done a work, perfectly consonant with your pastoral office, and most worthy of Our commendation. Moreover, let it afford you consolation to learn that, in the midst of your trials and sufferings We abide with you with special tokens of Our fatherly affection, and that We shall leave nothing undone to encourage and assist you. In the meantime, Venerable Brethren, We exhort you, though you need no exhortation, to put on the meek spirit of Jesus Christ, the Prince of Pastors, so that, overcoming evil with good, you may show forth that magnanimity, that constancy, and that patience, which, now more than ever before, must abound in you. And since you desire above all things, after the restoration of the Catholic religion to its former splendor, that peace and order may again flourish in the nation, offer to God, as a propitiatory offering, the trials and sorrows which you daily suffer, that He may mercifully bring your desires to their earliest fruition. The Most Blessed Mother of God, who watches over the Mexican people from her shrine of Guadalupe, will not fail you. You may rest assured that, as at other times she often showed herself the solicitous Patroness of the nation, so, in this bitter extremity, she will soon lend her powerful assistance. In union with you, We shall offer Our continual prayers before the throne of the same Blessed Virgin. In fact, that there may be evident token of this union, We take pleasure in announcing to you, Venerable Brethren, that on the twelfth day of December, on which day the solemnity of Our Lady of Guadalupe is observed among you, We shall offer the Holy Sacrifice in honor of her whom you venerate with singular devotion under this title, and for the welfare of Our dearly beloved Mexican people. Make known to the Faithful of your dioceses what We have resolved that, by their petitions on that day, united with Ours, they may more readily obtain for their sorely tried country the gifts of peace and tranquillity. In testimony whereof, and as a pledge of Our fatherly benevolence, We lovingly impart Our apostolic blessing to you, Venerable Brethren, and to all your clergy and people.

Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the fifteenth day of June, the feast of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus, in the year 1917, and the third of Our Pontificate. BENEDICT XV, POPE.

The Mexican Hierarchy has reason to rejoice over the Holy Father's approbation of their conduct.

Russia.—The outstanding events of last week were the serious rioting in Petrograd, the progress of the movement for Finnish and Ukranian independence, and the resulting changes in Russia's Cabinet.

Riots in Petrograd

At midnight on July 15 the so-called Bolsheviki, who compose the majority faction of the Social-Democratic party, started two demonstrations against the Provisional Government, during which a number of persons were killed or wounded, but quiet was soon restored. Two days later, however, more serious disturbances began, in which armed soldiers and sailors from Kronstadt, other disaffected troops, and working men and women took part. While the people were gathered in groups along the Nevsky Prospekt about 2 p. m. rifle shots were suddenly fired against upper windows and house-tops, machine-guns began to rattle, and soon a general fusilade was going on, armed soldiers who had left their barracks being driven by the rioters to the side streets for shelter. For thirty-six hours the disorder continued, and before the riot was quelled by the loyal troops 56 people had been killed and 650 wounded. In a message sent to the Russian sailors M. Kerensky said: "It has been established without doubt that the disturbances in Petrograd were organized by agents of the German Government." Two attempts have been made to assassinate M. Kerensky.

On July 19 the bill establishing the complete independence of Finland from Russia was enthusiastically adopted by the Diet in session at Helsingfors, the capital. Before the bill became a law a two-thirds majority vote urged the immediate passage of the measure, and the Diet then rejected by a vote of 104 to 87 a proposal that the new law be submitted to Russia for approval. After the vote on the bill the Senate prepared a statement announcing its resignation. As that body had been appointed by the Russian Provisional Government, which is the inheritor of the Grand Duke of Finland's prerogatives, the Senate had now lost all local standing.

Independent Finland

On July 15 Ministers Tereschtenko and Tseretelli returned from Kiev in the Ukraine, whither they had been sent by the Provisional Government to investigate the movement for autonomy that has been going on in southern Russia. They came back with a declaration of Ukrainian autonomy, which Minister Kerensky had indorsed, and which the Provisional Government was asked to sign at once. A special meeting of the Cadet Central Committee was then called to consider the question, but the Ministers decided that, without breaking their oaths, they could not usurp the powers of the Constituent Assembly by giving self-government to the Ukrainians. It was argued that a grant of these concessions to the districts of southern Russia would encourage a score of other nationalities in the Republic to make like demands, which for consistency's sake would have to be granted. Then the Constituent Assembly would be faced by a dismembered Russia.

Ukrainian Autonomy

The Ukrainian question and the Petrograd riots brought about a shake-up of the Russian Cabinet. Cadet Ministers Shingareff, Finance; Manuiloff, Education; Dekrasoff, Ways and Communications; Prince Shakhovskoy, Social Welfare, and Steganoff, Acting Minister of Trade and Industry, all resigned on July 15, and on July 20 Premier Lvoff gave up his portfolio, and Alexander F. Kerensky took his place, also retaining the office of Minister of War and Marine. M. Tseretelli has been appointed to the post of Minister of the Interior, which was held by M. Lvoff, but will also retain his portfolio of Minister of Posts and Telegraphs.

Cabinet Changes

Conscription in Canada

GEORGE E. ROE

THE newspaper treatment of the Canadian political crisis that has been brought on by Sir Robert Borden's call for conscription is typical of war journalism. That is to say, there has been little serious effort made to deal with the various developments, which are interesting enough for all that, but every now and again something appears in a wholly detached way in a newspaper, reflecting somebody's idea of an incident to be emphasized. In such circumstances it was to be expected that as the most rigid resistance to the new policy is found in the French and Catholic Province of Quebec, sooner or later some one would find that the Church is the author of the resistance. And sure enough there have been articles bearing that message.

Of course it is not true that the Church has taken a stand, or that Catholics are in any sense united on the issue. Whatever English and Scotch Catholics there are in Canada will be found ardent in their support of conscription as they have been of all other war measures. The shorter the time since they left "home" the stronger their devotion. Amongst Irish Catholics there is a good deal of complication. A great many Irish Catholics went to the war, and their parents are disposed to play up to the war spirit, although the events of a year in Ireland and some happenings in Canada have exercised a disturbing influence. On the other hand, an anti-conscriptionist meeting has been held in the heart of the oldest Irish settlement in Montreal. Mr. Doherty, the Minister of Justice, who will have to apply the law, is an Irish Catholic. One of the most active supporters of Sir Wilfred Laurier in his opposition to the bill is another Irish Catholic, Mr. Murphy. Some of the Catholic Bishops have identified themselves, at one time or another during the last three years, with some phase of the war movement. But no Catholic Bishop has taken a stand in public against the war movement, and this is as true of Quebec as of the rest of the Dominion. Neither in Quebec nor elsewhere have the Bishops acceded to every request made, but they have complied with many, and have used their influence in what was then considered a perfectly proper way by men who, it is more than likely, before many weeks will be cheering on those of their partisans who proclaim that the Church is the enemy.

Some months ago a national service registration was ordered. In Quebec, as elsewhere, it was believed that this registration was a preliminary to conscription, and people declined to fill and return the cards. The Government then asked the Bishops for help. The Archbishop of Montreal brought up the question whether what was being done was meant as a preparation for conscription. He was assured, in writing, on the authority of the Prime Minister, that it was not, and on that assurance he and other prelates counseled the people to fill in and return the blanks. It is not clear that the advice was generally followed, for, as to this or some kindred matters, an Archbishop said: "My people do not adopt my views; they adopt Mr. Bourassa's." And Mr. Bourassa was insisting that, whatever might be the vigor of the denials, conscription was on the way. Among those who agreed with Mr. Bourassa rather than with their Bishop on this matter of political concern were a great many priests, especially the younger ones. But there was no sign of a disagreement between priests and bishop over religion. It was a political question then and it is not less so now, for although the statement is made in Parliament that the cards received last fall will not be used for the purposes of the draft, people outside of Parliament flatly refuse to believe it.

Another allegation is that Catholic Quebec holds back because France has opposed the Church. Undoubtedly it is true that the sympathy of New France for Old France was notably impaired during the years when the French Government was seizing church property, closing church schools and expelling Religious Orders, when M. Viviani was banishing God from education and eliminating the future life as a topic of general or particular discussion. In Quebec they felt badly about all that, felt hurt and ashamed that men of their race and language should be at such work. Quebec opened her arms to the banished priests and nuns. And, as a hint of the extent to which this conscription issue is a religious issue, let it first be said that the priests and nuns who were thus sheltered have shown themselves to be moved by exactly the same impulses as those they left behind in France. They are French, out and out. And the beautiful and touching thing about it is that the Quebec Canadians wish them to be so, like them to be so, and withdraw no jot of their welcome for those who, through unfitness for service in France, remain in Quebec. The preacher for the Lenten exercises last spring came to Montreal direct from the trenches, and his career as a warrior served only to increase the size of the throngs that went to hear him as a preacher. That is how much religion has to do with the opposition to conscription.

In short, French Canada, which is against conscription, does not and will not base its politics upon its religion. Those in the other Provinces of the Dominion who are of different race and different religion may ascribe to these differences the difference in political views, and this all the more readily because for some years past there have been local controversies in which race, religion, language and politics were inextricably mingled. Their saying so does not make it so, nor is the position any stronger because the Saturday Review, of London, England, falling back upon the method long familiar in the case of Ireland, affirms that the Catholics of Quebec have given way to an access of bigotry and threatens them with chastisement by returned soldiers as well as with suppression of their disloyalty at the hands of the Government.

The simple truth is that in Canada, as in every other part of the world, there are fundamentally conflicting political concepts; that for twenty years events have been compelling a choice between Imperialism and Nationalism; that those who are reluctant to face that choice, with all its implications, have temporized, made concessions to the requirements of the hour, and lived in hope that the vital issue might be avoided; that the Imperialists were in control of the Government when the war broke out and carried the country with them; that the Nationalists, taking shelter behind the voluntary principle, withdrew from the controversy for, as they supposed, the period of the war; and that this conscription measure raises the issue in so vital a way that the Nationalists must either assert their opinions or wholly abandon them. Just as Imperialist determination was strongest in the half-million or more British-born who had been in Canada only a few years or a few months before the war call came, so Nationalist sentiment is strongest amongst the French Canadians, who have been rooted to the soil of Canada for two and a half centuries. Between these extremes there are in Canada many varieties of opinion, and so little is it a question of Catholic and Protestant that several of those who advocate the enforcement of the new policy by the present moribund Parliament do so because, they say, if the people were allowed to vote on it there would be a majority against conscription. They may be right, or they may be wrong, but what is certain is that the Catholics in Canada are in a minority and could not defeat conscription if they all voted against it, as not all of them would.

The "Via Media" Repaved

WILLIAM H. MCCLELLAN, S.J.

WHEN the single force of unbound truth had borne the great soul of Newman straight on its tangent-path out of the circle of the via media, those of his followers whose progress was still half-centripetal found a new center for their orbit in the person of Pusey. The Oxford movement, true to the national trait proverbial of its components, did not know when it was beaten. It began to supply by physical activity what it lacked in logical cogency, and to assume proportions which thoroughly alarmed the Anglican Bishops. These worthy gentlemen, confronted with so new a phenomenon in the unsettled days of the sixties and seventies, did not know in this novel relation the benumbing and leveling powers of their own system. Hence they resorted to extreme measures, and supplied the infant "Anglo-Catholic Church" with a whole litany of glorious confessors, by their proceedings against Bennett, Lowder, Mackonochie and others. Later on—and first, it would seem, in practical America—the lesson was better learned, and the advanced rector was quietly left to discover that in the clerical meeting and the missionary society he could not insist on the same things as "essential" which were so presented from his individual pulpit, and that either his habits or his habitat must be somewhat reconsidered. But at the first it was not so; persecution was the order of the day.

It was the noontide of the combatant period that enlisted in the cause of Tractarianism in this country the powers of Ferdinand C. Ewer, undoubtedly one of the most sincere and forceful exponents of the new theory. The necessity of justifying his position to thinking men and women was apparent to him from the start, and his first effort to meet it was a series of sermons which he preached as rector of Christ Episcopal Church, New York City, and which were published in 1868 under the title "The Failure of Protestantism." A new edition of this work was recently issued from the publishing house of Mr. Edwin S. Gorham. The publisher's preliminary note informs its readers that "By a very general request it is now republished as it was originally written," and that "The value of the book lies in the fact that it has a living message for our own day."

The reader, finding within the same cover a memoir of the author by the late Dr. Morgan Dix, naturally begins at this source in order to view Dr. Ewer's work in its historical setting. Here he learns that "The sermons on the Failure of Protestantism . . . cost him a large measure of his popularity, and prepared the way for the more serious loss of his rectorship," and this because the said sermons were a "dauntless expression of unpopular sentiments." First-hand acquaintance with the text itself will probably prepare the reader to accept the fact more readily than the explanation. Such an unintelligible maze of contradictions ought to cost any man his influence as an intellectual leader. It would require a volume of double the size of the original to contain the briefest possible refutation of the latter's innumerable errors in plain logic and history. One grows weary of merely noting them in the margin. Even were space at hand, it is probable that the citation of some of them in an article like the present would cost any reviewer his reputation for veracity. The book itself must be read in order to believe it possible that any sane man ever seriously uttered such patent nonsense.

The main theme of Dr. Ewer's sermons, though really a popular apology for Tractarianism, is almost evident in their title. The failure of Protestantism as a religious force is depicted only to show by contrast that High Church Anglicanism is the true remedy. The third of the sermons is the key to the whole: it bears the title "The Anglican Church Fundamentally Different from the Protestant Sects." In proving this important thesis the writer plays his trump card. "Why is it," he asks, "that, as the Protestant denominations are mutually drawing together, and seeking coalescence in union meetings and the interchange of pulpits, our Church stands aloof from the movement?" Had Dr. Ewer lived to propound this question at any time since October, 1907, any of his hearers might have replied in the words of the German professor, "Why is it?—It isn't!" The famous amendment to Canon 19, commonly known as the "Open Pulpit" legislation, has put Dr. Ewer's strongest argument out of the field forever. The unanimous passage of that amendment by the entire Protestant Episcopal House of Bishops displayed these chief pastors in this interesting situation, denying the value of their own commission to any would-be teacher of their flock, thus removing from the Protestant Episcopal Church not only her raison d'être but even the essential characteristic expressed by her distinctive name. Surely, if Dr. Ewer could now return to his former field of labor, he would scarce recognize its aloofness from other Protestant bodies or its claim to any fundamental difference from them.

The reappearence of these sermons at the present time arouses curiosity. The mere fact of the recrudescence of this bit of middle Tractarianism, based thus largely on an argument which is unblushingly reproduced in spite of its now patent falsehood, leads one to inquire what can be that "living message for our own day" which can call up such a ghost at the risk of making any Episcopalian who is conversant with his own times feel that his intelligence is gratuitously affronted. Of course, a reprint offered to the public under such circumstances requires an introduction. This need is met by a "Foreword" from the Rev. Dr. Van Allen, Rector of the Church of the Advent, Boston. In a tone of dignified yet sincere charity Dr. Van Allen announces the work as being, in his opinion, a useful contribution to the recently inaugurated movement for the reunion of Christendom, which has gradually become reduced to an effort for the federation of Protestantism. At first, it is difficult to see the appropriateness of Dr. Ewer's sermons in such a cause. One naturally wonders, after the Protestant Episcopal Church herself, in 1910, made the first advance toward the rest of the Protestant world in the interests of "a better understanding," how other Protestants will now relish being informed that the Protestant Episcopal Church alone has failed to fail. However, at the very end of the "Foreword" Dr. Van Allen gives us the key to his anticipations of the usefulness of the message. Speaking of the projected reunion, he says:

> We Catholic Churchmen approach the problem, not considering what we must give up, but rejoicing in what we have to impart to our brethren who have equal rights to our own in the common heritage. From these we may receive much: inspiration from their zeal, their generosity, their piety, their missionary enthusiasm, their consecrated scholarship; new light, perhaps, on old truths, though no new truth, since the Catholic Faith is kept whole and undefiled in the Church's Liturgy. But we have to impart to them the Sacramental Life from the Altar of God, where the Apostolic Priesthood ministers the Pure Oblation daily, serving Christ, not in our way, but in His. (Page 15.)

Here, then, is the "living message" of Dr. Ewer's sermons; surely a consoling and inspiring one to Protestants of other denominations. We fancy it has its interest for Dr. Van Allen's school as well. More than three years ago the present writer, in the columns of AMERICA, ventured a modest prediction that the High Church Anglican would not find himself much at home in the ranks of the Protestant Federation movement. Evidently that prediction was not unfounded. Matters are not pursuing just the course that "we Catholic Churchmen" desire. To convert the vast body of Episcopalians to Tractarianism has long since proved hopeless; but it would be indeed a pity if Protestants of other denominations should also be incredulous. Therefore let Dr. Ewer speak again, and say to them:

> Lest you forget,—we have something to give you. Do not make the fatal mistake of neglecting to ask for it. It is true you have all failed; but never mind, we can repair all. We may indeed condescend to imitate your natural virtues, but remember that you are absolutely in need of our supernatural powers. We Catholic Churchmen hold in our hands the only hope of a reunited Christendom. Be sure to avail yourselves of it.

It is much to be feared, however, that the average Presbyterian, Methodist or Baptist will prove as unimpressible as the average Episcopalian has shown himself to be. The latter has listened for nearly ninety years to these assumptions of Sacramental grace, Apostolic tradition and ecclesiastical authority; but it has not taken him ninety years to observe that no evidence of their truth is forthcoming, and hence to decide to continue on his way and let the High Churchmen do all the talking. Even "persecution" has been relinquished, not as unavailing but as superfluous. The elasticity of the Anglican organization, born in the brains of Elizabeth's political advisers, has admirably stood the stress even of this new distortion.

But Dr. Ewer's antiquated volume has in very deed "a living message for our own day." Only the pity is that the promoters of the new edition have overlooked that message. Had they read it aright, and did they now proclaim it plainly, it would prove a far more valuable asset to Anglicanism. For it would prove a real attraction to Protestants of other denominations, and might end by making the Anglican system the very standard to which the Protestant Federation would rally. We would respectfully suggest that Dr. Van Allen and his associates approach their "separated brethren" with some such line of argument as the following: We Catholic Churchmen of the Anglican body have indeed something to give you. You must come to us to find Protestantism in its purest form. All of you—Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists and others—have made the vital mistake of holding to some positive doctrines which could be actually identified with your respective organizations as such. But we Anglicans threw off the last shackles of authoritative doctrine when private judgment spoke its final word in the Oxford movement. It was left to us to show that a member of our communion might believe even Catholic doctrine, provided he accepted it on his own authority; nay, that he might even profess ecclesiastical authority, if he first erected his authority to suit himself. A Presbyterian, Baptist or Methodist can always point to some positive proposition which his church as such can be said to teach. But we Anglicans labor under no such disability. No mortal man can now accuse the Anglican church as a body of teaching anything positive. One thing only is, and always has been, hers by corporate consent, and that one thing is a pure negation. All Anglicans are opposed to the authority of Peter's Chair.

Look, then, Brethren, to the rock from which ye were hewn. Remember that your mutual differences have only been superadded to your Protestant origin; that the name Protestant designates your only common note—opposition to Rome. And then behold, in wonder and awe, a Christian organization in actual existence which has nothing left of her own but this. Our system is the type-species of the genus; our private judgment is refined to chemical purity. Once within our fold, you may believe anything whatever except that Peter is the Devinely appointed shepherd of souls. Then will you be Protestants indeed. Look unto us, then, and be saved.

The Tradition of Holiness

BLANCHE M. KELLY

UNQUESTIONABLY there were saints in Israel. When God constituted it His "peculiar possession above all peoples," committing to it no uncertain revelation of Himself, to be carried like a flame through almost palpable darkness, it was made a condition of the covenant that Israel should become "a priestly kingdom and a holy nation." And within the confines of this nation He raised up His torch-bearers. He separated to Himself His priests and sealed His prophets. He called Moses from Pharaoh's court and David from his sin, and He sanctified Jeremias in his mother's womb, so that side by side with the belief in the unity and supremacy of God there persisted the idea of moral integrity as characteristic of the exponents of this belief.

"Holiness to the Lord," however, was peculiar to the Jewish religion. For even though here and there amid the gloom of heathendom there stood out men for whom Tertullian was to find the phrase anima naturaliter Christiana, Socrates, for instance, "terribly at his ease in Zion," Plato, "Santo Virgilio," Epictetus, or his disciple, Marcus Aurelius, their light, if it was not darkness, was at best but the twilight of the gods. The pagan pietas found no incentive in the pantheon, which was neither more nor less than the apotheosis of sin. Still, unmistakable as was the Mosaic revelation, it was not the fulness of light, and preeminent as was the righteousness of the Hebrew Saints, it was but a figure and a foretype. Men of God they were inasmuch as they were men of desires. They were holy as the temple of Solomon was holy, but the glory of the second temple was greater than that of the first.

But there came a day of fruition, a day of fulfilled prophecies, when the pen laid down by Isaias was taken up by St. Matthew, a day when supernal sanctity in the Person of Jesus Christ taught the world by what signs it should know His Church, and the chief of these was the holiness of its members. This holiness has been an unbroken tradition in the Church since the day Christ preached the Sermon on the Mount, and the continuity of this tradition is emphasized in a startling manner, even to us who know from our catechisms the notes of the Kingdom of God, by Father Kempf's work on the "Holiness of the Church in the Nineteenth Century," which has been translated into English by his fellow-Jesuit, Father Breymann. The author defines a saint as a person who, with the help of special graces, practises heroic virtue, the heroicity of which having been confirmed by miracles, is officially acknowledged by the Church. He reminds us that to prove her holiness the Church must produce saints in every age of her existence. And so she has done.

The unity of the Church of Christ has frequently been attacked, her apostolicity contested, her catholicity denied, but her incontrovertible sanctity confronts the sects like a bulwark. Every man, whether Protestant or freethinker, has a perfectly clear and definite idea of what he means by the word saint. Secondarily he may mean a madman or a fool, but primarily he means a member of the Catholic Church. He may regard the Church as "the scarlet woman" and her head as "the dragon of hell," but he is none the less aware that she and no other is the source and fountain-head of that strange, mad, incomprehensible, Divinely attractive thing called sanctity. A few years since a Methodist divine created a stir of amusement, an achievement which we need not begrudge him, by claiming St. Patrick for his particular persuasion; it is hard to decide whether this discovery would have brought the greater surprise to St. Patrick or to Charles Wesley. The Anglican plea of succession through St. Augustine was never meant as a denial of his membership in the Catholic Church, but rather as evidence in support of the Anglican claim to that membership. Without going into Luther's unspeakable ethics or denying that many non-Catholics lead lives of unblemished uprightness it must be said that Protestantism has produced no saints. Bunyan does very well as a literary curiosity, but his righteousness is hardly of the type we should expect to see confirmed by miracles, and while we need have no hesitancy in agreeing with Matthew Arnold that Wesley had "a genius for godliness," we are not thereby precluded from speculating as to what a warm and glowing thing this ultimately "methodical" genius would have become had it been nurtured upon the means of grace at the disposal of the Catholic Church. This barrenness would be pathetic, if it did not verge so close upon the ludicrous, an aspect which appealed to the clever author of "The Prig," when he wrote his ineffable description of an Anglican canonization, the commission being reduced to examining the "causes" of Charles I and Hannah More! All things considered, of course, there is nothing to be wondered at in this. I believe it was Mgr. Benson who used to thank God for the delightful inconsistency of so many Protestants who reject the doctrines of the Catholic Church, including the necessity of good works, and conform their lives to her standard of morality.

But there is a vast difference between this natural virtue and that described in Father Kempf's book. While not all those whose virtues are recorded here have received the official recognition of the Church, she is at least examining their reputed sanctity, and that, humanly speaking, is unmistakable. Beginning with the record of the "great sufferer," Pius IX, this wonderful book, a book to be read on one's knees, takes us through all the categories of sainthood. Here, for instance, is the child-saint, Teresa the Little, the Flower of Jesus, at once sister and daughter of the great Teresa, "the Colbert of the cloister." She smiles across the ages into the face of that indomitable child, Agnes, to meet the eyes of the Poverello of Assisi resting approvingly on her "little way." Here is that glory of the priesthood, the Curé of Ars, like St. Philip, an apostle of the confessional. Here the inexhaustible charity of Ven. Joseph Cottolengo merges like river with river with that of St. Vincent de Paul. Religious founders, like the Venerable Julien Eymard, Don Bosco, Blessed Madeline Sophie Barat and Blessed Julie Billiart, lead their battalions to the firing-line as did Benedict, Dominic, Ignatius, in other hours of need. As it was in the first ages when sanctity hid in the catacombs, dwelt in the quiet of Cecilia's house, and penetrated the precincts of Cæsar's palace, so it is now; it is crowned in the person of Maria Christina, queen of the two Sicilies; hidden and despised in Nunzio Sulprizio, the blacksmith's apprentice of the Abruzzi, little brother of St. Alexis; performs in an extraordinary way the ordinary duties of wife and mother. That the gates of mysticism are still in the keeping of the Bride of Christ is evident from the supernatural favors bestowed upon Anna Catherine Emmerich and Marie Lataste. In fulfillment of her teaching office the Church sent her saints, conquistadores of Christ, to every clime and to every heathen people, and Damien de Veuster left his Belgian home with much the same regret that Columba felt for his dear Derry and its "groves of white angels," to die in desolate Molokai like St. Francis Xavier on the island of Sancian. And then the martyrs, whether they fall by the thousands as at Damascus in 1860 or in groups or singly as in various parts of China and Africa, it is the same tradition that they take up and hand on, the tradition of the Roman arena, the tradition of Tyburn tree, the tradition of the Holy Catholic Church with which the Spirit of Holiness has promised to abide forever. Once more she is justified by her children.

The Brave Sons of France

BARBARA DE COURSON

THE influence of M. Maurice Barrès on patriotic and intellectual Frenchmen has been considerably increased since the beginning of the war. From the first he resolutely set himself to sustain and encourage his countrymen under an ordeal that was to tax their patience to its utmost limits. He has always preached perseverance, endurance and confidence. Even in August, 1914, when the future seemed so dark he, like the late Count de Mun, never wavered in his patriotic endeavor to ward off depression and discouragement.

M. Barrès is a native of Lorraine, a fact that intensifies his patriotism. Before the war, although not ranking as a typical Catholic writer, he earned the lasting gratitude of Catholics, by his vigorous appeal in favor of the churches of France, condemned by the separation of Church and State, to slow decay and inevitable destruction.

His last book, "Les Familles Spirituelles de La France," is, in many respects, a striking contribution to the literature of the war, already numbering many thousand volumes in the allied countries. Its indirect purpose is to emphasize that "sacred union" which is supposed to bind together French soldiers, whose political and religious opinions differ. M. Barrès carries out his program by quoting largely from letters written by Catholics, Protestants, Jews and Socialists. These letters all breathe a spirit of sacrifice, differently expressed, but deeply rooted and thoroughly sincere.

This spirit was born before the war, but it has been fanned into a flame by the magnitude of a conflict unprecedented in history, and is daily made deeper and stronger by the length of the ordeal and the tragedy of the sacrifices required.

It would be childish to conclude from the letters quoted by M. Barrès that all our fighting men are saints. We are even justified in saying that in some cases a prolonged war rather dims the notions of right and wrong and breaks down moral barriers. But while making due allowance for abuses that are inevitable, we may safely conclude from M. Barrès' book, backed by the personal experience of those who live in France, that there exists an élite, a chosen group of generous people whom the war has ennobled, purified and spiritualized in a marvelous manner. These men may be widely different in their politics and their social condition, but they are linked together by a golden bond of devotion to duty and of belief in spiritual forces.

It is a well-known fact that the world is governed by minorities. Christianity was founded by twelve fishermen; France may be remodeled on other lines by the élite to whom M. Barrès introduces us. Many of these have fallen, after sowing seeds which their comrades will develop and bring to full maturity and fruition.

Among the typical heroes to whom M. Barrès introduces us there are first, the priests, of whom 25,000 are now "militarized." Of these, some 300 are military chaplains, duly approved by the Government; the others are either stretcher-bearers, infirmarians or soldier-priests, who exercise their ministry as pastors of souls, while performing their military duties.

M. Barrès names a few of these heroes. A Vincentian who was stretcher-bearer in an infantry regiment, realized that the men whose chiefs had fallen were hesitating. He resolutely put himself at their head and led by their priest-corporal, the soldiers successfully mastered the enemy. The Abbé Remy, professor before the war in a provincial seminary, is mentioned for his "superb attitude on the battlefield." He started at the head of the first vague d'assaut and, by his encouragements, electrified the men. An Oblate was officially honored for having "taught his men to despise death." He was killed while rescuing a wounded soldier. Several Jesuits are also mentioned as having given examples of magnificent courage and absolute self-sacrifice. "I have," adds M. Barrès, "before me 156 official mentions of priests and religious gloriously killed in Champagne, September, 1915; 206, of priests and religious, killed at or near Verdun in 1916. I also possess the official texts of 3,754 citations of priests and religious, some of whom have been mentioned for distinguished services six or seven times." Most of them wear the badge of the Legion of Honor, the military medal, and the Croix de Guerre. M. Barrès, not a typical Catholic writer, freely acknowledges that these priest-heroes have learnt the secret of heroism from the example of Christ. Gilbert de Gironde, a young Jesuit, expressed the thoughts of all when he wrote:

> To die as a priest and a soldier, in an attack, while giving absolution, to shed my blood for the Church, for France, for my friends, for those who have the same ideal and for the others too, that they may be given faith . . . . Ah, que c'est beau!

A seminarist of Chavagne mortally wounded lay on the battlefield alone and unassisted for hours. He could still use his hands and he thus wrote to his family: "My crucifix is beside me; I am waiting for God's holy will. . . . I renew the sacrifice of my life; death is not so dreadful; it brings happiness. . . . Let your grief for me be silent, resigned, almost joyous." These soldier-priests all express the same thoughts. The sacrifice of their vocation evidently paved the way for other sacrifices. In their habits of detachment, fostered in the cloistered atmosphere, where they were trained, lies the secret of their "superb attitude" on the field of battle.

Among the Protestant chaplains and soldiers M. Barrès meets fine types of men, whose somewhat austere spirituality is vivified by a sincere faith. There are sixty-eight Protestant chaplains in the French army and over 300 Protestant clergymen, officers and soldiers, who occasionally officiate in the absence of the regular chaplains. M. Barrès quotes letters, written by Protestant soldiers, men of culture and education. These prove that the supreme trial which they had to face, found them brave and self-denying. More touching still is the prayer of a young Protestant soldier, who died at Amberieu. "Lord, Thy will be done, not mine . . . Lord, I fought to do Thy will. I offer my life for peace. Lord I pray Thee for my family; Thou knowest how much I love them. . . . Reward my nurses for all they have done for me, I am poor, but Thou are the Source of riches." One of these nurses, a Catholic Sister, wrote down the boy's prayer and sent it to his people.

Another Protestant soldier, Alfred Cazalès, was only eighteen. He had been carefully trained and, judging from his letters, was of a thoughtful and mystical turn of mind. Only three days before he fell at Boelincourt, the lad wrote to his parents that the war had brought him three valuable experiences: it had made him know men; it had made him understand the Communion of Saints, and the "unique and marvelous value of prayer."

Among the Jewish soldiers, whose letters lie before him, M. Barrès finds some, whose patriotic feeling is combined with a deep love for their race. Thus a certain Amédée Rothstein, who fought magnificently, and was made an officer on the field of battle, wrote to the Jewish chaplain: "If my life, which I look upon as sacrificed, is spared, after the war, having fulfilled my duty towards France, I shall devote myself to the unfortunate people of Israel to which I belong." Many Jewish soldiers are Alsatians, among them Captain Bloch, whose passionate love for his native province breaks out in his letter. His dream was to be among the fighting men to whom the captive provinces owe their deliverance from the German yoke. A dying Catholic soldier mistaking Rabbi Abraham Bloch for a priest, asked him for a crucifix. Having found one the Rabbi knelt by his side and held it before his eyes till they closed in death. A few minutes later, the charitable Rabbi was killed by a shell, breathing his last in the arms of a Jesuit, Father Jamin.

The attitude of the French Socialists in Parliament has often been offensively anti-patriotic, party spirit dominating patriotism. Among them were many anti-militarists, who however made excellent soldiers, when they joined the ranks. Those who were sincere in their objections to war, satisfied their conscience by the conviction that this war is just, Germany being the aggressor; others considered that it must lead to a lasting and definite peace. Pierre Genin, who, before the war, was a free-thinker and an anti-militarist, writes that he is sustained by the belief that his sacrifice will be of use to his children. Another Socialist, Edmond Lapierre, died the death of a hero at Crouy. He wrote some days before that he was still and would remain "a Socialist with a humane heart and generous feelings" but he recognized the sacred duty to be performed. Even the vain theories of "universal brotherhood," in which they still believe, do not hamper these dreamers in the stern fulfilment of their military duty. Captain Robert Gauthiot was a cultivated man and a Socialist. He managed his men by trusting them and often asserted that even those who were inclined to grumble became zealous soldiers if their officer appealed to their intelligence and generosity.

Among those whom M. Barrès calls les traditionalistes, we breathe a saner atmosphere. The Socialists, even when they fight like heroes, profess ideas that to Catholics are impracticable and dangerous; the traditionalistes represent the very flower of France. They are men, to whom generations of honorable, industrious and God-fearing ancestors have bequeathed a sacred heritage of belief and duties, which in no way exclude a clear appreciation of modern claims and necessities.

Among the letters quoted, are many that reveal a passionate love, not only for France, but for la petite patrie, the particular region to which the writer's family belongs. This is a distinctly French characteristic, with its roots in the distant past. Francois Baudry, a young soldier, writes that he will do honor to la Vendée by an exemplary performance of his duty. Pierre de Rozierès, a native of Lorraine, was in spite of his youth a thinker whose dominant idea was that "the war is a terrible thing, but a great grace." At Ablain St. Nazaire, he succeeded in "gaining three times more ground than he had been ordered to gain." He was then and there made a member of the Legion of Honor. "Before congratulating you, Lieutenant," said the General in command, "I must say, thank you." The lad bore his honors meekly, attributing them to circumstances and, still more, to the training he had received at home.

In August, 1915, he went home on furlough. Two months later he was killed in Artois. On him was found a paper that ran thus: "My God, I accept now with an obedient heart, the kind of death that it shall please Thee to send me, with its anguish, its sorrow and its pain." Before the war, Pierre de Rozierès devoted himself to literature. With the thoroughness and modesty that marked his character, he was learning his lesson, in order to enlighten others after he had mastered it. His views on the duty of landed proprietors are those of thousands of French traditionalists, whose lives in the provinces are little known to the passing stranger. He considered the presence of a château in a village almost as necessary as that of a church, that social order is the expression of God's will and that the château or manor house of a village, ought to be a source of good example and good advice; a refuge and a help. It is in doctrines such as these, not in empty theories impossible to realize, that the real soul of France speaks.

The Red Cross and Its Antecedents

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

CLARA BARTON is the patron saint of American Red Cross work as Florence Nightingale is the patron of similar British effort. In popular American estimation Miss Barton is regarded even as the founder of all Red Cross humanitarian organization for the mitigation of suffering from the effects of pestilence, famine and war. The fact is she had nothing whatever to do with the origin of the Red Cross Society. Her special personal connection with it is based on the fact that, in 1882, after much effort, she was able to start in the United States, a branch of the Red Cross Association that had been originated by the delegates of sixteen European nations, at an International Congress, held in Geneva, Switzerland, in August, 1863.

There was no Red Cross during our Civil War. Hospital and relief work then was done by what was known as the "Sanitary Commission." Among the helpers in this organization was Clara Barton, who, because of the experience she had gained there, and her enthusiasm for such work, was invited by the officers of the International Red Cross of Europe, after the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, to cross the Atlantic and assist them in their operations. When Miss Barton returned to the United States she labored for over a decade before she was able, because of official discouragement and popular indifference, to get a recognition for the organization here.

Mention of the Sanitary Commission as the relief organization of the Civil War does not derogate from the credit due the heroic work of the Catholic Sisterhoods during the same era of suffering. The names of Mother Angela Gillespie, Sister Anthony O'Connell, Mother Angela Hughes, Mother Augustine McKenna, Mother Monica Pue, Mother De Chantal Keating and their many associates from Emmitsburg, Nazareth, Chestnut Hill and Pittsburg are as much a part of the imperishable record as those of Lucretia Mott, Julia Ward Howe, Clara Barton or the others made more widely known by popular acclaim.

The inspiration of the Red Cross Association came from a philanthropic Swiss, Jean Henri Dunant. Horrified at the sufferings of the wounded at the battle of Solferino, in June, 1859, he wrote a book, "Un Souvenir de Solferino," describing the dreadful scenes he had witnessed after the battle, and urging a world-wide organization of civil societies to care for the wounded and to supplement the surgeons' work. The idea was well received by the Geneva Society of Public Utilities, and the agitation resulting from the translation of the book into many languages brought about the assembling of the delegates of sixteen nations at Geneva, for the International Congress of October, 1863. In the following August these delegates signed the Geneva Convention, a series of rules for warfare binding their nations to a humanitarian alleviation of the horrors of war. They did not make a direct provision for the organization of the Red Cross Society, as we now know it, but they made such a society possible by providing that each nation ratifying the Convention should have a national civil organization in charge of hospital aid and relief, and with privileges of neutrality, during a war. Fourteen nations at once accepted the Convention. This number has since been increased to forty-three, thus giving the rules the authority almost of international law. Since 1864 these rules have been revised several times at international conferences. The older generation will recall that at the outset no one ever spoke of the "Red Cross" when referring to the movement. The "Geneva Cross" was the term used. The Swiss national flag is a white cross on a red field. Out of compliment to their civic hosts the Geneva delegates adopted as the badge and standard of the new organization the white flag of peace with a red cross in the center.

The Geneva Convention was an international civic recognition of the old Catholic practices of the corporal works of mercy, and a long delayed protest against the destruction during the three preceding centuries of the fundamentals of Christian benevolence. The Red Cross badge itself can be likened to that which was the distinguishing mark on the habits and cloaks of the "Clerks Regular, Ministers of the Sick," also called the "Fathers of Good Death," founded in Italy by St. Camillus de Lellis. They were confirmed by Pope Sixtus V in 1586, and had for their special mission attendance on the sick and the care of hospitals. They were unquestionably the first real Red Cross nurses. St. Camillus died in 1614, twenty-eight years after founding his Order of Red Cross nurses. He established, during his life, sixteen houses of his Order in Italy and lost 220 of his nurses during the numerous plagues and wars of that time. Philip IV introduced the Ministers of the Sick into Spain. Father Andrea Sicli, of Palermo, traveled to Mexico, Peru, Brazil, to introduce them into South America. Father Perez, of Castile, after being superior of the Order in Spain brought the Order to Lima where he died August 15, 1770.

Nor are Catholic tradition and impetus lacking in the more modern agitation for army sanitary reforms and improvements in army hospitals. Nursing for fifteen centuries, from the days of St. Paul, was in the hands of Catholic religious and was regarded by them as an act of devotion both for personal sanctification and for the benefit of the afflicted. The popular name for the hospital was Hôtel Dieu, God's Hospice. The Reformation substituted Sairy Gamp for this in England until 1840, when a Quakeress, Elizabeth Fry, organized an "Institution of Nursing Sisters," but the impetus there for the rehabilitation among non-Catholics of nursing as an occupation for respectable women came with Florence Nightingale and the Crimean War.

Miss Nightingale was an educated woman of fortune who had shown from childhood an intense desire to take up nursing. When she visited the Continent, as we learn from her latest Life, by Sir Edward Cook, the chief attraction that Paris offered to her "lay principally in its hospitals and nursing Sisterhoods." It was the same in Rome. Finally she determined to devote herself to hospital work and for a training went to Kaiserwerth, an old town on the Rhine, where there was a hospital conducted by Lutheran deaconesses. She stayed among them several months. "The nursing there was nil," she wrote. "The hygiene was horrible. . . . I took all the training there was to be had; Kaiserwerth was far from having trained me."

Her friend, the future Cardinal, the then Dr. Manning, secured permission for her next to live among the Sisters of Charity, in Paris, and to study their hospitals and institutions. Of her experience there she says:

> The Catholic Orders offered me work, training for that work, sympathy and help in it, such as I had in vain sought in the Church of England. The Church of England has for men, bishoprics, arch-bishoprics and a little work. For women she has—what? . . . She gave me neither work to do for her, nor education for it.

Further on, Sir Edward Cook, in this same "Life of Florence Nightingale," relates how the special correspondent of the London Times, in the Crimea, wrote to that paper about the bad nursing facilities arranged for the British soldiers and the good fortune of the French who had the nursing Sisters:

> Here the French are greatly our superiors. Their medical arrangements are extremely good, their surgeons more numerous and they have also the help of the Sisters of Charity who have accompanied the expedition in incredible numbers. These devoted women are excellent nurses.

Immediately letters piled up in the Times office asking, "Why have we no Sisters of Charity?" Florence Nightingale volunteered to organize a corps of nurses, "including in the list of qualifications," as her sister tells us, "her sympathy with the Roman Catholic system of work." There were ten nurses in the first band she took out to the Crimea, and of these ten, five were Catholic Sisters of Mercy, under the direction of an Irishwoman, Mother M. Clare Moore. After this came the inception of the whole modern idea of non-Catholic war-nursing among English-speaking people.

In spite of these historical facts, we have Clara Barton, in her "Story of the Red Cross," telling the public that "Only, however, when Florence Nightingale went to the Crimea was a nurse for the sick or wounded soldiers ever heard of." Equally misleading in the face of the records of the Knights Hospitalers, during the Crusades, and of the medieval monastic hospitals, is the declaration in the "official publication of the Red Cross," the Red Cross Magazine for April, 1917:

> No one has ever told the frightful story of the wounded and sick in the wars of history. The plain facts are that the tale is horrible beyond all imagination. For there was no one that could or ever did care for them!

St. Paul appointed deaconesses to visit the sick and distressed. The Roman matron, St. Paula, of the fourth century, with her band of trained women nurses in Judea, laid the foundation of the nursing Sisterhoods of succeeding centuries. St. Vincent de Paul's activities come a little nearer our own time. The Reformation destroyed the great hospitals of the Middle Ages and disorganized their scientific care of the sick and distressed. The Red Cross program is a synthesis of some of the many Catholic ideals of charity, that were in practice for centuries, with a substitution of humanitarianism for the old Christian charity.

This is what Alvan F. Sanborn, writing recently from Paris to the Boston Transcript, says of the "White Swallows of Allah," as the Turks of the Crimea called them:

> The Red Cross Society, while more venerable than the feminist organizations, is a mere parvenue by the side of the Religious Orders. The humble Sisters by the admission of the very intolerant anti-clericals who erstwhile were bent on harrying them, have rendered services in this war that entitle them to the everlasting gratitude of the entire nation. They have adapted their nursing methods of late years much more completely than is generally supposed, to the exigencies of modern surgery and medicine, and, even where their training still leaves something to be desired, they more than atone for the lack by their incomparable fidelity and application. The white cornette of the Sister is probably the most comforting sight that ever blesses the eyes of the sick or wounded soldier. More than any other livery it inspires even the aggressive unbeliever with instant confidence. The soldiers wounded during the earliest stages of the war would have fared hard, indeed, in many of the frontier towns, had it not been for the nursing of the Sisters.

Blessed be the name of the Sisters and of the Red Cross too!

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

"South America's Catholicism"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for June 30, P. R. D. commented upon the religious life in Brazil, but in my estimation he is a little severe. The statistics of the population of the State of Sao Paolo as given for the year 1912 are incomplete and imperfect by reason of certain inevitable conditions and circumstances; for the population really exceeds 2,000,000, the majority of whom are Catholics, although they are not so practical and well-organized as American Catholics are. In the larger cities the churches are filled on Sundays, but in the cities of the interior there are not enough churches to hold the Faithful. This does not prove, however, that all Brazilian Catholics are faithful observers of the Commandments, for many who attend Mass on one Sunday, neglect it for two or three.

With regard to frequenting of the Sacraments, many Brazilians do not seem to realize the importance of the practice, and even neglect their Easter duty, but the people of today understand their Catholic duties better and there are well-founded hopes that Brazil will soon be a thoroughly Catholic country.

Regarding the wedding ceremony, people that are rich or that live comfortably are accustomed to marry in their own house and in the afternoon, because that is a long-established custom. Less well-to-do Catholics, however, are married in the parish church, but nearly always in the afternoon. I know many parishes where Confession is made and Holy Communion received, not on the day of the marriage, but the day before.

As for our clergy, about fifteen years ago in the State of Sao Paolo, there was only one bishop, whereas now there are five or six, though they are still too few to direct properly so numerous a flock. The Bishops are learned and saintly men, models of virtue, full of apostolic zeal and are working hard to better conditions. The people, generally speaking, are widely scattered, can be visited only once a month and have not many opportunities to hear the Gospel. Indeed there are parishes which should have ten priests instead of one or two.

The Brazilian people do not produce many sacerdotal vocations; and very few of the priests are the sons of the rich. On account of the similarity of language and the facility with which they adopt Brazilian customs, Portuguese priests are welcome, and they can get better results than do the Italian priests, who constitute the great majority of the clergy.

The parochial school, one of the elements which could most contribute to the development and preservation of the Faith, is sadly lacking in Brazil, because it is a young, unformed and unorganized country. The Bishops visit the parishes as frequently as possible, but some dioceses are so large that it takes four years to visit them thoroughly. My Bishop used to spend three months continuously in visiting one part, and after a week's rest would start out again. It is during these pastoral visits that people approach the Sacraments.

I once accompanied my superiors in this work, and I saw what it would take volumes to describe. In my yearly reports I insisted on two things: First, the dreadful indifferentism and strange religious ignorance that prevail in some districts; second, that the old are beyond reform, but the young can be saved. I knew some parishes that were entirely indifferent to religion, but, owing to the efforts of the pastors, all the children learned their catechism and the majority of the people became associated to the League of the Sacred Heart.

Brazilian people have excellent dispositions for practical Catholicism; the responsibility of so many wrongs cannot be ascribed to them or to the priests, but only to the circumstances that led up to this condition. The most religious States are Minas Geraes and Bahia and not Sao Paolo, but the need for reform and organization is almost the same in all.

The seed sown by the Jesuits long years ago still remains, even in the families who have the happiness of seeing a priest but once in two years. All the religious practices bequeathed by the Jesuits are still observed, but owing to the dearth of clergy some superstitions have gained ground.

As to Brazil's moral condition, in the larger cities, the immorality is dreadful, but is practised chiefly by certain foreign elements of the population. In the interior there are many lapses, as is natural, the majority of them, however, being among colored people.

Troy, N. Y. ERNESTO CANGUEIRO.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the issue of the Catholic Mind, for March 22, 1916, in an article on "The Church in Chile," it is asserted that "Catholics" have 863 priests in Chile." According to the "Catholic Encyclopedia," there were in 1905, 863 priests in the archdiocese of Santiago alone, and approximately 1,400 priests in the entire country. Statistics of Religious Orders for the archdiocese of Santiago are likewise quoted for the entire country. Here are the "Catholic Enclycopedia's" statistics for Chile according to the census of 1905:

	Clergy
	Secular	Regular
Santiago, Archdiocese of	451	412
Concepcion, Diocese of	99	91
San Carlos, "	86	69
Serena, "	35	64
Tarpaco, Vicariate Apostolic	14	30
Antofogasta "	—	—	Approximately 1,400

	Religious Orders
	Men			Women
	Orders	Houses	Members	Orders	Houses	Members
Santiago, Archdiocese of	76	20	905	120	29	1727
Concepcion, Diocese of	10	—	—	7	—	394
San Carlos, Diocese of	—	30	141	—	18	95
Serena, Diocese of	—	—	—	—	—	—
Tarpaco, Vicariate Apostolic	—	4	24	—	5	50
Antofogasta, Vicariate Apostolic	—	—	—	—	—	—

	Catholic Population
Santiago, Archdiocese of	1,600.000
Concepcion, Diocese of	835,790
San Carlos, "	371,856
Serena, "	250,000
Tarpaco, Vicariate Apostolic	106,215
Antofogasta "	44,805
Total	3,208,666

As the foregoing figures are twelve years old, no doubt Chile's Catholic statistics are now more encouraging still.

Balboa, C. Z. F. L. MANEY.

Chaplains for the New Army

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Chaplains in the new American army are of three kinds. First, there are chaplains for the hospital-units, many of whom have gone to France. Of thirty-eight hospital-unit chaplains, only one is a Catholic priest. This disproportion is due, not to discrimination on the part of the Government; but to lack of initiative on the part of individual priests. The second class is composed of regular and conscript army chaplains. Owing to the fact that the Bishops have placed this matter, so far as Catholics are concerned, under the efficient management of Father O'Hern, C.S.P., thirty-eight per cent of these chaplaincies will be under Catholic jurisdiction. The third class is made up of those in the National Guard, that is, in the State regiments, federalized, and now to all intents and purposes part of the Regular Army. These regiments, or rather their commanders, pick out their own chaplain. The Governor of the State makes the appointment, but he selects the man whose name is sent him by the commander as representing the men. These chaplains become Regular Army chaplains just as the troops become regular soldiers at the moment of federalization.

I am certain that a number of these regiments could secure Catholic chaplains very easily, but unless some effort is made by individual priests these places will go to ministers of other denominations who are seeking them earnestly. The preponderating number of Catholic boys in so many of these regiments makes it an easy thing for a priest to be chosen. In not a few cases the commanders are Catholics, which makes the matter still easier of accomplishment. Our boys should be told to ask for Catholic chaplains, and our priests must not let any false modesty withhold them from pushing themselves near to the souls of the boys going forth to die for all of us.

St. Louis. L. J. KENNY.

"No Priests in the Trenches!"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In two recent numbers of AMERICA I noticed articles in regard to priests in the trenches in France. I have in mind particularly the first letter, signed by George Brennan and published in AMERICA for June 30, 1917. I quite agree with Mr. Brennan in his statement that "If our Catholic young men are to fight shoulder to shoulder with the Allies, then we must insist that the French priest be taken from the ranks and the trenches and put where he belongs."

Viviani, who recently shed tears over the tomb of Washington, but who, a few years ago in the Chamber of Deputies of France, in connection with the outrageous persecution of the Catholic Church by the atheistic French Government, proclaimed: "We have extinguished the lights of Heaven and legislated God out of existence," is a factor in the present French Government which must be reckoned with. The soldiers in the United States army are approximately forty per cent Catholic. It is stated that we are at war, among other reasons, to fight for liberty. This being so, it means that we are fighting for true liberty and true democracy, a liberty in the enjoyment of which every man in every country which may be affected by this war shall be free to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, and that governments shall not be permitted to persecute any church nor the members of any church. For instance, we are not in this fight for the sort of liberty from which the poor Mexicans now suffer under Carranza. True liberty is only consistent with the ministers of religion following their duties as ministers and not as laymen. If reports be true, many of our soldiers are already in France and many of them will soon be in the trenches. Of this many, at least forty per cent are Catholics. These men are going to fight for the sort of liberty which we understand and which is represented by the Stars and Stripes; they are concerned, therefore, not merely in having as many priests as possible to administer the Sacraments of the Church to them, but they are also concerned that the French Catholics, the Irish Catholics, the Canadian Catholics, the English Catholics, the Australian Catholics, and all Catholics who are fighting with them and on their side, shall, to the greatest extent possible, have the services of Catholic priests, not as soldiers but as priests. They are also concerned that the French people at home shall not be deprived of the services of the Catholic priests, and that Catholic priests shall not be dragged from their churches to serve, as soldiers, at the front.

Now I have the following practical suggestion to make: Let the Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops of the United States (the Hierarchy of the United States) unite in a brief statement as to what the present Government of France has done against the Catholic Church, and how it has taken and is taking, from their vocation as priests, the French priests to put them in battle as laymen. Let them record their objection to this course and let them appeal, as a body, to the President and Congress of the United States and to the Secretary of State of the United States, urging them to use their good offices to request that this course on the part of the French Government cease, and that French Catholic priests, except to the extent that they may act as chaplains, be relegated to their proper offices and to their churches in France, as Catholic priests, to the end that there they may render their best and proper services to God and to their country.

St. Louis. PAUL BAKEWELL.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The latest communication on the subject of "Let Them Get Acquainted," appearing in the issue of July 14, is to my mind highly irreverent, causing me to wonder that it was allowed in print. If the colleges and convents of this country are going to be guided by such Catholics as S. E. from Baltimore, it may be safe to predict that there will be as many mixed marriages as ever before. Girls and boys in their teens are scarcely able to choose their life partners and their impulsive affections may lead to even worse blunders than unhappy alliances. What may be the result of these early associations may be gathered from the experiences of a principal in one of our high schools "somewhere in America," where the number of clandestine marriages became the talk of the town. Respectable Protestants would no longer risk their daughters' reputation at that school, and, sad to say, in a nearby Catholic college one young man was suspended for a worse offense. In the name of public and private experience please let this loose and undignified discussion cease.

If Mr. Spearman and those who applaud his utterances have done any good, may we not also fear for the chain of wrongdoing they may have to answer for? Let us hear no more wailing about lost vocations and unhappy marriages when the casting of our young people upon the altar of the world and sensuality long before they have the moral strength to combat its evil, is advocated by those who ought to know better. Those who have suffered from unreasoning parents and the rigor of the Old-World traditions could have gone their own way after they were of age had they had sense enough to plan a life for themselves. Besides had they prayed, God would have directed them to a sphere of happiness in spite of their parents' ideas.

Neither European traditions nor the narrow-mindedness of certain religious teachers need be the absolute guide for young people. Our Blessed Mother, the one great model put by God Himself before Catholic womanhood, should be studied more carefully and devoutly; there is nothing in her life which every good woman cannot safely and advantageously imitate.

I know one young girl who was satisfied with a friendship for her religious teacher during her boarding-school days at a prominent convent. After she left school she met an unbaptized man who fell desperately in love with her because of her innocence and purity. She told him frankly that all his hopes were vain, for no non-Catholic would ever dare to ask her widowed mother's consent to a mixed marriage. Courage is singularly magnetic, and he loved her all the more for her stand. Finding her inflexible, he determined to look into the teachings of the Catholic Church, and before the end of a year was a member of the fold. The Jesuit Father who instructed him was convinced that he required only the noble attitude of this unsophisticated convent-girl to bring him to the Faith. Another daughter of the family began very early to "get acquainted" and has blundered wofully. Her choice is a failure.

God loves innocence and never fails to provide for those who keep it. "I have been young and now I am old: yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread" (Ps. xxvi:25). "The law of his God is in his heart: none of his steps shall slide" (Ps. xxvi:31). "Keep innocency and look to the thing that is right."

Clayton, Mo. O. L. S.

What Ireland Wants

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am a little disappointed by Mr. O'Kelly's article in AMERICA on "What Ireland Wants." I think a better title would have been "What Ireland Should Want." I had hoped after reading the bill of contents on AMERICA's cover to find a statement of present conditions in Ireland, such that from it one could gather what the majority view is, whether for absolute independence with separation, a colonial status with autonomy, or what not. It seems to me that, for us Americans of Irish birth or ancestry, the real question is: What does the Irish people want? Is the Irish people—a majority that is—Sinn Fein? Is it Nationalist? All are agreed that the Irish people should have a free national life. All are seemingly not agreed as to what is necessary for this. What is the majority view?

Cannot somebody tell us what the Ireland of today does want, not what she should or might want? We know the arguments for Sinn Fein and the arguments for Nationalist Home Rule, and we don't know which represents the view of most Irishmen.

When we know that, we are getting somewhere toward a basis of union among ourselves in America, so far as our sympathies with Ireland are concerned. I came here twenty-five years ago with the views of a Home Ruler of Parnell's day. Now some of my Sinn Fein friends as good as hold me traitor because I still lean to those views. Do they or I represent Irish opinion today—that is what I want to know? Cannot somebody tell me?

Mr. Vernon, N. Y. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As an Irishman, who, when in the land of his birth, did "his bit," as the popular phrase has it, for the land of his birth, and who as a consequence later found himself on American soil, I should like to voice Ireland's claim, distinctive and inalienable, for a complete severance from England, and for a government of her own, republican in form and fact.

Mr. Shane Leslie has recently set forth his views in AMERICA on the proposed convention, which has for its ostensible purpose to settle the Irish difficulty, but in reality is doomed to fail and to discredit Ireland in the eyes of the world. Among other things he says: "America has not allowed a referendum on peace or war. I do not believe it to be any wiser to give Ireland a referendum as to whether she wishes to be a republic or not." No sane individual would expect England to accede to this, with her monarchical government and institutions. As Mr. Gladstone said during Sir Charles Dilke's republican agitation, "The English people dearly love a lord."

To understand the "Irish question," the fact must be borne in upon the minds of those who address themselves to it, that Ireland is not England, and that the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" exists only on paper. Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst put it well, though contemptuously, when he said: "The Irish are aliens in blood, language and religion." National sentiment is indestructible, and England's policy has been to recognize it in Poland and, recently, in Belgium. In the past she recognized it for sinister purposes, in Italy, when she fostered and sheltered Mazzini in all his conspiracies in London; and deified Garibaldi when he landed on her shores; but in India it is ignored, as in Ireland. Further on Mr. Leslie writes to the point in the following: "I believe it would be a master-stroke on England's part to accept an Irish republic; for the first business of an Irish republic would be to effect a defensive alliance with England against the occupation of Ireland by a foreign foe."

The avowed purpose of this country in declaring war against Germany has four objects set forth: the end of autocracy; freedom for small nations; advancement of democracy; and a permanent peace. Assuredly, permanent peace would be an idle dream if, after terms of peace are reached, the independence of oppressed nations is ignored, for a recrudescence of conflicts will follow, ending in other appeals to the arbitrament of war. No lapse of time, however long, can legitimize or condone a moral wrong. England's grip on Ireland is one of conquest, of brute force. At the present moment she has a garrison of 150,000 soldiers in the Island to overawe the populace, though she needs them at the front, badly. She dares not attempt conscription, fearing another rebellion. Since the first landing of the English on Irish soil twenty-one generations of the Irish race have come and gone; and each, to its last breath, has protested against foreign usurpation; the present generation in no uncertain terms proclaims the same uncompromising doctrine. In all history no record of so consummate a failure in government is seen. Is it to go on indefinitely, or is this war for democracy to end it? Cardinal Newman's views on the subject are well worth noting. Writing to Mr. J. H. Mozley, October 20, 1882, he says:

> I am anything but a politician, whether in grasp of principles or knowledge of facts. As to Ireland, judging by what I saw in Ireland twenty years ago, the question between the countries was not one of land or of property, but of union.
>
> Cromwell and others have, by their conduct to the Irish, burned into the national heart a deep hatred of England, and if the population perseveres, the sentiment of patriotism and the latent sense of historical wrongs will hinder even the more rational, and calm judging, the most friendly to England, from separating themselves from their countrymen. They are abundantly warm-hearted and friendly to individual Englishmen, of that I have a clear experience in my own case, but what I believe, though with no large experience to appeal to, is, that there is not one Anglophilist in the nation.
>
> Observe, Gladstone the other day, at Leeds, complained of the little support given by the middle classes and gentry in Ireland. I think it was at the time of the Fenian rising that the Times had an article to the same effect. Gladstone seemed to think them cowards; no, they are patriots!
>
> I knew, when in Ireland, one of the leaders of the Smith O'Brien movement in 1848; his boast was that from Henry II's time the people had never condoned the English occupation. They had by succession of risings, from then to now, protested against it.
>
> Our rule has been marked by a persistent forcing on them of English ways. Such, I suppose, was our law of property, founded on the feudal system, instead of their own communism.
>
> About this I know very little. What I do know is the stupid forcing on their Catholicism our godless education. Since 1845 all English parties have been resolved that primary education in Ireland should be without religion except that . . . the Bible without comment should be allowed in the primary. . . . But to conclude, I can but say, we are suffering partly from delicta majorum, partly from our own. (Ward, "Life of John Henry Cardinal Newman," Vol. II, p. 517.)

On another occasion replying to a letter of the English Jesuit, Father Hopkins, he wrote:

> Your letter is an appalling one, but not on that account untrustworthy. There is one consideration, however, which you omit. The Irish Patriots hold that they never have yielded themselves to the sway of England, and therefore have never been under her laws, and never have been rebels.
>
> This does not diminish the force of your picture, but it suggests that there is no help, no remedy. If I were an Irishman, I should be (in heart) a rebel. Moreover, to clinch the difficulty, the Irish character and tastes [are] very different from the English (Ibid. p. 527).

In estimating the above extracts, it should be remembered that the Cardinal was considered in politics to be a Tory. No man was prouder than he of being an Englishman.

Oakland, Cal. THOMAS F. MARSHALL.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.
Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.
Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

"Rum, Romanism and Rebellion"

AT the close of the presidential campaign of 1884, Mr. James G. Blaine received a delegation of Protestant clergymen in New York. One of these clerical gentlemen was unhappy enough to instance the ruin wrought in civic life by the combined influence of "Rum, Romanism and Rebellion." What happened to Mr. Blaine in that election is now a matter of history.

The modern New York representative of the Rev. Samuel Burchard of triple R fame, is the New York Times. Arrayed against the powers that hold sway over this fair city, says the Times, in the issue for July 15, are the Catholics, the Germans and the saloon-keepers. Inferior to Dr. Burchard in alliterative ability, the New York Times' President, Adolf Ochs, in other respects is his worthy fellow. Any discussion of Germans and saloon-keepers is foreign to this examination. As to "the Catholics," says the Times, referring to them as though they were an alien people, or a rare species of bug, they are wrought up because of the Charities "Investigation," which grew out of the City's "insistence on the right to examine the books of the Catholic institutions subsidized by the City."

This statement may be simple and unadulterated ignorance. It is more closely connected, however, with those Arabian utterances which when offered seriously, are usually characterized by the short and ugly word. In at least three respects, is it contrary to the truth. First, it insinuates that the "investigation" was confined to the "Catholic institutions" when, in point of fact, the majority of the homes criticised were not Catholic but non-Catholic institutions. Second, there are no "subsidized" institutions in New York. The City commits certain charges to a variety of New York homes, hospitals and asylums. In return for services rendered, it pays, not the whole, but part of the cost. There is no "subsidy" here, unless we admit that Mr. Ochs is "subsidized" when he rakes in a penny for a copy of his paper, or Mr. Prendergast when he draws his salary from the City, or the Ritz-Carlton when it collects a hotel bill. Finally, the City's "insistence on the right to examine the books of the Catholic institutions," was not the occasion of the Strong "Investigation," nor did that right fall under the scrutiny of the remarkable Commission, for it is a right continually exercised by the City and freely acknowledged by the institutions, Catholic and non-Catholic.

Is the Times anxious further to emulate the example of Dr. Burchard? If so, it should retain the slogan Rum, Romanism and Rebellion. Pleasant memories cluster around those three words.

Doing Our Bit

THE story is told of a young physician who, after a few years in a factory town, had worked up an excellent practice among penniless patients. "I'm not getting along at all," he wrote his father, "I'm not doing a thing"; and in some alarm, the father left the plow in the furrow, and hastened to the discouraged disciple of Esculapius. It so happened that he came upon the young man as he was "taking his morning" at a free dispensary, and he sat by, a silent but intensely-interested spectator, while twenty-five poor unfortunates received help for their sick bodies, and a kindly word for their depressed souls. The physician forgot his visitor, as he bent his skilled energies to his work of mercy, but hardly had the door closed upon the last patient, when the old man burst forth "Son, what do you mean! You wrote me that you weren't doing anything. Why, if I had helped twenty-five people in a whole year, as much as you have in a single morning, I would thank God that my life counted for something."

"But father," countered the young man, somewhat abashed. "There isn't a cent of money in it. I do this work free, and most of my other work too, if it comes to that."

"Money!" shouted the old man scornfully. "What is money in comparison with being of use to your fellowman? You keep at this work, and I'll go back to the farm, and gladly labor to support you as long as you live; yes, and I'll sleep sound every night, because I have helped you to help others."

Perhaps the story is trite, and no credit can be given here, because it is told on an old unmarked newspaper clipping, yellowing with age. The moral is plain enough. Rightly do the ascetics counsel us to work and pray for a small opinion of ourselves. On the other hand, it is well to reflect from time to time on the good we do and on the greater good, possible to us, but left undone, simply because we "don't think of it." Perhaps we can't do much to lighten our brother's burden, but few of us are so poor that we can do nothing at all. "Give what you have," says Longfellow, "it may be better than you dare to think," and give it now. A kind word in the living present will be more appreciated by your neighbor than a wreath of flowers on the mound above his grave.

How Shakespeare Puts It

THAT amiable predisposition to interpret kindly the words and deeds of others, which should be conspicuous in the better portion of the human race, Shakespeare beautifully calls "The merciful construction of good women." Whatever their social position may be, the poet's "good women" are the true ladies of the land, for they are skilled in passing kind judgments on the actions of their fellow-pilgrims, because they are feelingly aware how much they themselves stand in need of others' "merciful construction." "Good women" realize that most of their neighbors' deeds are open to at least two interpretations, so they exercise their ingenuity in finding the kinder one. They have learned by experience that the lenient judgment is likely to be the more correct. They are fond of likening the doings of others to quadratic equations of the second degree, which bear, as is well known, both plus and minus signs, and they are content with a solution of the problem that gives the value of plus only. "Good women" moreover in their eagerness to place a "merciful construction" on whatever happens, always keep in mind Burns's excellent counsel:

> Then gently scan your brother man,
> Still gentler sister woman;
> Though they may gang a kennin wrang,
> To step aside is human:
> One point must still be greatly dark
> The moving why they do it;
> And just as lamely can ye mark
> How far, perhaps, they rue it.

Finally, "good women" realize that by neglecting to cultivate the habit of putting a "merciful construction" on others' words and actions, they do themselves even more harm than they do the neighbor. Constant, unkind thoughts sour and embitter the heart, ruin a winning and attractive disposition, and thus seriously lessen the beneficent influence that "good women" can exert.

Political Parties and Plutocrats

WITHIN recent years, the term "politics" has assumed a malign meaning, and to call a man a "politician" is to furnish grounds well-nigh sufficient for a libel suit. It was not always so. Washington was a politician, if one ever existed, and so were Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, Adams and Lincoln. That evil has arisen from partisanship in national and local campaigns, as well as from unworthy aims fostered by party leaders, is clear enough. The "muck-rakers" of the last ten years have never allowed us to forget it. Yet in the system of political parties, as it exists in the United States, there is far more good than evil. Without vigorous political parties, constitutional government, as we understand it, would be impossible.

Where legislators, executives, and so many judges are chosen directly or indirectly by popular vote, the will of the majority must inevitably be reflected in our laws, their application and interpretation. But American government operates under a series of checks and balances, not the least useful of which, although not clearly foreseen from the beginning, are strong political parties. Without an unsparing opposition to keep close watch on the party in power, to expose its errors, and place the responsibility where it belongs, an elective government would soon degenerate into something like an autocracy. Responsible only to self-perpetuating leaders, it would become the apotheosis of what has been aptly styled "invisible government."

Of late, the once clearly-defined party lines have become somewhat blurred. The change is good, if it means that there is a growing independence of hand-picked party leaders and of political "platforms" built to sustain illegal private interests. If it means that influences are at work, powerful enough to disregard all party differences, because through patronage or by direct financial methods they can control all parties, the outlook for representative government is discouraging. Better far to trust a well-defined political party which can be held responsible for any malfeasance, than to surrender to Foundations, steely or oleaginous, responsible to no group except their plutocratic patrons. "Fusion" is a consummation devoutly to be desired when it is a union of men and parties who can be trusted to guard the best interests of the community. When "Fusion" is only another name for an insolent and rapacious plutocracy which thinks that all things have their price, it is high time for the community to adopt such measures as will effectively dismember this enemy of representative government. A Bowery politician is bad enough, but an oleaginous government is infinitely worse.

The Chaplains' Aid Association

THE war has called into being many useful associations, but none more useful and important than the Chaplains' Aid Association. Its aim is to provide for the needs of our priests who are serving as chaplains with the forces that are behind the flag on land and sea.

The scope of its work is extensive, and so the demands made upon the Association are great indeed. Prayer books, pamphlets, catechisms, tracts of special interest to soldier and sailor are to be published by the Association which plans also to issue a series of pamphlets entitled "Lives of Soldier Saints," and another series called "American Catholic Heroes." That these valuable little tracts may have the widest circulation possible they are to be distributed free to the troops. That means that the cost must fall upon the Chaplains' Aid Association. The demands do not stop here. Devotional articles of every kind, books, magazines, papers are needed in the soldiers' and sailors' recreation halls. In fine everything that makes for the welfare of body and soul must be supplied to make the soldier a better soldier by making him a better man.

It was General Pershing who said: "Our boys like to think that while they are fighting far away the folks back home are thinking of them." Yes, and a great deal more than merely thinking of them; doing something for the good not only of their bodies but their souls. That's what the Catholic soldier and sailor like. So the work of the Association is a spiritual work.

Many are doing their bit for the bodily welfare of the fighting men, and their work is laudable and deserving of the emulation of Catholics. Yet Catholics cannot stop there. They must see to it that the thousands of our young men who will be in camp or trench do not starve spiritually, deprived as they must be of the ordinary helps of religion. The spiritual welfare of the men who are giving their all for God and country must be the concern of every Catholic American worthy of the name.

In the Red Cross $100,000,000 drive a month ago, the cry was raised: "If you can't go across with a gun, come across with your bit for the Red Cross." The answer was far beyond the $100,000,000 mark. Will the plea for Catholic soldiers and sailors receive merely a weak response? Not likely in view of the tale of Catholic generosity written large and firm in the stone of church and school scattered up and down the land.

Any offering will be welcome. Associate membership in the Chaplains' Aid is but a dollar a year. Less than two cents a week! A supporting member pays five dollars, and a contributing member, ten dollars yearly. But membership means prayer also, for souls are at stake as well as bodies. An Our Father and a Hail Mary daily with the aspiration, "Mary, Conceived without Sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee," is promised by every member, for the welfare of our soldiers and sailors. And the Association asks every member, without assuming it as an obligation, to go to Holy Communion once a week for the same intention. Here surely is a holy work "for those who remain at home."

The office of the Chaplains' Aid Association is at 580 Fifth Avenue, New York. Its honorary president is his Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of New York, its president, the Rev. John J. Burke, C.S.P.

Imitating the I. W. W.

A WESTERN journal remarks that it is "difficult to speak with any moderation of the recent outrageous eruptions of the I. W. W." Bellowing its unalterable hostility to war, this unspeakable organization seeks to make converts by burning grain-elevators, destroying orchards, and blowing up freight-trains. It is noticeable, however, that when deported by the citizens of Bisbee, the I. W. W. offered no violence to the relief-train sent them by the Government. The guiding spirits of this association for the promotion of lawlessness are men who for years have made more than a comfortable living by inciting disorder; their followers, many if not the majority, are misguided dupes whom these leaders will betray without compunction on payment of a sufficient price. Considered in its effects upon its members, the I. W. W. is a standing menace to any community which harbors it. But its power for evil is vastly increased, if through repeated disorderly conduct, it stings a long-outraged and peace-loving body of citizens to take the law into their own hands, thereby adopting the principles of the very organization which they are seeking, and rightly, to put down.

To a city placed at the mercy of these bandits, the "direct action," preached and practised by the I. W. W., may seem the righteous, as well as the easy, road to safety. In reality, however, it is only another step in disorder, and a step that may be disasterous. If private citizens may arrest, judge, and condemn law-breakers, why have a government at all? In his message to the Governor of Arizona, the President calls attention to the grave nature of this public disorder, for which much palliation, but no valid excuse, can be offered:

> May I not respectfully urge the great danger of citizens taking the law into their own hands, as your report indicates their having done? I look upon such action with grave apprehensions. A very serious responsibility is assumed when such precedents are set.

Two wrongs never did make a right. It will be well to keep this simple principle clearly in mind, in these days when many seem sorely tempted to act upon the execrable principle that the end justifies the means. Rather, let us with Lincoln, "have faith that right makes right, and in that faith dare do our duty."

A Dinner of "Yarbs"

THE Rev. Francis Higginson, writing from Salem about 1630, relates how the Puritan colonists, urged no doubt by necessity, and instructed perhaps by friendly Indians, had learned to use as food a wide variety of common weeds. Our veracious chronicler records that besides the sand parsley, chirvel and marigold that used to grace the Pilgrims' frugal board, "Also divers excellent pot herbs grow abundantly among the grasse, as strawberrie leaves, in all places of the countre, and plenty of strawberries in their time, and pennyroyal, winter saverie, sorrell, brooklime, liverwort, carvell, and water-cress, also leeks, and onions ordinarie, and divers physicall herbs."

What the men of Massachusetts found palatable and nourishing 287 years ago, Professor George E. Stone of the Amherst Agricultural College thinks we should try to eat in these stirring days, so he has prepared a list of "Edible Weeds and Pot Herbs" which the Massachusetts State Board of Agriculture is distributing. From the array of esculent "yarbs" the Professor offers, thrifty housewives will doubtless be able to prepare war-menus that are no less novel than inexpensive, though the diners will probably have to be educated up to a correct appreciation of the toothsome and nutritive qualities of familiar garden-weeds which they now ignorantly despise.

For instance, the tender shoots of the common milk-weed, which farmers' boys used to think a deadly poison, are recommended as a savory pot herb; purslane is praised as little inferior to asparagus; boiled poke-weed, we are credibly informed, is "hardly to be distinguished from spinach"; scurvy-grass is said to make an excellent salad; curled dock, golden dock, patience dock and burdock can be mingled in a mess of greens that would tempt an anchorite and even the hostile nettle is disarmed and converted into an appetizing entree.

To take the place of what were once considered the substantial dishes of a dinner, perhaps a pièce de résistance of stewed cow-slips, besides being delicately reminiscent of ante-bellum menus, will be in high favor with the fastidious, particularly if it is preceded by a pigweed entree and followed by a horseradish salad. As for the dessert, the frugal hostess who knows where ferns, bell-wort, false Solomon's seal and samphire grow, and who remembers Parson Higginson's list of pot-herbs will be well able to bring her dinner to a fitting conclusion.

If the suggestions offered in Professor Stone's pamphlet are widely adopted, however, let the Consuls see that the State take no harm therefrom. For it is much to be feared that men who subsist for the most part on the diet of ruminants will be rather deficient in those martial qualities that are so necessary for the successful prosecution of this war. Intrepid men of action are needed now, not meek dreamers. But if these alluring yarb-dinners become too popular shall we be brave and warlike enough to force an early peace from the Kaiser?

Literature

FIRST AID TO THE "LITER'Y"

THOSE who, without finishing a wide and judicious course of reading, are eager to enjoy the reputation of being "liter'y," should feel deeply beholden to Miss Mary Eleanor Kramer, a Chicago schoolma'am. For she has recently compiled a sort of first-aid manual called "One Thousand Literary Questions and Answers" (Sully and Kleinteich, New York), which can be so readily mastered that the volume's reader should have little difficulty in keeping, for at least ten days, the population of a moderate-sized summer-resort in a state of inarticulate astonishment at his marvelous learning. For after studying the book, he should be able to display such familiarity with the homes, the haunts, the habits and even with the titles of the works of divers authors, renowned and obscure, living and dead, that his fellow-vacationists will unanimously vote him the most amiable and entertaining "high-brow" they ever met.

To use the book to the best advantage, he who would be reputed liter'y, should commit to memory each morning bebore breakfast a hundred of the manual's questions and answers. Thus equipped, let him descend with a thoughtful look to the hotel piazza and await his opportunity of elevating the frivolous conversation that is doubtless going on there. Perhaps some one's flippant reference to Wall Street's "war babies" will give him the chance he seeks, and he can adroitly put the thousandth question in Miss Kramer's book, which runs: "For what is Trinity Churchyard, New York City, famed?" When all have "given it up," he can triumphantly answer, as the manual directs, "For the number of illustrious dead resting there." Perhaps he can then convince some of the guests how important it is that they should know just "Who wrote 'Following the Star,'" or "What writer resides in a double cottage, the parts of which are known respectively as 'the bungalow' and 'the barracks,'" or "Who wrote 'My Ragpicker,'" or "Who was termed the 'Tenth Muse.'" Or suppose some imperfectly educated young person is eager to learn "the names of two American bachelor poets," or "What English poet was pronounced 'one of the finest-looking men in the world,'" the liter'y vacationist can easily give her the desired information.

As our handbook gives highly satisfactory answers to all the foregoing questions, it is clear that any one who has early and exclusive access to Miss Kramer's informing volume can solve the submitted problems long before all the other guests on the piazza can do so. Then while amazement at our literary lion's marvelous stock of book-lore is still intense, he might languidly ask the assembled company Question 104: "Where is Pigeon Cove?" or Question 999: "Who resided at Copse Hill?" or Question 176: "Who was called the last of the Boston Tea Party?" Then while the guests are groping helplessly for answers, he can deliver the coup de grâce—guided, of course, by the indispensable handbook—by asking them in rapid succession Questions 754, 755 and 756, which are worded as follows: "For what is Cockermouth notable?" "For what is Bassenthwaite notable?" "For what is Fulham famed?"

The entire piazza, thus reduced to silence by our literary expert's brilliant questionnaire, can only look appealingly at him for the answers. Then with the impressive air of one who has at his finger-tips the entire contents of the Chicago schoolma'am's book, he will say:

"Pigeon Cove is near Andrew's Point, at the extreme end of Cape Ann, Massachusetts. Ralph Waldo Emerson immortalized the spot by once spending a week's vacation there. Copse Hill was the southern home of Paul Hamilton Hayne, and is located at Forest Station, Georgia. The last of the Boston Tea Party, incredible as it may seem, was actually none other than old Major Melville. As for Cockermouth, that was Wordsworth's birthplace; Bassenthwaite was where the translator of the 'Rubáiyát' lived, and we should never forget that Fulham was once the home, not only of Hook, Richardson and Bulwer Lytton, but even of the melodious and noisome Swinburne,"

After ending up with such a dazzling display of learning as that, our liter'y vacationist can securely rest on his laurels for the remainder of his stay and can accept with winning modesty the homage paid by the unlettered to the erudite.

The pretentious volume described in the foregoing paragraphs is an extreme type of the sort of book in high favor nowadays with superficial people who are eager to have at their command, for social exigencies, an impressive quantity of personal gossip about authors, little and great, particularly if they are still living, but who have scant inclination to read their works, and are quite incapable of distinguishing what is admirable in their writings from what is worthless. The names of Walter Scott's dogs, the color of Shakespeare's eyes, the cut of Browning's coat, the music in Newman's voice, or the size of Hawthorne's house are not matters of vital moment. But it is of high importance to know what works of these authors the judgment of the ages has found to be imperishable masterpieces, so that the youths and maidens of our day may learn to read them with appreciation and pleasure.

Most Catholic boys and girls in the land who really wish to be able some day thoroughly to enjoy reading the best things that Scott, Shakespeare, Browning, Newman and Hawthorne have written, have it in their power, as a rule, to do so. For it is the pleasant duty of these young people's parents, teachers and advisers to cultivate in their charges an intelligent appreciation of what is best in literature, so that they will grow up men and women of refinement and culture.

What the Church most needs in this country today is a clear-headed, well-read, thoroughly educated laity. But those who learn early in life to like the best books are doing a great deal to make themselves laity of the character desired. For constant intercourse, so to speak, with the choicest spirits and keenest minds the world has seen, and an enduring acquaintance with the high thoughts and noble aspirations which the authors of the ages have left us, will unquestionably be of tremendous influence in training the mind, forming the taste and molding the character of the ideal Catholic layman. But, of course, it is not by burdening the memory with the contents of silly "first-aid" books like "One Thousand Literary Questions and Answers" that this end will be successfully achieved, but by continually reading with discernment and delight the immortal masterpieces themselves.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

REVIEWS

Euripides, and the Spirit of His Dramas. By PAUL DECHARME. Translated by JAMES LOEB. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.75.

In the list of indictments drawn up by Aristophanes against the art of Euripides, not the least is the charge of what we should call realism, or, more exactly, depraved realism. As an instance of this, the critic in "The Frogs" cites a rather unsavory episode in one of the plays. "Well, is the story not true?" Euripides rejoins as if this were a sufficient defense of his theme. And then the opponent makes the significant reply, "Certainly it is true,—but what is the use of displaying this ignominy?" Now this certainly is a bit of dialogue that proves that the history of the world, as well as the globe of the world, revolves. One need not draw out the parallel between ancient Athens and modern New York. It is exact and astonishing, and Mr. Decharme, the author of the above work, adds a remark that is equally pertinent. "The youth," he says, "to whom all boldness is alluring found pleasure in such stories, but the old men and all who cared for the integrity of the nation's education were not wrong in deploring it."

Euripides has other points of contact with the modern mind. His skepticism, both in religion and philosophy, was Modernism three centuries before Christ as it is Modernism twenty centuries after. So too was his slight regard for the existing conventionalities of art, and not only of the conventionalities, but even of the fundamentals, if by their sacrifice he could startle popular approval by producing strong emotional effects. Euripides did not disdain to beguile his audience by a beautiful lyric even when the beautiful lyric was perfectly inappropriate. This gives him kinship with some of our latter-day methods, and seems to imply an audience as unscrupulous artistically as those of today. It is no wonder, then, that Euripides is held in higher esteem by our own critics than he was by Aristotle.

The author of the present volume brings out these qualities of Euripides but in no spirit of censure. He joins the chorus of admirers, extenuating the shortcomings and emphasizing the merits of the poet until one almost forgets that there was a Sophocles at all. In the first part of the work he examines the critical spirit of the man himself, his religious, philosophical, social and political views; in the second part, his dramatic genius is described; his choice of subjects, his dramatic action, his prologues and choral odes, and in the concluding chapter one finds an admirable summary of his whole subject. In general, the book is a complete and compact discussion of the work of the dramatist, convenient and entertaining for the student, but too detailed for the general reader, and, in the reviewer's opinion, too partisan for one who seeks a perfectly just estimate of Euripides' position in the history of Greek literature.

F. M. C.

"Over the Top." By an American Soldier Who Went, ARTHUR GUY EMPEY, Machine Gunner, Serving in France. Together with Tommy's Dictionary of the Trenches. Sixteen Illustrations and Diagrams. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

War's Dark Frame. By WADSWORTH CAMP. New York: Dodd, Mead and Co. $1.35.

The author of the first of these war-books is a native of Ogden, Utah, who enlisted in the British army after the Lusitania went down, and when he had had every experience, apparently, that a trench-soldier could well have, was severely wounded and invalided home. For instance, he belonged to the "suicide club" of machine-gunners and bomb-throwers; he has been a member of a firing squad detailed to execute a deserter; he "lived, ate and slept in the trenches with the unburied dead for six days" and he has "gone over the top" of the trench to charge the Germans. In a rather crude, cynical way, he gives a vivid account of his adventures, using the usual devices of the American humorist to make the horrors of war seem amusing. The "Dictionary of the Trenches" contains "most of the pet terms and slangy definitions which Tommy Atkins uses a thousand times a day, as he is serving in France." From a perusal of it the reader can learn that "V. C.," for example, really means "Very Careless" of your life, that one of the advantages of being a "R. C." (Roman Catholic) is freedom from compulsory "church parade," and that "trenchitis" is a combination of "fedupness and homesickness, experienced by Tommy in the trenches, especially when he receives a letter from a friend in Blighty, who is making a fortune working in a munition plant."

Among the correspondents who are recording every phase of the great war, Wadsworth Camp has been enrolled by his new book, "War's Dark Frame." The volume has been well named, for it does not purport to enter the theater of war, or to treat of the battles or diplomacy, but only of the accompaniments and side-issues as they affect the individual. Mr. Camp has had the privilege of visiting the front lines of both the French and English armies, and vividly describes the duties and life of the soldier. Incidental to the personal view which he presents, he gives definite explanations of the various methods of death-dealing, from the machine-gun and the gases to the huge field-artillery. It is a readable and instructive book and furnishes a valuable key for interpreting the laconic official reports.

T. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The July Month opens with a good paper by Father Sidney Smith on "The Popes as Peacemakers." He adduces strong arguments for constituting Benedict XV chief guardian of the Hague Resolutions. In an excellent essay called "Hidden Gardens," Dora Johnson has this telling paragraph:

> If I had my way and the necessary means, I'd overthrow the whole of the present educational system and have the children taught what they really need to learn; that is, how to save their souls, cultivate the earth, and keep comfortable homes. I'm so sorry for these poor mites, stuffed with shreds of mathematics and wisps of 'ologies, and not knowing, half of them, how to cook a dinner or wash the baby or which way a potato is planted. Their mothers won't risk spoiling food to teach them. The present mode of teaching is producing, especially in cities, an atrocious type of person, with a mind like a shiny button, reflecting everything that passes but producing no light from within. Such people will argue that they must be able to write poetry because they have learned the rules of prosody and have been dragged round in a wretched "nature class" to look at trees and things, which the Board of Education has scheduled in the Admiration column. I see, at times, the appalling vision of a crop of gleaming, black boot-buttons, bred in the rotten deposits of our civilization, spreading over and blotting out what beauty there is in art with their cheap, merely-clever claptrap. It is a nightmare, of course, but if allowed to develop unchecked, these abnormal-minded people would, in time, become the normal people of their day. It is their cursed eugenics that will keep their numbers down, by which time we may have institutions for their quiet suppression and new educational laws.

John Ayscough contributes to the number a war-story that his countless admirers are sure to like.

The late Samuel Milbank Cauldwell in the introduction to "Chocolate Cake and Black Sand and Two Other Plays" (Putnam, $1.50) explains that they are "distinctly a domestic product intended for home consumption," requiring no more stage scenery than "can be found in the cellar or garret of any well-regulated family" and no larger cast than "three children from four to fourteen of assorted sexes and one male adult." The "two other plays" are "The Undoing of Giant Hotstuff" and "The Invention of the Rat-Trap," and all three are so amusing and absurd that the children will enjoy putting them on. The sixteen illustrations in the book help to show how the plays should be presented.——Most readers of the seven stories in Wallace Irwin's "Pilgrims into Folly" (Doran, $1.35) will no doubt agree that the tales are hardly worthy of being preserved in book-form. "Wings" is the best of the collection.

"If I Went Out A-Walking" is the title of the following poem by Enid Dennis in "A Scallop Shell of Quiet," a recent volume of the "Adventurers All," a series published by Longmans:

If I went out a-walking with the Mother of my King,
We'd hie not to the mystic grove to hear the night-bird sing.
She'd take me to a village scorned where nothing good can dwell
And bid me (if she loved me) bear the water from the well.

If I went out a-walking with the Mother of my King,
When swift into His presence I would fain be hastening,
She'd lead me through the city's streets, and up its crooked ways,
Nor would she find her Son for me until we'd sought three days.

If I went out a-walking with the Mother of my King,
The King whom in His beauty the Saints stand worshiping,
She'd guide me to a crowded place, and midst the throng she'd press
And leave me with Veronica to lave unloveliness.

If I went out a-walking with the Mother of my King,
She'd lure me from the solitudes where Cedron's waters spring
And set me there on Calvary's height to watch the nails in-driven,
If I dared to go a-walking with the valiant Queen of Heaven!

If I go out a-walking with the Mother for my guide,
Through many a strange and dreary land I'll wander at her side,
But if in Earth's death places still to her hand I cling
I'll walk one day with Mary in the garden of the King.

EDUCATION

The Gary School in Politics

"IT is a pity," writes Mr. William G. Willcox, President of the New York Board of Education, "that the people of this city do not know more about the Gary schools." And forthwith the worthy President intones the opening notes of a pæan. "It is a pity," say in effect many principals and teachers in Manhattan, "that the people of this city do not know more about the Gary schools"; whereupon, not to be outdone by any mere president, their united voices are raised to proclaim that the sum of all educational wickedness and inefficiency is Garyism. Both sides agree on this, that the Gary Plan needs only to be seen to be embraced, or, as the case may be, to be led out and shot at daybreak.

When doctors are at odds, the case of the populace is sad. It is hardly fair to assume that New Yorkers are slower to assimilate a proposition of this kind, than the majority of free-born American flat-dwellers. But if they are still in ignorance of what the Gary Plan really is, whose is the fault?

The Subsidized Campaign

TWO years ago, or more, the benevolent City Fathers lured the great prophet of the new school, Mr. William Wirt, from his peaceful home amid the sand dunes and the roaring blast-furnaces of Northern Indiana. For two years the City has "subsidized" this gentleman, to employ a word from which the "Charity Trust" has extracted the last trace of opprobrium, by applying it to the private institutions of charity. True, the Corporation Counsel has rendered an opinion that the Board of Education has no power to retain Mr. Wirt in his present capacity, but what are ordinances, charters and opinions among friends? Touching the merits of the Gary Plan, Mr. Wirt has not been wholly silent since his arrival in New York, but in comparison with his vociferous followers, he has outdone the Sphinx in taciturnity. For two years "a campaign of enlightenment" has been carried on by pamphlets, by subsidized lecturers who, when speech failed, invoked the aid of magic lanterns and moving-pictures, and by newspapers with an expectant and pleading eye fixed upon the City Hall. Nor has the opposition emulated the clam. On July 15, it was announced that "Twenty-five hundred meetings will be held this week in Harlem and the Bronx to denounce the Gary Plan." This may seem an intolerable deal of sack for one poor loaf, but despite all this publicity, the President of the Board of Education, who considers the coming of the Gary school to New York as the dawn of the milennium, still complains that the people of New York know very little about the new gospel. Perhaps they know more than he suspects. There is much significance in the fact that the City Superintendent, with thirty-three out of the thirty-five Associate Superintendents, bitterly opposes the Garyized school. Is it reasonable to suppose that this opposition, shared by hundreds of teachers and parents, is wholly based on ignorance or prejudice? By talking not wisely but too much, the patrons of the Gary Plan have given their case away.

The "Enriched Curriculum"

THE Plan was introduced to New York in the pleasing guise of a magician, who by the wave of a wand, so it was said, could reduce the tax-rate, and cause 2,000 children to luxuriate in a school building, previously made to resemble a snugly-packed tin of sardines, by the presence of only 1,000 young hopefuls. The first claim has long since been abandoned, and the second is urged but feebly. It is hard to argue convincingly against the fact that new expenditures call for real money, and the proposition that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. Accordingly, a new record has been placed on the municipal grafonola. "It is not a matter of dollars and cents," writes the President of the Board of Education, as one pained to the very soul by the mention of vulgar pelf, "but a question of giving the children the kind of education that will fit them for life." This serene announcement sounds well, but it begs the question. There was never an educational system that did not make the same claim. Its fitness to attain that end, however, is evidenced, not by the a priori praise of subsidized "experts" and press-agents, but by practical results. The Gary schools have not reduced the tax-rate, they are not being applied in New York to relieve congestion, and, as the Buckingham tests clearly proved, in intellectual training they are decidedly inferior to the old-type schools. Yet, despite the Buckingham tests and the earnest protests of many principals and teachers, the adherents of the Gary schools are now basing their claims on a pure assumption, namely, that the Gary Plan offers the pupil "an enriched curriculum."

The Plan at Any Cost

WHAT the City Superintendent of Schools, Dr. Maxwell, thinks of this assumption, is stated in his letter of June 29, to the President of the Board of Education:

> At various times, various reasons have been urged in support of the duplicate-school plan. At first it was the solution of the problem of congestion. Again it was the solution of the academic problem. Now its advocates urge its educational advantages through "the enrichment of the curriculum."
>
> The introduction of the duplicate-school plan in schools and districts where there is no present congestion seems to indicate that the purpose is not to relieve congestion. On the other hand, the introduction of the duplicate-school plan into many schools that have previously had such facilities . . . seems to indicate that the purpose is not solely to "enrich the curriculum." The plan seems to be the thing, whether the advantages claimed for it can accrue or not. Any school or system of schools, or any method of teaching, is to be judged not by the criterion you lay down, namely, the amount of time devoted to a given subject, or the application of any specific method, but by the results in cultivating concentration, accurate observation, just reasoning, and luminous expression.

In concluding this letter, an incisive criticism of the Gary Plan, Dr. Maxwell seriously objects to "the rapid extension of the Plan to all the schools, before the merits of the Plan have been thoroughly tested," and to the assumption

> That in the duplicate schools more time is spent on academic work. . . . I characterize this as an assumption because it is a matter in dispute, involving the question of whether the periods spent in the auditorium, and some other periods, are to be regarded as time "spent in academic work."

To many observers, including several diocesan superintendents of schools, the periods in the auditorium seem more akin to an intensive course in disorder, than "academic work." The adherents of the Plan, however, always count it as an "enrichment," on the same principle, probably, as Mark Twain's flatboater considered Cincinnati river water "richer" than Mississippi water at St. Louis. It had more nice nutritious mud in it.

Sordid Politics

IF one thing is clear in the whole history of the Gary Plan in New York, it is that this experiment has been foisted upon the City by interested persons, with small reference to the genuine needs of public education. The members appointed to the Board of Education last winter, were stalwarts who could be depended upon to stand pat on the Administration's determination to force the Plan in New York. Scarcely ever has the Plan won a point except by a strict party vote. One year ago, it seemed that a fair trial of Mr. Wirt's engaging theories in a community like New York, would be an experiment, costly perhaps, but coupled with possibilities of valuable results in secondary education. But today to hope for anything like a "scientific evaluation" from the subsidized experts in charge of the Plan, is to hope for the impossible. In voting the extension of the Plan on June 27, the Board of Education consulted neither the principals of the schools in question, nor the local boards and superintendents, and openly disregarded the vehement protest of the Board of Superintendents, as well as the warning of Dr. Maxwell, who on the previous day had stated that it "was working incalculable harm to the children, and arousing more opposition from parents than any other educational experiment during my long experience." A hand-picked board of education measured its experience with the experience of men actively engaged for years in the schools, and awarded itself the palm. In crude fact, just at the present moment, this huge educational experiment, involving thousands of school children and millions of dollars, is nothing but a grimy pawn in a very sordid game of politics.

New York's Goldbrick

ON July 15, the Board of Education announced the steps which will be taken to establish the Plan firmly in New York. Out of a financial expenditure of $12,400,000, $6,000,000 will be devoted to fourteen new sites and buildings. These new schools will care for 27,800 children. To enlarge buildings now in use, will cost $3,000,000, while $1,400,000 will be used to arrange new playgrounds, and about $2,000,000 for the equipment of existing buildings with playgrounds, workshops, auditoriums and gymnasiums. "True education," concludes the President of the Board, "should put character first, efficiency second, and the acquisition of knowledge third." Thus does the President, while speaking words as true as any ever uttered by Polonius, provide himself with a safe retreat, and hedge his ears against such remarks as were uttered last week by the Vice-President of the Federation of Neighborhood Associations:

> This diabolical system not only makes the children below par mentally, but puts them out of the reach of discipline, and will be the means of making hundreds of future delinquents. The Administration is itching to spend millions on an experiment that will deprive thousands of children of a proper education, and make criminals of many.

From all of which it would appear that since to some, the Gary Plan is as honey, sweet in the mouth, and to others, more like red pepper on a burn, good men and true may honestly arrive at varying conclusions on what purports to be the same thing. It also appears that O. Henry was right in his conclusion that it is easier to sell a goldbrick in New York than in any other city in the world, not excepting Odobolt, Iowa.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

The Rural Apostolate: Catechism

IN the rural apostolate, too, the slogan should be sounded, "Your country needs you." It is hard to realize how this broad field has been so neglected. Where parish schools are established, there is not the same need, but catechism classes are called for in the numberless holes and corners, and indeed in vast deserts in our country districts, where no such advantages as those afforded by schools are at hand. Start a few, and you will find the children come up out of the ground. There is a place, not far from the writer's habitat, where the saying is current: "Hit a gum-tree and out pops a Norris," this being a prevailing clan in the vicinity. Once when a catechism class was begun there, the number of meek little Norrises that responded was amazing.

Two Difficulties

THE religious instruction of country children, in the absence of parish schools, must always struggle against two difficulties. One is the absence of competent teachers. Even good-will cannot make up for the incompetence of the teacher who cannot add to the say-by-rote recitation of the catechism. Again, rural attendance is always precarious, and even the best-equipped church Sunday-school leaves many a remote locality unreached.

Our Catholic young men and young women are well fitted to meet this crying need. Indeed, in view of the needs, both of city and country, all educated young Catholics ought to feel themselves wanting if they do not undertake occasionally some catechetical work, or its equivalent in such social work as is best suited to their powers. Look at the many young men and women, even business and professional men, who teach regularly in the Protestant Sunday-schools! How many of our young Catholic lawyers and business men teach catechism in their leisure hours? Yet, in the case of those who do, how valuable is their training; how credible their counsels on moral matters appear to our growing children!

A Sublime Work

FOR rural work in particular, facilities without number are opened up by the all-penetrating automobile. Your machine, as a gift of God, brings you responsibility as well as pleasure. Your Guardian Angel may have kept you from skidding in February, because he wished to give you a chance to teach catechism in August a dozen miles out of town.

I need not dwell on the merits of this sublime and most meritorious work. Your simple teaching is in most cases an eternity saved, in place of an eternity lost, for the child. Some difficulties, of course, may be urged, yet these are largely imaginary. Poor attendance often discourages a beginner. But even one child is worth laboring over; and, if well instructed for a few weeks, will usually bring others in its train. Trifling premiums work wonders. With country children the simplest means are effective: little pictures, a calendar of gummed paper-stars, an occasional treat. Moreover, by selecting apt periods of the year, and teaching intensively, more can be done than by dragging on a class too continuously.

So much assistance is given in books, devoted to teaching catechism, that none need be at a loss for a method. The "Teacher's Manual of Christian Doctrine," published by the Dolphin Press, Philadelphia, is a gold mine of catechetical lore for all ages and conditions. Yet a few suggestions may be helpful.

Practical Suggestions

IT is best to conform to local usage regarding the much-debated choice of a catechism. "The Baltimore Catechism" usually causes to a conscientious teacher a certain amount of worry; but by going slowly, and omitting harder questions for beginners, as in the "graded series," it can be made easier. In teaching little children do not try to explain every word as it comes along. In each chapter, pick out a few topics here and there for explanation: three or four topics are sufficient for an afternoon's lesson. The "No. 3 Baltimore," or Kinkead's "Explanation," will give you a practical explanation.

Always draw a practical conclusion. Instil some virtue, recommend some Catholic practice conjointly with your doctrinal teaching. Eventually you will form a habit of doing this. Don't try to teach very little or backward children in too systematic a manner. Instruct them "concentrically." In each lesson go over the circle of a few fundamental truths, gradually enlarging on one, or emphasizing another until the children are familiar with most of the essentials, e.g., for First Communion. Large pictures greatly help toward this. Bible history can be splendidly used to illustrate the catechism, and hymns are a great addition. Add a short game or two occasionally, as a treat, after class, and you have your children won.

The Gospel in the Fields

THE attraction of teaching catechism in the country is sure to grow, even though it may appear discouraging in the beginning. "Yon's a mule, I reckon; and yon's a styar (steer)!" saide a naïve youngster, pointing to a picture of the crib of Bethlehem, and the instructor felt a little puzzled as to how to get the spirit of devotion into this child of the woods. But the age-old narratives of the Scriptures atoned for the discouraging beginning. They were real to these country children, as they are rarely to city dwellers. It was as if they themselves had helped drive the oxcart that brought Jacob down to Egypt, or had climbed the oak tree from which Absalom was hanged. And the Gospel was still more real. They realized what that walk must have been from Nazareth to Bethlehem. They knew how Mary and Joseph felt, alone without Jesus in the great city. They understood why it was a sacrifice for the Apostles to leave their nets: they themselves had to go down to the shore and help mend nets on Saturdays. They kept in close touch with their Guardian Angels as they traveled the forest road homeward, watching out at every darkening turn for "the skeery things."

The Teacher's Influence

THE truth has not so facile an entrance for the country child; but once it has entered, it is enshrined in associations which are not incongruous. The city child must make his shrine a thing apart from his daily surroundings. The country child hears even Christ Himself teaching him through the objects and processes most familiar to him; sowing and reaping, fishing, threshing, the birds, the fields, crops and cattle.

The role of a good catechism-teacher in the life of a country child is remarkable. His sayings and his doings are handed down for generations. His teaching is woven into the life of the community. He has interpreted for his charges the root-mystery of the world. The seed once planted will not easily die; and the planting will be especially firm, if he gives some simple directions to the parents for teaching at home. In the case of those who leave the country for the city, the effect of such rural catechism work on city life is very marked. Let us hope that our Catholic societies will do more to further this splendid work.

JOHN LAFARGE, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Federal Law and Child Labor

THE preliminary regulations for the Federal Child-Labor law were presented for the consideration of those interested in the new legislation, on July 24, at the office of the Assistant Secretary of Labor at Washington. The Child-Labor law goes into effect on September 1, and places the following restrictions on those establishments whose products are shipped in inter-State commerce:

> No child under 16 can legally be employed in any mine or quarry at any time; no child under 14 can legally be employed at any time and no child under 16 more than 8 hours in any workday, more than 6 days in any week, or before 6 a.m. or after 7 p.m. in any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment.

The law aims at remedying economic conditions that are disastrous to real national development. No foreign foe can harm a country more surely than the unpatriotic citizen engaged in the exploitation of the child.

Music in Education

THE College of the Sacred Heart, Manhattanville, New York City, will offer a two weeks' normal course in primary methods of music teaching during August. The method to be followed is the one in use at the Catholic University and has been prepared under the direction of its professors by Justine Ward for the schools of the country. A few of the advantages of the method are: (1) It enables the child to read music at sight. (2) It puts music within reach not merely of the few, but of every child. (3) It prepares the child to become a member of a church choir. Back of this movement inaugurated at Manhattanville is the splendid purpose of making music a basic part of education, in accordance with the custom of medieval days, when all the people shared in the liturgical service of the Church. The success of true church music really depends on the children, as few churches can afford paid choirs. The training of the child, however, must begin early. If at the age of six the child is taught to read music, just as it is taught to read a language, by the age of nine or ten it has the equipment requisite for membership in a liturgical choir. The method particularly stresses two things, the natural beauty of the child's voice, and the concentration of mind necessary to make a child musically literate.

Law and Political Economy at Marymount

MARYMOUNT, Tarrytown-on-Hudson, announces the addition of a law and a political economy course to its collegiate curriculum. The political economy lectures will be given by Professor John Ryan, A.M., Ph.D., and the law lectures by Mr. A. Judge, a well-known New York lawyer. The official statement issued from Marymount explains the purpose of the courses:

> It is not expected to make women lawyers, or that those who take this course should be able to dispense with professional attorneys. But at least a broad view of certain problems can be given which will better enable woman to fill the place which is being recognized as hers in public life, and will especially be a guide to her in the administration of her property.
>
> If she is a wage-earner it is absolutely necessary that she should understand the laws which govern economic production, and the laws which may retard or advance her business interests. If she is in her natural environment, the home, and rearing a family, she should know enough to protect their interests and her own, if she is left, as often happens, the executor of a business or of an estate.

The world never needed womanly intelligence and sympathy more than it does today. The education that will equip women to meet modern conditions most effectively will not neglect a medium by which true American womanhood may find its expression.

The Marquette League

ON May 1 the Marquette League closed its thirteenth year. Its receipts for the past twelve months were $19,188, and all office expenses were covered by $1,953:

> Ten chapels have been provided for since May 1, 1916. These bring the number of Marquette League chapels up to forty-two: forty-two fresh, clean, suitable buildings, where formerly Mass had to be said and the Sacraments administered in log huts, often held together by mud, or in an Indian tepee. During the past year we have added one hundred and four new members to our list, which makes the number of those having joined the League since its establishment in 1904, a little over 1,600. By direction of the Board of Directors the Executive Secretary of the League, during the month of August, will visit the several States throughout which the League operates, to make an extended personal survey of Indian conditions in relation to missionary activities. The Directors believe that this will enable them to give a much more intimate attention to the needs of the individual missions and extend the knowledge of their necessities to those generous friends and members of the League who have never failed to enable it successfully to provide for any emergency. It is expected that most satisfactory results in extending the usefulness of the League will follow.

The office of the Marquette League is at 423 United Charities Building, New York City. Its object is the welfare of the Catholic Indian. In these days of concern for small nations and scattered, afflicted people the League deserves hearty support. For practical purposes the Indians fall under both categories, and no people are nearer to Americans. It costs $10 a month to support a catechist in the Indian field, $70 a year to maintain a child at any mission school. A chapel can be built for $1,000 and in some places for $500.

Creating a Monopoly in Whale Meat

THE rosy hope that the consumption of whale meat might help to solve the problem of the high cost of living has led to a new disillusionment. According to the editor of the Seattle Union Record, "The spongy steaks from the big sea monsters are now demanding rapidly ascending prices, first because of the novelty, and secondly because of an existing monopoly." No sooner was there a demand for this latest delicacy than the inevitable monopoly sprang into being and the entire product of the whaling concern which had supplied the local market was henceforth disposed of to a single firm. As a consequence the retail price at present is about thirteen cents a pound, and restaurants, we are told, are charging forty-five cents for an order that costs them five cents. There is a very simple moral attached to the soaring prices of whale meat. It is useless to hope for any solution of the problem of high prices until we have solved the problem of "corners" and monopolies. The former must be absolutely abolished in so far as they are keeping from the people the necessaries of life, and the latter must at least be regulated for the common good. Even whale meat becomes subject to monopolistic interference so soon as the demand for it arises.

Educational Program for the War

AN educational program for the war has recently been issued by Dr. P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education. After urging "attendance as usual," Dr. Claxton says:

> The attendance in the high schools should be increased, and more boys and girls should be induced to remain until their course is completed. All laboratories and manual-training shops in high schools should be run at their full capacity. In many of the shops work should be done which will have immediate value for the national defense. In all high schools in which domestic science, sewing, cooking, sanitation, etc., are taught, large units of time should be given in the summer and fall to sewing for the Red Cross and for local charities. Classes for grown-up women should be formed in which practical instruction can be given largely by lecture and demonstration in the conservation and economic use of food.
>
> For all boys and girls who cannot attend the day sessions of the high schools, continuation classes should be formed, to meet at such times as may be arranged during working hours or in the evening. All cities should maintain evening schools for adult men and women. In cities having considerable numbers of immigrants, evening schools should be maintained for them with classes in English, in civics, and such other subjects as will be helpful to these foreigners in understanding our industrial, social, civic, and political life. All students should be made to understand that it is their duty to give to their country and to the world the best and fullest possible measure of service, and that both will need more than they will get of that high type of service which only men and women of the best education and training can give. Patriotism and the desire to serve humanity may require of these young men and women the exercise of that very high type of self-restraint that will keep them to their tasks of preparation until the time comes when they can render service which cannot be rendered by others.

The faculties of colleges and universities are bidden redouble their energies and concentrate them on those things that will be of most service during the progress of the war, and best prepare students for the most effective service to their country and to the world when the war is over.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

AUGUST 4, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

The Canadian Crisis
George E. Roe

Prejudice and Mexico's Ruin
Eber Cole Byam

Spencer and St. Thomas
Thomas F. Woodlock

The Cost of the War
A. Hilliard Atteridge

Florence Nightingale's Friends
Gerald C. Treacy

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
August 4, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 17

PAGE

CHRONICLE 411–414

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Canadian Crisis—Prejudice and Mexico's Ruin—Spencer and St. Thomas—The Cost of the War—Florence Nightingale's Friends 415–422

COMMUNICATIONS 423

EDITORIALS
False and True Women—An Intellectual Revival?—Woman's Part—After the War — The Mission of Wealth—The Teacher and the War 424–426

LITERATURE — Robert Southwell — The Parish Church — Reviews—Books and Authors—Books Received 427–431

EDUCATION—Catholics and Secular Colleges 431–432

SOCIOLOGY—The Mistakes of Society 432–433

NOTE AND COMMENT ...433–434

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF"

NEXT to good food the most important thing to a successful army is good shoes.

It is the same way in business and in life. The great importance of good footwear is the reason for the care, the study and the painstaking attention we give to producing shoes that are an aid to health and success.

James S. Coward
262-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(Near Warren Street)

Mail Orders Filled Sold Nowhere Else

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES
Established 1799
Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.
For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

Mount de Chantal Wheeling, W. Va.
. . . . ACADEMY FOR GIRLS . . . .
Thorough and refined training. Healthful and beautiful surroundings.
Seventieth year opens September 11, 1917
FOR PROSPECTUS ADDRESS, THE DIRECTRESS

Camp Ko-wa-ho
THE CATHOLIC CAMP FOR GIRLS
Lake St. Catharine
Poultney, Vt.
For booklet, address
Mrs. F. H. Throop, 1542 East 12th St., B'klyn, N.Y.

ST. XAVIER ACADEMY
For Girls
BEATTY, PENNSYLVANIA
Academic, Commercial, Elementary departments;
Music, Art, Domestic Science, Athletics.
72nd year opens Sept. 5, 1917
WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

SEVENTY-TWO YEARS
St. Mary's College and Academy
For Young Women and Girls
MONROE, MICHIGAN
A Home School distinguished for its refining influence
CONDUCTED BY THE Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart
Extensive Parks and Walks for Outdoor Life
COLLEGE—Empowered to grant Degrees and State Teachers' Certificates.
ACADEMY—A High School of recognized standard.
PREPARATORY—Foundation for Literary, Commercial and Vocational Departments.
Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Expression, and Domestic Science.
HALL OF THE DIVINE CHILD
A Select Boarding School for Small Boys. Fireproof—Complete Equipment.
Address DIRECTRESS, 207 West Elm Ave.

THE COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE
NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
chartered by the University of the State of New York, empowered to confer degrees in Letters, Science and Music
Department of Pedagogy
Approved by the Regents of the State of New York, and by the Superintendent of Public Instruction of New York City
Department of Secretarial Studies
LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF BACHELOR OF SCIENCE
For catalogue address the registrar

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 17
WHOLE No. 434

AUGUST 4, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—In France fighting on the Belgian and British fronts has been confined to intense artillery duels and numerous raids and counter-raids, without tangible results on either side. On the French front the offensive has been mainly with the Germans who made their fortieth ineffectual attempt to regain the Craonne Plateau. Beginning with a violent and sustained artillery bombardment from Cerny to Berry-au-Bac the attack gradually concentrated between Hurtebise and the Casemates Plateau, and between the Casemates Plateau to the Californie Plateau. The Germans were able to take some trenches on the ridge, but later were not only driven out of them by French counter-attacks but lost some additional ground. Other sectors also in the French line were subjected to severe German attacks but in no case was any substantial gain made and maintained. Fighting on other fronts, the Galician front excepted, has been sporadic and unimportant.

Bulletin, July 23, p.m.-July 30, a.m.

The collapse of the Russian armies in Eastern Galicia has become very serious, due for the most part to the disaffection of the troops, and has resulted in great loss of territory, guns and men. The Austro-German offensive which began last week west of Tarnapol has developed rapidly and has spread from that place in a southwesterly direction for a distance of 150 miles to the Carpathians. North of the Dniester the Russians have retreated to the Gniesner, east of Tarnopol, and they have evacuated Koniuchy, Podajce, and Buczacz; south of the Dniester they have abandoned Nisniov, Tlunacz, Ottynia, Nadworna, Delatyn, Kolomea and the Tartar Pass. In Vilna and Rumania the Russian armies have fought with great spirit, have made some progress, and indirectly have somewhat retarded the retreat in Galicia, but in the latter place there appears to be almost complete disorganization.

The Galician Campaign

On July 25, the House voted to send the Administration food bill to conference with instructions to the conferees to disagree on the amendments added by the Senate. The vote was by division and stood 169 to 101. An effort was made to secure a separate vote on amendment 23, which provides for the creation of a Congressional committee on war expenditures. The opposition of Mr. Wilson to this amendment and to the one proposing that a board of three members should administer the food control have stirred up considerable controversy, which was precipitated by the letter of the President addressed to Representative Lever, which is, in part, as follows:

The Administration Food Bill

> Section 23 is not only entirely foreign to the subject matter of the food administration bill in which it is incorporated but would, if enacted into law, render my task of conducting the war practically impossible. I cannot believe that those who proposed this section scrutinized it with care or analyzed the effects which its operation would necessarily have. The constant supervision of executive action which it contemplates would amount to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the executive work of the Administration.

The President said that he did not question what might be the motives or the purpose of the committee, but that cooperation such as that contemplated was "not practicable in the circumstances." He expressed the hope that both houses would see that his objections rested on indisputable grounds and that he "could only interpret the final adoption of Section 23 as arising from a lack of confidence in myself." Those who support the amendment declare that it would in no way hamper the action of the President and would merely provide a means of salutary publicity.

On July 28 the Senate and House conferees came to an agreement on a prohibition provision. This provides that thirty days after the bill becomes law no person shall use any fruits, foods, food-materials, or feeds in the production of any distilled spirits for beverage purpose, with the separate stipulation that the prohibition shall not apply to the fortification of sweet wines. Importation of distilled spirits is prohibited in a new section. The House conferees withdrew their opposition to the liquor commandeering amendment, which is adopted substantially as written by the Senate except to include whisky in stock as well as in bond. It is generally understood that the President does not intend to resort to the commandeering authority. As approved by the conferees the prohibition section declares that no more whiskey or other spirituous drinks can be manufactured during the war, which means that the annual production of 253,283,273 gallons of distilled spirits can no longer be looked for. But until exhausted there will in all likelihood be available for consumption the 230,000,000 gallons of spirits which have been in bond. The President has received the discretionary power to bar beer and light wines.

The conference of the Allies, which has been holding sessions at Paris, adjourned on July 27, after issuing the following statement:

The Conference of the Allies

> The allied Powers, more closely united than ever for the defence of the people's rights, particularly in the Balkan peninsula, are resolved not to lay down arms until they have attained the end which in their eyes dominates all others, to render impossible a return of the criminal aggression such as that wherefor the Central Empires bear the responsibility.
>
> France, Great Britain and Italy, simultaneously and as soon as possible, will end the occupations they have been obliged to make in ancient Greece, Thessaly and Epirus. Military occupation of the triangle formed by the Santi Quaranta road and the Epirus frontier will be maintained provisionally as a measure of security, Italy and Greece to agree as regards reestablishment of the civil administration under a commissioner appointed by Greece. France, Great Britain and Italy will preserve during the war a naval and military base on the island of Corfu, the island remaining under the sovereignty of Greece.

The statement is taken to be a virtual recognition of Greece as a loyal member of the coalition against Germany, and it is believed that Gen. Serrail will now be free to undertake a more active prosecution of the campaign in Greek Macedonia. Greece is expected to take an active part in the campaign, with its navy and merchant marine in close cooperation with the Entente.

In Athens the Chamber of Deputies convened on July 25, and at its meeting acclaimed Premier Venizelos by a large majority. The Parliament is extremely democratic and was marked by the fact that King Alexander took no part in its opening session. There was no speech from the throne. This departure from traditional custom was made the more significant by the statement of the Premier:

Parliament Reassembles in Greece

> "The reassembling of Parliament, which was dismissed by the arbitrary action of Constantine, is the formal resumption of democratic government and the rule of the people, in line with the ideals and principles of which the United States gives a conspicuous example. No longer have we a royal autocrat ruling by the divine right of kings and not responsible to the people, but rather a constitutional monarchy in which authority is exercised within strict limits."

The Premier declared that Greece was now aligned with the Entente allies, that relations with Germany had been broken, and that a state of war existed between that country and Greece; no formal declaration of hostilities had been necessary because that step had been taken by the Provisional Government.

President Wilson took effective measures to put an end to the dispute between General Goethals and Mr. Denman, which has retarded the shipbuilding program, when he accepted the former's resignation and invited the latter's. Rear Admiral Washington L. Capps, chief constructor of the navy, has been appointed to replace Gen. Goethals in the post of manager of the Shipping Board's Emergency Fleet Corporation in charge of construction; and Mr. Edward N. Hurley, formerly chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, has been named as head of the board.

Other Items

The task of the conferees on the War Revenue bill, which calls for $1,670,000,000, has been considerably complicated by the announcement made by the Secretary of the Treasury that a new war budget providing for additional revenue to the extent of $5,000,000,000 was in contemplation, and that another loan of $2,000,000,000 would soon be needed by the Allies. But on July 28 the Senate Committee on Finance set a limit on the amount of war revenue taxation it is willing to impose upon the industries and upon the people of the United States, in response to Secretary McAdoo's demand for an increase. The decision, however, only applies to the immediate preesent. The committee is willing to increase the pending war revenue bill to a gross levy of $1,943,000,000 but not beyond that point. Higher income taxes and corporation taxes are planned.

On July 25 the Aviation bill became law when the President affixed his signature to the appropriation of $640,000,000 for the creation of an air-fleet. Mr. Howard Coffin, chairman of the aircraft production board of the Council of National Defense announced that preliminary organization had already been completed, and that if progress were made with equal rapidity in the future "there need be no fear as to America's position in the aircraft field by next summer."

Ireland.—On July 24 Mr. Andrew Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced the Government's nominees as delegates to the Irish Convention. They included, among others, the Earl of Dunraven, president of the Irish Reform Association; the Earl of Desart, the Earl of Granard, Baron MacDonnell, Sir William Goulding, chairman of the Great Southern and Western Railway of Ireland; Sir Horace Curzon Plunkett, Sir George W. E. Russell, former Under Secretary of the Home Department; Sir Crawford McCullough, former Lord Mayor of Belfast; Sir Bertram Windle, Patrick Dempsey, Martin Murphy, Edward Lysaght, Alexander McDowell, and Sir William Whitla, professor of materia medica and therapeutics in Queen's College, Belfast. The number of labor representatives was increased from five to seven.

The Convention

On July 25 the Convention met at Regent House, Trinity College, Dublin, and after unanimously adopting committee recommendations naming Sir Horace Plunkett as chairman and Sir Francis Hopewood as secretary adjourned until the following day. Ninety-two delegates were present. The opening address of the Convention was delivered by the temporary chairman, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Mr. Duke. No press representatives were present, and the exact nature of the business discussed at the meeting is not known. Sir Horace Plunkett, however, is credited with the suggestion that the drafting of the convention should proceed as for all Ireland, thus leaving Ulster to see what she is faced with before she objects.

The delegates present, in addition to John Redmond, Joseph Devlin and the Government nominees mentioned above, included the following: The Duke of Abercorn, the Marquis of Londonderry, the Earl of Mayo, Viscount Middleton, Lord Camors, the Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland, the Most Rev. John B. Crozier; the Archbishop of Cashel, the Most Rev. J. M. Harty; the Archbishop of Dublin, the Most Rev. John H. Bernard; Sir Henry Arthur Blake, Colonel Robert H. Wallace, Grand Master of the Orangemen of Belfast, and Hugh T. Barry, John Joseph Clancy, Stephen L. Gwynn, Thomas Lundon and John O'Dowd, members of the House of Commons.

The official report of the session of the Convention held on July 26 announced that a preliminary procedure committee was appointed to prepare proposals, and it was agreed that the Convention adjourn until August 8, to enable the chairman, Sir Horace Plunkett, in conjunction with the secretaries, to issue to the members in circular form the material necessity for the Convention to proceed with its duties. At this meeting the committee asked that Sir Francis Hopewood, the Convention's secretary, submit to the members of the committee information in regard to the procedure adopted by the Convention that drew up a constitution for the Union of South Africa.

Rome.—Now that the codification of the canon law has been completed, the Holy Father has undertaken another momentous reform, that of the catechism or the compilation of a single text to be used throughout the Catholic world. In the reform of the catechism, the following procedure will be kept: (1) Circulars are to be dispatched to the Bishops of the world intimating to them the intention of the Holy See, and asking them to forward to Rome three copies of the catechism actually used in their respective dioceses. In many cases these circulars have already been sent out. (2) Having received copies of the various catechisms, the Holy Father will appoint a commission to examine into them. This commission of Cardinals and priests will follow the course adopted in the Pontificate of Pius X, when his Holiness had a single catechism compiled for the diocese of Italy. The desire of Benedict XV is that the text promulgated for Italy shall serve as a norm for the commission which must collect all the decisions given by the congregations with regard to the Italian catechism. (3) The new catechism compiled, it will be translated into Latin, and the proof sheets will be sent to every Bishop in the world for whatever suggestions each may see fit to make, exactly as in the case of the various sections of the canon law. (4) When the Pope has approved and promulgated the work, its editors will be authorized to publish editions in the various languages.

The New Cathechism

Russia.—Prince Lvoff, who resigned the post of Premier on July 20 to M. Kerensky, is reported to have done so because he could not agree with the Provisional Government's decision to realize at once the entire program of the Socialist party. He opposed the immediate proclamation of a republic, the execution of the Government's land proposals, and the control of the Cabinet's policy by the Congress of Workmen and Soldiers' Delegates. It appears that the late Cabinet crisis was caused by the Socialist Ministers presenting an ultimatum demanding the foregoing changes, besides the abolition of all class-distinctions, and a fundamental reorganization of the whole financial and economic system. Prince Lvoff's Coalition Government had become quite unworkable. It was always at the mercy of the Council of Delegates, and its inner construction was one that gave complete power to the Socialist minority. There was a kind of War-Cabinet, a Committee for Military and Foreign Affairs composed officially of Lvoff, Kerensky and Terestchenko. But the Premier was virtually the Socialist Tseretelli, who led the Council of Delegates. So it was not really a Coalition Government at all, but a Tseretelli-Council-of-Delegates Government with the non-Socialist Ministers as mere technical advisers.

Why Lvoff Resigned

On July 23 the Executive Councils of the All-Russia Workmen's and Soldier's and Peasant's organizations issued a proclamation to the army, calling on the soldiers to fight the Germans manfully and warning them that "With the Government lies the salvation of the revolution. We have acknowledged its unlimited authority and its unlimited power. Its commands must be law. All those who disobey the commands of the Provisional Government in battle will be regarded as traitors. Toward traitors and cowards no mercy will be shown."

Proclamations and Disclosures

That the foregoing warning was necessary is shown by the dislosures in a telegram sent to Premier Kerensky by the Commissioner of the Provisional Government who was with the Second Army on the Southwestern front. He wrote:

> We unanimously recognize that the situation demands extreme measures and efforts, for everything must be risked to save the revolution from catastrophe. The Commander in Chief on the western front and the commander of the Second Army today have given orders to fire on deserters and runaways.
>
> Let the country know the truth. Let it act without mercy. Let it find enough courage to strike those who by their cowardice are destroying Russia and the revolution.

Most military units are in a state of complete disorganization. Their spirit for the offensive has utterly disappeared. They no longer listen to orders of their leaders, and they neglect all exhortations of comrades, even replying by threats and shots. Some elements voluntarily evacuate positions without even waiting for the approach of the enemy.

Cases are on record in which an order given to proceed with all haste to such and such a spot to assist comrades in distress has been discussed for several hours at meeting, and reinforcements consequently have been delayed several hours.

These troops abandon their positions at the first shots of the enemy. For a distance of several hundred versts long files of deserters, armed and unarmed, men in good health and robust, who have lost all shame and feel they can act altogether with impunity, are proceeding to the rear. Frequently entire units desert in this manner.

The Provisional Government also issued a proclamation explaining the seriousness of the situation, urging all true Russians to defend their country against the invader and to protect the Administration from counter-revolutionary measures, and indicating important reforms that must be effected.

At a joint sitting on July 23, of the Council of Workmen's and Soldier's Delegates, and the Council of Delegates of the Peasants of All Russia, unlimited powers at home and abroad were voted Premier Kerensky. After an all-night session the following resolution was passed by a vote of 252 to 57:

> Recognizing that the country is menaced by a military debâcle on the front and by anarchy at home it is resolved:
>
> First, That the country and the revolution are endangered; Second, That the Provisional Government is proclaimed Government of National Safety; Third, That unlimited powers are accorded the Government for reestablishing the organization and discipline of the army for a fight to the finish against the enemies of public order and for the realization of the whole program embodied in the governmental program just announced.

In an interview Premier Kerensky gave the Associated Press, he said:

> Relying upon the confidence of the masses and the army, the Government will save Russia and Russian unity by blood and iron, if argument and reason, honor and conscience, are not sufficient. No one will dare take advantage of the present situation in order to attempt to restore the old régime. I find ridiculous the talk about a coming counter-revolution under my leadership. The new Government must immediately stop the retreat and the economic dissolution, and restore the country's finances. We expect Russia to forget her personal interests and to have in mind only the highest interests of the country.

The New Cabinet

On July 24 the Premier was reported to have completed the new Provisional Government's Constitution, and to have formed another Coalition Cabinet, composed of ten members, half of them belonging to the Socialist group and half to the non-Socialist parties. The other State offices will be directed by unpolitical department heads who are not members of the Cabinet. The Socialists in the new Cabinet are: Alexander Kerensky, Minister President, and Minister of War and Marine; M. Tseretelli, Minister of Post and Telegraphs; M. Skobeleff, Minister of Labor; M. Tchernoff, Minister of Agriculture, and M. Pieschehonoff, Minister of Supplies. The non-Socialists are: N. V. Nekrasoff, Vice-Minister President without portfolio; M. Terestchenko, Minister of Foreign Affairs; I. N. Efremoff, Minister of Justice (M. Efremoff is a member of the Duma's temporary committee); Nicholas Lvoff, Procurator of the Holy Synod, and M. Godneff, Controller of State. The directors of departments are: M. Prokopovitch, Progressive member of the Duma, Department of Trade and Agriculture, and A. A. Barishnikoff, a member of the Duma and a Moscow manufacturer, Department of Social Tutelage.

The Extraordinary National Council

The Commander-in-Chief and the commanders of the various armies having decided on July 26 that the only way to save military discipline from ruin was to restore capital punishment for treason and cowardice, the Provisional Government established on all the fronts courts-martial composed of three officers and three soldiers to pass judgment on each case. Orders have also been issued to discover the German agents who are said to be responsible for the recent riots. The Premier has prohibited the publication of all papers which foster the spirit of disobedience to the Provisional Government. News came on July 28 that the situation in Russia is so grave that Premier Kerensky, without waiting for the Constituent Assembly to meet, ordered an Extraordinary National Council to convene at Moscow on July 31. The participants were announced as members of the Duma, men of prominence from the chief centers of the Empire and representatives from the Zemstvos, municipalities, labor unions and universities. The Premier promised two sessions for the discussion of an exhaustive report on the condition of the country, and a consideration of ways and means to save the country from ruin. Premier Kerensky declared that conspiracies to restore monarchical government would be "suppressed in the most determined and merciless way," and turbulent Kronstadt was ordered to hand over the chief radical Socialist agitators, or the island would be blockaded. Despite all these precautionary measures the disorder is apparently great, the Constitutional Democrats have one grievance, the Socialist Ministers another and the representatives of trade and industry still another, and no group appears willing to yield a point: The first named are resolutely opposed to the policies of the Foreign Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, the second demand that the non-Socialist Ministers be subject to party dictation, otherwise the Socialists will refuse to take instructions from the Councils of Deputies, the third declare that they will collaborate with the Government only if all power is confided to the Provisional Government. Meantime while the leaders are squabbling, the peasants continue disobedient and lawless, subject, Kerensky claims, to German intrigue.

The Canadian Crisis

GEORGE E. ROE

WHILE the opposition to conscription in the Province of Quebec is in no sense conditioned on Catholicism, the fact that people who are French and Catholic almost unanimously oppose the draft is very likely to have a bearing upon the progress of events incidental to the application of the new policy, if it ever comes to be applied. There are signs that organized labor in Canada is opposed to conscription, and indeed soldiers in uniform invaded the Toronto Labor Temple to suppress forcibly expressions of that opposition. It appears doubtful whether in the agricultural community, in the English-speaking Provinces, a majority would favor the draft, but however harsh the recrimination in such places, the controversy amongst neighbors would not much exceed in violence the average political debate. It is known that many industrial leaders are disquieted by the prospect of any further reduction in the number of available workmen, but this attitude, though it might be frowned upon publicly, would be secretly approved. It is different when disagreement proceeds from people who speak a different language and who are always being told that it is their duty to abandon that language; who practise a religion whose condemnation furnishes to a widespread and very aggressive organization its chief motive for existence. A lodge of the Orange Order has already demanded that Quebec Day be dropped from the program at Toronto Exhibition, although Labor Day and Farmers' Day will be continued without protest.

In an election, if there is one, an effort will be made to consolidate the other Provinces against French and Catholic Quebec, and if the law is enacted by this Parliament and its application proceeded with before an election or a referendum, it must be expected that racial antipathy and religious prejudice will influence the manner of the application to the French and Catholic people of Quebec. Moreover, a profound psychological effect follows from the fact that French Canada bears the stigma of the military defeat of 1759. Remembrance of conquest is all the world over an inspiration to contempt, and in this case, as in others that might be mentioned, there will be the feeling that harsh measures may be instituted almost with impunity because of an expected unwillingness or incapacity to resist. These expectations usually fail of realization, but the temptation to put them to the proof is always very strong. Thus it happens that awkward and possibly tragic incidents are more likely to occur where the opponents of conscription are French and Catholic than where the opposition comes from organized labor, from passively resisting agriculture, or from industry in distress. There were threats the other day of using ball cartridges to suppress demonstrations in Montreal, and that or a similarly destructive order may yet be given, when it would not be given against English-speaking Protestant labor in Toronto or against farmers on the Western prairie.

Americans, if they find Canada in the morning headlines, would do well to remember that the Canadian case is not on all fours with their own. American participation in the war has been dictated by resentment arising from a train of specific incidents injuriously affecting American honor or interest. Canadian participation was an act of assent to a decision taken by Great Britain on her sole responsibility.

There have been two main currents of political thought running in Canada for the past twenty years. One flows towards implicit acceptance of whatever Great Britain decides to be good, the other towards retention of the control of events by which Canada's future may be kept as far as possible in her own hands. That there is room for many cross-currents and back waters is easy to see. Sir Sam Hughes began by raising troops to rush forward to the trenches and ended by demonstrating to his own satisfaction, if not to others', the incompetence of the British war-chiefs. Cabinet ministers are credited with rejecting proposals made to them in London as inconsistent with the sense of self-government, and immediately afterwards advocating measures in Canada on the all-sufficient plea that they have been asked for in London.

At the other extreme, prominent Quebec Nationalists agreed at the outbreak of the war that the attacks upon Belgium and France gave ample warrant for voluntary enlistment by Canadians, leaving their position not easily distinguishable from that of the British-born who flew to arms when England prepared for the grapple with Germany. For twenty years, in peace and war, the Imperialist aspiration has been making progress, sometimes by direct advances, sometimes by adroit diversions, sometimes by temporizing concessions, and during twenty years the Nationalist resistance has been offered in exactly the same ways, now by direct attack, now by adroit diversion, now by temporizing concessions. What the war was to do was to bring to the front those whose first and last thought was for England, and what it is now to do is to subject to long avoided test those whose first and last thought is for Canada.

It was the newest Canadians, the British-born, who led in the race for the trenches. They had been in Canada but a few years or a few months and had never ceased to be of England. It is the oldest Canadians, whose generations for nearly three centuries have been Canadian and who long ago ceased to be of France, who shoulder the resistance to conscription for a war in Europe in which Canada's part is confessedly that of a satellite of Great Britain. Eighty per cent of the first troops to leave Canada were British-born. It may be that eighty per cent of the first opposition to conscription will be from Quebec. The primal motive, the love of one's own home and the home of many of his forefathers, operates in both cases. If people inspired by similar motives are to find themselves in conflict, from the experience of the world a dangerous situation impends.

What the Quebec Nationalist will have to contend against, if the world's attention should be attracted to him by untoward events, is the indifference felt for all lesser contentions by those who are interested in the war. He pleads that the strength of Canada has been sapped, that the country faces financial, physical and political exhaustion, that her independence has been compromised and the future of her institutions put in jeopardy. The world which turns a deaf ear to the plaints of Holland, Sweden, Denmark and Greece, and which seems to have forgotten Montenegro, cannot be counted upon with certainty for even a patient hearing. But then no people, certainly no small people, ever enters with determination upon a difficult course out of regard for what other people will think. The motive has to be more compelling than that. In this case the motive is very simple. But a handful of peasants, 60,000 in all, was left by the officers of the French King, in 1763, along the shores of the Canadian rivers. In attaining their present strength of nearly 2,000,000 they have achieved a national consciousness in circumstances of national isolation. What strength they have gained, thus left to themselves, they mean, if they can, to preserve. They have been three centuries out of Europe and feel no impulsion to dictate its boundaries. They foresee a long future in the home-land where their stock has taken root, and they would prevent, if they can, its being compromised by the decimation of the race.

The bearing of all this upon the general Canadian problem is obvious enough. If conscription is applied Canada will face the fundamental issue which Canadian statesmen for fifty years have hoped need never be faced. They have believed, or made believe, that with one foot in Europe and one foot in America they could march forward without embarrassment, and they have always anxiously avoided anything that would cause a failure of accommodation between the two feet. Perfect accommodation seems now likely to be impaired, and if so there may be some awkward stumbling for a time.

Prejudice and Mexico's Ruin

EBER COLE BYAM

PERSISTENCE of prejudice, how much injustice, how much sorrow, how much bloodshed and destruction come of it, no man can tell. Because of it, orphans are deprived of their foster-parents; the sick are abandoned to their diseases, and the poor to their poverty. Because of it, a blast of anarchy destroys the accumulated labors of generations and leaves a stricken people defenseless beneath a descending pall of pestilence and famine.

Sad indeed it is to contemplate the persistence of prejudice among those we cannot help, though we know they are insulting their own intelligences fully as much as those they thoughtlessly calumniate. Historic lies, oft repeated, at last come to be taken for granted, even by those most injured by them. The victims of calumny not only supinely submit to insults themselves, but allow vilification of the helpless dead to pass unchallenged. A state of mind is thus created which accepts only that which agrees with its preconceived opinions and rejects everything to the contrary.

To those whom curiosity has excited to attempts to verify the long-accepted judgments of the past there comes a rude awakening, in which pained surprise is quickly followed by hot indignation and a burning desire to refute the false and proclaim the true. History serves not only as a record of the past, but in a measure as a guide to the future. By a careful consideration of the policies of preceding generations of statesmen, and their consequent failures and successes, we discover a guide to the future, and are thereby enabled to avoid like mistakes, or to achieve like successes, to the profit of future generations, if not of our own.

It, therefore, becomes the duty of the conscientious historian, not only faithfully to record a truthful narrative, but also, when he attempts to demonstrate the sequence of events, to lay prejudice aside, and judge fairly and impartially. Unfortunately, this is not always done, and the consequence has been, not only grievous injustice in the past, but the infliction of irreparable damage in the present.

The judgments of men are determined largely by preconceived opinions based upon the sum of their experiences, or in the absence of that, upon the recorded experiences of others. In this manner men acquire certain prejudices which become controlling factors in every equation they may be called upon to solve. Herein serves the historian, and upon his integrity and intelligent interpretation of events there frequently depend the formation of public opinion, and indirectly the conferring of happiness and prosperity, or the infliction of misery and poverty, upon millions of innocent men, women and children.

The average reader, among the 200,000,000 English-speaking inhabitants of the world, must depend for his information upon those historical works written in the language he understands. Therefore, when the average English-speaking person seeks information about Mexico, recourse must be had to those writers who have had the time and the intelligent interest to comb the multitudinous letters, reports and histories of a vast army of Spanish writers whose labors have been the recitation and interpretation of that country's 400 years of eventful history.

Unfortunately, the writers in English have brought to their task the accumulated prejudices and preconceived opinions of centuries of inherited dislike for the Spaniard and his religion, and, as a consequence, have served to mold the present-day opinion of the average American and Englishman into a form as false as it is distorted. Accepting their interpretation of events as trustworthy, modern writers have followed the guide thus given them, and the melancholy consequence has been the ruin of a flourishing nation of 15,000,000 people, the destruction of the accumulated labors of generations, the death of hundreds of thousands by pestilence and famine, the exile and impoverishment of other hundreds of thousands, and the subjection of the despairing remnant to the most revolting tyranny.

As an example of how history is distorted and falsified, three instances will be chosen at random, a well-known historian, a translator of note, and the author of a comprehensive guide-book on Mexico. The first is H. H. Bancroft, whose exhaustive "History of the Pacific States of North America" has been considered not only an authority, but the last word upon the subject. In discussing the Spanish writers, this author says:

> The writings of the authors in question were moreover submitted to a rigorous system of censorship by Spanish councils and tribunals under control of the priesthood, without the approval of whose officials no work could be published. The spirit that animated these censors was the same as that alluded to above, and their zeal was chiefly directed to the discovery and expurgation of any lurking anti-Catholic sentiment. Many valuable works were doubtless suppressed, but such of them as were preserved in manuscript, or those whose contents have since been made known, have not proved that the censors directed their efforts against anything but heterodoxy and unfavorable criticism of Spanish dealings with the natives.

Mr. Bancroft here gives us to understand that any writings containing unfavorable criticism of Spanish dealings with the natives were expurgated by the "rigorous system of censorship"; and he does not fail, most unwarrantedly and dishonestly, to create the impression that many valuable works were destroyed by the censors. Throughout the numerous volumes of his work Bancroft reads a multitude of indictments against the Spaniards for their alleged mistreatment of the Indians. Where did he get his information? Strangely enough, from the very priests he would have us believe exercised a hawk-like vigilance in the discovery and expurgation of any "unfavorable criticism of Spanish dealings with the natives." Author after author, report after report, document after document, are cited by him as containing the very evidence he declares with entire positiveness to have been rigorously expunged.

The humane Las Casas wrote volumes to prove his countrymen the most inhuman butchers ever known, and, in his perfervid imagination and misguided zeal, created millions of peaceful Indians, that he might increase the horror in his grim pictures of their wanton slaughter. Nor is Las Casas the only one. Practically all the contemporaneous writers of the Conquest-period handle the subject with a freedom evidencing an amazing indifference on the part of Mr. Bancroft's board of censorship. The historians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, mostly famous clergymen, follow the lead of the earlier authorities.

These evidences not only prove the falsity of Mr. Bancroft's statement, but also indicate to us the zeal of the missionaries and others for the welfare of the natives; and later narratives and complaints recite both success and failure in the gradual but steady progress toward the spiritual and material betterment of the native races.

The second instance is that of Mr. Charles Cullen, who translated the "History of Mexico" written by the Jesuit Clavijero. Driven from Mexico in 1767, Father Clavijero finished his history in Italy, where it was published in Italian in 1780. Cullen immediately translated it into English, and, in doing so, took occasion to interpolate a whole paragraph inverting the meaning intended by the author. This interpolation occurs at the end of the last paragraph of Book X. Clavijero says: "God punishing in the miserable posterity of those nations, the injustice, the cruelty and the superstition of their ancestors: grim example of the Divine justice and of the instability of the kingdoms of the earth."

The foregoing did not suit Mr. Cullen, so he left it out and interpolated the following:

> Thus, it has been said, in conducting the Spaniards, a polished nation of Europe, to overturn the rude monarchy of the Mexicans, in America, did Providence punish the latter for the injustice, cruelty and superstition of their ancestors. But there, the victors, in one year of merciless massacre, sacrificed more human victims to avarice and ambition, than the Indians during the existence of their empire devoted in chaste worship to their native gods; there the legislative art of Europe corrected the bloody policy of American tribes, and introduced the ministry of justice, by despoiling Indian caziques of their territories and tributes, torturing them for gold, and enslaving their posterity: and there the mild parental voice of the Christian religion was suborned to terrify confounded savages with the malice of a strange, and by them unprovoked, God, and her gentle arm in violence lifted up to raze their temples and hospitable habitations, to ruin every fond relic and revered monument of their ancestry and origin, and divorce them in anguish from the bosom of their country.

The "chaste worship" alluded to by Mr. Cullen was an exaggerated horror of human sacrifice and cannibalism. His "despoiling Indian caziques of their territories and tributes" was in reality a relieving of a suffering people from an intolerable burden. The destroyed "temples" reeked with the stench of putrid human bodies. Countless uninformed writers have gleefully quoted this passage in support of their prejudices, and countless others doubtless will continue to imitate them, unconscious of the fraud and falsehood.

The third instance is that of the "Compendious Guide-Book," whose author has spoiled an otherwise meritorious work by his thoughtless prejudice, which has led him to overlook no opportunity to damage the memory of every prominent Spaniard, both lay and clerical, where the least excuse can be found to do so. In the introductory remarks to his review of the viceregal period, this particular writer says:

> Mexico was under the iron rule of Spain from 1521 to 1821, and during those three centuries it was ruled by five (Hernan Cortes first) Governors (1521-28); two Audiencias (1528-35), and sixty-two Viceroys (1535-1821), the last of whom was Francisco Novella. Personal ambition and religious zeal stimulated Cortes to the Conquest, and covetousness and love of power were the salient characteristics of many of the peruked and bespangled rulers who followed him. These Viceroys (virreyes) were for the most part Spanish nobles, prelates, or court politicians, who sought the position for selfish purposes, and with the idea of repairing their dilapidated fortunes in the New World.

Passing by the "iron rule," which has become the stereotyped prefix to any reference to Spain's dominion in the New World, we find "personal ambition and religious zeal" advanced as thoroughly reprehensible spurs to human endeavor. How much, I wonder, of the world's material progress would have been realized without "personal ambition," and to what degree would its moral development have advanced in the absence of "religious zeal"? Yet, whenever our would-be historians touch upon the subject of Spanish rule in the American colonies, they conjure up a very host of evils and then charge them all to "personal ambition and religious zeal."

Another favorite pair of invectives is "covetousness and love of power." How many, I wonder, of our own patriotic politicians of the present day would be found in public office if these qualifications were denied them? And then, too, we read the sneering reference to the "peruked and bespangled rulers," which plainly is written to show that all the undesirable characteristics of worthless governors were the inevitable accompaniments of "perukes" and "spangles." Those making such derogatory references forget that the famous men of their own land, if such there were, wore these same perukes and spangles, when such were in fashion.

And those terrible Spanish viceroys were self-evidently all bad because they were "for the most part Spanish nobles, prelates, or court politicians," all of which proved the fiendish purposes of the regal despotism grinding the colonies under the "iron rule." The King of Spain should have followed the example of a certain modern ruler who delegated his Secretary of Agriculture to make a report on military affairs, the modern democratic idea being that any knowledge whatever of a subject is a sure disqualification to speak thereon.

It was, of course, quite to be taken for granted that these "Spanish nobles, prelates, or court politicians" were actuated by a "love of power" and "sought the position for selfish purposes and with the idea of repairing their dilapidated fortunes in the New World." Modern democracy furnishes, apparently, no such examples of "covetous" officials, and they would have us believe that when "deserving Democrats" accept office, they do so at a great sacrifice of time and money, and have no thought for "personal ambition," "love of power," to say nothing of "selfish purposes," nor of any desire to "repair their dilapidated fortunes."

The writer referred to proceeds to give a condensed synopsis of the rules of the sixty-two viceroys, and, in view of his prejudices and preconceived opinions, we may be assured that he has overlooked no opportunity to calumniate every viceroy where the least excuse to do so was available. On reading his narrative we discover that he could find cause for condemnation in but two of those viceroys; in fully fifty he could find no cause for complaint, and in the case of ten others he is frankly laudatory. In other words, out of the extended viceregal period of 286 years, he shows us that for eighty-one years Mexico was ruled by men whom he is compelled to praise; for 199 years it was ruled by men in whom he, with all his prejudices, can find no fault; and that those whom he condemns ruled the land for but six years, or for but two per cent of the viceregal period.

Therefore, it is safe to say that no people on the face of the globe ever enjoyed for an equal period of time as good a government as was granted to the Mexicans during the colonial days of the Spanish rule.

Spencer and St. Thomas

THOMAS F. WOODLOCK

A WRITER in the London Times recently called attention to the fact that the philosophy of Herbert Spencer has of late lost its influence. "We do not attack it," he says. "We ignore it. It has gone out of fashion. It does not answer, it does not even ask the questions we ask." The reason that the critic gives for this is expressed as follows:

> It is not merely that we are tired of Spencer, that we look for something newer, but that in all his works there is one great assumption which we instinctively deny. . . . The assumption is that all man's deepest values are imposed upon him by external circumstances; and that, if those circumstances could be changed, his values would change with them. Man in his thoughts and emotions and conscience is entirely molded by his surroundings, which means his material surroundings; and that reality which he is so intensely aware of within himself is less real than the reality outside himself of which his senses make him aware. Spencer in fact affirms, or rather implies as if it needed no affirmation, that this external reality is the only reality, and that our values are a mere comment upon it, a theorizing about it which has become habitual and instinctive. For him the emotional part of those values, the passion which we have for truth, beauty and righteousness, is an illusion, even if a useful illusion. . . .

The assumption is constant and against it we rebel. For in less than a generation a change has come over our thought, a change so great that we have not succeeded in expressing it and are scarcely aware how great it is. But when people talk of the revival of religion they mean this change if they mean anything at all; we no longer believe that our values are imposed upon us by our external circumstances or that the emotional force in those values, the passion for truth, beauty and righteousness, is merely a useful illusion. Rather we seek for an explanation of the nature of the universe in those values. They are to us more real than external reality. We believe that we ourselves, that is, our thoughts, our motions, our conscience, are more real than our material surroundings and that we are not passive material molded by those surroundings but active beings with an activity which we call spiritual.

From this the writer goes on to point out the tremendous significance which lies in such a view of man and his "values." It is, he admits, an old view but one now rapidly gaining ground and reacting very powerfully upon the evolutionary theory itself.

All the implications of this belief have not been stated; it has logical consequences of which we are not yet fully aware; but it is certainly true that it makes for a revival of religion. For what is religion but an affirmation of absolute values? What is the belief in God but a belief in a Person of absolute value? And the belief in God, so far as it is a religious belief at all and not a mere desire for help or comfort, is produced by the sense of absolute values, the sense that they are not for mere abstractions but for a single and personal reality.

There is still a surviving prejudice against this belief in God as something unscientific and superstitious; and it remains to be proved that it is neither; that it is the logical and inevitable result of our belief in our own values and, more than that, the result of those values when they are obeyed by the whole will and the whole mind. That, we say, remains to be proved, but the intellect of the world is now turning to the proof of it. It is no longer possessed by the superstition that the belief in God must be superstitious. We have entered upon a new period of creative religion, all the more creative because it is not yet consciously religious. And we reject the philosophy of Spencer because there is no hint or promise or hope of religion to be found in it.

St. Thomas in dealing with the proofs for the existence of God distinguishes five ways of argument, the fourth of which, as it appears in the excellent English translation of the Dominicans, is as follows:

The fourth way is taken from the gradation to be found in things. Among beings there are some more and some less good, true, noble, and the like. But "more" and "less" are predicated of different things, according as they resemble in their different ways something which is in the degree of "most" as a thing is said to be hotter according as it more nearly resembles that which is hottest; so that there is something which is truest, something best, something noblest, and, consequently, something which is uttermost being; for the truer things are, the more truly they exist. What is most complete in any genus is the cause of all in that genus; as fire, which is the most complete form of heat, is the cause whereby all things are made hot. Therefore there must also be something which is to all beings the cause of their being, goodness, and every other perfection; and this we call God.

It is remarkable that the modern writer should not have noticed the extraordinarily close correspondence of his argument with that of St. Thomas. And it is equally remarkable that he should seem to suppose that "science" has anything to say on the subject, or that the modern intellect has anything to add to the logical argument of the thirteenth-century Doctor of the Church.

Nevertheless much can be forgiven a man who in these days and in the London Times can talk of the "superstition that the belief in God must be superstitious." It is a most felicitous characterization of a very plain and wide-spread phenomenon.

The Cost of the War

A. Hilliard Atteridge

NOW that the war has reached the end of its third year, various computations are being made of its cost. Anything like an accurate estimate of the sum total is impossible, but certain definite figures are available as to some details of the expense, and with the help of these a minimum estimate can be made out. The total expenditure cannot be less than the figure thus arrived at, and it may be much more.

Reckonings in advance are always doubtful. Not three months ago, the British Government's estimate of the daily cost which it had to meet was between five and six million pounds sterling. But figures laid before Parliament in June show that this was a rather misleading compilation, for by the end of May it was stated that the daily expenditure had risen to between seven and eight million pounds. Britain has borne financially a heavier burden than any other belligerent. In the war with Napoleon, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, she had to finance her Continental allies, and she has had to do the same thing again on a greater scale in the present war. But for English help, in the form of liberal advances of money, neither Russia, France nor Italy could have kept her armies in the field. Up to the end of last March, the amount advanced to the Allies by Britain was £900,000,000.

Moving in the House of Commons on July 24, a vote of credit for £650,000,000, that is, about $3,250,000,000, Andrew Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced that Great Britain's war expenditure had reached the total to date of £5,292,000,000. The House was startled to hear that England's advances to the Allies and the dominions had already reached £1,000,000,000.

The daily war expense while showing a decline over the figures given on May 9, when Mr. Bonar Law asked for the last war credit, still approaches £7,000,000 and exceeds the budget estimate by £1,000,000 daily. Comparing the seventy-seven days prior to July 24 with the first thirty-five days of the financial year the expenditure shows a reduction of £1,000,000 daily. The Chancellor estimated the net increased expenditure at £33,300,000, not including advances to the Allies, which represented an increase of £300,000 daily. It was obvious he added that the budget estimate must be exceeded, and it would not be surprising if, at the end of the financial year, the excesses were approximately the same as those of the last financial year. The total advances to the Dominions were £146,000,000. Part of the increased expenditure, the Chancellor explained, was due to the fact that Great Britain had made greater payments to India for war service. This meant that a larger force had been obtained from India than had been expected when the estimate was framed. There was also an increased expenditure for aeroplanes. Another increase in army expenditure was due to the fact that the casualties at the front had been lower than last year. Reginald McKenna, former Chancellor of the Exchequer, who followed Bonar Law, said that the figures given by the Chancellor did not constitute the daily outgo. These had to be added to the amount which must be paid on the interest on the debt, and the amount expended on other services not dealt with under the vote of credit. A total daily expenditure of £8,000,000 must be expected, he thought, before the end of the year. The country's revenue was something like £2,000,000 daily and its expenditures £8,000,000, which meant that £6,000,000 had to be raised by war loans. The last named sum, daily, over the whole year, represented for interest and for a moderate sinking fund a further income tax of three shillings, four pence in the pound which added to the present rate of five shillings was more than eight shillings. Trade after the war, he feared, would be crippled by an income tax of eight shillings. This means a tremendous burden on the budgets of the years of peace in the form of interest and sinking fund on this huge total. But this does not represent the entire expenditure of the British Empire on the war. At least £150,000,000, and very likely a much larger amount, has been expended by India and the Oversea Dominions.

As for the Allies of Britain, we have the official accounts for France up to the end of last year, showing an expenditure of £2,469,000,000. The Italian accounts are available up to June, 1916, only, but they show an expenditure of £312,000,000. There are no complete figures available for Russia; we may assume that her expenditure will be at least equal to that of France, and for France we may put down the outlay, adding a rough estimate for the seven months of 1917 to the expenditure up to the end of last year, as about £3,000,000,000. Making a similar addition for Italy, the amount up to the end of July cannot be less than £600,000,000. For the smaller States, Belgium, Serbia and Rumania, we have no definite account. Adding together the outlay of Britain, Russia, France and Italy, and leaving the smaller countries out of account, there is a total outlay of over £11,000,000,000, more than half of which, perhaps two-thirds, represents debts to be dealt with in the future.

As to the expenditure of the Central Powers, the published figures are much lower than those of the Allies, and in some quarters there is a suspicion that they have been deliberately underestimated. As they stand, they indicate up to the end of the three years something over £5,000,000,000 for Germany, including money advanced to Turkey, and about £3,000,000,000 for Austria-Hungary. This makes a total European-war expenditure of nearly £20,000,000,000. To this will presently have to be added the war-expenditure of the United States. Japan may be left out of the account. She is the one belligerent power which will show a financial balance to the good on the war. Her operations have been confined to the expedition against Kiao-Chau and some naval operations not on a large scale. And on the other hand, the State arsenals have been supplying at good prices munitions to the Allies, chiefly to Russia, and instead of raising new loans, the Japanese Government has paid off many of her debts since the war began.

There are other costs of the war, of which it is impossible to make even the roughest estimate. One can only indicate their general character. Over wide tracts of country, especially in Belgium, Eastern and Northern France, East Prussia, Poland, Lithuania, Courland, Volhynia, Galicia, Serbia and Rumania, there has been wholesale destruction of property. Some of this property, if it had been converted into money before the war, would have brought sensational prices. Under this head one may name, for instance, the treasures destroyed in the library at Louvain. Then there has been destruction of buildings, from historic churches down to unfortunate villages and farmsteads. Wide tracts have been laid waste and whole fleets of merchant shipping sunk. Any estimate of the value destroyed would be only the wildest of guesses, but the total must be enormous.

Again, it would be difficult to make even the roughest estimate of the loss resulting from the interruption of normal industrial activity in the belligerent nations. A great part of their energies has been devoted for three years, not to the production of useful commodities, but to turning out thousands of millions worth of arms, equipments and munitions; the arms and equipment soon to be worn out, the munitions to be blown into the air soon after they are manufactured. It has been the most colossal instance of non-productive industry in the world's history.

Finally, there is another class of losses, the most terrible of all, and again the most difficult to estimate from the standpoint of economic value. We have precise figures of the loss of life and the war casualties generally for only one country, but no official total has been published for many months, and as yet, no precise figures have been collected from the casualty lists for nearly a year. France has published no list of casualties since the war began; neither has Russia nor Italy nor the minor belligerent countries. German totals are published from time to time, but there are no Austrian or Turkish figures.

Attempts have been made, however, with the help of the British and German statements, to arrive at a general estimate. The figures for deaths in action and deaths from wounds received in action in all the belligerent armies and navies amount, according to the lowest estimate, to 6,500,000; according to the highest to 8,000,000. These figures, however, do not include deaths from sickness under the stress of war, and leave entirely out of account the deaths caused by the war among the civilian populations. It is not easy to grasp numbers made up of millions. One has to have recourse to imaginary ways of conveying an idea of what they amount to. Let us take the lowest figure of the deaths in action, 6,500,000. Now suppose this number of men drawn up in a marching column of fours, closely locked together, without any intervals. That column would be 865 miles long from front to rear, and marching day and night, if such were possible, it would take nearly a fortnight to pass a given point.

But this army of the dead is much less than the numbers of the wounded. It is true that many of these recover and after a while are again fit for service, and that the lists of wounded are swelled by the same men being wounded two or three times in succession. But there is a large proportion of men more or less crippled for life by the loss of sight, of one or more limbs, or by a general physical and nervous breakdown. Only after the war, when pension estimates are prepared, will the totals of these incapacitated men be available. Economically, the loss to the nations is made up of the millions, mostly young men, whose lives have been cut off and who are no longer economic factors in the life of their peoples, to which has to be added the similar loss arising from the numbers of incapacitated men. When we consider these losses and the other losses that can only be indicated, but not estimated, it seems clear that the cost of the war, represented by mere national expenditure, is the smaller item in the account.

Florence Nightingale's Friends

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J.

A RUMOR gained credence a while ago that if any of our Sisters wished to enlist for Red Cross work they would have to lay aside their habits. Mr. Henry P. Davison, Chairman of the War Council of the Red Cross, put the rumor in its merited tomb when he stated: "I know of nothing that would justify a regulation to the effect that a Sister of the Catholic Church would be required to remove her habit and wear civilian clothes if participating in Red Cross work. I am familiar with the records of the Catholic Sisterhoods in other wars. I have seen their work in this terrible conflict, especially in France, and my attitude is one of unqualified admiration. The American Red Cross will welcome and prize their service in the work it has undertaken."

There is nothing surprising in this statement for those who identify war-relief work with Florence Nightingale. And who that knows the sad story of the Crimean hospitals at Scutari could fail to credit that remarkable woman with a large share in the development of scientific nursing as we know it today in war? When she first came to the hospitals after Inkermann was fought, the doctors looked on her as an intruder. She was a volunteer so what could she know about the regular routine of an army hospital? This was the typical attitude of the day when only part of a nation went to war. England felt the same way in 1914, when the cry, "Leave it to Kitchener," settled the question of English incompetency to the satisfaction of official incompetents, but to the satisfaction of no one else.

The striking fact about Florence Nightingale was that she did not withdraw and criticize, but forced an acknowledgment of her ability by staying at the front and bringing order out of confusion in relief work for the wounded. She could do this only because she was trained for the work and the band of nurses that formed her first group were likewise trained workers. In view of Mr. Davison's tribute to our Sisters the complexion of that group is worth knowing.

In an appreciation of Florence Nightingale, written some time ago, A. Hilliard Atteridge stated that comparatively few of those who honor the name of Florence Nightingale are aware of the fact that "It was to the convents she turned for her recruits" when she was organizing her band of nurses for the war hospitals of the East. "Those who were not Catholic Sisters," the same writer holds, "were members of the newly established Anglican Sisterhood." This much is certain, that when word came to England from the seat of war, that the hospitals in the Crimea were in a wretched state, Florence Nightingale wrote to the War Office that there was loss of life in the military hospitals that could be prevented and she was prepared to prove it. She was taken at her word and ordered to the East at once. With her went a band of Sisters of Mercy. Their going came about in this way: Bishop Grant, of Southwark, was the son of a warrior, and the sufferings of the sick and wounded soldiers of the Crimean War touched him to the quick. The convent of the Sisters of Mercy, at Bermondsey, was the oldest in his diocese and the only one that carried on its list of ministries the care of the sick. On October 16, 1854, he wrote to the Sisters: "In times of real difficulty the children of Mary must be ready to imitate her in her journey with haste into the mountains. Five of your number must start for Turkey tomorrow to nurse the sick soldiers." While the sudden orders were being carried out, Bishop Morris of St. George's, who came to the convent to offer help to the departing Sisters, asked: "Who is to take care of you from here to Turkey?" "Our Angel Guardians," was the answer. They did, too, in a journey that was fraught with peril. On October 22 the Sisters met Florence Nightingale in Paris, and in a week's time they sailed from Marseilles for Constantinople, where their ship came to anchor on November 4. They found quarters in the Turkish barracks, a big building for those days, sheltering during the winter of 1854-55 between 1,900 and 2,500 wounded at a time, the hospital cots, with the spaces between, extending over four miles of territory. At each angle of the building was a tower in which were a few rooms and a hall. Florence Nightingale and her party took one tower, allotting to the Sisters a large room. The room was unfurnished, with the exception of a large chair without a back that served also as a table. Not a whole pane of glass was in any window, and there was no heat of any kind. Mother M. Clare, the head of the band, with two Sisters remained at the Barracks Hospital and Sisters M. Gonzaga and Anastasia were detailed for work at the General Hospital about a mile away. The routine work of the hospital as we find it outlined in the "Annals of the Sisters of Mercy," was under the direction of Mother M. Clare Moore, who had sole charge of supplying all requisitions made by doctors and nurses. Under her was a contingent of Greeks, Italians, Turks and French civilians, besides a detail of orderlies. A woman of rare executive ability, Mother Clare directed the energies of this motley throng in a manner that made the army officers wonder and called from Florence Nightingale the tribute: "I could not have managed at all without Mother Clare."

The days at Scutari were busy ones for the Sisters. After the fatigues of the day's nursing it was not unusual for the Sisters to be up till midnight trying to rid themselves of the filth and vermin that clung to them from their contact with the poor sufferers, Their scant rest was disturbed by the big rats that infested their sleeping quarters. Two of the band caught hospital fever and hung between life and death for weeks. On recovering they had but one request: not to be sent home. It was readily granted. From the letters written by these brave women at the time it is not hard to find where their consolation came from. "The Blessed Sacrament is reserved," wrote Mother Clare, "and we have a little lamp before it. What a blessing to be able to go there sometimes!" On the eve of the Assumption, 1855, the soldiers decorated the chapel, and then joined with the Sisters in chanting the Litany of Loretto, and in saying the rosary.

In November cholera broke out and Florence Nightingale turned to Mother Clare with the request to get more recruits from the convent at Bermondsey. Cardinal Manning and the Secretary of War agreed and three more Sisters of Mercy were sent to the Crimea. The deaths from cholera averaged from twenty to thirty daily, many of the doctors falling victims to the disease. Yet this did not prevent a fitting Christmas celebration. On December 27, Mother Clare wrote to the Sisters at Bermondsey:

> We had our chapel beautifully adorned on Christmas day. Fatigue parties brought us a quantity of lovely green boughs, and one of the soldiers decorated the chapel, so you might almost imagine the grotto of Bethlehem. All the Catholic soldiers were waiting from four a. m. for the Mass celebrated at half-past six; we had second Mass at seven, and the troops paraded for last Mass at nine. At Benediction in the evening the "Adeste" was sung. . . . The men all enjoyed themselves.

The extremes of climate and the drudgery of hospital work began to tell on Mother Clare. Three Sisters who were summoned to the front bade her a fond farewell, thinking that it was their last leave-taking from the Mother they loved. These Sisters were assigned to the Left-Wing Hospital, Land Transport Corps, at Karain, which consisted of huts on the hillside. They had a hut to themselves with two nurses to help them. Though it was Easter-tide, snow fell heavily, and many a morning on awakening they found their cots covered with "beautiful snow." It did not chill their devotion to the sick, and Mother Clare was consoled by a letter from Florence Nightingale that shortly came from the front: "The Sisters are quite well, cheerful and most efficient. Dr. Taylor expressed to me yesterday in the strongest words his feelings, on the reform they had worked in his Land Transport Corps Hospital. 'They do more than medicines,' he said."

While Americans remember Longfellow's beautiful tribute to the heroine of the Crimean War, few are aware of the fact that she met with opposition from the local authorities. The soldiers who benefited by her unselfish devotion appreciated this remarkable woman, and a wounded soldier writing home at the time says that when she was making her night rounds in the Crimean hospitals he had seen men turn to kiss her shadow. Yet her efforts to improve the hospital system were regarded with suspicion by some red-tape officials, and though sustained by the home authorities, she often said that without the support and comfort she received from Mother Clare, who sincerely felt for her, she could not have held her ground. But this help was to be taken from her, for Dr. Cruikshank considered the return of Mother Clare to England the only means of saving her life. So she reached Portsmouth on May 16, 1855, and found a letter awaiting her, dated Balaklava. It is worth quoting, and worth remembering too, in war-time:

> . . . I do not presume to express praise or gratitude to you, Rev. Mother, because it would look as if I thought you had done the work not unto God but unto me. I will ask you to forgive me for everything and anything I may have done which could ever have given you pain, remembering that I have always felt that it has given me more pain to reign over you than you to serve. . . . I trust you will not withdraw any of the Sisters now here, till the work of the hospitals ceases to require their presence, and that I may be authorized to judge this. . . . Dearest Mother, what you have done for the work no one can ever say. But God will reward you for it with Himself. If I thought that your valuable health would be restored by a return home I would not regret it. But I feel that unless you give up work for a while your return to Bermondsey will only be the signal for renewed calls upon your strength. However it matters little provided we spend our lives to God. . . . My love and gratitude will be yours, wherever you go. I do not presume to give you any tribute but my tears. . . . But I should be glad that the Bishop of Southwark should know . . . that you were valued as you deserve and that the gratitude of the army is yours. And believe me, dearest Rev. Mother, ever gratefully and lovingly yours.
>
> FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

The six Sisters who remained in Russia continued the work among the sick and wounded. The last band left with a detail of wounded and reached England on July 27, 1856. Mother Clare received several other letters from the "heroine of the Crimea." In one she assured the Superior that "None of your own children values you, loves you, and reverences you more than I do." No less interesting is Florence Nightingale's tribute to Mother Clare's administrative ability. "You were far above me in fitness for the general superintendency," she wrote, "both in worldly talent of administration, and far more in the spiritual qualification which God values in a superior."

There seems little doubt that Mother Clare was in every sense a superior woman, and Florence Nightingale was not alone in estimating her worth. People who had never come in contact with an Irish lady, who despised "Papists," and Sisters, men and women of all creeds in the mixed population of Scutari united in their admiration for Mother Clare and the devoted band that she brought to the help of Florence Nightingale. The British Government officially expressed its gratitude for "the devotion of the Sisterhood in mitigating the sufferings of the sick and wounded soldiers in the British hospitals in the East."

There is an interesting incident in connection with the return of the Sisters of Mercy to England. They came back in detachments, lessening the nursing force as the sick decreased in number. The "Guards" on their return were accompanied by some of the Sisters, and when they disembarked the commanding officer of the regiment asked the Sisters to share the triumph by walking at the head of the column, from the wharf to the barracks. Along the line of march the crowd showed their disapproval by hooting. It proved too much for the troops, and one soldier broke ranks and called upon his fellows to defend the ladies who had stood so faithfully by their dying comrades-in-arms. The regiment to a man brought their guns to the old "fire" position. The Colonel stepped between the troops and the people, and in a few words told of the labors and sufferings these women in black had undergone for the men at the front. The hooting then turned to cheering, and as the regiment continued its march the Sisters shared in the ovation.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As I understand it, the purpose of Catholic education is to prepare the individual to fulfil properly the vocation to which God has called him. Perhaps it would be well, therefore, to "let him get acquainted" in the right way and under the right guidance. The Saints taught the use of natural means in accomplishing the purposes of God.

Indianapolis. A. S.

Retreats for Soldiers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am writing to call attention to a suggestion made in the pages of the Queen's Work and of Our Sunday Visitor, that our boarding colleges for boys and our seminaries throughout the country take up the work of organizing and conducting retreats for the young men who are going to the army. The month of August and the first part of September offer an opportunity for such retreats, and it is obvious that good results may be expected, not only for the men who make the retreat, but for all with whom they come into intimate contact during their days of service.

Would it not be practicable so to organize these retreats that shifts of recruits, or better still, the men from officers' training camps, could be brought in turn to the making of retreats on their way to the camps, or on three-days' furlough. In some instances it may be possible to have the recruits come for instruction in the evening when the place of retreat is near the camp, and then they may spend their Saturday and Sunday furlough, which I understand lasts from noon of Saturday until ten o'clock Sunday night, in the place of retreat, engaged in spiritual exercises.

Many of the pick of our graduates of Catholic colleges will be among the first draft, and they will be glad of this opportunity to prepare themselves in a spiritual way for the trying experiences of the service. Retreats for conscripts are a recognized and very important activity of the retreat houses of Europe, and the results have been most gratifying. Many a young fellow has professed his gratitude for the moral strength and courage that he has received in the exercises of the retreat, and without which he would certainly have yielded to the temptations around him.

While no small benefit may come to our young men from the training and discipline of well-conducted camps, there is no question that they will also be exposed to temptations, and the reports that come to us of some of the young men of other countries who have returned from the front, invalided not only in body but also in their Catholic faith and practice, should make us doubly anxious to do all that we can to fortify our brave fellows who are going to the army.

The details of the work should not present too much difficulty. The chaplains of the training camps would gladly cooperate, and not a few of the non-Catholic chaplains will be found eager to help on a work whose benefits they can well appreciate. Indeed if this work is undertaken on a large scale it cannot but impress non-Catholics in general with the motherly solicitude of the Church and with her endless resources effectively to guard and fortify her sons in every emergency. In some of our boarding colleges and seminaries the month of August is already bespoken for various retreats. But in others it may be possible without much inconvenience to arrange for a whole series of retreats for recruits.

The retreats suggested are of course what are known as closed retreats, where the men go to a religious house and seclude themselves for three days, spending the time in thinking over the truths and reflections suggested by the priest-director in his instructions, squaring their accounts with God and their neighbor, preparing for a good Confession, and making decisions and resolutions for the future conduct of their life. There could scarcely be a better time for such spiritual exercises than the eve of a young man's entrance into the army when the retreat may very well be his preparation to lay down his life in the service of his country.

Several plans will suggest themselves. A college may organize retreats for its own graduates who are going to the colors. The officers in training may be given separate retreats. The retreats may culminate in the formation of a group of sodalists who will be instructed in the means of cooperation with the chaplain according to the methods suggested and tried during the stay of our troops on the southern border. Some such permanent organization of the retreatants is very advisable and will extend their influence to the others in the regiment. Since this plan was proposed we have heard from several chaplains and their experience confirms the practical worth of the suggestion.

The financing and promotion of these retreats would not present any difficulty if only those who have the welfare of our recruits at heart, pastors, fathers, mothers, Catholic societies and the superiors of seminaries and colleges, unite to carry into practice this suggestion for retreats for the recruits.

St. Louis. EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

Persecution Renewed in Guadalajara

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am sorry to inform you that according to information received from reliable persons who have just come from the spot religious persecution has been renewed with great fury in Guadalajara. Archbishop Francisco Orozco Jiménes, who for some weeks had concealed himself within his diocese on account of the persecution conducted against him, recently left his place of retirement, hoping that the bitterness of the persecution had somewhat abated. One of the first things he did was to issue a pastoral letter, in which he aligned himself with the Bishops who recently protested against the new Mexican Constitution framed in Querétaro. On July 11 the Governor of Jalisco, General Manuel M. Diéguez, ordered the arrest of all the priests of Guadalajara, and at the same time soldiers were rushed to all the churches not already in possession of the Government, with orders to search for documents.

Fortunately information of the intentions of the Government reached the priests some minutes before the time set for their arrest, and, as a consequence, all of them, with the exception of six, were able to make good their escape. The six who were apprehended were put in prison and cut off from all communication with the outside world, at least that was the state of affairs which obtained when the persons to whom I am indebted for my information left for this country. The documents sought for by the Government were the pastoral letters of Mgr. Jiménes, who is to be put to death, according to the Government's statement, as soon as he is found. Pressure is being put on Father Torres, now in prison, who is supposed to have been recently ordained by the Archbishop, with the hope of discovering the latter's place of concealment.

The persons who reported these facts were also informed that Father Emmanuel Yerena, parish priest of Mexicaltzingo was beaten by the soldiers who arrested him, and that some persons of the parish who believed that the Government intended to rob and close the churches and were trying to save the sacred vestments were shot and perhaps killed. It is impossible to describe the consternation of the Faithful of Guadalajara, who have suffered so much on account of the radicalism and bigotry of Governor Diéguez. It is believed that all the churches are now closed, and that no priests can administer the Sacraments.

Denver. L. M. A.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.

President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00

Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

False and True Women

GERTRUDE ATHERTON has just published a typical "Atherton" book. It is made up of facts and theories. The facts are good, the theories painful to readers who still have a spark of reverence for women, seeing in every woman a mother's image, sublimated to the height of womanhood in a Mother whose Child is God. Motherhood is not the ideal of the fanatical feminist or the Atherton class. In "The Living Present" the author proclaims:

> The end of the war may mark a conclusive revulsion of the present generation of European women from men, that may last until they have passed the productive age. Instead of softening, disintegrating back to type, they may be insensibly hardening inside a mold that will eventually cast them forth a more definite third sex than any that threatened before the war. Woman, blind victim of the race as she has been for centuries, seldom in these days loves without an illusion of the senses or of the imagination. She has ceased, in the wider avenues of life, lined as they are with the opulent wares of twentieth-century civilization, to be merely the burden-bearing and reproductive sex. Life has taught her the inestimable value of illusions and the more practical she becomes, the more she cherishes this divine gift. It is possible that man has forfeited his power to cast a glamor over any but the meanest type of woman. If that should be the case women will ask: "Why settle down and keep house for the tiresome creatures, study their whims, and meekly subside into second place or be eternally on the alert for equal rights? As for children? Let the State suffer for its mistakes. Why bring more children into the world, to be blown to pieces on the field of battle or to be a burden to their women throughout interminable years? No! For a generation at least, the world shall be ours and then it may limp along with a depleted population or go to the dogs."

The pen of the woman who wrote this twaddle produces best-sellers for the delight of readers who are now called upon by the nation they love to be brave in the sacrifice that must be theirs, if their sons, or fathers, or brothers are to succeed in making "the world safe for democracy." Will the women who feed their intellects on this poison that flows from a ready pen guided by a warped mind feel stronger and braver in these days when the country calls for the aid of women who are true patriots, because they are true women? Hardly.

There is a brave woman in St. Paul, a widow of sixty-five. Her name is Mrs. Peter Farrell, and she does not write best-sellers, so the women of America know nothing about her. She spoke a sentence the other day that was written down by a newspaper man. It contains more worth than all that is crowded into the latest product of the pen of Gertrude Atherton. It reflects the mind of a real woman, and will reach the hearts of men and women, for hearts are reached by character not by tricks of tongue or pen. Three of Mrs. Farrell's sons had been called by the draft, while her fourth son was registered and is still liable to conscription. She is not in easy circumstances, as she cannot write best-sellers. In facing the war-situation that came right into her poor home, she said: "I must find out right away what to do; if they've got to go, it's not me that's going to stop them."

When the war-drums cease throbbing the brave women of the land will be remembered for what they did, not merely for what they said. Not the pen-women of poison but the mothers of men will leave enduring memories in the nation's heart. Their names may never appear on publishers' lists, but their power will go into the nation's blood that makes for real national virtue and character. It was Mary Roberts Rinehart who said: "I do not wish to be remembered as a writer, but as a mother and a wife." On such women rests the home, and on the home is the strong, brave nation built.

An Intellectual Revival?

ARE the American people growing more serious-minded? It would seem so. For in a pamphlet recently published at Washington by the Bureau of Education, and entitled "A Graphic Survey of Book Publication, 1890-1916," Mr. Fred E. Woodward proves that during the last six years especially, our national appetite for books of fiction has been decreasing, while the demand for books of a more solid character has been constantly growing. He writes:

> The number [of works of fiction] recorded in 1916 was 932, with one exception (919 in 1915) the smallest number since 1898; in fact, a smaller number than in 1886, twenty-seven years before, when 1,080 were issued. The records show that in 1890 fiction was 24 per cent of the whole number; 1893, 22 per cent; 1899, 17.5 per cent; 1903, 18.6 per cent. Since 1913 the percentage of fiction has decreased. In 1906 fiction was 16.4 per cent; 1907, 12.2 per cent; 1911, 9.1 per cent; 1913, 9.45 per cent; 1914, 8.77 per cent; 1915, 9.44 per cent; 1916, 8.91 per cent.

What is more gratifying still, Mr. Woodward's charts record, along with this remarkable decline in the popularity of lighter literature, a corresponding advance in the number and variety of other kinds of books. Out of a grand total of 10,445 books published in this country last year 322 dealt with philosophy, 755 with religion and theology, 767 with sociology and economics, 324 with education, 1,234 with science and "useful arts," 461 with general literature, 860 with poetry and drama, 754 with history, 364 with geography and travel and 469 with biography.

No doubt the world-war that has now been raging three years has done much to make the nation more sober-minded than formerly, and in the hope of finding a solution for the manifold problems that face them, a larger number of Americans are reading more serious books than best-sellers. It is worthy of note that the 1,032 works bearing on religion and theology that appeared during the first year of the war almost doubled the number published in 1890, while the 408 books on philosophy that came out in 1914 numbered thirty-seven times as many as were printed in 1890. These figures seem to indicate that Americans are now taking a keener interest in such momentous questions as the end of man, the nature of the soul, the existence of God, etc., questions that have always engrossed the minds of thoughtful men. As every clear-headed person who gives such problems serious study cannot but be brought nearer and nearer to the conviction that what the Catholic Church teaches on these subjects is the whole truth, the intellectual revival that is now going on in this country seems to be full of bright promise.

Woman's Part

WHEN the ominous "master-lists" of General Crowder were in the process of making, crowds gathered about the bulletin-boards throughout the country, composed, for the most part, of women, not men, and with the announcement of each serial number that signified an early call to the colors, tears were shed, not indeed by the registrants, but by the women who loved them. The young men who heard the summons greeted it joyously, as befitted their manhood, or at least with an expression of unconcern, though they knew full well that they were going into the very jaws of death.

The real anguish at the news was felt by the little mothers and the new-made brides and the plighted maidens who must remain at home. Their courage never faltered, and even then they were ready to bid their loved ones Godspeed on their dangerous mission, but already, with the clairvoyance of affection, they saw the trenches and the guns and the heaps of dead, and in spite of all their efforts, the tears would come. Soon indeed they too were able to smile, not joyously, but bravely through the mist of pain, and throughout the war there will be few braver things than those sad smiles.

Their tears were prophetic, not merely because women must weep, but because theirs will be the harder part. We may well hope that the war will not demand of us the same heavy toll it has exacted of Europe; and we trust that the end will come before our women, like their sisters in France, will all be wearing mourning. But before many months have gone, every American woman will be harrowed with grief. Undoubtedly they will bear it bravely, for women are braver than men. But it will be only human for them to seek relief. Where shall they find it? The soldiers will find their strength in the midst of the fray, in the places of death. Paradoxical as it may seem, the women will find their consolation in the same grim company. Not in seeking to escape from the dread spectacle of the ravages of war will they ease their pain, but in meeting it face to face in the houses of grief. They will find their consolation in no way so surely as by becoming angels of consolation to others in anguish. If peace of soul is to be found anywhere in the days that are to come, it will be found where sorrow and pain most dwell. One's own little pain will be dwarfed in the presence of great pain, the individual's sorrow in the sorrow of the entire nation.

After the War

THE fact that "the speedy adjustment of industrial conditions after the war," the August intention for the League of the Sacred Heart, has been blessed and approved by the Holy Father should bring at least a little comfort to the hearts of his numberless spiritual children. Whether Pope Benedict, from his watch-tower on the Vatican Hill, sees signs indicating that peace will soon be restored to the world, we do not know. It is clear, however, that he is eager to enlist the prayerful assistance of the Faithful in securing for the warring nations the light and strength to solve wisely and quickly the knotty problems they must all face when the war is over.

Once peace is made, the causes that have made capital and labor bitter enemies in the past will by no means disappear. But the heavy burden of taxation that must be borne by both while industry and commerce are being reorganized, is likely to be the source of graver difficulties still. Working men nevertheless will be entitled then, as now, to wages that will enable them to maintain a family in decency and comfort, and laborers must not be exploited by grasping capitalists. A workman's health or morals should not be imperiled by the conditions under which he is forced to labor, and on the other hand the demands of employees should not make it impossible for their employers to compete successfully with other tradesmen or manufacturers. Moreover, as fierce commercial rivalry had much to do, no doubt, with the outbreak of the present war, if the coming peace is to be lasting, the policy of nations, like that of individuals, must be governed by justice and equity.

However, harmonious relations between capital and labor, and lasting peace among nations cannot be preserved by legislation alone. Therefore the Leaguers are asked to pray for an increase of the spirit of Christian charity between employers and employed and among commercial competitors. Only in this way can "a speedy adjustment of industrial conditions after the war" be brought to pass, and as God's bestowal of that grace will most probably depend on the fervor of the Leaguers' prayers during this month, all who have at heart the return of peace without delay, and the establishment of desirable conditions in the industrial world, will cry to Heaven with faith, confidence and perseverance.

The Mission of Wealth

"THE angel who looked too long at heaven's golden pavement was flung into hell" is the timely warning Miss Agnes Repplier gives the readers of her excellent essay on "Money" in the August Atlantic Monthly, and she shares an Oxford principal's deep misgivings about the fate of those who are successful in accumulating great wealth but who do not enjoy "a corresponding growth of knowledge as to the uses to which wealth must be applied." But that both these perils seriously menace Americans is evidenced by the feverish curiosity the general public feels in the trivial utterances and the frivolous doings of the merely rich. If the editors of cheap magazines and Sunday supplements were to omit from their pages every article and every illustration which depended for their interest solely on the fact that the "copy's" subject is a person of great wealth, literature would without question grow higher in quality and lower in quantity.

For if a man's income is only ten thousand a year, his taste in jewelry, his fondness for golf, the beauty of his wife, the number of his children, or the charming location of his summer cottage are matters of little moment to "general readers." But let a series of successful operations in Wall Street suddenly make him a multi-millionaire, and the world cannot learn too much about his personal habits, and the details of his home life. The Sunday supplement will display forthwith photographs of his little daughter Muriel playing in the park, describe carefully his wife's gowns, give exterior and interior views of his villa at Newport, publish his ideas on ameliorating the condition of the poor and elaborately recount his latest bon mot. So it is clear that the value of his words and deeds is gaged by the size of his income.

Yet a man's true worth is not measured of course by the mere possession of wealth but by the use to which his wealth is put. When we read that during New York's "lushest" season last winter 350,000 non-residents assembled there "to teach the residents a needless lesson in prodigality," and that "A profound contempt for cost swayed the crowds which gathered day after day and night after night, wherever wealth could be squandered," the thoughtful begin to suspect that all our millionaires are not precisely the wisest spenders that ever lived.

However, the entrance of this country into the war is likely to remedy many of the evils to which our excessive wealth has given rise. If, with even-handed justice, wealth, as well as men, is conscripted, so that the richest are forced to give the most, we can build up an invincible armament, let us hope, that will speedily restore peace to the world, and we can then establish a system of relief-work, perhaps, that will quickly bind up the wounds of Europe. It is an old Catholic principle that the rich are only the stewards of their wealth. After they have provided themselves with what their state of life requires, the rest of their property belongs to God's poor. But His world has seldom been so poor as now, for it sorely needs peace and comfort. Is it not, then, the mission and the duty of America's wealth to supply the world with both?

The Teacher and the War

AS a result of selective conscription, the forces of the United States will soon be on a powerful war-footing. The call has come for men at the front, and the call will be answered. The country has chosen a method in raising an army that is new, yet thoroughly in keeping with the traditions of democracy. Whatever opposition may have been legitimate in the past, the present is no time either for carping criticism or Cassandran prophecy. In answer to the question, "Are your sure that this campaign will succeed?" Lee once answered that it was not his business to assume the role of a prophet, but to act. In the work of the day, it is not enough merely to abstain from the display of a nagging temperament which helps no one, not even the nagger, nor from the expression of gloomy forebodings of failure. What is wanted is the cheerful, ready obedience which safeguards the result by making prompt action possible.

Yet even in the general eagerness to win the war by bending all energies upon direct military preparation, it is to be hoped that no countenance will be given policies hurtful to our schools. Men are needed in the ranks, on the farms, and in munition factories, but the need is scarcely less great in colleges and high schools. As the President has pointed out, after the war the country will require well-trained men. The technical schools were provided for when the Government advised them to continue their courses with as little interruption as possible. It would seem a wise course to extend the same encouragement to the colleges and high schools, factors at least of equal importance in the educational process, by exempting the teachers from military service. This is not to release the teacher from the obligation of serving his country, an exemption which would not be grateful to the majority of the profession. It is simply placing him in the position in which he can render the country a maximum of service.

Literature

ROBERT SOUTHWELL

THE last decade of the sixteenth century saw stirring times in England. It was a golden age in English literature, but it was a dark period for her Ancient Church. Both literature and history bear on their pages the name of one whose works were very popular during that time and whose life and sufferings were enlisting the interest of his generation. For against the popular writing of the day rebelled and struggled, and against the efforts to suppress his religion fought and taught the poet, priest and martyr, Robert Southwell. He paid the penalty of death for his adherence to the Catholic Faith, and renounced winning the laurels of a pagan poetry that might have been his but for the resolute purpose he had formed of devoting poetry to higher uses.

Poetry was for Father Southwell no mere pastime, nor even for him its "own exceeding great reward." He had an avowed purpose in all he wrote and was fearless in the expression of it. It was inspired by the times and he voiced it as follows:

> Poets, by abusing their talents, and making the follies and feignings of love the customary subject of their base endeavor, have so discredited this faculty, that a poet, a lover and a liar are by many reckoned three words of but one signification. But the vanity of men cannot counterpoise the authority of God, who delivered many parts of Scripture in verse, and, by His Apostle writing us to exercise our devotion in hymns and spiritual songs warranteth the art to be good, and the use allowable. . . . Christ Himself, by making an hymn the conclusion of His Last Supper and the prologue to the first pageant of His Passion gave His Spouse a method to imitate as in the Office of the Church it appeareth, and to all men a pattern to know the true use of this measured style.

Again he wrote: "Passion, and especially this of love, is in these days the chief commander of actions, and the idol to which both tongues and pens do sacrifice their ill-bestowed labors." His own task, self-appointed and blazing before him with the light of an ideal was "to direct these humours into their due courses, and to draw this flood of affection into the right channel."

That he was successful his poems prove. "Never must be forgotten 'St. Peter's Complaint,' . . . whereof the English is very rare," wrote Edmund Bolton in 1616, and Ben Jonson's exquisite praise of "The Burning Babe" is now one of the commonplaces of poetic criticism. Southwell without question was the outstanding Catholic poet of his age, as was Crashaw in the succeeding century. The note of religion is in all he wrote, his earnest conviction being:

> "It is the sweetest note that man can sing
> When grace in virtue's key tunes nature's string."

Life, death, love, incidents from Our Lord's or Our Lady's life; these were the themes on which he wrote. Though few in number they are rich in the thoughts to which they gave rise, when once the fire of his imagination lent its glow and the love in his soul blew them into flame till each of his poems became a prayer and an inspiration.

Of the few subjects that his Muses wooed, death perhaps, is perhaps his most frequent. Of it he sings

> "Like solest swan that swims in silent deep,
> And never sings but obsequies of death."

Hounded for years, with death's probability constantly menacing him, engaged in sacerdotal duties contrary to the laws of the realm, spied upon and finally betrayed, arrested and tortured, he yet had a tender love of death, as of a person whom he courted. He sweetly sang of the martyred Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots:

> Rue not my death, rejoice at my repose;
> It was not death to me, but to my woe;
> The bud was open'd to let out the rose;
> The chains unloosed to let the captive go.

He longed for death with the eagerness of a homesick child. "Grace more than nature keeps my heart alive." He had tasted all that life could hold for him. He had lived for a Master he loved to serve, he would die for the Saviour he had lived to love. All life's banquet he had fully fed upon, and thankfully would let the feasting cease:

> "My feast is done; my soul would be at ease;
> My grace is said; O Death, come, take away."

And death did come and in the form he had most desired. Well had he written of death and deserved well of death in return. And death was no craven in the payment. It held out to him the richest reward it was in its power to bestow. It forged chains to hold him bound, it fashioned racks to tear his frame, it grew the martyr's palm and placed it in his holy hands, it wove the martyr's crown and pressed it to his brow. From the nearness of the hand of death outstretched at every moment to strike the blow, must have come the inspiration that thrilled his pen to write the glowing tributes that he did. So when he came to die he was as one who had been studied in his death. When he wrote of death he felt it as a near reality. He was its laureate and unbidden sang its praises.

But for all his dealing in so somber a subject, the spirit of all his poems is of joy rather than of sadness, of trust rather than of despair, a spirit of sober peace in the reflection that death is but the ending of life's vanities, the beginning of eternity's full bliss. If "Sorrow is the poetry of a creation that is fallen," joy is the poetry of the soul that is secure in the hope of a redemption. Robert Southwell had breathed the "pure serene" of a courageous confidence in things he could not see, yet could believe, he had behind him the sterling strength of the eternal truth of what he meditated, and it was to be expected that all this should overflow in influence upon his pages.

The topic of life also forms the staple of his poetry, with love the undertone of it all. Indeed the three terms, life, love, death, continually recur, and in the brevity of their contexts are illustrative of much of the epigrammatic writing of the time.

Father Southwell's prose is also thoroughly characteristic of the author. He wrote to his father, whom he had successfully won back to God, "Though you suffered the bud to be blasted, and the flower to fade, though you permitted the fruit to perish and the leaves to wither away; yea, though you let the boughs decay, and the very trunk corrupt, yet, alas, keep life in the root, for fear the whole become fuel for the fire;" and "If God be the way, the truth, and the life, he that goeth without Him strayeth, he that liveth without Him dieth, and he that is not taught by Him erreth." Thus all his prose is clear and melodious. It has the felt grandeur of his religion in it.

Other poets of the age—and it was the great age of English poetry—pursued their way unhindered, idols of the flattering crowds. Deaf to the plaudits of a throng to which he could not cater, and of set purpose opposed to the strings on which his fellows harped, it was only to be expected of a world that could not understand him, that it would also not appreciate him. A certain thrill of romantic interest did however attach to all he wrote because of the dauntless spirit of the man. His life was weary but his soul was brave. He wrote his longings in burning words, and people read and realized and knew, so true is it that "Poetry is self": he was a notable exception however to the rest of the quotation, "But self is seldom poetry." He had lived as he had written, joyfully, sweetly, and he had died as he had lived, a Catholic first and a poet afterwards, in the sentiments of his own fine words:

Who lives in love, loves least to live,
  And long delays doth rue,
If Him he love by whom he lives,
  To whom all love is due.

Who for our love did choose to live,
  And was content to die;
Who loved our life more than His life,
  And love with life did buy.

Let us in life, yea with our life,
  Requite His living love;
For best we live when best we love,
  If love our life remove.

He died in 1595, but the world of English letters can never forget him. Even if it should, the Church never will, for she has his name indelibly written, not merely on "shafts marmoreal stained with tears of time," but in the hearts of many Catholics who say "Venerable Robert Southwell, Pray for Us!"

C. L. BERNHARDT, S.J.

THE PARISH CHURCH

This is the House of God to me,
  And this is Heaven's Gate,
This ground for holy ground did He Elect, predestinate.

Love's importunity hath made
  Of this His trysting-place,
Here have I known the accolade
  Of His impelling grace.

This is the Hill of Calvary,
  And this is Thabor's Hill.
Broken His Body here for me,
  His wounds their Treasures spill.

He hath 'neath many a soaring dome
  His tabernacled rest,
Yet chooseth here a lowly home,
  An arm's-length from my breast.

Then what to me are Milan's spires,
  And what San Marco's birds?
This is the place of my desires,
  Nest of my faltering words.

BLANCHE M. KELLY.

BOOK REVIEWS

Pensées Chrétiennes sur la Guerre. Par JULES LEBRETON, S.J. En Face de la Douleur. Par ANTONIN EYMIEU, S.J. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne. 1 fr. each.

Suffering and the War. By SHERWOOD EDDY. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.50.

Religion in a World at War. By GEORGE HODGES. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.00.

One of the by-products of the war has been to rectify many erroneous notions. Face to face with the elemental facts of life and death, men have stripped away a good deal of the false veener from their favorite theories and have had the courage to see the truth. This has been especially true of suffering. Before the war it was the fashion of the world to regard it as an unmixed evil, to be done away with at any cost, and the ideal of our civilization was to a certain extent measured by its more or less dilettante efforts to minimize it. Some of the Protestant sects have retained the old Catholic view that suffering is very often a blessing in disguise, and that through its means, whether it be physical or mental, man fights his way to true manhood. Others of the sects, however, have been content to have Christ climb Mount Calvary, but they have had no desire to share in His Passion. The war has changed all this, and many books have appeared which set forth their authors' efforts to analyze the meaning, function and nobility of suffering, its power to mold character and purge away the dross of littleness, and its possibilities to lift an individual or a nation to the heights of sublimity.

"Pensées Chrétiennes sur la Guerre," the first of the little books named above, treats in its opening paper of the former union between Christian peoples and their present division, the mental attitude that Catholics of France should adopt toward their enemies, and the hope of ultimate concord between members of the Church. A second paper takes up the question of the poignant grief that is wringing the heart of France at the untimely death of the very flower of her children. The author declares that the young men who have gone so bravely to their death, have like Christ sown in passing sorrow to reap in eternal happiness, lost their lives only to find them, and he bids his countrymen reflect on the glory and the joy that their loved ones have gained rather than on the pain that has been the price.

"En Face de la Douleur" is likewise intended to hearten the tortured souls of Frenchmen. The author takes up the general subject of suffering, sifts the true from the false in the statement often on the lips of Catholics that it is by God's will that men suffer, explains what is meant by the permissive will of God, shows how in spite of His allowing human agents to run their course and nature to follow its laws, His beneficent Providence does dispose all things, suffering included, to the creature's ultimate good. After showing what is God's part in the sorrow entailed by the war, Père Eymieu considers what should be man's attitude, and by a series of philosophical and ascetic reflections lays down practical considerations for grappling with the inevitable burden which awaits every man and is pressing with especial force on France today.

"Suffering and the War" and "Religion in a World at War" are little books that can be commended to Catholic readers with such few reservations as are inevitable in Protestant works, for their sane and satisfactory treatment of the subject on its natural rather than supernatural side. Both books contain much with which a Catholic will find himself in entire sympathy.

J. H. F.

The Oppressed English. By IAN HAY. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $0.50.

This little book on the Irish question fairly teems with extravagant misstatements and misleading comparisons. For example, the author asserts: "Ireland is just as free as England and Scotland and Wales. In one respect her freedom is very much greater for she is heavily over-represented in the House of Commons." But Mr. Hay cannot point to an instance in the past century where a bill intimately affecting Scotland has been passed by Parliament against the united and strong protests of that country's representatives. On the other hand, the history of the British Parliament is one of repeated rejection of measures proposed for Ireland by Irish members, and the imposition upon Ireland of British-made legislation against the constitutional opposition of Ireland's representatives. Agitation alone and fear of uprisings in Ireland, not her constitutional representatives in Parliament, have won her whatever rights she has gained. Only in the last few years has she begun to be treated as a real constituent and not an inferior dependency of the United Kingdom. As to her over-representation, Mr. Ian Hay neglects to remark that for a great part of the nineteenth century, Ireland was shamefully under-represented in Parliament, and it was not English justice that righted the inequality, but the fact that English misgovernment so depleted the population of Ireland she is now a little over-represented in Parliament.

The author's description of the niggardly Home Rule measure of 1914 is a grim parody of the facts, while his picture of Wyndham's Land Purchase act makes one wonder if he ever even read the bill in question. The comparison between Scotland's and Ireland's wrongs will convince the discerning reader that perhaps Ian Hay right well deserves his title of humorist. But his description of the Sinn Feiners and their blow for liberty during Easter week passes all bounds. One may deplore and even condemn the revolutionaries and the revolution, but common decency would demand that such a travesty of both should not be published in the name of information for the American people.

J. F. X. M.

Outlines of Economics. By RICHARD T. ELY, THOMAS S. ADAMS, MAX O. LORENZ and ALLYN A. YOUNG. Third Revised Edition. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.10.

Attention has frequently been called to the fact that in much of our best modern thought there is a decided return to Catholic principles and ideals. It is again illustrated in this extensive work on economics which is the result of the combined efforts of several prominent American economists. The conclusions arrived at by them are in most instances in full conformity with the principles which have at all times been laid down by Catholic moralists. The third revised edition of this book has called for so many alterations that a complete resetting of the type was necessary. New chapters have been added and the statistics have been brought down to the date of publication. A very sane point of view is in general taken by the writers and a well-poised judicial attitude is preserved towards the various conflicting systems and schools.

Some few subjects, however, would have met with different treatment on the part of Catholic authors. Thus the writers speak of a condemnation of usury both by Holy Scripture and by the Church in her earlier periods, and then refer to a changed attitude towards interest-taking. This calls for a word of explanation. The fact is that the Church has never changed her principles. The only change has been in the application of them according to varying economic conditions. Catholic authors would also have taken an uncompromising position in dealing with the limitation of offspring as practised in modern society and in discussing its effects. Whatever is condemned by God must be condemned without further consideration by the economist. He will thus best serve the good of the individual and of society. The great Catholic economists are ignored in the lists of references given. Thus we might expect some reference to Father Pesch's monumental introduction to this subject in his three exhaustive volumes on "National Oekonomie," and at least a mention of Dr. Ryan's well-known book on wages.

J. H.

Letters of Arthur George Heath, Fellow of New College, Oxford, and Lieutenant in the 6th Batt. Royal West Kent Regt. With memoir by GILBERT MURRAY. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.25.

Professor Murray's excellent memoir of this young Oxford fellow, "who went abroad to die," will enable the reader to realize in a measure what a heavy toll the present war is exacting from the scholarship of England. And when it is recalled that nearly all the nations in the conflict are sustaining similar losses, the future of learning seems dark. Most of Lieutenant Heath's letters were written to his mother and describe his experiences from the time he received a commission in Kitchener's army in August, 1915, until a week before he was slain in action, October 8, 1915, on his twenty-eighth birthday. "Don't trouble about me" were his last words.

In the tribute to the memory of his young friend Professor Murray well observes: "There is always a religion of some sort at the root of every man's living. Every man is either willing or not willing to sacrifice himself to something which he feels to be higher than himself," "But Oxford," he attests, > has, by some strange secret of its own, preserved for many centuries the power of training in its best men a habit of living for the things of the spirit, . . . it keeps living in generation after generation of its best students a tone of mind like that of some cassocked clerk of the Middle Ages whose mental life would shape itself into two aims; in himself to glorify God by the pursuit of knowledge, and among his fellow-men to spread the spirit of Christ.

The letters are those of a high-hearted, affectionate son, who gave to his country's service the best that was in him, who felt keenly the horrors and hardships of the trench warfare but was gifted with a quiet sense of humor that stood him in good stead. He hated the ruthless artillery and longed to settle the war by "the quiet and decent methods of the infantry." "Men should be born without mothers," these days, was his expressive comment on modern fighting. Though he had neglected to shout something dramatic to his command during a German charge, he subsequently found comfort in the reflection: "After all it is no use saying 'Remember Waterloo' to my men, for most of them have never heard of the battle, and would think I was referring to the railway station."

W. D.

Alaska, the Great Country. By ELLA HIGGINSON. New Edition. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.50.

It was inevitable that Mrs. Higginson's book on Alaska should run into more than one edition, for it has the accuracy of history and the glamor of romance. Nor are the two disparate, but romance treads close to realism throughout, precise bits of historic lore blending entertainingly with feminine fancy on well-nigh every page. Mrs. Higginson scorned the discomforts of the journey to the North, and was sensitive only to the beauties of the scenery. Upon reading her enthusiastic pages, all will doubtless agree that:

> Each country has its spell; but none is so great as the spell of this lone and splendid land. It is too sacred for any light word of pen or lip. The spell of Alaska is the spell of God; and it holds all save the basest, whether they acknowledge it or deny. Here are sphynxes and pyramids built of century upon century's snow; the pale green thunder of the cataract; the roar of the avalanche and the glacier's compelling march; the flow of mighty rivers; the unbroken silences that swim from snow mountain to snow mountain, and the rose of sunset whose petals float and fade upon mountain and sea.

The history of the place from its wild beginnings in the interesting poetry of a people's myths, is told in the language of an epic, throughout which the name Baranoff rings like a refrain. There are descriptive passages of rare beauty; points of keen observation; stories of sin and suffering, passion and cruelty, with ice of glaciers and fires of volcanoes for backgrounds. The kindness of the people, a fact so commonly dilated upon by writers of travel, struck our writer also, and she gives it grateful mention. Catholics will thank the author for this tribute to the heroism of our Sisters:

> It is another of the lessons of the Yukon; and reading, one stands ashamed. There those saintly beings spend their lives in God's service. Nothing save a Divine faith could sustain a delicate woman to endure such ceaseless torment for three months in every year; and yet . . . we, rather than they, are for pity. The stars upon their brows are the white and blessed stars of peace.

Mrs. Higginson's book tells us what we are likely to forget and therefore was it well to edit it anew, namely, that birds carol and flowers flame there, that human hearts are beating there, in the far, white loneliness that we know as Alaska.

C. L. B.

ing public monies, or enjoying charters from Government or other public authorities, to purchase Empire-made goods and to place all contracts with British firms; exceptions to be made by special permission of proper authority, only in cases where such a course is considered to be at variance with public interests.

In theory this may not appear to be open to exception. In practice the great industrial organizations of the United States have shown a marked tendency to ignore the existence of a parallel of latitude, or even of a very large body of fresh water, when minerals or other materials useful in their operations have been discovered by their agents, and in the second place Canada has always been the best customer of American industrial producers. Peace in North America, and on terms consistent with self-respect, is for Canada a concern essentially her own. It has been threatened twice in the last half century over concerns that were not hers at all, over the Trent affair and over the Venezuela boundary dispute. It has been preserved, in delicate circumstances touching the fisheries and Alaska, by her own firmness and good sense.

All this has an evident bearing upon the basic elements of the present controversy over conscription. Will Canada throw her all into the war, and take her chances on the complications that arise in her already difficult problems? Those who are for doing so, are for conscription, with the attendant borrowing, until the war ends. Will Canada, while there is yet time, give heed to the instinct of self-preservation before she has been reduced to a multiple dependency under which her initiative would disappear. Those who are for counting the effort already expended, for comparing it with that of others, especially with that of the United States whose fourteen fold man power and forty fold wealth are only entering on the scene, are against conscription and all that conscription involves. These latter have a difficult rôle, but their opponents are not reclining upon velvet. If they were they would not be passing revolutionary legislation without attempting to hold either general elections or by-elections to fill the numerous vacant places in Parliament. They would not be appealing to London for leave to continue in existence a Parliament already moribund instead of asking the people of Canada for a new lease of power. All this may help to a comprehension of the reason why, in Canada, there are two sides to a question which, looked at from a distance too great for details to be distinguished, appears to have but a single face.

Lloyd George and Literature*

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

IT may seem preposterous to connect Lloyd George with the revival of literature, for of all the swarm of politicians who so strangely rose into power in the days before the great war, and during it, Lloyd George was among the least distinguished for literary power or grace. Unquestionably, he possessed a personal force which in speaking he communicated through his words to his listeners, a force which gave him ascendancy over them; but it was evanescent, it did not remain in the words recorded by reporters or written by himself. In this respect he was like nearly all the other political leaders of the time, not merely in England, but in all the countries, save only in France and Ireland. In France, prose writing had become so well understood that most educated men had mastered a good, thoroughly expressive style. In Ireland, the spiritual force which inspired the higher types of public men more than personal motives could do, gave their utterances a throb of high passion and a vitality of inward truth which sealed them with peculiar distinction. In the United States, President Wilson attained tremendous contemporary fame as a literary stylist; but it is too difficult a task at this late day to get an understanding of how his academic and artificial writings attained to such a degree of favor. However, to return to Lloyd George, it is quite clear that he at least possessed no share of that high gift which, when it is allied with the unique opportunities afforded by national leadership in times of crisis, may lead to such permanent works of literary power and beauty as, for example, the Gettysburg address of Lincoln. Yet Lloyd George it was who, in the memorable speech delivered before the Commons in February, 1917, after Germany had declared its unrestricted submarine blockade of the Allied coasts, enunciated the policy the effects of which brought about the splendid revival of literature which marked the end of the twentieth century.

To be sure, Lloyd George did not have literature in mind when he announced that the importation of print paper into England would be cut some fifty per cent in order to save tonnage required for the importation of food. Nor did he have in mind the betterment of prose and the intensification of the spirit of poetry when, three months later, after the submarine campaign had caused serious results in England, he ordered another cut of fifty per cent in the amount of paper which it would be lawful to import into England. It is now clear that what Lloyd George had in mind was, first, the obvious necessity of saving tonnage, and second, the personal yet even more important object of crippling the political power of the press, especially of the Northcliffe press. The press had made Lloyd George, as it made most of the politicians of that age, because without the publicity afforded by the press—the perfectly enormous multiplication of the power of their speeches, and the power of their personalities, and the power of their hypnotic phrases, and the more sinister and direct power of their cabals and conspiracies—none of the politicians, in any of the so-called democratic countries, England, France, the United States, could ever possibly have attained such ascendancy as they most amazingly did. It was the press, and most chiefly the Northcliffe press, which stamped the seal of Lloyd George upon the British public's mind. Nobody knew this better than George, save Northcliffe, of course, and when, through his affiliations with the English Hearst, Lloyd George had ousted Asquith and secured the Premiership, the first real use he made of his new power was to torpedo the ship that had carried him over. He had at once been obliged to chaffer and dicker with many sources of power and influence in order to obtain a working machine, and he knew that Northcliffe was very likely to throw him down as effectually as he had set him up. It was up to him, therefore, to move first. Germany gave him the unique opportunity. The limiting of the huge tonnage of print paper imported into England struck everybody save the dismayed Northcliffe and the other great newspaper lords as a very sensible step. The fact that it immediately led to the total disappearance of a large number of the smaller and weaker journals did not particularly matter, in such a time of national danger and crisis. The fact that the newspapers which continued to exist were very much smaller was such an obvious improvement that again all save the proprietors rejoiced. And when six months later the raid of the submarines right into the hitherto safe portions of the Channel was followed by the total suppression of all journals save the official government gazettes, "for the period of the war," the public by that time was so well accustomed to the centralization of authority in the Government that save for a few minor disturbances, led by such determined publicists as the two Chestertons, Hilaire Belloc, A. R. Orage, Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, Darrell Figgis, and by the Sinn Feiners in Dublin, for a long time there was no obvious difference in the course of public affairs, nor was there any great change until the end of the war. We all know, now, how totally unexpected, save by a very few far-seeing ones, was the length of the war, and we are well acquainted with the events of the tremendous revolution by which the power of the oligarchy of incurably materialistic and money-seeking interests and their political tools was at last broken, and the new era of Christian democracy based upon farmer proprietorship of the land, economically, and upon the Catholic Faith, spiritually, dawned at last upon the torn and desolated world. But what has not been so well known is the fact that out of that period of silence of the press arose the splendid revival of literature which coincided with the coming of the new age of economic justice and of spiritual power and beauty. It is to this aspect of the subject that I desire briefly to direct your attention.

---

* These lines are an extract from Professor Belloc's "History of English Literature in the Twenty-first Century." The author of this standard work is a grandson of the famous Hilaire Belloc, the historian of the Great War.

It is of course exceedingly difficult for us today to gain anything save a partial understanding of the importance and power of the press in the days before the great war. And no more truly frightful souvenirs of that period have come down to us than the copies preserved in our libraries of the more typical "yellow" newspapers, as they were called; why, nobody now can say, except that we do know that the word "yellow" connoted sinister and deplorable ideas which nobody today would dream of connecting with that color, unless we went back to the teachings of the old mystics, who ascribed the color yellow to Judas, and taught that it signified idleness, and a horror of suffering and envy and treason. So, just before the great war, people talked of "the yellow streak" of cowardice, and the "yellow peril," and the "yellow press." How strange they seem, these huge, flimsy sheets, all yellowed indeed by the passage of time, with their huge, screaming, almost incoherent "head-lines," their "funny" pictures, their long, detailed, malodorous gloatings over human sins and sorrow and shame! How strange, especially, their assumption of an editorial authority, based absolutely on nothing at all save personal self-sufficiency or the personal interests of their proprietors and editors! Save here and there, nearly all really ethical reasons for being had passed away from the daily newspapers of that period, and with honorable and few exceptions, the press existed to make profits for its owners or to advance the personal interests of individuals and cliques. The magazines were nearly all devoted to various profit-making policies of supplying popular entertainment to large masses of the public. Those powerful and strong-willed individuals who realized the situation advanced their own interests and the interests of their chosen associates, or political parties, or theories, by seizing and wielding this almost universal power. Against the magnates of this oligarchical tyranny stood out only two classes, namely, the definitely religious part of the press, and the champions of various forms of social reform and social revolution which ran the gamut from highly idealistic, self-sacrificing ideas, some of which, and the best of which, came from the treasury of the Church, down to the most awful and diabolical teachings of the spirit of evil. And the press was never idle. Huge forests were felled each day to be made into paper to feed its voracious maw. Hundreds of millions of copies of newspapers were printed every hour of the day and night. Armies of writers, tions. Yet the tendencies of the Pan-Hellenics to stress society above scholarship, to place money above morals, manners above manhood, afford an environment which is insidiously destructive through its false perspective. Unless they can direct, fraternity men do not participate in Catholic student activities.

Intellectual success has the danger of a real superiority, for its value is not transient, but real and continuous, especially in this era when "brains count." Whatever the quality of success, athletic, social, forensic, political, and otherwise, the "successful" student is apt to consider himself superior to his fellow men. He thinks he has risen above mediocrity, when that very assumption is the first sympton of mediocrity. It takes real success to be humble.

Pleasure and Faith

THE modern symptom of "animalaria" finds violent expression in the secular institution. With customary intensity college students pursue their pleasures. Well indeed, if these are of an innocent type. But speaking from experience, I know, and others will substantiate me, that "pleasure" to most students is synonymous with "wild oats," that is, with debauchery. The fear of his fellows, the fear of mediocrity, is deeply implanted in the adolescent boy. He is at the stage when he wishes to be taken for a man; and finding the idea prevalent among his elders that "sowing wild oats" is a "normal" perquisite of manhood, he imagines he must herd with the crowd, and be like it in thought and action. Unhappily, I cannot say that Catholic young men are free from this taint. I have talked with libertines of the worst type who sneered at everything that is holy, but when confronted with the statement that they sneered at that which they secretly revered, the libertines admitted it. The strongest warning that came to me as a boy, came from a libertine. But young men do not know of this secret homage, and think they must "sow" to attain their manhood.

Vice is wide-spread among young people; every priest, every physician knows its prevalence. To my certain knowledge, a most degraded variety is privately advocated by one university instructor. Loss of will-power, weakening of the memory and of the power of logical deduction, derangement of nervous control, and general debility: these constitute the physical price paid. The moral price? Who knows it better than the sinner?

I do not believe in education as a panacea, but it is my sincere conviction that for college and university, a wise course for students in sex-hygiene would remove much of the lure of a certain kind of crime. It is not proper that young people should learn the decent through the indecent; yet I know that the majority of Catholic students in non-Catholic schools are subjected to this inversion in which the most important of instincts is debased and made the object of scorn, as if it were loathsome and abnormal. Modern research in heredity and disease is opening a hopeful vista through its study of sin and its physical consequences. One of the best sermons preached is the chapter on venereal disease in most modern text-books on heredity. Where the moral law will not make the slightest impression, fear of the physical consequences often prevents transgression.

Students, and young men in general, have a curious habit of admitting their transgressions to each other, and such confessions may be provoked quite unexpectedly. Of course, here too the Chinese saying holds true: "He who boasts has an empty purse." For these confessions are born of pride, they are founded on a spirit of braggadocio, and are in no way comparable to the self-accusation in Sacramental Confession. Impurity fears Sacramental Confession, while pride spurns it; and both beget indifference and disbelief. Impurity especially finds ready objection to dogma, and "natural" excuses for license. Peccavi is the most difficult word in the human lexicon.

And thus they go, the servants of pride and lust. It is difficult to measure this loss in actual figures. Failure to enroll or re-enroll, coupled with the shifting of the student-population, makes accurate records impossible. At least five per cent seem, like Peter, ashamed to confess Christ. Defection through pride and impurity generally does not occur until after graduation, when a definite estimate is no longer possible. For pride and lust breed hypocrisy, too, and neither would be known for what it is. So they simulate adherence before Catholics, but lapse in a new environment.

University of Missouri. Richard A. Muttkowski, Ph.D.

SOCIOLOGY

The Mistakes of Society

NO doubt you have been hearing, these several years past, that society has been making mistakes. Perhaps, too, you have wondered how such a thing could happen. It is more than likely that after an attempt or two to reconcile this blanket statement with logic, you gave up and modestly retreated rather than set up your knowledge or beliefs in opposition to the wisdom of numerous experts. These specialists did not strengthen their dicta with proofs, but in your hasty retreat this omission passed unnoticed.

I have come to the conclusion that anyone who trys to lay blame on society for the shortcomings of a specific group of individuals would be receiving merited attention if he were arrested on suspicion. When he makes, "society's mistakes," both the plea and finale of a talk, or a book, or an essay, he has, paradoxically, been taking thought to explain something which he is incapable of explaining. He has, it is more than likely, been striving to explain the moral or spiritual status of criminals and in despair, because God, religion and common-sense have been considerately omitted from the reckoning, he resonantly and complacently places the blame on the broad shoulders of society.

Society and the Criminal

SINCE the advent into public notice of a certain school of criminologists society has been taking the blame for the treatment accorded law-breakers. We have, so this school tells us, been inconsiderate of the criminal, altogether too inconsiderate. We have segregated him; we have punished him; we have given him opportunity for extended reflection on the error of his ways. These things have been mistakes, and since they are generally and universally applied in the treatment of those who except themselves from the operation of law, society is said to have made the mistakes.

We should, it seems, have taken an opposite course. It would have been more proper had we placed a premium on the criminal's transgressions, had we made his years after the crime pleasant and agreeable. He should have been escorted to a carefully prepared home where all suggestion of walls and aloofness, all hint at such snobbishness as exclusion from other homes, would have been missing. In such a dwelling the offender would have found, if society had not been making mistakes all these years, public servants awaiting the expression of a wish speedily to deliver to him reality. His education would have been well looked after, his health would have been a matter of concern to high-salaried experts, his desires for relaxation anticipated, and motion-pictures, Victrola concerts, lectures and mechanical demonstrations of a not too taxing sort provided for the whiling away of several hours daily. He would, of course, have been permitted the delightful companionship of the thousand-and-odd others who might have been brought to the same home. For the backbone of this regime of correction, some form of work, educational, inspirational and congenial in nature, would have been arranged, lest time drag too heavily, and the subject of it all regret that he had ever been brought to live in such a place.

This is what we should have been doing all this time for the criminal, for confusing though the thought is, he has been a victim, immolated through the mistakes of society. And as victims are petted and "heroized," so we should have made a hero of him and petted him.

The Logic of Reform

AH, yes, but where's the logic? It may be answered that we are expecting too much under the circumstances. We are told that, according to well-authenticated fact, the dealer in wholesale charges cannot, in the nature of things, be a logician. His mind is not so constituted that it can arrange heavy thought into the pretty sentences and at the same time muster fact in support. Is he who says that "society's mistakes create the criminal" and "society's mistakes perpetuate the criminal through mistaken treatment" and other such, is he anything of a logician? If he were would he not argue in all seriousness, though he had started wrongly, somewhat after this manner?

Society has been confining and punishing those who err seriously and in this course it has been making grave mistakes; it has been following up one error with another. When through the process of the law it has been shown that someone has committed a crime, the members of society from his immediate neighborhood should be herded together and taken away as prisoners, and they, not the criminal, should be made the subject of experiment. They have made the criminal possible. The existence of one man who breaks the law is both indictment and proof of society's failings and society, not the criminal, should be made to bear the blame!

Perfectly absurd, you say! We agree with you. There is but one perfect phase in the whole treatment of the criminal by this new school, and that perfection lies in its sublime absurdity!

The Origin of the Evil

CODDLING the criminal was first sloganized about five years ago. The idea, in so far as can be ascertained, is but an outcropping of modern life-thought which insists that everyone have a good time, live his own life, do as he wish, and use his liberty. We can feel the currents of this swiftly and pleasantly-flowing sentiment all about us. We experience it in the schools, where all forms of real punishment are barred; we feel it in civil life, where the mechanics of governing are shirked by the average citizen because they are a bore; we meet it in our home lives, where machinery has stepped in to remove the drudgery. The young are taught to avoid obstacles, and the way of youth is made straight and easy; middle age is buffered and cushioned into fatty ease, and old age is a thing of the past. We have been forgetting that these two ideas are contraries: Character is developed through the meeting and overcoming of obstacles; the line of least resistance makes the backbone weak and pliable. In grasping our petty, temporary liberty we are sacrificing that larger liberty which comes after. Whereas, if we were obediently hemmed in by the thousand-and-one petty supervisions of daily life, we would come to know the real meaning of liberty. These petty prohibitions are the barks which protect something beyond price, real liberty of action.

We have been making mistakes because we have been making life too easy and aimless and sweet. We have taught ourselves to be satisfied with twenty-four hours as they come. That would do very well in the realm of the spirit; there it is a highly valued principle of progress. But in the world of matter it is the then and not the now that should be looked to carefully. We have been reversing this; we have made soft the now and our then will be harsh and cruel. We have been softening the ways of our children and our criminals and their later state will be a hard one to brook, so that the first may, through our mistakes, become the second.

Edward F. Mohler, M.A.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Freemasonry and Internationalism

THE completeness of the rupture which the war has caused between various Lodges of Freemasonry may be seen from a statement made by Colonel C. E. Cassal, and quoted in the London Month for July, 1917. Speaking before English Masons the Colonel declared:

> From the day the war broke out we have altogether ceased communication, direct or indirect, with any Grand Lodge in an enemy country. Only one attempt, and that indirect, had been made in the whole of that period to approach us by such a Grand Lodge, and that was not a German Grand Lodge; and that indirect attempt, made through the Grand Lodge of a neutral country, was to ask our investigation of the British system of dealing with prisoners of war and thus by implication to attack it. We declined absolutely . . . to be drawn into controversy or correspondence of any kind, direct or indirect, with the Grand Lodge of an enemy country.

In times of peace Freemasonry, like Socialism, boasted of its international brotherhood, strong enough to prevent or stop war but now, in reality, Lodge is hurling anathema at Lodge, the German Lodges being particularly insistent on the accusation that the Latin Masons of Europe used the Craft for political purposes. The same accusation has been made against Mexican Masons; in fact, a prominent Mexican "Brother" has declared that the Masons were foremost in the terrible revolution which has devastated the country.

Profits and Prices

UNITED STATES SENATOR POMERENE, of Ohio, has made public the letter issued by the Bird Coal and Iron Company, of Chicago, soliciting stock subscriptions:

> Having purchased foundry iron for as low as $12 or $13 a ton during the past twelve months, you know that there must be a tremendous profit in it at the present market price of approximately $40 a ton. On a production of 6,000 tons a month, the capacity of our furnace, which will be ready to go in blast within six or eight weeks, you can easily figure what the profits will be when we can produce the iron for approximately $10 a ton and sell it at $40 a ton. A profit of $150,000 a month is well within reason, and on a capitalization of $1,100,000 will be in excess of 100 per cent profit on the entire issue of the common stock of $1,000,000.

The Senator remarked that these profits almost equaled coal profits.

The Toll of Industry

THE New York State Industrial Commission has recently given the following figures anent accidents in New York State:

> In the year 1916 there occurred in New York State over 300,000 accidents; in the United States, 3,000,000 industrial accidents, 20,000 of which were fatalities. These 3,000,000 accidents, the equivalent of one-third of the population of the State of New York, involved a total time loss of 105,000,000 days. This is 350,000 working years; 3,500 centuries. Contemplate the vast loss not only of time but of work not done. It is equivalent to the amount of work that might have been done by a squad of 60 men working continuously for the last 6,000 years or through the entire period of history.

Readers are left to imagine what each accident means to the dependent family of the wage earner. No workman's compensation law can restore a broken limb or a shattered life. The average compensation wage in New York State is $9 a week.

Knights of Columbus War Fund

WITH the approbation of the hierarchy, the Knights of Columbus began their campaign for a $1,000,000 war fund on July 22. The purpose of the fund is made clear in the official announcement of the campaign:

By a recent ruling there will be 181 Catholic chaplains appointed to the American armies, approximately a third of the total of chaplains; but as the number of Catholic troops is conservatively estimated as well over one-third of the total of enlisted men, the need for additional chaplains to those authorized by the War Department is apparent. The Knights of Columbus $1,000,000 war fund will provide for these additional chaplains, will make it possible for many thousands of Catholic soldiers training to fight, and, if need be, to die for their country, to hear Holy Mass and receive the Sacraments regularly during their period of training; and, beyond all else, will provide chaplains for the American Catholic soldiers in the trenches of Europe so that on the eve of battle there will not be a Catholic fighting man lacking the consolations of his faith when these are most vitally needed.

That a work of this truly beneficent and patriotic character merits the approval of every loyal citizen, goes without saying, and that it should receive the enthusiastic support of every Catholic in this country is imperative for its success.

The War Department has officially recognized the Knights of Columbus as the agency for all relief work among Catholic soldiers in camp and at the front. The work of the organization at the border last summer is guarantee enough that Catholic soldiers will not be neglected in the present war.

The Philippine Mission

THE disastrous effects of the war on the mission field are manifest in the Philippines, where nearly all the Catholic schools are closed. The Church Extension Society has placed the sad condition of the Philippine Church before the American people:

> Most of the missionaries laboring in the Philippines come from that stricken little country, Belgium, and until the beginning of the war, the Missions were almost wholly supported by the friends and relatives of the missionaries in Belgium. Many of these good friends have been called to their eternal reward, and those who are left are almost destitute. Is it any wonder then, that the missionaries of the Philippines in their great sorrow turn to us in the United States in a last hope of receiving something for their support and for the upkeep of the Catholic schools that they find so necessary in order to preserve the faith of the people, who once were and should now be Catholics?
>
> Twenty-five dollars a month supports a school, and the faith of the present generation, as well as the faith of future generations, depends on the school.

Negro Education

THE Department of the Interior has recently issued a report on negro education. The report is the result of four years' study, and includes first-hand information garnered from more than 700 schools. Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones, who was in charge of the committee that drew up the report, says:

> No racial group in the United States offers so many problems of economic and social adjustment as the 10,000,000 negroes. Negroes form almost a third of the total population of the Southern States. In Mississippi and South Carolina, they constitute over half the population; and in the "black belt" counties, the proportion ranges from 50 to 90 per cent. The significance of such a concentration is difficult to explain to those not familiar with communities composed of people who differ widely not only in economic and educational status but also in ethnic type.
>
> In the fifty years since freedom was decreed, negro illiteracy has decreased from over 90 per cent to 30 per cent; nearly 1,000,000 colored men are now farmers of varying degrees of independence; a quarter of a million own their own farms and the total acreage of land owned by negroes aggregates 20,000,000 acres of fertile soil. These facts are indisputable evidence not only that the colored people are capable of progress but also that their white neighbors have looked with favor upon their struggles and in many instances have actually given substantial aid to their endeavors.

The conclusions drawn by the report are, in brief, as follows:

> (1) That there is a pressing need for increased public school facilities for negroes in the South. (2) That the aid of philanthropy should be continued with the present liberality until the South has attained to a better economic condition. (3) That all education should stress, first, the development of character, including the simple but fundamental virtues of cleanliness, order, perseverance, and the qualities essential to the home, and second, adaptation to the needs of the pupil and the community. (4) That supervision of both public and private educational efforts should be increased, so that all agencies may be correlated with each other, sound business methods established, organization of work suited to income and plant, and building operations conducted with economy and good taste.

It might not be amiss to stress godliness among the "fundamental virtues." Before the negro was brought to America to slave, the missionaries were rather successful in educating him, when the white man's greed did not frustrate their efforts. The pivot of their educational system was the catechism. It stressed godliness.

White Cross Nurses

THE White Cross Nurses were organized by eight students of the American Academy of Christian Democracy, at Cincinnati, in October, 1915. Their object is to furnish Catholic associations, leagues and federations properly trained secretaries, field agents, press correspondents, lecturers, social workers, and nurses. The bulletin of the American Academy of Christian Democracy announces the opening of its seventh course on September 14, 1917, at Cincinnati:

> The course extends over seven months, and comprises recitations and lectures on social science, political economy, charities and social service, parliamentary law, sanitation and practical nursing, physical culture, office work, including typewriting and registration of case work, and the fundamental principles of Christian philosophy. Lectures by visiting representatives and organizers of social movements are given frequently. The field work is obtained through affiliation with the council of social agencies, social units, associated charities, Catholic charities, Santa Maria Institute, juvenile and domestic relations' courts, and numerous other charitable and philanthropic organizations.

White Cross Nurses fill positions in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia and Kentucky. At present they are answering cries for help from organizations whose support is being withdrawn and transferred to war purposes.

The High Cost of Living

WHILE various reasons are given for the high cost of living a report sent out by the Federal Department of Agriculture furnishes the interesting information that the cold storage plants are bursting with food. In one instance 173 warehouses report that the amount of butter held July 1 this year was almost seven times greater than on July 1 last year. Other items are as follows:

> Frozen beef: 243 storages report a total of 105,174,204 pounds. 171 storages report 88,078,061 pounds, as compared with 55,109,049 pounds on July 1, 1916, an increase of 59.8 per cent. 221 storages report an increase of 4,642,361 pounds, or 4.6 per cent, during June, 1917. 136 storages report a decrease of 18,478,422 pounds, or 25.4 per cent, during June, 1916.
>
> Cured beef: 268 storages report a total of 34,560,268 pounds. 202 storages report 31,342,078 pounds, as compared with 18,915,105 pounds on July 1, 1916, an increase of 65.7 per cent. 239 storages report an increase of 2,690,848 pounds, or 8.7 per cent, during June, 1917. 171 storages report an increase of 9,157 pounds, or 0.1 per cent, during June, 1916.
>
> Frozen lamb and mutton: 121 storages report a total of 3,995,883 pounds. 81 storages report 3,143,744 pounds, as compared with 1,939,175 pounds on July 1, 1916, an increase of 62.1 per cent. 107 storages report an increase of 730,486 pounds, or 22.4 per cent during June, 1917. 67 storages report a decrease of 357,738 pounds, or 15.8 per cent during June, 1916.

There is much to be said on the high cost of living, and something too on the cost of high living. The high cost of profiteers, greedy speculators and price manipulators is the most pressing question for the Government to settle.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

AUGUST 11, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

The Canadian Conscription Controversy

George E. Roe

Lloyd George and Literature

Michael Williams

Modern Jesuits in Modern Japan

A. Russel Dilkes, Jr.

"The Great Disillusionment"

Floyd Keller

"Your Red Cross"

Gerald C. Treacy

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
August 11, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 18

PAGE

CHRONICLE 435–438

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Canadian Conscription Controversy—Lloyd George and Literature — Modern Jesuits in Modern Japan—"The Great Disillusionment" — "Your Red Cross" 439–446

COMMUNICATIONS 447–449

EDITORIALS
The Mother of the King—Recreation for Our Soldiers—The Wrong Way—Rationalism and Patriotism—The Hot Weather—Work and Drudgery...450–453

LITERATURE — Longfellow and Some Modern Considerations—Reviews—Books and Authors.....453–455

SOCIOLOGY—Jane Ashton's Teeth 455–456

EDUCATION — A Little Knowledge 457

NOTE AND COMMENT..... 458

The Catholic Identification Booklet
25 CENTS . . . . PRICE POSTPAID . . . . 25 CENTS

A NECESSITY
for all Catholic men and women in the military or other dangerous walks of life

BUT
all Catholics should have one

BECAUSE it is a safeguard against remaining without spiritual help among strangers, the Catholic Identification Card telling them to call nearest Catholic priest.

DESCRIPTION—An unostentatious article, leatherette bound, containing crucifix, scapular medal, identification card, and leaflet with instructions for assisting the dying. In small pocket-sized card case form.

BE WARNED—Like all valuable religious articles, it has its unauthentic imitations. This booklet only has the Imprimatur of His Eminence John Cardinal Farley, and the endorsement of numerous other clergy. To be sure, look before buying for this Imprimatur on inside of front page of leaflet.

IF YOUR DEALER CANNOT SUPPLY YOU SEND TO
THE W. J. FEELEY COMPANY, 10 East 50th Street, New York City
Manufacturers and Distributors

CATHOLIC CHURCH MORTGAGES
For Sale in Any Amount
All principal and interest collected and remitted to investors without charge. These mortgages, yielding from 5% to 5½% interest, are a first lien upon Roman Catholic Churches, Hospitals, Schools and other institutions constituting the highest class of security.
Correspondence invited.
B. J. CAVANAGH
600 Fleming Bldg., Des Moines, Iowa.

Mount de Chantal Wheeling, W. Va.
. . . . ACADEMY FOR GIRLS . . . .
Thorough and refined training. Healthful and beautiful surroundings.
Seventieth year opens September 11, 1917
FOR PROSPECTUS ADDRESS, THE DIRECTRESS

ST. FRANCIS ACADEMY, JOLIET, ILL.
Affiliated with the Catholic University. Accredited to the De Paul University, Chicago, and to the State University of Illinois. Located in a most picturesque spot of Joliet. Excellent facilities. Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls. Kindergarten, Preparatory, Academic and Commercial Courses. Exceptional advantages in Vocal and Instrumental Music, Art and Expression. Department of Household Arts and Science. Conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis. Address the Sister Directress.

ST. XAVIER ACADEMY
For Girls
BEATTY, PENNSYLVANIA
Academic, Commercial, Elementary departments;
Music, Art, Domestic Science, Athletics.
72nd year opens Sept. 5, 1917
WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

Camp Ko-wa-ho
THE CATHOLIC CAMP FOR GIRLS
Lake St. Catharine
Poultney, Vt.
For booklet, address
Mrs. F. H. Throop, 1542 East 12th St., B'klyn, N.Y.

Carlton Academy
UPPER SCHOOL for older boys gives thorough preparation for all colleges. Individual attention. Commercial Courses. Athletic Sports. Resident Chaplain.
LOWER SCHOOL for younger boys, with Housemother to give personal care.
SUMMIT Rev. James F. Newcomb, A.B.
New Jersey Headmaster

THE COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE
NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
chartered by the University of the State of New York, empowered to confer degrees in Letters, Science and Music
Department of Pedagogy
Approved by the Regents of the State of New York, and by the Superintendent of Public Instruction of New York City
Department of Secretarial Studies
LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF BACHELOR OF SCIENCE
For catalogue address the registrar

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 18 }
WHOLE No. 434 }

AUGUST 11, 1917

{ $3.00 A YEAR
{ PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—On July 31 the Allies, after a long preparation of intense artillery fire made an attack on a front of about twenty miles in Flanders, and pushed forward from Dixmude to the Lens River, south of Warneton. The amount of territory, thus gained, varied at different points of the line, but the Germans were driven back for a distance of two miles on a front of about twelve miles. Twelve towns and villages were taken, one of which, St. Julien, was later retaken by the Germans, and still later recaptured by the British. Further gains had been made by the Canadians east of Lens.

Bulletin, July 30, p.m.-Aug. 6, a.m.

The occupation of Eastern Galicia by the Austro-Germans is practically complete, the only portion now remaining in the hands of the Russians being a narrow strip East of Brody. North of the Dniester the Russians, who are in a state of demoralization, have refused to recognize the authority of their officers, and have made no serious effort to defend their positions. They have abandoned Tarnopol, Skala, Husiatyn, and have been driven across the Zbrocz River into Russian territory. South of the Dniester, a greater degree of military discipline has been maintained, but the retirement of the Russian army north of the river has necessitated the evacuation of Horodenka, Sniatyn and Kuty. In Bukowina also the Austro-Germans have been sweeping forward, and have occupied Czernowitz and the sector northeast of it as far as the Russian frontier, which they have crossed in the direction of Chotin. Further south they have taken Raranoze, Bojan, Radautz, Kimpolung and Watra. In Rumania the combined Russian and Rumanian forces have driven back the Austro-Germans about eleven miles on a front of forty miles.

Collapse of the Russians

On August 2 the Food Control bill and the Food Survey bill, the latter after a delay of two months, were reported out of conference in practically the same form as that given them by the Administration. There was some disposition, even among the Senate conferees, to eliminate the Committee on War Expenditures, as it was generally believed that the President would no longer insist that Mr. Hoover should be the sole food administrator if the war expenditures committee were eliminated from the bill. Mr. Wilson, however, made it clear that he would oppose the committee on food control, and in deference to his wishes both of the Senate's amendments, together with the labor exemption clause, were dropped. The House passed the bill as reported without serious protest; but the Senate regards it with a good deal of disfavor. It will come up for vote early during the week, but whether it will pass or not is by no means certain at the present writing, because there is a strong movement to send it back to conference.

The Food Bills

The Sheppard resolution, submitting to the States a prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution, passed the Senate on July 31 by a vote of 65 to 20. It reads as follows:

Proposed Prohibition Amendment

> Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.
>
> Resolved by the Senate and House in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each house concurring therein) that the following amendment to the Constitution be and hereby is proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:
>
> Section 1. The manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.
>
> Section 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the Legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.
>
> Section 3. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

There is little likelihood of the measure being introduced into the House before the end of the year, as the Democratic leaders have stated that that body would refuse to consider any legislation during the present extraordinary session, except that bearing on the conduct of the war. Unless therefore the President insists on the passage of the resolution, it will not in all probability be taken up in the House until Congress reconvenes in December.

The first important step toward requisitioning all the shipping resources of the United States was taken by the Shipping Board on August 4, when Admiral Capps, the general manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, notified shipyards throughout the country that all ships and all materials and equipment for the same in the yards under their control had been commandeered by the Government. The notice read:

Ships Requisitioned

By virtue of an act of Congress, approved June 15, 1917, entitled "An Act Making Appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on Account of War Expenses for the Fiscal Year Ending June Thirteenth, Nineteen Hundred and Seventeen, and for Other Purposes," and by authority delegated to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation under executive order of the President, dated July 11, 1917, all power-driven, cargo-carrying and passenger ships, above 2,500 tons D. W. capacity, under construction in your yard and certain materials, machinery, equipment, outfit and commitments for materials, machinery, equipment and outfit necessary for their completion are hereby requisitioned by the United States.

On behalf of the United States, by virtue of said act and said order, you are hereby required to complete the construction of said requisitioned ships under construction, and will prosecute such work with all practicable dispatch. The compensation to be paid will be determined hereafter, and will include ships, material and contracts requisitioned.

The Government had previously entered into agreements with foreign nations, principally Great Britain and Norway, for which many ships were being built in the United States, and it is said that 675 vessels will be affected by the order. The next step, according to reports, will be to requisition the ships now afloat and under American registry.

Although the revision of the War Revenue bill, still in the hands of the Senate Finance Committee, is far from complete, and the exact total remains to be determined, it seems likely that the sum provided for by the present bill, as finally drafted, will aggregate $2,000,000,000. The additional sum of $304,600,000, not previously provided for is to be raised by levying $162,000,000 on corporation incomes; $27,600,000 on individual incomes of $15,000 and more; $90,000,000 on distilled spirits; and $25,000,000 on malt and beer. The Committee has announced that it is hoped that it will not be necessary to impose additional consumption taxes, although additional taxes of ¼ cent a pound on sugar, ½ cent a pound on coffee, and 1 or 2 cents a pound on tea are under consideration.

War Revenue Bill

General Crowder has issued an important communication to the effect that those who fail to present themselves to the exemption-boards will not only not escape being summoned to military service but will by the very fact of their failure to present themselves forfeit whatever claim they may have had to exemption. Their names will be listed with those who are called to the conscript armies, and refusal to obey will be dealt with according to military procedure and penalties, which involve court-martial and in the case of desertion death. Aliens, except enemy-aliens, according to a new ruling may now be accepted for conscript service.

Resistance to Draft

France.—On August 31 the Premier M. Alexandre Ribot replied in the Chamber to the declaration made a few days previously by Dr. Michaelis, the German Chancellor, that there was a secret treaty between France and Russia having in view plans of conquest. Premier Ribot said that the German Chancellor had publicly challenged the French Government to declare whether in a secret sitting June 1 "the French Government had not made known to the Chamber of Deputies the terms of a secret treaty made before the Russian revolution whereby the Emperor had bound himself to support French pretensions to German territory on the left bank of the Rhine."

Ribot Answers Michaelis

In reply to the challenge the Premier declared that the Chancellor's version contained "gross inaccuracies and lies." This was particularly true, he added, regarding the rôle the Chancellor attributed to the President of the Republic in giving an order to sign a treaty unknown to Premier Briand. In further explanation of the matter Premier Ribot said:

The Chambers know how things passed. M. Doumergue, ex-Premier and Foreign Minister, after a conversation with the Emperor, demanded and obtained M. Briand's authorization to take note of the Emperor's promise to support our claim to Alsace-Lorraine and to leave us free to seek guarantees against fresh aggression, not by annexing territories on the left bank of the Rhine, but by making an autonomous State of these territories which would protect us and also Belgium against invasion.

We have never thought to do what Bismarck did in 1871. We are, therefore, entitled to deny the allegation of the Chancellor, who evidently knows of the letters exchanged in February, 1917, at Petrograd and falsified since, as his most illustrious predecessor falsified the Ems dispatch. Whenever the Russian Government is willing to publish these letters we have no objection.

The Chancellor refrained from speaking about my declaration of March 21, wherein I repudiated in France's name any policy of conquest and annexation by force. He has wilfully forgotten my language, May 22, in the Chamber, saying we were ready to enter into conversation with Russia as to the object of the war, and if the German people, whose right to live and develop peacefully we do not contest, understood that we wished peace founded on the right of people, the conclusion of peace would thereby be singularly facilitated.

M. Ribot then read from his speech in the Chamber warning against those who wished to spread the conviction that France was seeking conquest and read the terms of the resolution adopted by the Chamber at that time declaring that peace conditions must include the liberation of territory occupied by Germany, the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France and just reparation for damage done in the invaded regions. The resolutions also favored the creation of a league of nations for the maintenance of peace.

The Premier emphatically denied that France wished any annexation of territory. The accusation brought against her would, he said, deceive no one "especially the democratic masses of the Russian people," whom their enemies were trying to mislead as to the intentions of the French democracy. In conclusion the Premier declared that France addressed itself, not to Germany, but to all who were witnesses or actors in the struggle which it had been maintaining for the past three years "and who know that there is in the depth of the French people's soul a deep attachment to the principles of justice, respect for people's rights" and true generosity.

Great Britain.—On August 4, the third anniversary of England's declaration of war against Germany, the Prime Minister delivered in London an address which was a call to the Allies to "tighten their belts to reach the summit of their hopes." After saying that the Allies "are fighting to defeat the most dangerous conspiracy ever plotted against the liberty of nations," he continued as follows:

Lloyd George's Speech

> We have checked the ambitions of Germany. The nations of the world have been climbing painfully the steps that led to national independence and self-respect. France and Great Britain reached the platform long ago, and then came a great power to thrust the nations back to the old dark servitude. That is what we have been fighting three years.
>
> The Kaiser now adopts different language—fighting to protect German soil. Even now neither he nor his new Chancellor has said they would be satisfied with German soil. They talked glibly of peace but stammered when they came to the word "restoration." Before we enter a peace conference they must learn to utter that word to begin with.
>
> War is a ghastly business. But it is not as grim as a bad peace. There is an end to a horrible war. But a bad peace will go on and on, staggering from one war to another. The Prussian war-lords have not yet abandoned their ambitions; they are only discussing the postponement of the realization of their ambitions.
>
> The next time the Prussian war-lords meant to make sure. There must be no next time. Let us have done with it. Do not let us repeat this horror. Let us make victory such that national liberty, whether for small or great nations, can never be challenged. The small nation must be as well protected and guarded as the big nation.
>
> We of this country cannot allow sectional organizations to make war or make peace. The nation as a whole has made war-sacrifices, pretty evenly divided among all classes, and the nation as a whole must make peace.

The Marquis of Crew, who presided at the meeting, declared that the Allies were cheered by the entrance of America into the war, and reminded the audience that the Allies' war aims are still "reparation and security."

Ireland.—In spite of the general political unrest and the local disturbances caused in certain districts by hotly contested elections, the country is remarkably free from gross crimes. The Dublin Weekly Freeman quotes in support of this view the opinions of four prominent judges, who in opening the Assizes made favorable comments on this happy condition of affairs. Before the King's County Assizes at Tullamore, Lord Chief Justice Campbell said that he was in a situation to congratulate the Grand Jury most sincerely on the peace and prosperity of the county. Not only was there no increase of any kind in serious crime, but the records of intemperance showed a very substantial decrease. In cases of the smaller or more insignificant breaches of the law, the figures had fallen from 1,975 in the previous year, to 1,647 this year. Addressing the Grand Jury at Wicklow Assizes, Lord Chief Justice Ronan said that there were only three bills to go before them. The county inspector had authorized him to say that the state of the county was quite peaceful and satisfactory. The specifically reported cases were only four, a remarkable decrease from last year, when they were ten. Judge Ross, opening the Meath Assizes at Trim, paid substantially the same tribute to the county, and Judge Gibson, at the Westmeath Assizes, passed a similar verdict. This general verdict of the judges at the various Assizes, all testifying to the law-abiding qualities of the people and the practical freedom from the grosser forms of crime is one of the most telling tributes to their sterling virtue and an official refutation of the charge of reckless violation of the law so often brought against them.

The Verdict of the Judges

The selection of Sir Horace Plunkett as chairman of the Irish Convention, which was recorded last week in America, has been favorably received. Sir Horace Plunkett is held in the highest esteem for his work in the agricultural organization of Ireland, which probably owes more to him than to any other individual. He has kept himself aloof from party politics, and although some of his views have not met with the approval of Irish Catholics he is everywhere respected for his disinterestedness, ability and modesty. He founded the Irish agricultural organization in 1894. He was Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction between 1899 and 1907. He is a Commissioner of the Congested Districts Board. He is the author of several books dealing with Irish problems. He is as familiar with Irish opinion in the United States as in the British Empire.

Sir Horace Plunkett

Russia.—The situation has not altered much. The National Conference which is to meet at Moscow will be composed, it is reported, of 850 delegates, but Finland, the Ukraine and the Maximalist party will not be permitted to send representatives. The re-reformed Cabinet, which M. Kerensky is said to be working at, will consist of fifteen or sixteen members, all equal in power. The Constitutionalist Democrats, according to advices published July 29, were opposed to the Minister of Agriculture, M. Tchernoff, and M. Terestchenko, Minister of Foreign Affairs, remaining in the Cabinet, but Premier Kerensky was determined that they should stay, and rather than conform to the clamor for their resignation he gave up his portfolio on August 3 and the rest of the Cabinet, except the Vice-Premier, M. Nekpasoff, retired with him. Later, however, all withdrew their resignations with the exception of M. Terestchenko and M. Tchernoff. Premier Kerensky's action was also due to the failure to bring the Constitutional Democrats into the Cabinet.

Cabinet-Making

On August 4 the political conference held at the Winter Palace came to an end. Each of the five parties represented passed a resolution declaring its confidence in the Premier and inviting him to form his own Cabinet. Four of the resolutions urged that a new ministry should follow the program of reform announced by M. Kerensky on June 21, but the Constitutional Democrats opposed the measure.

Important changes have also taken place in the army. General Alexis A. Brussiloff, commander-in-chief of the Russian troops, has resigned, and General Korniloff, commander on the southwestern front, has taken his place, General Tcheremissoff, commander of the Eighth Army, assuming the latter's post. Foreign Minister Terestchenko has sent a circular letter to the Allies in which he says:

> The criminal propaganda of irresponsible elements was used by enemy agents and provoked a revolution in Petrograd. At the same time part of the troops in the front were seduced by the same propaganda, forgot their duty to the country and facilitated the enemy piercing our front.
>
> The Russian people have been stirred by these events through the Government created by the revolution and with an unshakable will the revolt was crushed and its originators were brought to justice. All necessary steps have been taken at the front for restoring the combative strength of the armies.
>
> The Government intends bringing to a successful end the task of establishing an administration capable of meeting all dangers and guiding the country in the path of revolutionary regeneration.
>
> Russia will not suffer herself to be deterred by any difficulty in carrying out the irrevocable decision to continue the war to a final triumph of the principles proclaimed by the Russian revolution.

The feeling of insecurity at home is indicated, however, by an appeal to the people made by the Provisional Committee of the Duma, on August 2. It reads:

> The riffraff of the army, overwhelmed by a riot of cowardice, is in flight. What has occurred in the army is merely an echo of what is happening all over Russia. This state of affairs is due to the usurpation of the rights and power of the Government by organizations of irresponsible parties and to the setting up of a double authority at the center, while there is no authority at all on the spot.
>
> A catastrophe behind the front will bring with it the ruin of the army, which means the ruin of Russia. There is but one way of escape, and that is the establishment of a firm, powerful authority which should be prepared to exact from each and all the execution of their duty. The Government must be strong and unanimous; it must make for a single goal, the defense of our great country against the mortal peril that threatens from the quarrels of the revolutionists and the sweeping away of all authority on the spot.
>
> The chief problem of the Government lies in immediate organization and in the administration of justice, without which all the reforms proposed by the Government must fail of realization. Until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly all legislative acts tending to radical change in the present régime, whether of the Government or of the social order in general, and tending to introduce even greater disturbance into the ideas of the people's rights, must not be allowed.

Premier Kerensky returned to Petrograd and attended a Ministerial meeting on August 4, subsequently issuing a manifesto in which he declared his intention of constructing a strong revolutionary government. A joint meeting of the executives of the Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Councils, by a vote of 147 to 46, expressed their confidence in the Premier, though the Maximalists strongly protested. Up to August 5 M. Kerensky had made scant progress in forming a new Cabinet. The Constitutional Democrats still opposed the Socialist program and refused to allow the Council of Deputies to control the Cabinet. They seemed ready to support M. Kerensky, but would not enter the Ministry. The Social Revolutionists appeared likely to withdraw support from the Premier. They demanded an inquiry within three days into the accusations against their leader, M. Tchernoff, ex-Minister of Agriculture, who is charged with having relations with the Germans, and if he is acquitted they want him restored to the Cabinet. Nearly all seemed agreed that M. Kerensky is the only man who can save the situation.

Root's Return

The members of the American mission to Russia who left this country May 19 safely returned to "a Pacific port" on August 3. At a luncheon given the following day to the commissioners Mr. Elihu Root expressed his belief in Russia's ability to weather the present storm. "I have abiding faith that Russia, through trial and tribulation, will work out, create and perpetuate a great, free, self-governing democracy," Mr. Root said in his address. He found in the Russian people "a high capacity for self-control and a noble idealism, heading always in a better way toward higher things." And he pleaded for deep sympathy for the nation "which is struggling with the problems that we have been studying for 140 years and have not yet solved."

James Duncan, Vice-President of the American Federation of Labor, said that the establishment of a stable government in Russia has been retarded by so-called reformers who have returned home from America. They spread the report that we had entered the war for sordid reasons and they tell the Russians that "The Government of the United States is more oppressive than the old régime at Petrograd."

The Canadian Conscription Controversy

GEORGE E. ROE

CERTAIN aspects of the Canadian conscription controversy have a bearing upon the relations of the Dominion to the United States. Some of these are incidental, some of larger significance. For example, it is admitted that selective conscription was long ago considered, that it was held to be a better way than voluntary recruiting, once the figures at first thought sufficient had to be multiplied, and that the idea was abandoned because of the ease with which the border could be crossed. The entry of the United States into the war not merely changed that situation, but after Congress had decided for selective draft the border became an object of concern from the opposite direction. The Canadian Conscription Act, by complementing the American, eliminates a boundary problem which might have been productive of international annoyance. There is a shrewd suspicion in some quarters that this was one of the compelling reasons for the introduction of the Canadian measure, although it is never given by the sponsors.

Secondly, the war has brought a change in the matter of finance. Prior to 1914, the dependence of Canada upon British capital was all but absolute. It was estimated that the private, the corporation, the municipal and the government indebtedness to Great Britain was not far short of $3,000,000,000. For twenty years British money had been pouring into Canada in amounts sufficient to meet all reasonable and a good many uneconomic demands. When the war began that stopped. There has been a vast amount of British money spent in Canada since 1914, but practically all of it has been for war's destructive purposes. There have been heavy additions to Canada's debt in three years, but again for destructive, not constructive expenditures. One estimate is that in four years Canada will have borrowed four times as much as in the previous fifty. How much of this has been had from the United States there is no telling, but what is certain is that Canada has leaned upon New York to an extent never before within the range of contemplation. Two interesting divergent deductions follow: First, that it behooves Canada to stand well with the nation upon which it has placed and will continue to place this dependence, and, secondly, that the longer the process continues the more difficult it will be for Canada to guard the reality of her independence in face of her powerful neighbor. The arguments need not be elaborated. One makes for accelerated war effort, the other for a halt. Today two of the country's transcontinental railway systems are potentially bankrupt. To-morrow, French Canada foresees that the bankruptcy may be of another sort, one that perhaps will imperil those institutions which are dearer to Quebec than anything else and which center round the laws, the language and the religion they brought with them from France and guarded for three hundred years as the ark of their covenant.

The third, and not the least important bearing upon the relations between Canada and the United States, has to do with material conditions after the war. The disarray into which fiscal and industrial conditions have been thrown will impose a heavy strain upon the statesmanship of reconstruction, and the present outlook is for measures of customs which will seriously interfere with trade between the two countries. Who knows to what that may lead? Up to 1897 there was tacit acceptance of the view that the United States had a footing of equality in Canadian markets. The grant, by the treaty of Washington, to the United States of equal navigation rights in the lower St. Lawrence, even where both its shores are Canadian, was a sign of the purpose of the period. Since 1897 there has been a departure from this condition, Canada's preferential tariff in favor of Great Britain setting up a new status. To this not much exception was taken, partly because the integrity of the British Empire was conceded, partly because the actual tariff-making, in the hands of a Liberal, low tariff administration, left little actual occasion for complaint. But now two new schemes have been foreshadowed. First was a suggestion, made at the Paris Conference, for a series of trade preferences to apply after the war, by virtue of which France, Russia, Italy or other allies of Great Britain would share in the advantages of British, including Colonial, markets, to the exclusion of others, notably, in the Canadian case, of the United States. Whether this plan still finds favor is not very clear. Whether the entry of the United States into the war involved any agreements or understandings which would alter the intent of the Paris Conference is not clear either. But in the meantime a new proposition has been made, the acceptance of which forms part of the war problem. A committee has been formed in London, backed by powerful influences, whose mission is to see that all the natural resources of the British Empire are pooled for the advantage of British Empire industry, commerce and defense organization. And when that has been achieved, then

> With a view to encouraging the establishment of new industries in the British Empire and giving a measure of confidence and security to capital to be embarked therein, as well as assisting the expansion of existing industries, the Governments of the Empire are urged to make it obligatory on all Government departments, municipalities, railways, dock and harbor boards, gas, water and electric light corporations, and all such bodies spending public monies, or enjoying charters from Government or other public authorities, to purchase Empire-made goods and to place all contracts with British firms; exceptions to be made by special permission of proper authority, only in cases where such a course is considered to be at variance with public interests.

In theory this may not appear to be open to exception. In practice the great industrial organizations of the United States have shown a marked tendency to ignore the existence of a parallel of latitude, or even of a very large body of fresh water, when minerals or other materials useful in their operations have been discovered by their agents, and in the second place Canada has always been the best customer of American industrial producers. Peace in North America, and on terms consistent with self-respect, is for Canada a concern essentially her own. It has been threatened twice in the last half century over concerns that were not hers at all, over the Trent affair and over the Venezuela boundary dispute. It has been preserved, in delicate circumstances touching the fisheries and Alaska, by her own firmness and good sense.

All this has an evident bearing upon the basic elements of the present controversy over conscription. Will Canada throw her all into the war, and take her chances on the complications that arise in her already difficult problems? Those who are for doing so, are for conscription, with the attendant borrowing, until the war ends. Will Canada, while there is yet time, give heed to the instinct of self-preservation before she has been reduced to a multiple dependency under which her initiative would disappear. Those who are for counting the effort already expended, for comparing it with that of others, especially with that of the United States whose fourteen fold man power and forty fold wealth are only entering on the scene, are against conscription and all that conscription involves. These latter have a difficult rôle, but their opponents are not reclining upon velvet. If they were they would not be passing revolutionary legislation without attempting to hold either general elections or by-elections to fill the numerous vacant places in Parliament. They would not be appealing to London for leave to continue in existence a Parliament already moribund instead of asking the people of Canada for a new lease of power. All this may help to a comprehension of the reason why, in Canada, there are two sides to a question which, looked at from a distance too great for details to be distinguished, appears to have but a single face.

Lloyd George and Literature*

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

IT may seem preposterous to connect Lloyd George with the revival of literature, for of all the swarm of politicians who so strangely rose into power in the days before the great war, and during it, Lloyd George was among the least distinguished for literary power or grace. Unquestionably, he possessed a personal force which in speaking he communicated through his words to his listeners, a force which gave him ascendancy over them; but it was evanescent, it did not remain in the words recorded by reporters or written by himself. In this respect he was like nearly all the other political leaders of the time, not merely in England, but in all the countries, save only in France and Ireland. In France, prose writing had become so well understood that most educated men had mastered a good, thoroughly expressive style. In Ireland, the spiritual force which inspired the higher types of public men more than personal motives could do, gave their utterances a throb of high passion and a vitality of inward truth which sealed them with peculiar distinction. In the United States, President Wilson attained tremendous contemporary fame as a literary stylist; but it is too difficult a task at this late day to get an understanding of how his academic and artificial writings attained to such a degree of favor. However, to return to Lloyd George, it is quite clear that he at least possessed no share of that high gift which, when it is allied with the unique opportunities afforded by national leadership in times of crisis, may lead to such permanent works of literary power and beauty as, for example, the Gettysburg address of Lincoln. Yet Lloyd George it was who, in the memorable speech delivered before the Commons in February, 1917, after Germany had declared its unrestricted submarine blockade of the Allied coasts, enunciated the policy the effects of which brought about the splendid revival of literature which marked the end of the twentieth century.

To be sure, Lloyd George did not have literature in mind when he announced that the importation of print paper into England would be cut some fifty per cent in order to save tonnage required for the importation of food. Nor did he have in mind the betterment of prose and the intensification of the spirit of poetry when, three months later, after the submarine campaign had caused serious results in England, he ordered another cut of fifty per cent in the amount of paper which it would be lawful to import into England. It is now clear that what Lloyd George had in mind was, first, the obvious necessity of saving tonnage, and second, the personal yet even more important object of crippling the political power of the press, especially of the Northcliffe press. The press had made Lloyd George, as it made most of the politicians of that age, because without the publicity afforded by the press—the perfectly enormous multiplication of the power of their speeches, and the power of their personalities, and the power of their hypnotic phrases, and the more sinister and direct power of their cabals and conspiracies—none of the politicians, in any of the so-called democratic countries, England, France, the United States, could ever possibly have attained such ascendancy as they most amazingly did. It was the press, and most chiefly the Northcliffe press, which stamped the seal of Lloyd George upon the British public's mind. Nobody knew this better than George, save Northcliffe, of course, and when, through his affiliations with the English Hearst, Lloyd George had ousted Asquith and secured the Premiership, the first real use he made of his new power was to torpedo the ship that had carried him over. He had at once been obliged to chaffer and dicker with many sources of power and influence in order to obtain a working machine, and he knew that Northcliffe was very likely to throw him down as effectually as he had set him up. It was up to him, therefore, to move first. Germany gave him the unique opportunity. The limiting of the huge tonnage of print paper imported into England struck everybody save the dismayed Northcliffe and the other great newspaper lords as a very sensible step. The fact that it immediately led to the total disappearance of a large number of the smaller and weaker journals did not particularly matter, in such a time of national danger and crisis. The fact that the newspapers which continued to exist were very much smaller was such an obvious improvement that again all save the proprietors rejoiced. And when six months later the raid of the submarines right into the hitherto safe portions of the Channel was followed by the total suppression of all journals save the official government gazettes, "for the period of the war," the public by that time was so well accustomed to the centralization of authority in the Government that save for a few minor disturbances, led by such determined publicists as the two Chestertons, Hilaire Belloc, A. R. Orage, Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, Darrell Figgis, and by the Sinn Feiners in Dublin, for a long time there was no obvious difference in the course of public affairs, nor was there any great change until the end of the war. We all know, now, how totally unexpected, save by a very few far-seeing ones, was the length of the war, and we are well acquainted with the events of the tremendous revolution by which the power of the oligarchy of incurably materialistic and money-seeking interests and their political tools was at last broken, and the new era of Christian democracy based upon farmer proprietorship of the land, economically, and upon the Catholic Faith, spiritually, dawned at last upon the torn and desolated world. But what has not been so well known is the fact that out of that period of silence of the press arose the splendid revival of literature which coincided with the coming of the new age of economic justice and of spiritual power and beauty. It is to this aspect of the subject that I desire briefly to direct your attention.

---

* These lines are an extract from Professor Belloc's "History of English Literature in the Twenty-first Century." The author of this standard work is a grandson of the famous Hilaire Belloc, the historian of the Great War.

It is of course exceedingly difficult for us today to gain anything save a partial understanding of the importance and power of the press in the days before the great war. And no more truly frightful souvenirs of that period have come down to us than the copies preserved in our libraries of the more typical "yellow" newspapers, as they were called; why, nobody now can say, except that we do know that the word "yellow" connoted sinister and deplorable ideas which nobody today would dream of connecting with that color, unless we went back to the teachings of the old mystics, who ascribed the color yellow to Judas, and taught that it signified idleness, and a horror of suffering and envy and treason. So, just before the great war, people talked of "the yellow streak" of cowardice, and the "yellow peril," and the "yellow press." How strange they seem, these huge, flimsy sheets, all yellowed indeed by the passage of time, with their huge, screaming, almost incoherent "head-lines," their "funny" pictures, their long, detailed, malodorous gloatings over human sins and sorrow and shame! How strange, especially, their assumption of an editorial authority, based absolutely on nothing at all save personal self-sufficiency or the personal interests of their proprietors and editors! Save here and there, nearly all really ethical reasons for being had passed away from the daily newspapers of that period, and with honorable and few exceptions, the press existed to make profits for its owners or to advance the personal interests of individuals and cliques. The magazines were nearly all devoted to various profit-making policies of supplying popular entertainment to large masses of the public. Those powerful and strong-willed individuals who realized the situation advanced their own interests and the interests of their chosen associates, or political parties, or theories, by seizing and wielding this almost universal power. Against the magnates of this oligarchical tyranny stood out only two classes, namely, the definitely religious part of the press, and the champions of various forms of social reform and social revolution which ran the gamut from highly idealistic, self-sacrificing ideas, some of which, and the best of which, came from the treasury of the Church, down to the most awful and diabolical teachings of the spirit of evil. And the press was never idle. Huge forests were felled each day to be made into paper to feed its voracious maw. Hundreds of millions of copies of newspapers were printed every hour of the day and night. Armies of writers, reporters, editors, cartoonists, poets, to say nothing about the printers and the business people connected with the press, were employed. Everybody read, few people could think. Among those few only the minority had their thinking based upon the truths of religion. What wonder, then, that calamity came? The wonder is that it came not long before, and that having come, it was ever stopped before it swallowed up every vestige of civilization!

And necessarily the art of literature almost perished during that dark age of the power of the press. Respect for literary style, for the evidences of sincerity, high purpose, responsibility, was almost totally destroyed. On the one hand, art, wearied of the riot and dust of the market-place, turned aside and betook itself to sterile retreats where it practised strange developments only understandable by a few initiates. On the other hand, never before was there ever seen such a vast assemblage of would-be poets, prophets, story-tellers, teachers, critics and journalists, especially journalists. The clamor of their voices deafened and dizzied the humanity they assumed to lead and to mold. What a relief when silence so suddenly fell, and at last the soul of man was left undisturbed for a space to listen to the great voices which had never ceased to speak to it, but which had been overwhelmed by the mere clamor of the press, the voices of true poets and authentic artists, and writers with a sense of responsibility.

And when the silence was again broken, and the press resumed its function, altogether too essential a one to be left for too long a period unused, those who first made use of it were those who were urged to the task by stronger motives than commercial profit, those who were ready to labor and labor on, teaching or inspiring, even if their audiences were small, and their own emoluments little or nothing at all. They were listened to with fresh attention, new zest, eager interest. Words which had been abused and worn-out recovered life and power. Wonder and mystery and true romance and thrilling reality were attached to the songs and stories and plays and books which came again to claim the attention of the world. For with the revival of the press, came the revival of religion, and art and literature recovered that which alone can make them great and enduring, namely, the sacramental sense; the expression of unseen truths, the faithful service of God. True art and true literature turned again to their two great tasks, namely, to the enheartening and the enlightenment of man, and to the battle against the false art and the false literature which would set up many idols in place of God.

Modern Jesuits in Modern Japan

G. Russell Dilkes, Jr.

THE year 1918 will witness the semi-centenary of the new régime in Japan. It will be recalled that the Japanese Constitution, unlike the Magna Chartas of Europe, is not a code of concessions forced from the throne by the people vi et armis. It is a peaceable instrument of the commonwealth agreed upon by both sides. Its adaptations are from the best in European experience: the navy from England, the army from Germany, the laws from France, and the educational system from America. Its religion alone has remained untouched by Western ideals. Despite the radical changes which this remarkable document has brought about in modern Japan within fifty years and despite the freedom permitted under it to religious worship, Shintoism and Buddhism still flourish and increase. The millions still worship in 100,000 polytheistic temples supported by generous and continuous donations, and the Government is constantly erecting new ones. Shintoism especially, a blend of polytheism and ancestor-worship intimately bound up in the entire system of court ceremonial, is as alive today as government patronage and social prestige can keep it.

But if the Japanese have not assimilated the Western religion, they have seized with avidity upon Western culture. In 1873, the late Emperor Mutsuhito, in his self-selected era of "enlightenment" (meiji), officially commanded that education throughout his dominions "shall henceforth be so diffused that there shall not be a village with an ignorant family or a family with an ignorant member." As an astonishing consequence, today, in a land of 52,000,000 inhabitants there are 7,500,000 students and nearly 36,000 schools. Five government universities and numerous private ones are flourishing, having been founded by individuals or by religious bodies. In this land, a student is an envied personage distinguished by special garb. The populace look up to him: his elders foster him. A Japanese man of means invariably surrounds himself with several students, shosei, dependent upon him for bed and board in return for certain services. A promising college man is usually sent, either by the Government or by his family, to Europe or America to continue investigations along his special line of scientific or literary study.

In Japan all roads lead to Tokio. It is the sixth largest city in the world. In America it would be the third. It is almost as populous as Chicago. In point of numbers it is one of the largest educational centers of the world. In a city of over 2,000,000 inhabitants, there are 165,000 public school boys and girls. The number of young people to be seen on the cars and the streets during the rush hours of the morning and evening is greater than the number to be seen anywhere in New York, Chicago or Boston.

In the Kojimachi section of the city, on the sites which originally contained the residences of the medieval nobles, the public offices have been erected. The old castle of Yeddo is now the imperial palace, set in the midst of world-famous gardens. Near by is Hybia Park and the imperial theater and the museum of arms, containing trophies of the wars with China and Russia. The Parliament buildings and the Supreme Court are not far from the various foreign legations in this the most dignified and aristocratic residential section of Tokio. Amidst such surroundings of historical and social distinction and government-business, the tourist will eventually come upon a specially handsome, new, brick and stone structure in modern European architecture, situated on the highest point in the center of Tokio, its roof-garden towering above the main building, affording a clear vista of the city and harbor, and westward of the fertile valley leading up to Fuji San. On one of the pillars of the iron gateway, will be observed a bronze tablet bearing, in Japanese kanji ideographs, the words, Jochi Daigaku, "Wisdom University." But in 1914, incorporated with the approbation and under the protection of the Government, it is by far the most imposing educational structure in the city. Until recently it was supported by alms chiefly from Germany and Austria. It is a Jesuit institution of learning, one of the best in the Orient.

"What is a Jesuit?" was once asked of Dr. Johnson. He replied: "A person who is cleverer than oneself." Lord Chesterfield agreed that "one sees most Jesuits excel in some particular thing." A member of the society has said that in recent times they "have been occupied chiefly in keeping school and in writing books which are not generally read."

As a matter of record, they are the authors of tens of thousands of volumes on subjects ranging from theology to music, from medicine to chemical discoveries, from literature in all its phases to the sciences in their every aspect, from seismography, through the dazzling mazes of astronomy down to archeology and jurisprudence and naval tactics. They have been in the business of higher education on a large scale for almost 400 years. They are rectors and professors in several hundreds of colleges, of "Wisdom," situated in all parts of the civilized world, in which annually 50,000 students are trained in a wide range of studies. Lord Macaulay assures us that as educators "they discovered the precise point to which intellectual culture can be carried without risk of intellectual emancipation." "Enmity itself," he says, "was compelled to own that in the art of managing and forming the tender mind they had no equals."

In Asia especially have they distinguished themselves, honored the Government and sought to redeem the people from moral and intellectual stagnation. The Jesuit Martini was "the father of Chinese geography." The Jesuit Prémare is conceded "the most profound and thorough grammarian of the Chinese language." The Jesuit Ricci is called "the first sinologue," and the Jesuit Zotolli, "a landmark in the history of Chinese philology." The Jesuit college of Zi-ka-wei, near Shanghai, received warm tributes of praise from European potentates touring the East in state. For forty years it has been famous for its astronomical observations. The Chinese Government depends upon it for storm warnings against the destructive typhoon.

In Japan, the new Jesuit "University of Wisdom" not yet four years old, was instituted at the gracious command of Pius X., who commissioned Cardinal O'Connell to visit the late Emperor Meiji for the purpose. All of the professors rank as doctors of divinity: some of them are specialists as well in other branches of learning. Professor Tsuchihashi, the only Japanese Jesuit priest now living is a profound scholar in the Chinese language, Professor Gettelman is collaborator in a famous work on Socialism, Professor Dahlman is an authority on the religions of Japan, and Professor MacNeal, on literature and pedagogy. They are at present teaching eighty students, with the enrolment increasing forty per cent each year. In place of Latin, English as the world-language of commerce, and German as that of science and philosophy, are used. In place of Greek, Chinese is taught. To a student of Nippon, English is little less difficult than is Greek to us, and German a little more difficult than is Latin to us. The memory of a Japanese student is well-nigh prodigious; and, if his reasoning be somewhat weak, he is blessed peculiarly with quick perception. He is always courteous, exceedingly sensitive, very reserved, eminently susceptible to kindness and affection, it being impossible to drive him. Ping-pong indoors, and tennis, archery and baseball outdoors, are his favorite sports.

True, this modern Jesuit mission is not the first to set foot in Nippon. Four hundred years ago, the Jesuit Saint Francis Xavier made a whirlwind tour of the country; and the great Apostle of the Indies outdid the record of the great Apostle of the Gentiles in the number of his conversions to the Faith of The Master. But, although Xavier, in a few months, had redeemed thousands of natives with the waters of Baptism and started them on in their A B C of Catholicism, his wondrous Pentecostal miracle was a short time after annihilated almost as completely as though it had never been wrought. Hence, modern Jesuits in modern Japan are not continuing a work already established. Theirs is an infant enterprise, the mere cornerstone of a new undertaking in a new world, wherein they are giving, out of their intellectual bounty, that which the people prize most dearly, education. With glorious traditions in the Orient such as theirs, what of their future in this land of the Rising Sun? Let Okaze, a bard of Nippon, speak and say:

> The Mists
> Enveil the hills in mystery
> That in the distance darkly loom;
> But the breeze that blows thereby
> Comes laden with the scent of bloom.

May the scent of the bloom of virtue spread over Japan from Jochi Daigaku.

"The Great Disillusionment"

FLOYD KEELER

EVIDENCES of the Romeward trend in Anglicanism continue to accumulate. Editorials are appearing with considerable frequency in Protestant Episcopal papers, the evident purport of which is to soothe the disquieted members of that church, to point out to them how much they have at home and to attempt to show them that they would gain nothing by making their submission to Catholic authority, but on the contrary would really lose thereby. One of the latest of such is an editorial which recently appeared under the above heading in the Churchman. Like most of the utterances of the "Broad Church" school, this one is vague and unsatisfying. Efforts to grasp anything definite in it seem doomed to disappointment. The editor's thesis, however, appears to be that while "it is undeniably true that a considerable number of members of the Anglican Church have become converts to "Roman Catholicism" yet these same have experienced a "great disillusionment," and he instances a recently published letter from "a returned convert" who was thus disillusioned and who after having become "convinced of the claims of the Church of Rome, and after an experience within its membership rejoined the Anglican communion." If this sentence represents the writer's real state of mind throughout, it reveals a great deal concerning him and helps to explain his various "flops."

Let us analyze: This individual "became convinced of the claims of the Church of Rome." Now what does that involve? It involves holding, in the first place, the belief that our Lord Jesus Christ founded one Church and that the Church in communion with the See of Rome is that Church. It involves holding that the very best that can be said for organized bodies outside of that communion is that they are in schism; most of them, however, are in actual, formal heresy as well. Moreover it involves the belief that outside of the Catholic Church a person is cut off from participation in the real corporate unity of the Church, a unity which cannot be lost to the Church itself but which to be enjoyed by the individual must be had on the Church's own terms. It involves the belief that the one Church of our Lord's foundation possesses the attributes of infallibility, indefectibility and authority and that submission to that authority, especially as expressed in the supremacy of the Successor of St. Peter, is absolutely necessary to full Catholic life. All this and much more our "convert" accepted, "became convinced" was true. Then, "after an experience" within the Fold, he went back. One must indeed look for a tremendous "experience" to offset such claims when once they have been accepted, but what do we find? Parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus. He "found many parties in the Roman communion"! In other words, he found that the Church did not do what her enemies accuse her of doing, namely, fetter men's intellects and ruthlessly press them into such rigid uniformity of thought and action that they become mere automata and but replicas one of the other. He looked for, and claims not to have found, "a welcome for the convert," which may have been due to what the convert expected for himself. Naaman, the Syrian, was similarly disappointed because of his ideas of his own importance but, heathen that he was, he had the good sense to listen to a wise counselor and exercise the humility necessary to follow the direction of God's Prophet. Perhaps if our "returned convert" had done the same, he might have recognized that discipline is often salutary and that even the "joy upon one sinner that doth penance" is perhaps more perceptible to the "angels of God" than it is to the sinner himself. "The sermons struck him as thin and unscriptural." What a cause for rejecting the Divinely ordered plan for the government of God's Church! But had he not learned that while Catholic preachers "preach the Gospel," yet the fulness of life and the continued power of holiness within the Church give them material which those outside do not possess and which makes it unnecessary that they should always be loading down their discourses with Scriptural texts and a show of erudition?

In his dealing with "other converts he found many depressing elements; a lack of sympathy, a tendency to commercialism." In other words, he found that the net is still gathering in "good and bad," that the "wheat and tares" are still "growing together until the harvest," just as our Blessed Lord said they would, and he did not find Heaven let down upon earth. Finally, we are told "he began even to long for the united worship of the Anglican Church." This sentence surely explains a great deal, and shows that our "returned convert" is one of those persons who cannot be satisfied or pleased anywhere, for here he is pictured longing for something which everyone knows is non-existent. Where he expected to find this "united worship" for which he longed is not told us. Its whereabouts would be interesting, for no one else has discovered it. Certainly even among the "parties" and "partisanship" he claims to have found in the Catholic Church he did not find one extolling the Mass, teaching the Seven Sacraments and the Invocation of Saints, whilst another condemned all these things as "blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits" or as "fond things vainly invented." Yet that condition most certainly is found in the Anglican Church for whose "united worship" he became so sick at heart. Nothing can be done for one who has worked himself into that frame of mind and it is no wonder he went back or that we are told: "He does not hesitate to speak of the swift degeneration of the majority of English clergy who have changed their allegiance to Rome." He says it, but can he prove it? A few of the many men whose names spring to mind, Newman, Faber, Manning, Ward, Maturin, Benson do not show it. And among those still with us the present writer has met many whose lives certainly belie such a statement. Undoubtedly the Catholic Church, in her charity, has received some Anglican "black-sheep" and their "swift degeneration" may have been quite evident, made noticeable perhaps, though sheer contrast with others who did not exhibit it, but to say that a "majority" of Anglican converts thus go downward is simply a slander which scarcely deserves recognition.

Such methods show that the Protestant Episcopal Church is becoming profoundly stirred over the frequency with which its people are "going to Rome" and vague remarks, based as the editor of the Churchman confesses, on "guess work" such as that "some critics have asserted that the small thin current of converts toward the Roman communion is more than offset by something resembling mass movements of abandonment" will not serve to stem the tide. The present writer in his Anglican days was not at all "pro-Roman" and used to seek for justification for such statements, but the results of his most diligent and interested investigations always led him to find just the opposite. At present he can recall among his personal acquaintance twenty former Protestant Episcopal clergy who are now devoted and loyal Roman Catholics, and but two who, having been received into the Catholic Church, have afterward reverted. Not all come to "the great disillusionment" apparently. And the trouble is that the "disillusionment" is neither so "great" nor so widespread that it is noticeable and so when they find a case of it, editors are obliged to herald it abroad and on their own dicta build up "mass movements" supported not by facts but by veiled reference and innuendo. The truth is that Catholic-minded Anglicans in increasing numbers are finding in the true Faith, not cessation from all troubles or a place where they need no longer think or work to gain their souls' salvation, but a place where, when they have done their share, they are not in doubt as to the position they have occupied but can rest assured that their labor has not been in vain.

"Your Red Cross"

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J.

IN the Red Cross Magazine for May there is a well-written article giving the history of the development of relief work in war. Very properly it traces Red Cross work back to the Geneva Convention of 1863. Very improperly it gives the reader the impression that the care of the wounded in battle was first taken up by the Red Cross. "No one has ever told the frightful story of the wounded and sick in the wars of history. The plain facts are that the tale is horrible beyond all imagination. For there was no one that could or ever did care for them. The utmost ever done was impromptu charity on the spot." Now the writer of the article, entitled "Your Red Cross," whose name does not appear, must have known that Florence Nightingale and Mary Stanley were actively engaged in the care of the wounded in the Crimea, and the Crimea had passed into history when the Geneva Conference took place in October, 1863. No one can gainsay the fact that the Red Cross has brought relief work up to a high standard of efficiency, and no American would minimize the good it has wrought during the present war. However, while lauding the noble women of the present who have donned the nurse's uniform, it is unjust to forget or ignore the women of the past who without the aid of an up-to-date organization did their share for the sick and suffering as only women can. Florence Nightingale and Mary Stanley were not merely engaged in doing "impromptu charity on the spot." They were both aided by Catholic Sisters of Mercy and this before the Geneva Conference was heard of. While Florence Nightingale's name is a common possession of those who are interested in war relief work, it is surprising that Mary Stanley's work in the Crimea is not more generally known.

To appreciate the work of Mary Stanley it must be remembered that the British Government did some very fatal blundering in the Crimean War. In December, 1854, the leader of the Opposition bitterly arraigned the party in power, saying:

> You have chosen a winter campaign, and what have been your preparations for it? In November you gave orders to build huts. You have not sent out that clothing which is adapted to the climate. You have commenced a winter campaign in a country where most of all it should be avoided. You have commenced such a campaign, a great blunder, without providing for it, the next great blunder. The huts will arrive in January and the furs will probably meet the sun in May. These are your preparations!

Soon the press of the day was filled with accounts of the neglected state of British hospitals in the East. When Inkermann and Alma were set down glorious but red in the chronicles of battle, there was neither linen nor lint for gaping wounds. Ten doctors were at the hospital at Scutari and orderlies were the only nurses. England's allies had called upon the nursing Sisterhoods, and the cry was raised, "Are there no such nurses in England? Can our women do nothing for us in this fearful emergency?" The upshot of it was that some sixty nurses were found in London, but only eleven of reputable character could be chosen. Besides the nurses of those days there were lady volunteers. In most cases these ladies came from distinguished English families, while the professional nurses were far from being what the profession demands to-day, both as to skill and character. In less than six months over sixty per cent of the so-called nurses that accompanied Florence Nightingale were sent back to England, chiefly for misconduct. She was so afraid to employ the second band that came to her assistance that they were an entire month in the East in idleness. She dared not trust them in the wards alone! It was at this point that Mary Stanley inaugurated the policy of appointing the nurses as assistants to the lady volunteers and the Sisters of Mercy. Indeed, all through the history of nursing in the Crimea, Mary Stanley was more successful in meeting situations than was Florence Nightingale. The plain fact is that when facing a difficulty of more than ordinary moment, both relied on the skill and cooperation of the Sisters of Mercy. A writer in the North British Review of February 2, 1862, puts the case thus:

> It has been remarked that while in the Crimea our hired nurses disgraced themselves by incompetency and disobedience and many of our volunteer ladies were obliged to return home ill or worn out, the Sisters of Mercy held on with unflagging spirit and energy, never surprised, never put out, ready in resource, meeting all difficulties with a cheerful spirit, a superiority owing to their previous training and experience.

Shortly after relief work began in the Crimea, Mary Stanley was given charge of the General Hospital at Constantinople. Cleanliness was the first objective of her campaign. Her task was no light one. The Eastern hospitals were alive with vermin. The blankets were brown with fleas which the soldiers dubbed "light infantry." Under Mary Stanley the Sisters began a cleaning-up process. The situation that met Mary Stanley and the Sisters can be seen from a letter of one of the latter written to the London convent at the time:

> It seems as if we go to bed to become the food not of worms but of fleas, flies, bugs, ants, mosquitoes, while we are entertained by the music of rats, dogs and donkeys, and the roaring of cannon. . . . We have just received hundreds of poor creatures worn out with sufferings, frightful beyond imagination, endured at the Crimea, where the cold is so intense that a soldier described to me the Russians and the Allies in a sudden skirmish, and neither side able to draw a trigger. . . . Imagine then what they have been through, in the trenches, lying in water and snow, eating raw beef and biscuit, never seeing a bed, not getting a drink for days.

In addition to the troops, refugees fell to the care of Mary Stanley and the Sisters. Lord Napier tells in his reminiscences a story that speaks for the readiness of the black-garbed nurses to handle a sudden emergency:

> During the Crimean War I held a diplomatic position under Lord Stratford de Redcliffe the British Ambassador in Constantinople. One morning he said to me: "Go down to the port. You will find a ship there loaded with Jewish exiles, Russian subjects from the Crimea. It is your duty to disembark them. The Turks will give you a house in which they may be placed. I turn them over entirely to you. . . ." I went down to the shore and received about two hundred persons, the most miserable objects that could be witnessed, most of them old men, women and children, sunk in the lowest depths of indigence and despair. . . . I placed them in the cold ruinous lodgings allotted to them by the Ottoman authorities. . . . I went back to the Ambassador and said: "Your Excellency, these people are cold and I have no fuel or blankets; they are hungry and I have no food; they are very dirty and I have no soap; what am I to do with these people?" "Do," said the Ambassador, "get a couple of Sisters of Mercy; they will put all to rights in a moment." I went to the Mother Superior and asked for two Sisters. She ordered two to follow me. They were ladies of refinement and intellect. I was a stranger and a Protestant and I invoked their assistance for the benefit of Jews. Yet these women made up their bundles and followed me through the rain without a look, a whisper, a sign of hesitation. From that moment my fugitives were saved. . . . No one saw the labors of those Sisters for months but myself. . . .

The Koulali hospitals had only been in nominal charge of Florence Nightingale. Mary Stanley took over their real care together with Miss Hutton, another very efficient relief worker. Both ladies left the entire charge of the nursing to the Mother Superior of the Sisters of Mercy. "Koulali," wrote Miss Taylor, one of the lady volunteers, "under the administration of the Sisters, became the pride of the ladies and nurses who worked in it, the admiration of all who visited it, and the model hospital of the East."

After the fall of Sebastopol, Sir John Hall asked the Sisters to take charge of the General Hospital at Balaklava. Florence Nightingale had informed him that her nurses would be withdrawn shortly. The only reason their superior consented to the withdrawal of the Sisters to Balaklava was the fact that greater needs were calling for their ministry there than at Koulali. So on October 8, 1855, the Sisters left Koulali and within two days they came in sight of Balaklava, in the teeth of a terrible gale that kept them tossing about in the Black Sea some days longer. The Superior, who was impatient to be beside the sick soldiers, attempted to land in the angry swell, and the attempt nearly cost her her life. At the first sign of a calm the entire party landed safely, and on October 12 Sir John Hall met them and immediately named the Superior as Superintendent of the Balaklava General Hospital. A motley throng of patients crowded the place and overflowed into fourteen huts scattered around the vicinity. The sick troops had received some attention, but the civilians attached to the army as mule drivers and in other capacities were regarded as intruders and had suffered from neglect. While attending to the troops, the Sisters did not forget these men of many nations, civilian adventurers, rendered useless by sickness for military duty.

An outbreak of cholera kept the Sisters busy night and day, and one of their number, Sister M. Winifred Sprey of Liverpool, fell a victim to the scourge. She was sick only a day, and died calmly and sweetly, as the chaplain, Father Woolet, finished the prayers for the departing soul. The funeral took place the next day, the Sisters in procession with lighted tapers, three priests and several doctors attending the burial, while four soldiers among the many she had ministered to asked the favor of carrying the body to the last resting place. The faithful band just returned from the cemetery when a request came for two of their number to attend a new cholera case.

> It is strangely touching, wrote one of the doctors, to think of their turning from the terrible scene of cholera patients in their agony, to the sight of one who lay so calmly there, arranged for her burial, holding the parchment on which were written the vows she had made to devote herself to God and her suffering fellow-creatures. She had finished her work; theirs lay before them.

Indeed, so violent was the epidemic that for a time its suppression appeared out of the question. "We never leave the patients night or day," wrote one of those now forgotten nurses. The medical authorities at the time were experimenting with chloroform as a remedy, so constant watching was imperative.

Peace was hastened by the death of Nicholas I., the Russian Emperor, not, however, before another victim was claimed. This time typhus took Sister M. Elizabeth Butler away from her apostolate amid the sick and wounded. Two white crosses mark the graves on the brow of a rugged hill, cloistered by an iron railing set in cut stone. The Black Sea moans beneath them. The Sisters of Mercy did not remain long at Balaklava after the proclamation of peace. Mary Stanley returned to England and became a Catholic. Her conversion created a stir at the time, for she was the daughter of the Bishop of Norwich and sister to the more celebrated Dean of Westminster Abbey. Her after-life she devoted to charity. Among her benevolent works was the establishment of a home, a lodging house for women, a laundry at Westminster, a penny savings bank and a society for the help of the sick poor. At her own risk she became a contractor for Government clothing, thereby supplying work to soldiers' widows and other poor women. During the Lancashire cotton famine she rendered noble service. Her friend Lady Herbert enshrined her memory by erecting the Mary Stanley Bed in the hospital for incurables at Great Ormond Street, London. It was very fitting to choose this hospital for the Mary Stanley memorial, as it was partially founded as a thank-offering for the work of the Sisters of Mercy in the East, and its first Superior and the group of nurses on the first staff had served the sick and wounded in Turkey and Russia during the Crimean War.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six-hundred words.

"What Ireland Wants"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Towards the conclusion of a symposium by thoughtful persons on Ireland a critic of mine made inquiry as to the Home Rule bill and instanced some of its impotencies. I have since possessed myself of that bill and to be quite fair beg to quote first of all the powers which are excepted from the Irish people: "(1) The Crown. (2) Peace and war. (3) The Army and Navy. (4) Treaties with foreign powers. (5) Dignities or titles of honor. (6) Treason, treason-felony, alienage, naturalization, and domicile. (7) Trade outside Ireland (with important exceptions), bounties on the export of goods, quarantine, and navigation outside Ireland. (8) Postal services outside Ireland. (9) Lighthouses, buoys, and beacons. (10) Coinage, legal tender, and weights and measures. (11) Trade marks, copyright, or patent rights."

With these compare the powers which this much reviled Home Rule bill confers upon the Irish people: "(1) Education, primary, intermediate, and university. (2) The business of the Land Commission, including the fixing of rents, but excluding land purchase. (3) The business of the Congested Districts Board. (4) The business of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction. (5) The business of the Local Government Board, and the whole business of local government, including poor relief, lunacy, and lunatic asylums. (6) Trade and navigation within Ireland. (7) The business of the Board of Works. (8) The creation, stimulating, and fostering of Irish industries (including fisheries) by exports on production, subsidies, preferential railway freights, and a score of other indirect means. (9) The criminal law, except as regards treason. (10) Licensing. (11) Posts, telegraphs, and telephones, within Ireland. (12) The Irish civil service. (13) The Dublin metropolitan police. (14) Reformatory and industrial schools. (15) Prisons. (16) The business of the Registrar of Petty Sessions. (17) The business of the Public Record Office. (18) Banks and banking. (19) The judiciary from top to bottom. (20) The factory laws. (21) Trade boards. (22) Railways, tramways, and canals. (23) Company legislation. (24) The business of the Board of Charitable Donations and Bequests. (25) Hospitals and charities. (26) The business of the Registrar-General and of the Registry of Deeds."

Yet this prospect is bitterly criticised by both Unionists and Sinn Feiners, and I am afraid for the same reason, that they fear they would be unlikely to enjoy a fair share of patronage, a fear I believe to be groundless.

As far as the financial prospect of the bill goes, Dr. Kelly, Bishop of Ross, one of the hierarchical representatives at the Convention writes:

> In finance Ireland is treated with much generosity. Under the former bills she should pay out of her own taxes for all her own services, and contribute towards the maintenance of the Army and Navy, and other Imperial services from £2,500,000 to £3,500,000 a year. Under the new bill Ireland will have the expenditure for her own benefit of every penny of taxation raised in Ireland for many years to come. Even the increase of the taxes created by the Lloyd George budget will now be spent in Ireland and for Ireland. Moreover, for some years to come Great Britain will contribute a sum of £2,000,000 a year to make up the deficit between Irish expenditure and Irish revenue. (He might have added that a sum of money will also be paid yearly to provide Ireland with a surplus.) Mr. Gladstone retained to the Imperial Parliament the imposition of all duties of customs and excise, but the new bill, while it does not confer on Ireland full power in this respect, goes much further in all respects, and in practice gives unlimited control over beer and spirits.

Dr. Ross' economic knowledge of Ireland is greater than that of any single individual in America. There is no doubt Ireland will reap something from the present Convention even superior to this best of the three Home Rule bills, all three of which have at different times been rapturously applauded by the majority of the Irish at home and abroad, but that is no reason for contemning and attacking what after all, if it had been put into action in 1913, would undoubtedly have been accepted as a settlement in this generation at least. Half a loaf is always better than no bread and if now we are going to get a whole loaf, let us not abuse Mr. Redmond who spent his life making the present prospect possible.

St. Johnsbury, Vt. SHANE LESLIE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An answer to my good friend Mr. Woodlock, who asks "What Ireland Wants?" may be had from two very potent and very popular sources. The answer comes directly and with unquestionable authority and force from the Sinn Fein party, which will take nothing less than absolute freedom for Ireland. Its members will defend that claim with their lives, and they, politically and numerically, represent the real Ireland of to-day. Another answer comes from the Irish and their descendants in America, who, basing their demands upon their knowledge of events in Ireland, coupled with the pledges and war promises of Mr. Wilson, have found a league representing millions of American citizens who call themselves "The American Friends of Irish Freedom." This league has sent tons of literature signed by them and their friends, requesting that the United States demand of England the same liberty for Ireland that England professes to demand of Germany for Belgium. The great difficulty, however, lies in the fact that our press, seemingly subsidized by Lord Northcliffe and other Englishmen, has not done justice to Ireland's claim.

New York. JOHN N. DOOLEY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Of course Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock knows that no one can tell him with absolute certainty whether his belief that Ireland should—or is it must?—remain within the Empire with colonial Home Rule, or the hope of the Sinn Fein for a free and independent Ireland, represents Irish opinion today. That can only be determined by a vote of the Irish people in Ireland, and the Empire will take care that there shall be no such vote. But if the opinion of a majority of Americans of Irish birth or descent, with respect to Ireland's political future, be a reflex of the opinion of the majority in Ireland on the same questions, then assuredly we may tell him, with confidence that we are right, that the people of Ireland want a free and independent Ireland. For if there be one American of Irish birth or descent who wishes, or is content, to have Ireland remain a British dependency, there are ten thousand who do not. Besides, is there a living man who believes that England will give to Ireland the same form of government in all respects that Canada has?

Every man of Irish birth or descent, and a great many others, will admit that it is Ireland's right, or at least should be her right, to say whether she shall become a nation once again or remain within the British Empire. But few Englishmen or English sympathizers will. Men who look with wet eyes and aching hearts upon stricken Belgium and cry that we must sacrifice every man, if necessary, to restore freedom to Belgium, look with dry eyes and steeled hearts upon prostrate Ireland, and laugh when it is suggested that she, too, should be free. Will some one tell why that is? Will some one give one reason for the restoration of Belgium's independence that cannot be advanced with ten thousand times greater force in behalf of Ireland's independence? Both were conquered by might against the will of the people; one over 700 years ago, the other three years ago. Neither conqueror had a moral right to conquer. Does the passing of time make that which was morally wrong right? If it does, what reason can be advanced against the contention that in this progressive age three years subjugation is sufficient to justify the perpetual subjugation of Belgium? If freedom be denied to Ireland on the ground that the safety of the Empire requires that she should remain a part of the Empire, can any reason be given why the same rule should not apply as between Belgium and Germany?

The Irish question is said to be a perplexing one. It is nothing of the kind. The difficulty is with her rulers. Let the people of Ireland be free to decide whether they wish to become independent or remain a part of the British Empire; let the same rule with respect to a majority of a people having the right to decide the policies of a country be applied to the question of Irish independence, and the question will be speedily, permanently and satisfactorily settled. Why should not the majority rule apply to the Irish question?

New York. JOSEPH FORRESTER.

"Literature and Twaddle"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. Walsh, in the last two paragraphs of his article entitled "Literature and Twaddle," in the issue of AMERICA for July 21, raises the old question, What is Literature? In the last paragraph but one he quotes Conrad, indirectly I presume, since the passage is not marked off by inverted commas. I shall be obliged for reference, so to speak, to chapter and verse.

In the last paragraph he gives us a test consisting of three questions by which we may decide if the book we have been reading is literature, and concludes by saying: "In that case you have been reading twaddle and not literature."

I should like to know if Dr. Walsh means "novel" when he writes "book," and also what he means by "in that case," which in the context is evidently more than ambiguous.

Lastly, it would be of interest to me, and possibly also to some of the other readers of your paper, to read Dr. Walsh's proof that the answer to his third question would have any weight in the world, in determining whether what one has been reading is, or is not, literature.

Providence. FRANCIS R. BURKE.

Mr. Atteridge on Air-raids

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Like all Englishmen, in discussing the morals of other peoples Mr. A. Hilliard Atteridge is quick to see the mote in his brother's eye. In your issue of July 21 he uses one page and a half of your good white print-paper to rehash the stock argument that a German airman's frenzied delight is in killing English civilians, preferably women and school children.

Mr. Atteridge says, among other things: "It is for the honor of the British Air Corps that . . . they always take the risk of flying low for the purpose of confining the attack to its military object and avoiding as far as possible damage to the civil population." This solicitude on the part of H. M. Air Corps is doubtlessly the result of the English theory that it is more humane to cause the civil population of Germany to die a lingering death from starvation; due to a blockade which President Wilson called "illegal and indefensible," than to blow them into eternity painlessly, but expeditiously, by the indiscriminate use of air-bombs!

Just think of the excellent use to which that page and a half of your good white print paper might have been put! Mr. Atteridge might have written an article entitled "Why Worry About Cruelties in Ireland? The Irish do not; they are accustomed to it." Or he might have composed a charming little ditty with a caption something like this: "Vodka or the Roaming Romanoffs"; and if perhaps the "ugly novelty" of the aerial bombardment—"with the heartrending cries and sufferings of the little martyrs" (Anglo-newspaper "stuff")—had awakened his soul to its very depths, he might have given us the joy of reading a dissertation on "The Fight for Democracy, Series 1: Greece." But, alas! It was not to be. Maybe, in the distant future, Mr. Atteridge may amuse AMERICA's readers by a witty article on "Miss Cavell and Padraic Pearse: An Anglo-Saxon Appreciation." But, unfortunately, for the present we must be content with the immorality of Germany's Air Corps, spread over a page and a half of your good white print-paper.

Philadelphia, Pa. J. ALLYN POWELL.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Are not those in authority in Catholic colleges and schools doing all within their power and scope to encourage Catholic marriages and to discourage mixed marriages? They have long been waging a vigorous war along these lines. But what have Catholic parents been doing? Allowing Catholic young men and women to choose their own companions, places of amusement, etc. One noble teacher was heard to sigh and say: "We have the young folk with us only a few short hours. If we are not backed up by parents how worthless are all our efforts!" Why should Catholic parents wish to shift their responsibility to Catholic educators? The latter can but teach the principles, and it is for the parents to see they are put into practice. It is sad to realize how many parents are afraid to assert their authority. Because the young person has been to college and the parents have not, may give him better knowledge of books, but certainly not of life learned in the greater school of time and experience. Arouse Catholic parents to courage and endeavor!

Laredo, Texas. A. H. K.

Mr. Wells' Invisible God

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the course of an excellent article on Mr. H. G. Wells' recent work, "God the Invisible King," in AMERICA for June 23, Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock touches upon some of the absurdities, illogicalities, and whimsies in which the book abounds. He does not hesitate to pronounce against its dogmatism and its frequent shockingly bad taste, yet he finds it impossible not to be tolerant and even sympathetic toward the spirit of the book. "It is this spirit that is a portent of the times and it may be welcomed as perhaps the beginning of a movement toward the truth." With this last statement of Mr. Woodlock I should like to take issue.

As Mr. Wells himself points out, and his reviewer places due emphasis upon the fact, the important thing is not what the author of the work in question thinks about God, nor what changes have taken place in his personal views concerning religion. The important thing is whether the generation of whose spirit Mr. Wells informs us that he is the scribe, agrees with him in this new theology. He tells us that he has not found this new faith growing up in himself alone.

> He has found it or something very difficult to distinguish from it growing independently in the minds of people he has met, English, Americans, Bengalis, Russians, French, people brought up in "a Catholic atmosphere," Positivists, Baptists, Sikhs, Mohammedans. The new teaching is also traceable in many professedly Christian books and it is to be heard from Christian pulpits.

From other passages in the book it is evident that the prophet of the new religion has become convinced from his reading and his dealings with men of various creeds that there is to be a general breaking up of religious beliefs. The standards of Christ, of Mohammed, of Buddha and other spiritual leaders are being rapidly deserted. Mankind, practically as a unit, is making ready to enlist under the banner of the Wellsian God.

This of course is a bit chimerical. Even though all others should fail, there is one Church which can never fail, for she is builded upon the rock. However, we readily grant that Mr. Wells' prediction is being verified in part. For, aside from his authority, there is ample reason for believing that the disintegration which has been taking place in non-Catholic religious bodies will eventually culminate in a world-wide cult of Anti-christ. Looked at in this wise, "God the Invisible King" may truly be hailed as a "portent of the times." But it should hardly "be welcomed as the beginning of a movement toward the truth."

Protestant Christianity with all its errors and defects lies immeasurably nearer the truth. One may safely say the same of Islamism and others of the Eastern religions. It may even be questioned whether Mr. Wells' present position is much of an improvement over what Mr. Woodlock refers to as "the hopeless negation of drab Victorian days." The agnosticism, learned in the school of Huxley and Spencer, has not been abandoned. On the contrary it has been incorporated as a fundamental tenet of the new creed. Mr. Wells has simply added a few more errors to the old ones. Hence his new departure is not a turning back toward the truth, but a going farther on in the way of perdition. Let me quote his own words:

> At present if anyone who has left the Christian communion declares himself a believer in God, priest and parson swell with self-complacency. There is no reason why they should do so. That many of us have gone from them and found God is no concern of theirs. It is not that we who went out into the wilderness which we thought to be a desert, away from their creeds and dogmas, have turned back and are returning. It is that we have gone on further and are beyond that desolation. Never more shall we return to those who gather under the cross. By faith we disbelieved and denied. By faith we said of that stuffed scarecrow of Divinity, that incoherent accumulation of antique theological notions, the Nicene Deity, "This is certainly no God" and by faith we have found God. . . .

This language needs no comment.

Oxnard, Calif. JOSEPH R. STACK, S.J.

The Bible and the State Library

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A few days ago, while I was in the reading room of the New York State Library in the Education Building, reading "The Confessions of Saint Augustine" (Harvard Classics), I became somewhat perplexed in regard to the real meaning of a Biblical quotation employed therein. To clarify the situation I called for a copy of the Douay version of the Bible. After considerable delay on the part of the page, who was searching for the book downstairs, the startling intelligence came back, "We haven't a copy."

I think a state of affairs like this is a shame and a disgrace, an inexcusable laxity on the part of the library officials. To think that among the 375,000 volumes in the main library of the great Empire State there is not one copy of the Catholic Bible! Had I been looking for a King James version I would have been handsomely accommodated. A glance at the catalog under classification "Bible" reveals the following: "Modern Readers' Bible," Moulton; "Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary," Rev. William C. Piercy; "Holy Bible," American Standard Edition, published by Thomas Nelson & Sons; "The Bibles of England," Andrew Edgar, D.D.; "The Holy Bible," King James version; "Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament," Dr. Briggs and Dr. Salmond; "A Harmony of the Gospels," Wm. A. Stevens and Ernest D. Burton; "Hastings Dictionary of the Bible"; and "Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures."

Judging by numerous signs I conjecture that the library officials thought the Catholic Bible could be replaced by Y. M. C. A. pamphlets, Year Books of the Christian Endeavor, almanacs of the "Ladies' Aid," and above all by tiresome statistics of the Protestant missions and their progress in Korea, Abyssinia and elsewhere.

Not only do we find the Holy Bible missing from this great educational center, but also acknowledged and accepted textbooks of Catholic thought in different branches. In ethics we fail to find the works of Fathers Rickaby, Cronin, Humphrey and Hull. In rational philosophy, the works of Aveling, Dr. Coffey, Hettinger, Father Rickaby and Dr. Driscoll. In education, the treatises of Brother Azarias, "Jesuit Education" by Father Swickerath, and Dr. Pace's work. In sociology and economics, the works of Father Burke, Mgr. Parkinson, Goldstein-Avery, Bishop Stang and Father McLaughlin.

In conclusion, I think that if the State of New York is rich enough to purchase Crowley's "Romanism, A Menace to the Nation," and pay the subscription for "Tom Watson's Magazine," then certainly from the thousands of dollars of Catholic taxpayers it ought to secure a Catholic Bible and give it as prominent a place as is accorded to decidedly anti-Catholic journals.

Albany, N. Y. EDWIN A. DUGAN.

Remedies for Errors in Latin

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Every priest knows that the final syllable in the words omnia and sæcula is short and unaccented, and also that the first syllable in sæcula and sæculorum is long. Yet how few pronounce them so! By accentuating om, sæ and sæ, and making no pause after a in omnia and sæcula, the true quantities of these three words is easily secured in the phrase per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Michaeli and Michaelem are, of course, words of four syllables, having the first e long. By accenting the first syllable, as well as the third, the true pronunciation becomes easy enough. The elision of the e in Kyrie is an ancient error, for we find Kyri simply in some of the old MS. Horæ books. Then the consecutive e and i in eleison do not form a dipthong, but contrary to etymological custom the e is long and the i short. By accenting the first and alternate syllables all goes well in Kyrie eleison. By accenting the first and every alternate syllable in the sentence Introibo ad altare Dei it is easier to give the true than the false quantity to the ta in altare. Yet how often one hears that syllable short!

Cardiff, Wales. H. PARLIN.

Classification of Prisoners

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The finger-print and Bertillon systems prove that there are no two people alike in outward form and appearance. We fail to find two with the same disposition and habits. This shows the wonderful work of the Creator. Yet notwithstanding this indisputable truth, there are optimistic people in the world who think they can improve upon the work of the Almighty and pick congenial associates. Why not entrust to them the making of marriages, the selection of husbands and wives, if they can demonstrate that they have been wiser and more successful than others in the ordering of their own lives? The vague terms used by sentimental prison reformers, such as "morons," "defective delinquents," "feeble-minded," "strong criminalistic tendencies," "borderline cases," are only examples of studied ambiguity which serve to conceal their ignorance of the primary causes of hidden conditions.

Boston. JOSEPH MATTHEW SULLIVAN.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.

President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00

Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

The Mother of the King

THE bodily assumption of Our Lady into heaven after her death is not yet a defined dogma of Catholic Faith, but in the opinion of such eminent theologians as Melchior Cano, Suarez and Benedict XIV, it is so solidly grounded on Catholic tradition that it would be rashness to deny it. The heart of the Faithful has certainly not led them astray. During the centuries which have elapsed since the day of Our Lady's death, they have ever believed that if the virginal body which conceived and gave birth to the God-man was submitted like His to the sway of death, like His too it never felt the corruption of the grave. By His own power He rose from the dead. By His power and through His love He united the pure soul of His Mother to her sinless body and, crowning in its beauty and majesty, the double prerogative of motherhood and virginity bade His Angels bear it above the choirs of the blessed, the serried ranks of the angelic host, to the very throne of the Deity, where it is exalted above every other creature in dignity and power.

It was a day of triumph such as the courts of Heaven alone can witness when the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of Israel, its bloom unwithered and its beauty unstained, was transplanted from the earth, unworthy to preserve its fragrance, to the bowers of Paradise. "Who is this King of glory?" asked the warders of the heavenly gates on the morning of Our Lord's Ascension. "Who is He that cometh from Edom . . . walking in the greatness of His strength?" When the Queen of Angels and of men, the Mother of God was borne aloft above the clouds of opal and of gold that made her footstool, "Who is she that cometh forth as the morning rising, fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army set in array!" they exclaimed, dazzled at her beauty. It is the Virgin foretold by Isaias, who hath conceived and brought forth the Babe of Bethlehem and the Redeemer of the World, the Woman of the Apocalypse whom St. John saw clothed with the sun, the Woman who has crushed the Serpent's head, the Judith whose maiden hands slew the enemy of her people and who exclaims to the watchmen on the heavenly battlements, "Open the gates, for God is with us, who hath shown His power in Israel." It is the Esther who now "traverses the mansions of Heaven, passing through all the doors, into the court of the King." And a throne is set for the Mother of the King, and she sits on His right hand.

The Feast of the Assumption is the crowning jewel in our Mother's diadem. In this mystery, as an old liturgy says, we see virginity bearing a son, and a death that had no peer. The passing away of our Queen was no less wonderful than her child-bearing had been joyful. If she excites our wonder because as a Virgin she brought forth a Son, she is perhaps still more wonderful in the way she goes to her God. She knew no corruption, no stain in life, she knew not of the degradation and the dissolution of the tomb. A supreme miracle of God's power in her Immaculate Conception, in the priceless gift of the Divine Maternity, the masterpiece of grace in her sinless life, she conquers the laws of nature in her death. She had surpassed all men in love, in faith, in purity, she is lifted above all created natures by the undivided splendors of her reward.

On her glorious feast-day, some faint echoes of her triumph reach our ears, some dim ray of her unclouded glory fills our souls. And our hearts are glad, and our lips are full of praise. For she is also our Mother and our Queen. Through her it is easy to go to God, for it was through her that He chose to come to us. He, and He alone is our Redeemer, she is our Mediatrix with Him. Through her shall we find favor with Him who loved her so tenderly, and who in the joyous mystery of the Assumption set the seal to the countless favors with which He had so lavishly crowned her.

Recreation for Our Soldiers

IT was a veteran educator who said that three things were necessary to keep a college boy straight. The first was the Sacraments, the second, prayer, and the third, a healthy interest in athletics. What the college boy requires, is good for all young people. We have long since found out that a list, carefully compiled, but consisting exclusively of "dont's" is a poor way of keeping them up to the mark. The boy ought never to have an idle moment. He should travel along a straight line from school to home, and there employ himself in study and other useful occupations. But he won't. Elizabeth Anne likewise, should recur, almost automatically, to her sampler and other household duties at the close of the school day. But she won't either, even though she be the prefect, without blame and without reproach, of the junior sodality.

There is a good deal of the animal, the healthy growing animal in the young, that must be reckoned with. It is not bad. It is only natural. It cannot be suppressed, and the attempt at repression only leads to disaster. All work and no play, says the proverb, makes Jack a dull boy, and, when the burden of the work is lifted for a time, tends to make him a bad one. His play-energies must have some kind of an outlet. Too much repression forces them into unhealthful channels. It is only common sense to study these energies, to discover how they may be used to best advantage and made a positive help, rather than a hindrance or an indifferent factor, in the life of the young. No doubt, the "teaching of play" has been made ridiculous by extremists. In itself, however, it is only the recognition of a very valuable truth in psychology and morals.

We are now sending our "boys" by thousands into the training camps. In these grim schools of war, the regime will be sufficiently drastic; so drastic, in fact, as to lead to a revulsion in the times allowed for relaxation and amusement. Next to the direct spiritual ministry among our soldiers, it is hard to conceive a higher work than that now taken in hand by the Knights of Columbus, who propose to erect and supervise amusement-centers for the troops. Even the brief experience at the Mexican border was enough to prove the absolute need of ample facilities for recreation of a proper kind for the military posts. We are confronted, apparently, with the alternative, that if we do not put suitable relaxation within easy reach of our soldiers, many will be led away to practices which ultimately mean ruin of body and soul, and consequent uselessness as fighting units. Patriotism and religion alike call on every Catholic to cooperate with the Knights in this admirable work, to the extent of his ability.

The Wrong Way.

IF reports are true, Frank Little, the I. W. W. leader, was in many respects an undesirable citizen. Just keeping within the limits of a benign interpretation of the law, he did all that he could to make the prosecution of the war a failure. Last month he took a principal part in stirring up revolt in Arizona. A few weeks ago, he went to Montana, where he urged the miners to cripple the Government as far as they could, by striking. According him the sincerity of his convictions, it is still true that wherever he went a storm arose, a storm that swept away no undeniable abuse or palpable exercise of tyranny, but only engendered class hatred and rancor. So undesirable did he become, that early on the morning of August 1, certain men, hiding their cowardly faces under masks, called him to the door of his house, bound him, and forthwith hanged him from a neighboring telegraph pole. The man who had counseled violence as a fit and proper means of righting wrongs, ended his life as a victim of violence.

No doubt there will be many to applaud the action of these murderers. They undertook to rid the community of what many good citizens must have considered an intolerable nuisance, and at this perilous time a source of danger not to be left unchecked. But it is wrong, all wrong. Law and order want no such aids. Violence only begets violence. In stress, too many of us not only lose our heads, which is pardonable, but our sense of ethical values as well. Two wrongs never make a right, and never can. To do evil that good may come of it, and all be well, is not only bad morality, but a philosophy bound in the end to make even the attainment of the good aimed at impossible. And the scandal is greater when officials, by adopting evil practices, put themselves on a level with the forces which today are lifting up unholy hands against the authority that comes from God. It is not long since that in New York, petty tyrants in the uniform of the army disgraced the cause of liberty for which the country is at war. Happily, a recurrence was made impossible by the prompt action of the authorities at Washington. But it will be long before the incident is forgotten.

Rationalism and Patriotism

PROFESSOR THOMAS C. HALL has been dismissed from Union Theological Seminary. For years he has been teaching rationalism at that institution. He was not dismissed for that. Indeed, Union is considered broad enough to tolerate a rationalistic teacher. Its theology suffers of course, but Union seems to have strange ideas about that very strange science called Protestant theology. Professor Hall was forced to resign from Union, after the United States Government found him implicated in a plot that aimed at the destruction of the Government which protected him and his pupils in Union Seminary. His was a very poor return for government protection. Still he was an up-to-date rationalist, whose Christianity was Christless, but modern and a bit fashionable.

Just about a year ago another product of Union, Bouck White, enlivened a Socialist meeting by burning the "Stars and Stripes." No one is so foolish as to say that the erratic preacher learned flag-burning at Union. He learned rationalism there surely, and the consistent rationalist is a law unto himself. What does the man who is a law unto himself care for the flag?

Only a few weeks ago at Paterson, N. J., the police authorities interrupted a speech that was being delivered by Norman M. Thomas of New York, who was denouncing conscription. This young man a few years ago was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery, although at the time of his examination his answers were unsatisfactory from "an evangelical standpoint." The examination had nothing to do with loyalty to country, but a good deal to do with loyalty to Christ.

Old-fashioned Protestantism would have been shocked at the disloyalty to Christ contained in the answers of this bright seminarian of a modern Protestant seminary. But old-fashioned Protestantism is as rare as a horse car in New York, or a crowded pew in summer at Grace or Trinity.

Rationalism had convinced this young preacher that he was a law unto himself. He would preach a Christ of his own making. But a Christ of his own making never said all authority comes from on high and that loyalty to the law of the land is a conscientious duty. The Christ of the Gospels said that. So when conscription became law, this very splendid product of rationalism proceeded to decry it, for he was his own law. He was brilliantly logical but the police did not follow his logic, so they put a period to his speech. He disagreed with the police, as Alexander Berkman did. In fact, Alexander Berkman held the rationalist's principle that he was a law unto himself. Of course he did not call it rationalism but anarchy. The strange thing is that the root principle of both is the same. Bring God down to the human level till finally there is no God, and you have rationalism in the schools, and anarchy in the State. It is a simple process but it spells the end of patriotism. For true patriotism means loyalty to God and to the nation's law as to the voice of God, sounding in human tones.

The Hot Weather

HOT weather is by general consent a bore, a burden, a trouble. Now while no man can add a cubit to his stature by taking thought, any son of Adam can indefinitely thicken, widen, deepen and elongate his troubles by the simple process of thinking about them. Tiny they may be, no bigger than the smallest of all seeds, but if put under the hothouse glass of persistent reflection, they will quickly grow into a great tree, in the branches whereof all manner of annoyances from all parts of the universe will find an undisturbed refuge. Acquainted with this psychological truth, Mrs. Wiggs was wont to hide all her worries in the bottom of her heart, and "set on the lid and smile." Then they could not grow.

Yes, it is hot now, but think of the crisp October that impends, of the delightful blizzards that may rage about our heads next January, of the bracing chill that comes from the Atlantic with the winds of March and April! It is sure to snow, if we wait long enough. There was once a man, newly-imported from the interior, who used to worry whenever the tide went out. Unmindful of the governing moon, he seemed to entertain some doubt about the certainty of its return. But it always came back. If the weather were invariably hot or unalterably cold, incessantly dry or wet without end, we might have some reason to complain. Happily it is set in a cycle, and the turn is always at hand. "'Tis war-rum," says Dooley's Clancy, "but ye can't look f'r snow-storms this time iv' th' year. Annyway," he says, "me mind's taken aff th' heat be me wurruk. Dorsey that had th' big cindher-pile—th' wan near th' fince—was sun-struck Fridah, an' I've been promoted to his job. 'Tis a most re-sponsible place," he says.

Perhaps it is a strain in August to imagine what it feels like in the seasons when sere leaves fill the paths, or snowdrifts sparkle in the moon. If so, try to think how much better off you are, even with the mercury menacing the century mark, than thousands who like Tim Clancy, "wurruk out in th' mills, tin hours a day, runnin' a wheelbarrow loaded with cindhers."

Work and Drudgery

IN an address at a meeting of mechanical engineers, a Western manufacturer pictured in colors somewhat dark, the growing disposition of the day to look upon all work as "mere drudgery." This disposition, said the man of business, often leads to ill-considered strikes, occasional sabotage, and other industrial diseases which by lowering the output seriously interfere with "efficiency." "Industry," he concludes, "must find a substitute for the valuable relationship of master and man, which passed away with the coming of greater industrial concentration."

Honest work usually becomes dull drudgery because the laborer is not interested either in what he is doing, or why he is doing it. Why he is not interested is another question. In some cases, the lack is undoubtedly traceable to a mistaken vocation. Many a briefless lawyer or struggling physician realizes too late that the simpler duties of the farm or the counting-house would be more in keeping with his mental equipment. More than one young man now engaged in occupations almost menial, bitterly regrets the youthful folly that spoiled his preparation for a place of wider usefulness and profit in life. Others, perhaps, today find honest work "mere drudgery," because they have been caught by the false philosophy that life's main purpose is to seek amusement.

Lost opportunities, mistaken vocations and a bad philosophy will account for some ranks of the army of discontented workers, but not for all. The man who toils hard and faithfully for a pittance that barely suffices to keep body and soul together, may easily be pardoned for considering his occupation "drudgery." Of course, he ought to urge his interest to the flaming-point, by remembering that a half loaf is better than no bread, and that the laborer's cap is a badge of honor. But a badge of honor, along with all time-honored apothegms, grades low in calories, and to live for any considerable period on half a loaf means only half a life.

Probably the best way at the manufacturer's disposal of taking the drudgery out of work, is to consider the feasibility of paying the worker a living wage. It is just possible that the thing might be made to pay, in the form of an increased "efficiency." Rest-rooms, gymnasiums, mutual benefit societies and other devices usually viewed out of all perspective, it is to be feared, by the "socially minded," are excellent as far as they go, but they do not go far enough. They stop short of justice. It was on justice that the old "valuable relationship of master and men" was founded, and it can be revived only when "the greater industrial concentration" of today realizes that justice comes first, and frills second. The worker who sells a dollar's worth of labor for fifty cents in silver and twenty-five cents in some unwanted gymnasium privilege, simply because an habitually manipulated market makes better terms impossible, has a fair excuse for regarding his honest, poet-praised work as very prosaic drudgery. It was no less an authority than Leo XIII who authorized terms far stronger, by saying that in this case the worker is the victim of fraud and injustice.

Literature

LONGFELLOW AND SOME MODERN CONSIDERATIONS

LONGFELLOW is an ancient bard. His verse has become a twilight of memory to this generation, if not an utter darkness. We have had a literary revolution and are still wandering amid the ruins. Even a lame prose, calling itself free verse, is making a claim to Parnassus. This, of course, is the fantastic excess of the movement, the frenzy of the disease. The delirium will pass, but it must not be taken, as some are prone to take it, for a transitional phase of development. It is a decadence, a lapse towards barbarism, the tom-tomism of a dissipated culture settled into a pernicious anemia.

But much of even contemporary normal verse shows a vast swing away from Longfellow's age. It runs to a psychological subjectivism, a self-analysis harping on plaintive chords, expressive of purely personal moods. This is not necessarily poetic heresy, though it does not bespeak poetic health; for poets throughout all ages have struck, to some extent, the subjective note and sung their own moods. But the trend of contemporary verse is to confine itself within the limits of self-analysis, forgetful that there is a vast universe beyond the four walls of introspection. Subjective singing is only of poetic value when it can translate its mood into a universal mood; when its note harmonizes with the chiming of the spheres. When a poet sings his own love, he must, at the same time, sing the love of all other men; when he weeps, all other men must weep with him. But when a poet weeps introspectively, by a process of self-analysis, he weeps alone.

As a concomitant, or rather a result, of this modern tendency to introspective limitation in poetry arises the notion that verse-forms are of little value; the individual mood is idiosyncratic, therefore the form of expression is either peculiar or indifferent, as the poet may elect. The excess of this conception runs to so-called free verse. Within the compass of conventional forms, it uses any form indifferently for any mood. It is as if any instrument should be forced to produce any tone-color in music. The fact is, verse-measures have their normal expression, and the true poet, whose mood is always attuned to objective values, never forces his theme to an alien form. Grief cannot trip to a pizzicato measure, nor joy pace gravely to an adagio movement. A poet may write a sonnet to his mistress' eyebrow, but his tour de force is an artifice, whose accomplishment evokes a tolerant smile rather than wins a sincere applause. The murmur of bees is not a roll of thunder; when the poet murmurs, let him not reverberate his mood through tonitruating brasses; when he thunders, let him not crepitate Jove's bolt in the silken throat of a violet.

The anarchy of free verse is but an extreme symptom of the wide departure in verse-making since Longfellow's time. But the spirit of modern conventional verse also marks the difference, if not as emphatically, at least as surely. To go back to Longfellow is not only to return to another age, but to another clime. He began writing nearly a hundred years ago; the educational influences and culture of his younger days were as simple and sober as ours are complex and garish. He came of a Puritan stock after Puritanism had happily escaped the gelidity of its ice-age. The felicitous circumstances of his young manhood enabled him to pursue the bent of his genius to the full. Several years' sojourn in Europe, where he came into direct contact with and assimilated, with ever-increasing sympathy and ardor, the romance-literature of the old world, expanded and fertilized his imagination and rounded out his culture. No man in American literature so sympathetically wrought into his own genius the spirit of old-world romance. There is nothing typically American in his work, even in the poems which are American in theme. "Evangeline" and "Hiawatha" are not exceptions. Their subject and their coloring may be locally American, but their spirit and their imaginative texture are from the looms of the old world. Longfellow was steeped in the influence of romance-literature and his native genius responded to it as the cord to the bow. Why poetry in this country should be typically American to be worth the while is a puzzle to plague the wise. If it be typically American, and worth the while, good; but worth the while because typically American does not follow. It is like that other dreadful challenge: What new message has the poet to give the gaping public, or is he really original?

It is true that Longfellow would find small audience today. But the poetic judgment of the hour has no permanent measure; it has no objective criterion. His work has been called elementary, which is true, but not damaging; it is a criticism founded more than often in a psychic neurosis; the same objection might be brought against Homer. Poetry must be judged for what it is, and not for what it does not pretend to be. Longfellow's poetry is simple and lucid. He did not deal with problems, but with life. It is a poetry of grace and sentiment, in pellucid and flowing numbers, a placid stream wending its way through wooded upland and flowering meadow, not too deep to plumb, nor yet shallow enough to brawl.

He was not a poet of sublime reach; his head was not constantly striking the stars. He could not plunge into the abyss on outstretched vans, like Milton's Satan, through chaos and ancient night. He had no epic depth and breadth, no passionate intensity like a Keats or a Shelley, no splendor of phrase like Tennyson; he had not the fiery appeal of Whittier, the humor or the satire of Lowell, the grave and solemn dignity of Bryant. But he had grace, sympathy, simplicity, sincerity, nobility and a power of imaginative treatment, which secure him a notable place on the heights of Parnassus.

His genius was mainly reflective and placid, but at times he could shake himself free from his meditative mood and strike his pinions in a stirring and rapid beat, as in "His Skeleton in Armor":

> And as to catch the gale
> Round veered the flapping sail.
> "Death" was the helmsman's hail,
> "Death without quarter."
> Mid-ships with iron keel
> Struck we her ribs of steel;
> Down her black hulk did reel
> Through the black water.

In his narrative poems he excels, and none tell a tale in verse better than Longfellow. "Evangeline," a striking tour de force in English hexameter and "Hiawatha" in rhymeless trochaic dimeter, are notable examples. But it is in the "Tales of a Wayside Inn" that his genius manifests itself most characteristically. The level of flight is even and sustained. He is here the true minstrel whose harp is well-attuned to his theme. The tales are of a varied character, four of them colonial, some gleaned from the "Decameron," others from the "Gesta Romanorum," some from "The Chronicles of Charlemagne." Never did poet select a happier medium for his peculiar muse, and, of all his work, none better reveals the true quality of his poetic gift.

In the sonnet's scanty plot of ground, which is always a searching test of poetic quality, he achieves a deservedly high place. The group of six accompanying his translation of Dante's "Divine Comedy" are wrought with a noble beauty of diction and have caught something of the Dantean dignity and fire. The translation itself is a notable achievement, but like all translations, but dimly reflects the splendor of the original. For that matter any translation of a great poem fails in the spontaneity and the vital grace of the original. Beauty, sifted through the medium of an alien tongue, becomes a pale and ineffectual fire. It is like sunlight through an obscuring veil of clouds.

In his day Longfellow was the most popular poet in his tongue. The reason is not far to seek; his simplicity, his lucidity, the elemental character of his work, its tenderness and appeal to the domestic affections made him easy reading for the average man. Among the English middle-classes he disputed the palm of popularity with Tennyson. Not even in America was his vogue, in his own day, as great perhaps as in England.

In this generation his work, if offered for the first time, would find scant appreciation. We have become a crowd of sophisticated, erratic and erotic psychologists fluttering aimlessly in the intense inane. Simplicity and objectivity are rare qualities in contemporary poetry, and Longfellow's muse, if she were to enter upon the scene today, would be as out of place and as unheeded as modesty in a Broadway cabaret.

CONDÉ B. PALLEN.

REVIEWS

The Mythology of All Races. In Thirteen Volumes. LOUIS HERBERT GRAY, A.M., Ph.D., Editor. GEORGE FOOT MOORE, A.M., D.D., LL.D., Consulting Editor. Greek and Roman. By WILLIAM SHERWOOD FOX, A.M., Ph.D., Assistant Professor of Classics, Princeton University. Vol. I. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $6.00 a volume.

A comprehensive collection by competent and judicious scholars of all the myths of the various races and ages of man has long been eagerly looked for by the student of ethnology, art, literature and religion. The editors of the "Mythology of All Races" have felt the want and in the present work have endeavored to fill the gap. The series is therefore needed and timely. Its theme in itself is most interesting. Few subjects can have a greater appeal for the man who wishes to know the history of the thoughts and feelings of the races of long ago, of their notions of the Deity and of the forces and the manifestations of nature around them. Many of the tales and stories of ancient mythology are extremely beautiful and embody the noblest lessons, while some are coarse and repulsive. But underneath them all the student, if he reads their meaning aright, will find some faint glimmer of truth, the dim spark in most cases, of that early revelation made to man by the Creator, often distorted it may be, but easily recognizable, if studied without prejudice or passion.

In the preface of the work, the consulting editor, Mr. George Foot Moore, claims that the collection is made for its own sake, with no theory to maintain or illustrate. Here an objective study of the facts of mythology will be welcome. Few subjects lend themselves more readily to idle speculation and unsound hypotheses than the topic which forms the subject of the present volumes. Exception might be made from the Catholic point of view to the definition of religion given in the editor's preface, for the "scientific explanation" which according to him is the third element in the definition of religion seems to exclude that vital element of faith without which in the Catholic system it is impossible to worship or please God. There is also apparent the assumption of the gradual evolution of man from lower stages to a more perfect condition. Catholic readers will therefore weigh carefully the principles and the underlying theories of the writers of these volumes.

The first volume is admirably done. The Greek and Roman myths are outlined and analyzed by Professor William Sherwood Fox, of Princeton. In an "Introduction" he tells us what a myth is, explains its origin, its sanction and persistence, enumerates its kinds, tells us the character of the Greek myth, and is thus led to discuss the nature of the Greek religion in general. The Greek myths are then studied in all their wondrous variety from the story of Ouranos down to those where the element of chance is more visible, such as those of the Moirai, Tyche and Nemesis. It is a wonderful and fascinating story, and the editor throws no little light, thanks to his scholarship and power of interpretation, on those old legends of the "Voyage of the Argo" and the "Labors of Hercules," so familiar to our childhood. He shows the same thorough scholarship in the discussion of the myths of ancient Italy. If the editors keep unwarranted theories out of their finely conceived work, they will make a distinct contribution to modern scholarship. They are evidently thoroughly at home with their difficult theme. But their task is a hard one and many pitfalls are lying in their way. Care, taste and due reverence for their readers mark their choice of the many illustrations which enhance the value of the work.

J. C. R.

The Living Present. By GERTRUDE ATHERTON. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.50.

"Without the help of the women, France could not have remained in the field six months," is an assertion that Mrs. Atherton proves true in this volume. The first and more valuable part of the book is made up of sixteen papers which describe the relief-work the ladies of France are doing so successfully, and the second part of the volume is devoted to the author's reflections on "Feminism in Peace and War," which are of little value. She gives vivid pen-pictures of the fashionable ladies of her acquaintance who are in charge of the various organizations that care for the wounded, the poverty-stricken and the bereaved, and she tells how the war changed many a social butterfly into a heroine. Mrs. Atherton has lived so long and so intimately with the French that she can give the following just estimate of the national character:

Contrary to the prevailing estimate of the French—an estimate formed mainly from sensational novels and plays, or during brief visits to the shops and boulevards of Paris—the French are a stolid, stoical, practical race, abnormally acute, without illusions, and whose famous ebullience is all in the top stratum. There is even a certain melancholy at the root of their temperament, for, gay and pleasure loving as they are on the surface, they are a very ancient and a very wise people. Impatient and impulsive, they are capable of a patience and tenacity, a deep deliberation and caution, which, combined with an unparalleled mental alertness, brilliancy without recklessness, bravery without bravado, spiritual exaltation without sentimentality (which is merely preverted animalism), a curious sensitiveness of mind and body due to overbreeding, and a white flame of patriotism as steady and dazzling as an arc-light, has given them a glorious history, and makes them, by universal consent, preeminent among the warring nations today.

But the author does not seem to realize the great influence France's long centuries of Catholicism have had in forming the noble women of "The Living Present." Indeed, it is surprising how little she knows about the Church. For example, she volunteers the information that the Visitation nuns of Bourg "had taken the vow never to look upon the face of a man," but when their convent became a hospital the Pope kindly "granted the holy nuns a temporary dispensation from their vows." Why did Mr. Stokes's official reader allow the author to publish such an absurdity as that? W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The ninth revised edition of William E. Addis and Thomas Arnold's well-known "Catholic Dictionary, containing some account of the Doctrine, Discipline, Rites, Ceremonies, Councils, and Religious Orders of the Catholic Church" (Herder, $6.50), has recently appeared. The late Rev. T. B. Scannell, D.D., was the editor of the new edition of this valuable book, and he cites the three Catholic encyclopedias that have been published within the last few years, and gives references to other standard works of recent date. The "Catholic Dictionary's" 876 large double-columned pages are so full of accurate information that it is a reference book of great value. With this and the "Catholic Encyclopedia" at hand, no one need be ignorant of the Church's doctrine, history and practice.

Giusuè Borsi, a young lieutenant in the Italian army, was slain at Zagora, November 10, 1915, while gallantly leading an attack. Prior to resuming the practice of Catholicism in 1913, he had used his remarkable gifts to attack religion and morality, but after his "conversion" Borsi committed to paper the spiritual "Colloquies" he had with God in prayer, and some of them are translated and printed in the current Catholic Mind, under the title, "A Catholic Soldier's Diary." He reveals his soul just as it is and shows how God purified and enlightened it. The second paper in the number is Father Edward Hawks's account of how he made his parish school a social center for his flock, by starting catechism classes for public school children, providing entertainment and instruction for working boys and girls, and offering courses in domestic economy for wives and mothers. Most readers will doubtless agree that Father Hawks should have many imitators.

The late Donald Hankey's "A Student in Arms," an interesting war book favorably noticed in our issue of March 17, 1917, was so widely read that a "Second Series" (Dutton, $1.50) of fifteen papers quite varied in character has been published, but as often happens in like cases, the volume's quality is not equal to that of its predecessor. The best essays in the book are "The Bad Side of Military Service," "The Good Side of Militarism," "The Fear of Death in War," and a "Letter to an Army Chaplain." What the author says about immorality in the British army should cause those in authority, it would seem, considerable concern. The autobiographical parts of the book are quite interesting, but the "Imaginary Conversations" fall rather flat.

The six best sellers for June have already been noticed in AMERICA. They are: "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," "The Light in the Clearing," "The Definite Object," "His Family," "The Hundredth Chance," and "The Road to Understanding." ——It is a pity that Mr. William J. Locke, in his latest novel, "The Red Planet" (Lane, $1.50), which will also be a best-seller, no doubt, has essayed to work out a philosophical theory. His subject, the same as that treated by Mgr. Benson in the "Coward," is the demoralizing effect wrought on otherwise noble characters by sudden paroxysms of paralyzing fear. By such seizures Mr. Locke's hero is betrayed into depths of shame. The author tries to reconcile widely discordant elements in the main person in his story, and in spite of his degradation to win for him a large measure of sympathy. The story is not a pleasant one, the optimism of the old soldier who tells the tale is somewhat misplaced, the gloom of the war pervades every page, and although there are several delightful minor characters, the shadow of Leonard Bryce's failings is over them all. The book is clever, and well-written, but the author should have done with baffling psychological analysis and go back to the subjects in which he is more at home. One "Beloved Vagabond" is worth a dozen Leonard Bryces. What the public wants from the pen of Mr. Locke is his sympathetic delineation of simple, unobtrusive kindliness, all the better for its admixture of whimsicality.——"Fairhope, the Annals of a Country Church" (Macmillan, $1.25), by Edgar Dewitt Jones, is a delightful record of a Protestant community in northern Kentucky. The literary value of these memoirs, their mellowness and delicacy, compensates for lack of interest in the subject-matter. The characters are as real as they are accurately described, while the incidents are introduced with the grace of an experienced story-teller.

The "first series" of "Sermon Notes" (Longmans, $1.25), by the late Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson is made up of the discourses he preached while an Anglican. They are divided into nine groups which correspond more or less with the divisions of the Church's year. Often the notes are so full that the Bensonian touch is quite visible. The sermons are moral rather than doctrinal and so orthodox on the whole that Father Martindale, who edits the volume, seldom has to supply corrective footnotes. Preachers will of course be interested in the volume, and as the editor suggests, Mgr. Benson's admirers can use it profitably as a meditation book. The "second series" will contain his Catholic sermon notes.

SOCIOLOGY

Jane Ashton's Teeth

THIS is really a collection of hot-weather thoughts on why it is necessary for civilized communities to have laws. In another form, the underlying ideas were once expressed at a New York State Conference of Charities and Corrections; as a result, the New York Call remarked, with a deal of unnecessary ferocity, that the expresser was "a perfect type of the solid bone-head." But to return to Jane Ashton's teeth.

Jane, relates the Kansas City Star, loathes the attentions of the dentist. Despite her family, she will wait until driven by toothache before having her teeth cared for, and in the interim her complaints of the pain she suffers are loud and long. Some days ago her mother was urging her not to wait for the catastrophe, but to go before her teeth gave her trouble. "But, mother," Jane protested, "they are my own teeth, aren't they? If I want to let them ache, isn't that my privilege?"

"No, they are not your own teeth," replied mother. "They are the family's teeth, and the family suffers from them when you let them get to aching."

"That principle," comments the Star wisely, "applies to most of our interests. They aren't ours alone. They are the family's, the town's, the nation's. We can't paddle our individual boat. We are on a raft with a lot of others, and what we do concerns them as well as us." No man lives to himself, as the Grammar teaches.

PROPENSITY TO EVIL

THAT is to say, we live in a community, a society exercising lawful authority, competent to forbid us to sink the raft, or to let our teeth ache to the annoyance of others. Man is not an isolated atom, but a social being. No man is sufficient to himself either for his temporal needs or for the higher necessities of his mind and soul. In the union of a common bond, forged by common needs and common aspirations, he finds himself best able to work toward self-preservation and the attainment of happiness. He must therefore, by the constraint of nature, be a citizen of some State, perfect or inchoate; and the natural reason why he must obey is because "the humanity that is in him" makes his proper development impossible, unless he takes his place as a subject of that helpful union of allied interests, deriving its authority from God, which we call the State.

It would be easy to sketch an ideal State wherein every human factor would labor not only at his own happiness and perfection, but for the happiness and perfection of his neighbor and of the community. History, however, teaches that this ideal State has never existed; experience, that it does not exist today. There was never a society, even were it a partnership or a family, utterly free from clashing interests; and, morally speaking, the State in which no citizen will ever be inclined to enforce his own claims, without regard to the claims of others, seems impossible. "If there is anything absolutely certain," writes the English philosopher, Lilly, "it is that there is innate in every human being a propensity which renders him prone to evil and averse to good."

Why Law is Needed

WHAT can the State do to lessen this propensity? The means at its disposal are many and varied. It can encourage religion and education, with their elevating and purifying influences. It can appeal to the individual's realization of the necessity of organized society, and of his obligation to do his part in maintaining society as an efficient instrument of the public good. It can remind him, in season and out, that vice is hideous and virtue desirable, while thrift, peace, and honesty are profitable to the individual, and, at least indirectly, to every member of the community. But what if all these means, patiently and perseveringly applied, fail? What if, in a given case, they have failed? Is the criminal propensity of the law-breaker to be allowed precedence over the virtuous principles of the major part of the community?

Against this unchecked propensity, deaf to reason, law launches its sanction. "Men," wrote Plato, "must necessarily frame laws if they are not to sink to the level of the most savage beast." ("Laws," IX.) And he adduces the reason:

> If ever by some Divine dispensation there were born a man with a nature capable of these attainments [perfect political wisdom and self-control] he would stand in need of no laws to rule him . . . but, as things are, such a mind is nowhere found, except some faint traces; therefore, as a second-best course, we must take to law and order.

Aristotle adds the "coercive sanction":

> But these [motives drawn from reason] seem to have no power to dispose the bulk of mankind to goodness. . . . The bulk of mankind pursue the pleasures they like, and the means thereunto, and shun the contrary pains. . . . The man who lives by passion will not listen to the voice of reason, nor can he understand it. And when this is a man's state, how can any arguments effect a change in him? It would seem, indeed, as if passion were deaf to argument, and yielded to force only. . . . Therefore, law, although it is the reasoned conclusion of abstract wisdom and intelligence, has a coercive sanction. ("Nichomachean Ethics," x, 9.)

Centuries later, St. Thomas discussed the same truth in these words:

> Because of wanton and saucy spirits prone to vice, who cannot easily be moved by words, it was found necessary to provide means of restraining them from evil by force and fear; that so, at least, they might desist from evil-doing, allow others to live in quiet, and themselves at length be brought by habituation of this sort to do willingly what formerly they accomplished out of fear, and thus might become virtuous. ("Summa," I-II, Q. xcv., art. II.)

These passages give in outline the commonly accepted view of the sanction of law.

Crime and Responsibility

BRIEFLY, it is this: Man violates an authoritative prescription, thereby causing a breach in the moral order. Society imposes a penalty. It intends, thereby, to repair the breach, or, as some put it, to vindicate the outraged majesty of the law by dissolving the vinculum juris, the fetter forged upon the law by crime. Its next intention is to deter the criminal and others from repeating the offense. In the third place, it proposes to reform the offender by this discipline, or, as St. Thomas says, to bring him to do willingly what once he did through fear. Ultimately, the whole process works for the good of the individual and of the community.

Today our ideas on the sanction of law are undergoing an unsatisfactory change. Crime, we are told, is a disease, like typhoid or measles; it involves, therefore, neither actual guilt nor personal responsibility. Everybody is at fault except the alleged criminal. He, poor man, is an invalid demanding the most delicate consideration; he is lured, hypnotized, brainstormed; or his grandfather, moldering in some forgotten churchyard, was a notorious character. No one denies the actuality of borderline cases, or the influence, as yet unmeasured, of heredity, and especially of environment. The teaching that certain malign conditions, external or personal to the individual, may lessen or destroy responsibility is no discovery of a new jurisprudence, but a principle as old as historical man. But crime is caused by the free act of the individual; else the act is not crime, but accident, or the result of mental aberration. It seems, therefore, high time to call a halt upon our newer theories, and, as a first measure of prevention and reform, to insist on personal responsibility and respect for legitimate authority. We are not going to do away with evil by building gymnasiums or cooking schools, and then sitting down to rest. The ability to chin one's self six times or to make drip coffee does not take away the temptation to crime. If we are to make progress towards ideals of right living, we need discipline, mental discipline, and, above all else, that moral discipline which will teach our boys and girls to "love the brotherhood, fear God and honor the King."

Liberty and Obedience

WE need not plead for fear of punishment as the ultimate motive of prevention or reform, but we cannot safely blind ourselves to the fact that this fear has its place and value in the life of the community. As a modern investigator, Dr. William Healy writes in his study, "The Individual Delinquent."

> With full appreciation of the offender's personal background, and with attempt at all needed therapy, there may well go hand in hand the deliberate idea of building up inhibitory powers by maintaining the concept of possible future penalty. Even in cases of short periodic relaxation of will-power, there is no reason why the idea of retribution should not be invoked to aid in moral reformation, though the conduct has a definite physical basis which demands consideration.

Obedience to the law is a lesson that must be learned. Without subjection there can be no freedom; without law no liberty. It is a lesson that must be instilled in the home, in the school, by the churches, by all mediums of public communications, and by our courts. If this lesson can be taught by building up the character on lines of gentleness and love, let us work along this more excellent way. But if these means fail with Izzy the gunman and Tony the thug, let us not hesitate to adopt what Plato called "the second-best course," the unflinching sword of the law.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

EDUCATION

A Little Knowledge

THE question is sometimes asked: "Why are there so few Catholic educators in secular institutions of learning?" The answer is not difficult. Proportionately, the total number of Catholic students in various institutions of learning, including colleges, universities, normal schools and seminaries, is rather higher than that of any other denomination. But the teaching force of the Catholic schools needs constant recruiting; a fair percentage of men enter the seminaries to study for the priesthood, while the others engage in other professions, especially law and medicine.

Graduation in the law school takes place a year in advance of the regular graduations, and the conditions among law students are much like those of the general undergraduate body. There remain the students preparing for the other degrees, especially in medicine, and in the sciences and the humanities.

The "Dabbling" Physician

AS regards physicians, they are dabblers in the sciences. Their profession requires that they "dabble" in botany, chemistry, physics, zoology, pharmacy, physiology, anatomy, in the languages, perhaps in law, and in a host of related studies. The training of the present-day medical student may be likened to the passage of a man down an aisle in a store, who sees on both sides of him well-filled baskets of fruits and produce, from each of which he has time to select only a sample. "Sampling" is the word that best describes the training of the medical student. Yet in collecting the samples, the medical student generally is impressed only with the number of samples obtained, and forgets entirely the size of the baskets from which they were taken. A dear old physician used to say to me: "Physicians are the most conceited men in the world. I am one. Because they have touched so many sciences they have an exaggerated idea of their knowledge, their influence and their responsibilities, and regard the sciences and professions with a patronizing air." Be that as it may, there can be no doubt that the medical student is excessively conscious of his learning and extraordinarily imbued with his own importance. Self-conceit and the frank materialism that pervades the atmosphere of most medical schools, induce him to slight his religious obligations, and defection from the Faith seems to be the usual outcome.

Of medical students, one of every seven, an average derived from several schools, is a Catholic; yet I doubt if one of seven Catholics will remain true to his religion. Of physicians known to me personally, one of every six is a baptized Catholic, yet perhaps only one of ten such Catholics still adheres to the Faith in which he was baptized.

Graduate Students and Faculty

APART from medicine, the defection among postgraduate students is considerable. In one group of twelve graduate students, three were Catholics, three Methodists, one an atheist, another a Jew and four were of miscellaneous faiths. Of these, one Catholic, two Methodists and three of miscellaneous creeds practised their faith. One of the lapsed Catholics, had no religious training in childhood, the other had, he said, a too rigid training, and hence a reaction set in when he left home for high school. Parenthetically, I note that both married non-Catholics. The Methodist stated he had left his denomination because of the disagreement of his church with science. The defections will probably increase after a few years. This was in a science group, but defection is no less marked in the humanities, I believe.

Finally, the faculty. To educators, no modern movement is of such intense interest as the movement toward unification of creeds. It means the virtual abrogation of the doctrine of "private judgment," while the practical Christianity, so strongly insisted upon by this same movement, is in effect a repudiation of the doctrine of "justification by faith." Thus the old differences are wiped out, and a position is assumed which accords in many respects with the stand of the Catholic Church. Educators recognize this swinging toward the Church; they are aware also of her unchanged, dignified stand. This recognition is best illustrated when controversial topics are under discussion. "I wonder what the Catholics say to this?" is the question asked. They do not seem to concern themselves with the opinions of other denominations; subconsciously, they all accord the Catholic Church the position of precedence, and hence of authority.

Scientists and Religion

THE present attitude of scientists leans toward conciliation. "If I belonged to any church at all, it would be the Catholic Church," is a statement made to me so frequently by scientists during the past ten years that it compels attention. The reason, too, was given. "I admire the splendid organization of the church, and the education of her priests. The clergy is composed of educated men, backed by the authority of the church; they are not subservient to the whims of their parishioners. They are not merely high school 'grads,' with half a year at a seminary (I quote actual words), but university-trained men who know what they are talking about." Once more the old adage holds true, "Knowledge begets respect." One may also add, "tolerance."

These were well-known teachers, men of influence, of much experience, and considerable achievement. In contrast to their liberal view stands the intolerance of slight knowledge. A little knowledge is indeed a dangerous thing. It is a strange human trait that incites a man to fulminate against something of which he knows little, or nothing at all. Such is the case with many educated men who pretend to sneer at Christianity, yet some of the sneerers very patently have read not even a chapter of the Gospels they ridicule.

Like the rest of humanity, educators have their fads, in their teaching, in their research, and in their creed. Until a few years ago it was fashionable, especially in the sciences, to be a serious freethinker, and perhaps to own a "Freethinker's Catechism"—this last a paradox in itself. I venture to say that this external profession was largely a pose, and that secretly many of the "freethinkers" believed in a personal God and a hereafter. Yet many practised better than they preached. How else can one explain the anomaly of the professor who preached a destructive agnosticism in the classroom, and yet was a deacon in his church?

The Passing Materialism

THE pendulum has swung in the other direction: scientists are again seen in the churches. With splendid impartiality many attend a different church each time they go. But this swinging has a deeper significance than mere "faddism." It marks the revival of a Christian idealism and the incipient decline of an intolerant materialism. Even before the great war, condemnation of the criteria of materialism was heard with increased frequency. The warped perspective of a too rigid professionalism, the falseness of personal gain as a criterion of justice, and the material ideal of success were deprecated and denounced. The system whose first tenet is a denial of God, and whose second is selfishness, was stigmatized as impossible; it had had its opportunity, and the results were not pretty to contemplate. In introducing the element of sacrifice, educators have strayed far indeed from the materialisitc creed of selfishness. For the Christian ideal is sacrifice, embodied in the sacrifice of Jesus Christ for man, and in the sacrifice of the individual for his family, for his fellow-man and for his country. In this return to a Christian ideal lies the best promise for the future.

University of Missouri. Richard A. Muttkowski, Ph.D.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Red Cross and Florence Nightingale

THE founder of the Red Cross, Henry Dunant, speaking at a meeting of the National Association for the promotion of Social Science in London, in 1872, said:

> To Miss Florence Nightingale I give all the honor of this humane convention. It was her work in the Crimea that inspired me to go to Italy during the war of 1859. . . . In my turn I endeavored to follow the example of Miss Nightingale, as she herself had followed in the steps of Him who went about doing good.

It is well to recall Florence Nightingale's ideal in these days when much is spoken about the cause of suffering humanity. In suffering humanity Florence Nightingale saw the blood-red image of the Great Sufferer.

Saint Anne de Beaupré

THE feast of Saint Anne de Beaupré was celebrated this year at her national shrine with extraordinary splendor and devotion. According to the correspondent of the Soleil of Quebec, who wrote from Beaupré on July 26, the day of the feast a throng of 12,000 pilgrims came to the little village on the St. Lawrence not only from the Province of Quebec, but from every Province in Canada and from far-away districts in the United States. The spectacle at the Pontifical Mass at which his Eminence, Cardinal Bégin, of Quebec, assisted, was deeply impressive. Almost every year, some extraordinary favor marks the solemnity, and well-authenticated cures attest the power of the mother of Our Lady. This year, five such instances, as yet however not officially confirmed, have been reported. Among them the most striking perhaps is the cure of a Syrian girl. The Church is proverbially slow to pronounce officially upon these facts, but there can scarcely be any doubt that the little Canadian village has been the scene of well-certified and extraordinary cures, which science can explain in no ordinary and natural way and which can be ascribed only to the power of God who in working them does honor to the mother of Our Lady and rewards the faith of her clients! The spiritual favors and graces conferred through St. Anne on thousands who visit her shrine cannot be reckoned. No one leaves Beaupré without having his faith enkindled and his devotion and piety deeply stirred.

Birth-Rate and Birth-Control

RACE-suicide, whose propaganda has not ceased during the war, may be given pause by the set of figures published in the London Month for July, 1917. A comparison is instituted by the English magazine between France and England:

In 1700, France numbered about 20,000,000 inhabitants.
The British Isles numbered from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000.
In 1789, France numbered about 26,000,000.
The British Isles numbered about 12,000,000.
In 1814, France numbered about 29,500,000.
The British Isles numbered about 19,000,000.
In 1880, France numbered about 37,200,000.
The British Isles numbered about 34,800,000.
In 1913, France numbered about 39,500,000.
The British Isles numbered about 46,000,000.

In these last two periods the decay of Christian morality had its effect in both countries, but to a far greater extent in France, especially when we consider how the population of Ireland steadily decreased owing, not to race-suicide; but to the causes and consequences of the famine, from over 8,000,000 in 1841 to less than 4,500,000 in 1914. In 1881 France had about 10,000,000 more inhabitants than Italy but 144,000 less births. In 1910 France was only 3,000,000 ahead of Italy and yet fell short of the latter's number of births by 370,000. Many indications show that the main cause of this terrible decay is voluntary sterility. The number of marriages is increasing (282,000 in 1881; 308,000 in 1911; a greater percentage than in Germany). There is no trace of organic incapacity. Few unions prove entirely sterile, and one authority places the number of abortive births at 500,000 a year. Voluntary sterility is proved by the fact that the 282,000 marriages in 1881 produced 937,000 births, whilst the 308,000 marriages in 1911 produced only 740,000. In 100 French families 16 have no children; 50 have one or two; 23 have three or four; 8 have five or six, and only 3 over seven! The average family is 2.7 in France, 3.7 in England, 4.2 in Germany, 4.5 in Italy, 4.7 in Russia.

Four organizations have been formed in France, to counteract by every means fiscal, political, and moral, this curse of race-suicide that has been destroying the French nation more surely than any Prussian advance. It is worth noting that wherever the population, as in Brittany, is made up of practical Catholics their families are large. The Church's stand is clear. She recognizes the necessity of prudence on the part of parents and a sane regard for each other's health. Continence is the one restrictive measure.

Evangelizing South America

THE American Israelite contains a good paragraph about the propaganda against Latin Americans that is popular in some sections of our country:

> If love of truth did not count with us, which we are far from insinuating, ordinary Yankee business shrewdness ought to induce us to discourage the bigoted propaganda against Latin-Americans and the Catholic faith which they profess. For the rest, the shameful tactics to which some of the sects resort in their attempt to "evangelize" South America, are a sad commentary on the spirit of Christian charity, which is supposed to be the actuating motive. There are plenty of pagans in the world to be converted to Christianity, and efforts in the latter direction would be a more creditable performance than the attempt to alienate South Americans from their Catholic faith by having recourse to slander and misrepresentation.

Indeed, there are a number of pagans in the United States awaiting the zealous ministry of those who are so concerned about South Americans. The problem of empty pews in non-Catholic churches might be solved before an attempt is made to carry the torch of enlightenment to the people south of the Canal zone.

The War Fund's Progress

ENCOURAGING reports have been issued by the official organ of the Knights of Columbus, the Columbiad, concerning the progress of the million dollar drive undertaken by the Knights:

> The drive for the Knights of Columbus $1,000,000 War Fund is meeting with cordial cooperation from Catholics throughout the country, and all indications are that the fund will be readily acquired. In fact, so spontaneous has been the response to the appeal issued by the Supreme Officers of the Order that there is every reason to believe that the initial fund of $1,000,000 will be augmented far in excess of that amount.
>
> The K. of C. War Committee has already closed contracts for $100,000 worth of buildings for recreation centers and chaplains' quarters at the army cantonments, and negotiations are under way for the awarding of contracts for an additional $100,000 worth of buildings. The more the work advances the more do those in charge realize its huge dimensions. Already chaplains have been attached, at the Order's expense, to various camps, and more are being appointed.

How vitally necessary is moral protection for the morale of an army in camp or in the field is patent to all interested in the welfare of soldiers. Efficient chaplain service secures this protection, and the Knights' War Fund campaign was launched for this purpose. As the Supreme Knight has stated: "The time for talk has passed, the time for action has arrived. It is a call for 'All aboard' and every one must do his part."

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

AUGUST 18, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Newman and the Romance of Religion

Joseph F. Wickham

The Rockefeller Foundation

Bird S. Coler

Literary Specialization

John B. Kennedy

The Old and New Theology

J. D. Tibbits

First Centenary of the Brothers of Mary

John E. Garvin

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
August 18, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 19

PAGE

CHRONICLE 459–462

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Newman and the Romance of Literature—The Rockefeller Foundation—Literary Specialization—The Old and New Theology—First Centenary of the Brothers of Mary.....463–471

COMMUNICATIONS 471–473

EDITORIALS
Playing the Game—Divorce and Cooking—War and Tobacco—The Cat and the Bag — "Fortes Creantur Fortibus"—A Politician in Georgia 474–476

LITERATURE—Justus Van Den Vondel — Reviews — Books and Authors—Books Received 477–480

EDUCATION—"Does Education Pay?".....481–482

SOCIOLOGY—Socialism and the War.....482–483

NOTE AND COMMENT.....483–484

The Catholic Identification Booklet
25 CENTS . . . . PRICE POSTPAID . . . . 25 CENTS

A NECESSITY
for all Catholic men and women in the military or other dangerous walks of life

BUT
all Catholics should have one

BECAUSE it is a safeguard against remaining without spiritual help among strangers, the Catholic Identification Card telling them to call nearest Catholic priest.

DESCRIPTION—An unostentatious article, leatherette bound, containing crucifix, scapular medal, identification card, and leaflet with instructions for assisting the dying. In small pocket-sized card case form.

BE WARNED—Like all valuable religious articles, it has its unauthentic imitations. This booklet only has the Imprimatur of His Eminence John Cardinal Farley, and the endorsement of numerous other clergy. To be sure, look before buying for this Imprimatur on inside of front page of leaflet.

IF YOUR DEALER CANNOT SUPPLY YOU SEND TO
THE W. J. FEELEY COMPANY, 10 East 50th Street, New York City
Manufacturers and Distributors

The latest and best pamphlet on the subject

What Luther Taught

THE country is now flooded with literature commemorating the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's rebellion. So every Catholic ought to have at hand a brief and trustworthy guide. Fathers Husslein and Reville, of the AMERICA staff, have prepared from the very words of Luther himself just the pamphlet you need.

Price 15 cents. $10.00 a hundred

The America Press
59 East 83rd Street New York

The Catholic Mind

Issue for August 8, 1917
A Catholic Soldier's Diary
Parochial Schools as Social Centers

Issue for August 22, 1917
Popular Errors About Classical Studies
Every Catholic Child in a Catholic School!

You cannot afford to be without these useful little pamphlets.

FORTNIGHTLY (24 numbers)

Send us your Subscription at once.

$1.00 Per Year
Single numbers 5 cents each
For Parish Book Racks $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS 59 East 83rd St. New York, N. Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 19
WHOLE No. 435

AUGUST 18, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—There has been heavy fighting during the week on the western front. On August 6 the Canadians pressed close to Lens. Continuing their progressive movement from the north, they advanced along the Lens-Bethune road almost to the outskirts of the city. They then struck south and took the Cité du Moulin, which brought them within a thousand yards of the center of the town. They then moved eastward until their line was due south of Lens and but half a mile distant. The gains have been small but consistent. East of Ypres the British made substantial gains in the capture of the village of Westhoek and the positions stubbornly held by the enemy on the Westhoek ridge. Bulletins from both armies give the impression of a heavy engagement. The attack was made on a front of nearly two miles south of the Ypres-Roulers railway. There has been steady fighting along the French front on the Aisne and around Verdun in the Caurières Wood and between Avocourt Wood and Hill 304, neither side winning anything more than local advantages. Towards the end of the week the Germans in Champagne launched a heavy attack on a two-mile front on Mont Carnillet which netted them some gain. Berlin claims a large number of prisoners were taken.

Bulletin, Aug. 6, p.m.-Aug. 13, a.m.

Between the Dniester and the Pruth the Russian army seems to have regained something of its morale. The retreat has slowed down and the troops in several places are making a stand, in some cases counter-attacking and regaining some of the lost positions. South of the Pruth the retreat is still under way. This is the more vital part of the line because of its influence on Rumania. In Rumania the Germans struck a heavy blow at Fokshani, taking, according to their report, over 16,000 prisoners and 18 guns. The fighting in the north here has produced two effects. The first is that the offensive started by Rumania to help Russia has come to a halt, though marked at first by initial successes. The second is that the northern end of the Rumanian line is being bent back slowly towards the east, thus endangering the line which now runs along the Transylvania border. The Germans are closing in on the main railroad between Czernowitz and Bucharest. The loss of this line will be a serious blow to the Russo-Rumanian army. But the Russians are stiffening their defense, though pushed back to Ocna and retiring slowly on the Transylvania border.

The President won his long fight over the Food Administration bill on August 8 when the Senate by a vote of 66 to 7 adopted the conference report on the measure. Under the Food Administration bill as passed, after nearly two months of delay in the Senate, the President receives a grant of sweeping powers of food control, such as were never before conferred upon an American executive. The vote came after the bitterest struggle any war legislation has so far encountered, and at the end of a long debate in which the Democratic whip, Senator J. Hamilton Lewis, of Illinois, after declaring that the whole world was watching to see what the Senate was going to do, made an impassioned appeal to the members to put aside prejudice and support the Administration.

Food Control Bill Passed

On August 10 the bill was signed by Speaker Clark, of the House, and by Senator Saulsbury, Vice-President, pro tem, of the Senate and then sent to the President, who early in the afternoon signed it and then formally announced the appointment of Mr. Hoover as Food Administrator. Immediately after his appointment Mr. Hoover issued a statement in which he outlined the needs of the Allies, and the great part which he believed the consumers, as well as the producers, could play in alleviating suffering and distress. With proper co-operation and the exercise of the unusual powers granted by the Food bill, he felt sure that the situation could be met. His powers, he said, would be used to protect honest and patriotic men against those who were selfish enough to gamble on the sufferings of others. Mr. Hoover outlines the hopes of the Food Administration as follows:

> The hopes of the Food Administration are threefold. First, so to guide the trade in the fundamental food commodities as to eliminate vicious speculation, extortion and wasteful practices and to stabilize prices in the essential staples. Second, to guard our exports so that against the world's shortage we retain sufficient supplies for our own people, and to co-operate with the Allies to prevent inflation of prices. Third, that we stimulate in every manner within our power the saving of our food in order that we may increase exports to our Allies to a point which will enable them to provision properly their armies and to feed their peoples during the coming Winter.

The Food Administration is called into being to stabilize and not to disturb conditions and to defend honest enterprise against illegitimate competition. It has been devised to correct the abnormalities and abuses that have crept into trade by reason of the world disturbance and to restore business as far as may be to a reasonable basis.

In enforcing the measures of the act, Mr. Hoover says that it is not his intention to proceed with a host of "punitive measures" but rather by "co-ordination with the various trades to effect such constructive regulations as will render gambling, extortion and other wasteful practices impossible and will stabilize prices."

The Food Survey Bill

Immediately after the Food Administration bill had passed the Senate, Senator Gore moved to bring up the Food Survey bill passed by the Senate more than two months ago, but side-tracked for the Food Control measure. Senator Gore's motion to adopt the conference report on the bill was passed by a viva-voce vote. The Food Survey bill provides for an investigation by the President, through agencies to be designated by him, of the supply, consumption, cost, prices and distribution of all food products, fuels and agricultural implements, so as to devise means to secure a steady flow to the market. It authorizes the President in times of exigency, to purchase foods, fertilizers, and agricultural implements and sell them to producers, so as to stimulate production. This bill also needs the signatures of the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate before going to the President. It will work collaterally with the Food Administration bill.

Cabinet Changes

Like Germany, Great Britain has witnessed this week an important change in the Cabinet. Official announcement made some time ago stated that in Germany four Imperial Secretaries of State, including Foreign Secretary Zimmermann, five Ministers of the Prussian Cabinet, including Finance Minister Lentze and Minister of the Interior von Loebell, had resigned their portfolios and that Dr. Richard von Kühlmann, Ambassador to Turkey, had been appointed Secretary of Foreign Affairs in succession to Dr. Zimmermann. In England the change has not been so sweeping, but it is nevertheless highly significant. On August 11 it was officially announced that Arthur Henderson, Minister without portfolio and Labor member of the War Council, had resigned his post in the Cabinet. The resignation was accepted in a rather scathing letter from the Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, in which he practically accuses Mr. Henderson of bad faith and duplicity both with his Cabinet colleagues and with the Laborites.

Mr. Henderson has been under fire since he went to Paris recently to confer with French Socialists with regard to the International Socialist conference scheduled for Stockholm next month. He defended his action by stating that he met the French Socialists as a leader of the Labor party in England, not as a Cabinet Minister or as an official of the British Government. His presence in Paris at the Socialist meeting aroused considerable resentment, especially as he was accompanied by the Socialist pacifist, James Ramsay MacDonald, and the resentment was increased when Mr. Andrew Bonar Law, speaking for the Government, admitted that Mr. Henderson had gone to Paris without the knowledge of the Government. Mr. Henderson entered the British War Council as Minister without portfolio in December, 1916, when the Lloyd George Ministry succeeded to that of Mr. Asquith. Up to that time he had been Minister of Pensions.

The Irish Convention

Ireland.—On Wednesday, August 8, London received the official report of the Irish Convention. Sir Horace Plunkett, the chairman, addressed the gathering on the task before it and on various schemes for governing Ireland already in existence. He then suggested various means by which these methods of government might be examined. It was finally proposed by the chairman and unanimously resolved that a standing committee not exceeding twenty persons, five to form a quorum, be appointed to determine on general procedure details. On August 9 an official report gave the names of the standing committee, which the Convention ratified. The names include Viscount Midleton, Lord MacDonnell, Joseph Devlin, M. P., for Belfast West, Hugh T. Barrie, M. P., for Galway, the Mayors of Dublin, Belfast, Londonderry and Cork, and the Archbishops of Dublin and Cashel. A resolution was passed providing that the committee should have power to report to the Convention from time to time what further committees might be necessary, and to make proposals as to their composition. Invitations conveyed by the Mayors of Belfast and Cork that the Convention hold sittings in those cities were unanimously accepted. Adjournment was taken until August 21 to allow the secretary to prepare a different scheme of Irish government.

Persecution in Guadalajara

Mexico.—The persecution of Catholics in the State of Guadalajara continues with unabated fury. After the imprisonment of the priests, there was a great parade of protest, in which a large number of women and young men took part. The manifestants carried banners bearing different inscriptions. When the procession reached San Francisco Street, the police charged the men and women and seized the banners, at the same time threatening to shoot into the crowd. The parade finally reached the City Hall, and when some of the people attempted to speak, the soldiers on guard interrupted them continually. Confusion followed; some women and twenty-five men were arrested.

Next day the former were released; the students, however, were sentenced either to pay a fine of $200 or to remain in prison for fifteen days. They chose the latter and added to the chagrin of the Carranzistas by singing hymns in their cells. The priests have been released under bond, but the Cathedral and the Churches of El Santuario, Mexicaltzingo, El Carmen, La Purisima, San Francisco, San José and two or three others, have been closed by a special decree of Carranza, because the priests interfered in politics. This interference consisted in reading from the pulpit, the Archbishop's pastoral letter. A general order for the arrest of this prelate has been sent throughout the country. The people have been further incensed by this document which was affixed to the doors of all the churches in Guadalajara:

MUNICIPAL COUNCIL OF GUADALAJARA

The Governor of the State, under date of the 15 inst., has advised this Council as follows:

The Government of this State has decided, that since all churches are the property of the nation, to consent to reunions in which the people are incited in sermons to disregard the sovereign laws of the State and are thereby urged to rebellion, would be to render itself an accomplice in such criminal acts; that to leave these churches in the hands of such seditious persons would give rise to the same interpretation; that under such circumstances it is its duty to take over these churches and to withdraw them from those who thus abuse the trust placed in them for the sole purpose of performing religious duties.

For the aforesaid reasons, this same Government has asked and obtained of the President of the Republic of the United States of Mexico, the authorization to withdraw from religious worship and to close those churches, in which on the twenty-fourth of last month there was read from the pulpit a pastoral letter which by its nature tended to arouse the people to rebellion, inasmuch as it protested emphatically against the Constitution of the Republic lately passed and approved in Queretaro. These churches, according to the depositions made in the local Federal District are the following: the Cathedral, Mexicaltzingo, El Santuario, San José, Mezquitan Capilla de Jesús, San Francisco, and El Carmen. Wherefore, and in view of the authorization hereby given, you will please proceed to the closing of these churches; you will lock their doors, seal them and immediately hand over their keys to the State Bureau, and take every care and precaution needed.

Believe me, etc., etc.

Constitution and Reforms.

Guadalajara, July 15, 1917.

The Governor of the State, E. DEGOLLADO.

Such is liberty of speech and worship in Mexico.

Conditions in Yucatan

Yucatan still remains under the sway of Alvarado who is gradually crushing the unfortunate country under his iron heel. As is apparent from the subjoined letter sent to AMERICA by a prominent Mexican, the peninsula is far from happy or prosperous, and the outlook for the future is very gloomy.

The brave General Alvarado, who has been carrying on the work of revolutionary reconstruction, as he understands it, for the last two years, recently arrived in Merida from Mexico City. He has been appointed by the illustrious Carranza, Commander-in-Chief of the campaign against the "rebels" around Chiapas, Tabasco and, it appears, Campeche. Although there are no railroads connecting Yucatan with Chiapas nor Tabasco, Alvarado is to have his headquarters in Merida where, no doubt, he can direct the military movements by the use of wireless and aeroplanes. At least, he will be safe from any accident that may happen in the campaign itself. About 2,000 troops reached Merida recently. They are to be the nucleus of an army of 25,000 soldiers, that will be placed under the absolute command of this extraordinary strategist, Alvarado. Undoubtedly, if he does not meet the success which his previous military achievements warrant, at least he will have a stronger hold on the love of the Yucatanians, through these 25,000 bonds of love between Yucatan and the rest of Mexico. Incidentally, Alvarado will be still better able to hold his old Chief in check, and will continue developing the resources of our State in his own peculiar way. We are not prepared to say how soon the erstwhile prosperity of Yucatan will come to nought through the anarchic propaganda that has been carried on unceasingly for the last two years; but ruin is coming, I fear. The farm hands have been taught that they have rights, rights and rights, but no duties, no obligations whatever. Unfit to appreciate the good things of life and being accustomed to be guided, now they find themselves "full-fledged citizens," and as such make use of their inalienable right not to work. That is as far as their revolutionary education goes. The result is a very serious menace for Yucatan. The hemp industry is suffering from the conditions made possible by the Carranza regime. The output of sisal is decreasing and it will continue to decrease, so long as the revolutionary propaganda goes on. Yucatan will suffer and the poor, humble Indians, the farm hands, will likewise suffer. Moreover, the American farmers may be confronted with a difficult situation, if in the course of time they cannot get twine for their harvests.

Well, as I said, the contingent of 2,000 soldiers for Alvarado arrived in Merida, instead of arriving at Tabasco or Chiapas to fight the rebels, and they were sent to the Cathedral. Now, it is well known that after the outrages committed in that sacred place, after all things of value were taken away and the tombs desecrated, it was turned into a large warehouse where all sorts of greasy stores were kept by the Government, until it pained the hearts of all people, even unbelievers, to contemplate the awful conditions in which these vandals of the twentieth century had left that beautiful place. Finally, a few weeks ago, the Cathedral was given back to the Roman Catholic Church to which it belonged. And now another outrage is committed, soldiers have their quarters there. It is stated that these soldiers, poor, ignorant Mexicans, when they came into the Cathedral, respectfully took off their hats.

When Alvarado came back from his short trip to Mexico, the few grafters in Yucatan that follow him, determined to tender him a big reception on his return. Abusing the power they can exercise over the peons, they had several thousand Indians from the farms come into the city of Merida to cheer for their leader, Alvarado. They knew perfectly well that neither the well-to-do people, nor the city working classes would come out to meet this petty dictator, so they took these poor, ignorant Indians and shipped them to town. Due to some delay or to some other circumstance, the Indians had to stay longer than was expected, and they were also sent to the Cathedral to stay over night, as if it were a hotel, and there they remained suffering from hunger and thirst until their "apostle" Alvarado arrived with his soldiers.

I have mentioned before the daily paper El Democrata. This political paper commenced to attack Alvarado just before he left for Mexico, and the attacks were more severe during his absence. The editors wrote a series of articles entitled "Las Seis Coronas del General" (The General's six Crowns), in which referring to paid articles published in the Vera Cruz press, it was stated that Alvarado had done great things for Yucatan, deeds that show him as a true democrat, a man of progress, who had worked wonders in Yucatan in the brief period of two years. Democrata refuted all those articles. The result was that upon his return from Mexico, Alvarado had the young men who appeared as owners of the paper, sent to jail and there threatened with all sorts of things, unless they told who was the author of the series of articles referred to.

The sick in the public hospital are suffering terribly from lack of medicines. It is stated publicly that such a simple product as iodine cannot be had in the hospital. Despite all this tyranny and incompetence we hear in dismay, that the United States which is fighting for democracy, is contemplating a loan to Carranza. Can it be possible?

Such is the general condition in Mexico: other revelations will be made next week.

Russia.—After the vote of confidence in him given by the five chief political parties in Russia, Premier Kerensky announced his new Cabinet on August 6.

Kerensky's New Cabinet

The Constitutionalist Democrats are represented by three Ministers and M. Tchernoff, who was accused of intriguing with the Germans, has resumed the office of Minister of Agriculture which he had resigned. Here is the personnel of the new Cabinet: Premier, Minister of War and Marine, Alexander F. Kerensky; Vice Premier and Minister of Finance, N. V. Nekrasoff; Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. I. Tereschenko; Minister of Interior, M. Arksentieff (Social Revolutionary, lately released from penitentiary); Minister of Public Instruction, M. Oldenburg (Constitutional Democrat and member of the Academy of Sciences); Minister of Labor, M. Skobeleff; Minister of Trade and Industry, M. Prokopovitch; Minister of Social Tutelage, M. Astroff (Mayor of Moscow, Constitutional Democrat); Minister of Supplies, M. Pieschehonoff; Minister of Justice, M. Yaroudny; Procurator of the Holy Synod, M. Kartasheff; Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, M. Nikitine (Social Democrat); State Controller, M. Kokoshkine (Constitutional Democrat); Minister of Agriculture, M. Thernoff (Socialist); Assistant Minister of War, M. Savinkoff; Acting Minister of Marine, Lieut. Lebedoeff; Acting Minister of Finance, M. Bernatsky; Minister of Public Aid, M. Yefremoff, and Minister of Public Works, M. Youreneff.

Two things are remarkable about the new Cabinet: the inclusion of M. Arksentieff, the leader of the peasants' delegates as Minister of the Interior, and M. Tseretelli's voluntary exclusion. With the full approval of the Premier, he took no portfolio, but is using his influence to keep the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates loyal to the Provisional Government.

M. Savinkoff, Assistant Minister of War, with the object of restoring discipline to the army, has decided to appoint Government Commissioners with the troops, to replace the present elected Commissioners. According to the latter system, companies chose from their number delegates who in turn elected higher committees from divisions, corps and armies. Uniformed civilians figured largely in these bodies, and often dictated to commanders strategic movements. This was largely the cause of the recent military disasters. The new Commissioners will have authority over the administration and the political life of the army, but the officers in high command will direct all field operations.

On August 8 Mr. Elihu Root reported to President Wilson the results of the American Mission to Russia. He is of the opinion that the people are no longer in danger of internal chaos and believes that Russia can retain her present form of government. President Wilson congratulated Mr. Root and the Commissioners on achieving these results:

Mr. Root's Report

> Consolidation of the Russian factions into a so-called national party, fired by determination to follow the leadership of men like Kerensky, Milukoff, Placanoff and Prince Kropotkin and prevent internal discord from defeating the basic aims of the new Republic. Defeat of the wholesale German propaganda by exposing the intrigues of Teuton agents and frustrating the widespread campaign about everything American. Demonstration to the Russians that lasting peace cannot come until German militarism has been eliminated.

In explaining the readiness with which the Russians started a representative government Mr. Root said that the farmers had long been accustomed to local self-government through their mayors, and in a larger way through the Zemstvos, which gather in every district and exercise considerable power. He reported that before he left Petrograd, the extreme element that favors the destruction of all property, had lost the acendency, and that it cannot regain control of the forces of law and order. What Russia needs from America, said Mr. Root, are moral support, railway materials, money and expert help in the development of industries. He has no fear that Russia will repudiate her financial obligations. The food question he found a serious one in Petrograd and Moscow, but not in the outlying districts. As there is an abundance of soldiers in Russia already, Mr. Root does not favor sending on American troops. The new Republic's forces only need to be organized and disciplined. The likelihood of Russia's making peace with Germany he believes to be nil, but there is danger of a great Teutonic invasion. Word came on August 13 that the Provisional Government had postponed until August 23 and 24 the meeting of the Extraordinary National Council at Moscow.

Mr. Charles E. Russell, another member of the Commission, says that numerous Russians in German pay returned home from this country on purpose to discredit the American Mission. He reports:

> These men, some of whom claim to be Russians, but many of whom claim American citizenship and travel on American passports, preached anti-Americanism to the crowds and represented the United States as a nation ruled by thirty capitalists and seeking to exploit Russia and sell supplies and munitions.

By contriving to be chosen to company committees, German agents found it easy to spread disaffection among the Russian troops.

Newman and the Romance of Religion

JOSEPH F. WICKHAM, M.A.

ON a pedestal in the gardens of Trinity College, Oxford, there stands a bust of an old Oxonian. You might pass it by, if you were in a hurry, and not stand to gaze at the pensive features that seem to ask you to stop and dream. It is quite unremarkable, perhaps, that this bronze memorial should be here, for it is the common way of telling the world that a man lived, and was great, and died. And in very truth this old graduate of the old seat of learning, whose thoughtful face in the garden seems to be dreaming today of the Oxford thousands fighting in France, this old man, indeed, was great. He lived, if anyone in the nineteenth century lived; and when he died, the English world stopped still for a moment, for it had lost John Henry Newman.

The story of Newman is more than a twice-told tale. He has told it himself best of all; Mr. Hutton has told it, and the late Wilfrid Ward and Dr. Barry; and every man of letters from Mr. Birrell to Monsieur Bremond, and Mr. Benson has found him inspiration for his thoughts. And today, when Oxford is wide awake, and thinking of today's battles of armies set in array rather than of battles of the spirit fought in the long ago, it seems a work of supererogation to recall to memory those far-off days when Oxford was asleep and Newman woke it up.

But romance is never out of fashion, whether it be the romance of love, the romance of dying for one's country, the romance of finding new lands, or the romance of finding God. And Newman, though he was many things else, was certainly a figure of romance, standing forth as bravely in the nineteenth century as Washington in the eighteenth or Joffre in the twentieth. His romance was not that of love, or of discovery of continents, or of dying that others might live, but was the romance of religion, of a soul seeking the Soul.

It was an age of high aspiration and endeavor. Carlyle was crying against the shams of society with a voice that thrilled with indignation; Ruskin was teaching sincerity in art to an age that had forgotten what art was; Matthew Arnold was preaching the sweetness and light of an intellectual culture; truly Newman was no isolated figure winning the attention of an England that had no one else to hearken to. His rise to glory was no easy triumph; but triumph it was, and it grows greater the farther it recedes into time.

In Newman's youth-time the youthful poet Keats had summed up all truth in the word beauty. "That is all ye know on earth, and all ye need to know." The creed is not as simple as it may seem, and if carried to its widest interpretation, it is sound philosophy. Newman carried it to the forecourts of heaven, and proved it true; and it is in that journey, in that wonderful Odyssey of religious adventure, in that dauntless faring-forth of him who in the Siege Perilous had no dread, that lies the romance of the future Cardinal-Prince.

Many men and women have lived this romance; it is not new; it is not uncommon; and Newman's living it is in no sense a more precious thing than the experience of an unknown saint in the wilderness of the world. But all who have trodden the paths that lead to Rome will accept him as their leader and their hero, for their story is but a variant of his, and in him the tale is a classic, even as the tale of Troy divine. It is a tale of a man seeking truth, questing for it as the pearl of great price. And that day in Palermo, in 1833, when he wrote "Oh, that thy creed were sound, thou Church of Rome," he uttered the aspiration that was the watch-word of his heart's pulsation; it told the story of a soul's desire even as the device on a warrior's shield.

"Love," sings the Roman, "conquers everything." It was love of the English Church that conquered Newman's love of the Church of England. It was love of things that hailed their origins from more ancient sources than a monarch's decree or an act of parliament, that made him a soldier in the Tractarian movement at Oxford. It was the love of the ideal embodied in Tract 90 that broke about him the storm of protest in the halls of ancient Oxford, a tempest that drove Newman closer to his destined harbor, and that boded to Oxford and to all England that in the world of the spirit a new day was about to dawn. "I have no romantic story to tell," writes Newman in his "Apologia"; and yet his life in that splendid span of years from 1833 to his death is one long season of knighthood, a seeking of the Grail that was lost, and a watching the Cup as the only work worth the doing. These years are the answer to the prayer of "Lead, Kindly Light," that wonderful poetic cry out of the depths of the half-light when he saw darkly what he would see in the glory of the sun's full gleam.

To cross the stream that separated the Church of England from the Church of Rome was no mere crossing of the Rubicon. For Cæsar the plunge meant glory or defeat in the Roman world; and Cæsar brooked no defeat. For Newman, in his English world, it would seem to shadow forth anything but glory. And on that night of October 8, 1845, when Newman sat in his house at Littlemore, waiting for the Passionist priest to come and bid him enter the Apostolic fold, there must have flashed through his mind in a clear vision the worldly defeat that the morrow would bring. For with the new religion would come the loss of the whole olden world, the old friends, the old honors, the old scholastic ease, the old, familiar liturgy of the Church of England, and, not least of all, the old University of Oxford, with its halls and its towers thrice hallowed in his memories as among the sweetest of his life's possessions.

And so it was. The old England, the England that began when the eighth Tudor repudiated his Spanish queen, forgot him, for a while, but the older England that knew Augustine and Thomas of Canterbury welcomed the new ally to its thin battle-line. And now with the old courage and the new light Newman did the work where he found it to do. Ordained priest of the Catholic Church, he preached again, and delivered those marvelous lectures on "The Idea of a University," and was joyful in heart at the new gladness which was to come to him. And then in 1864 the England that had forgotten him again remembered, for Charles Kingsley had thrown down the gage of battle in the query "What, then, does Dr. Newman mean?" And Newman picked it up, and wrote one of the three or four most famous confessions in the history of the world, the "Apologia pro Vita Sua."

There is no need today to say even a word about the "Apologia," there never was a reason for offering it more than the sufficient compliment of reading it; for it is its own best introduction to itself, and its own best critic. All of Kingsley's books could well be spared from the accomplishment of the nineteenth century, but to conceive the nineteenth century in England without Newman's "Apologia" is to dream a garland of years quite at variance with one of their essential meanings. From the thrilling pages of the introduction to the point where Newman came, as he says "into port after a rough sea"; and from this record of his new peace to the beauteous closing page dedicated to Ambrose St. John and Newman's other fellow-priests of the Birmingham Oratory, the "Apologia" is a rare human document in the form of a work of art; a truly wonderful book, portions of which stand unrivaled in the prose of the nineteenth century, and easily challenge the test of comparison with the best pages of the half-dozen prose masters in all British letters. To read it through, slowly and thoughtfully and comprehendingly, letting the mind travel in a real companionship with Newman's, is a voyage into the seas of a soul's romance quite as actual as a mariner's adventure into undiscovered oceans seeking the land of promise.

The land of promise was come to Newman when he wrote this book; and the promised land was right at home, in England. He had become a prophet with honor, in his own country; and the men who were seas away from him in the belief of the soul clasped his hand in an ecstasy of joy over the great book of a great sincerity. Foemen in creed were honored in his friendship; and the old friends of his heart were happy in his triumph. Henceforth in the estimation of the British world Newman was not merely a great Anglican become Roman Catholic, but a great man of his time, a name upon men's lips with Gladstone and Tennyson and the Prince of Wales.

This is not a critical essay on Newman as a writer. If it were, we could not but tarry on the delights of "The Dream of Gerontius," that beauteous strain of music that breathes the mystery and the sweetness of Christian death; a strain of music, in very truth, for its words are a melody and a heavenly harmony that sing themselves to the soul of the man of faith quite as appealingly as Elgar's composition chants the hymn to all the world. "The Dream" was written soon after the "Apologia." The prose work gives us Newman's view of life, his own life; the poet conjures for us his vision of death, the fair vision that came to him in the solitude of Edgbaston, as he thought of the glory that was God and the grandeur that was man, if man but chose to grasp it.

Probably most great men suffer many disappointments in the course of their lives. Certainly Newman was not an exception in this respect. Not all of his plans could he carry through; not all of his contemporaries understood his ideals and motives; and many a brooding hour must have broken his peace of mind as he pondered on the ways of men. But the length of years that carried his sorrows gave him also his vindication and his crown. In 1878 Oxford called him home as honorary Fellow of Trinity, and after his thirty-three years of absence Newman was free to sit again at the high table and to make friends with the things of his youth. The next year saw the final touch of glory, when on the twelfth day of May Leo XIII made the priest of the Oratory Cardinal of Saint George. It was a splendid day for Newman, a fair day for all England, when the great Leo gave the word. Never, indeed, was a choice happier than this. The fitness of things displays itself more than once in a while in the ordering of human affairs; and this was a conspicuous example of princely honors finding their way to a prince of men, a unique occasion in history when one rare soul could offer to another the title that a critical world would hold as flawless. For with Newman the world had been nothing if not critical; but it had found him true, and it rushed to him now, and gave him all the love and all the friendship and all the glory that it had. And this is a very dear thing in life.

Eleven years more the Cardinal dwelt in the peace of Birmingham, the calm and serenity of old age falling upon him very gently and very sweetly, touching his spirit with that singular tenderness that looks upon you from the painting in the National Gallery. And then came the end of things, of the day and the even-time, and of dreams, and of earthly toiling. The life of the great man was rounded with the sleep that is life, the dawn of the deathless day; the great heart was at home with the Heart he had loved and served; and the motto on the Cardinal's shield, "Cor ad cor loquitur," was being lived to the uttermost.

A new generation has grown up since that August day in 1890 when Newman died. It is no doubt richer in many things than the generation that preceded it; but it is less rich in at least one thing, the precious personal memory of a man who followed the gleam faithfully as the knightliest of the knights of old, who chanted through the years the chronicle of his glorious adventure in language like the Angels' own, and who died at the last in all the beauty of death, and was laid away with the whole world weeping as at the passing of a friend.

The Rockefeller Foundation

BIRD S. COLER

"IN a tour through the many finer and coarser moralities which have hitherto prevailed or still prevail on earth," said Frederick Nietzsche, "I found certain traits recurring regularly together and connected with one another, until finally the primary types revealed themselves to me, and a radical distinction was brought to light. There is master-morality and slave-morality."

It is said that a distinctive trait of the paranoic is his perfect ratiocination upon false premises, and Nietzsche, a philologist who tried to search life through a chain of labored puns, who, on digging into the viscera of man and finding no link of tissue in his fingers corresponding with his conception of a soul pronounced the soul an illusion of human variety, had a tolerably true instinct for premises. His eye was an accurate and penetrating organ, capable of visualizing the three dimensions of form in social phenomena, but it conveyed its images to a brain that was like the over-wrangled mind of Childe Harold, "a whirling gulf of fantasy and flame." The practices describable as master-morality and slave-morality, have in truth, always existed. But by the dancing Furies in the cavern of Nietzsche's skull they were distorted into a vital process whereby nature endeavors to evolve from the human race, a higher type, whose development would be arrested if slave-morality in the masses did not prohibit men from destroying what to the average mind appears monstrous.

Said this philosophical interpreter of the Foundation movement:

> It is necessary to show that a counter-movement is inevitably associated with any increasingly economical consumption of men and mankind, and with an evermore involved machinery of interests and services. I call this counter-movement the separation of the luxurious surplus of mankind: by means of it a stronger mind, a higher type, must come to light, which has other conditions for its origin and its maintenance than the average man. My concept, my metaphor for this type, is, as you know, the word "superman."

Lest these words be too obscure, I will quote another passage:

> This must be a new kind of ruling species and caste, this ought to be quite as clear as the somewhat lengthy and not easily expressed consequences of thought. The aim should be to prepare a transvaluation of values for a particularly strong kind of man, more highly gifted in intellect and will, and to this end slowly and continuously liberate in him a whole host of clangored instincts hitherto held in check.

We have here then the practical expression of Nietszche's system, the "new kind of species and caste." It is, as a matter of fact, no new kind of system, only an old kind; but its terminology is new, and its methods have been transformed to accord with present conditions and fashions of thought. Democracy is the shibboleth of the hour: it is still a moving principle in politics, but it runs a great deal of danger of degenerating into a mere shout. The new caste movement is like one of those parasitic insects that wears the livery of the hosts upon whose life-juices it feeds: it is a student of mimetics. It wears the livery of democracy, and mimics the motions of philanthropy, while depositing its voracious grubs in the rich streams of human charity and the comfortable offices of democratic government. Fatal as the grub of the ten-cospis to the egg of the honest mason-bee is the grub of the Foundations to philanthropy and democracy. It is a parasite greedy to feed itself and not humanity, greedy for its own power and not popular government.

I am told that the cognate institutions of the Rockefeller Foundation are alike in essence and tendency. I cannot say except from inference and an occasional side-glance; they have not been the specimens I studied. It is the Rockefeller Foundation which attracts my attention particularly. It is not necessary that we should consider the Foundation an unmixed evil: it could not live in the world if it were that. Some patch of virtue, some fiber morally sound and effectively beneficial, everything must have to grow. But it is precisely the concrete good that is in the institution which makes it dangerous. It gives $1,000,000 to a college, and medical science, physical science, or science in its broader significance, has some gain. It does not make any difference in the public mind that its gift is conditional and involves the raising of a much greater fund from the public unofficially or officially: the people feel that some bacteriologist is enabled to get new light on a disease problem, some electrical engineer is equipped for beneficent discovery in his science, some new light is gained for the human mind through the benevolence of the world-renowned Rockefeller Foundation.

"What," asks the man in the street, "is to be gained by this act, except the gratitude of the public?" Of course the answer is, "power," the control, partly at its own expense but mainly at public expense, of the educational potentialities of that college, an influence over the minds that will themselves be influential in affecting public sentiment. It is impossible to go into details of the thoroughness with which this has been done. We can only mention two leading educational institutions supported in part and controlled in whole by the Rockefeller Foundation, the Rockefeller Institute and Chicago University. But these are by no means all the opinion-factories operated for the Rockefeller benefit. It aids many institutions of power and enlists thereby in its cause the weight and authority of those institutions. There was a recent instance of its method which is characteristic of the Foundation's benefactions. It was announced that Mr. Rockefeller had increased the capital of the Foundation to $125,000,000, of which $10,000,000 was to be used for war-purposes. I searched carefully for some definite pledge in the article in which reference was made to numerous activities connected with the war. I found one. It was an item of $160,000 for a hospital unit from Yale University. But it appeared that of this sum the Foundation was to contribute $25,000. That was enough to get control of it, to tie it to the Rockefeller system.

The scheme has attained proportions so huge that one is bewildered by its ramifications. It began through effecting educational agencies, but it has proceeded swiftly and surely to attach itself to governmental forms. It has subsidized critical and well-advertised agencies who play on mass-psychology, like the Bureau of Municipal Research of New York. It has reorganized and recast the whole policy of the New York City school system. It has fattened all the departmental offices and created new ones to sustain at the public cost the graduates of its subsidized schools. What is the effect of this? Why, to overload the tax-paying power until the great middle class is crushed down into the laboring class which is to be controlled by the methods of modern psychology for the benefit of the governing caste.

Perhaps it is not design, but it is hard to believe anything else of a system that results in as perfect a device for deceiving the public as the constant democratization of elective forms, such as direct primary systems, and the collateral process of binding more and more tightly in the directive system of the Rockefeller interest the officers so democratically elected. More and more are nomination and election facilitated, further and further are the realities of government removed from democratic control and lodged in the hands of a carefully created governing class. We are told that government is a science, a mystery, an esoteric art with which the vulgar have nothing to do. No simple act of administration has the merit of either honesty or efficiency, if not performed by an expert. This movement has already so far gained control of the public that many ordinarily sensible and sincere citizens are convinced that a government is honest which listens in on telephones, slanders men and women of blameless life, and parades its social intimacy with the opulent beneficiaries of its disposition of public values.

So far has the movement proceeded that many citizens are convinced that a government is efficient which can neither check an epidemic nor clean a street; are convinced that a government is economical which imposes a tax upon property such as would have left the most corrupt and wasteful administrator the world has ever known dumb with amazement. In spite of obvious inefficiency, trickiness and extravagance on the part of the politicians to whom it gives all the support of its vast power and public opinion, there are men, thousands upon thousands, who believe in this movement. There are some who do not. There are some who see the tell-tales of "master-morality" and the inevitable end of a power attached to a people's government which is itself irresponsible to the people and which exerts the power of some $125,000,000 visible capital, and the potentiality of incalculable millions invisible.

In his address on "The National Crisis" last Easter, Dr. Felix Adler of the Ethical Culture Society made this significant observation:

> It would be a fatal mistake on our part to allow the antithesis between autocracy and democracy to impress us to such a degree as to make us heedless of the mighty struggle that will presently take place within the bosom of democracy itself: I mean the struggle between two opposing ideas as to what democracy is, and how it should be worked. The one idea, the new and ominous conception arising in our midst, is in brief, government with the consent of the governed but without the participation of the governed. Increased power is to be vested in those who wield authority, both in the political chiefs and in the captains of industry; they are to mature the policies, to decide on the action to be taken, and the people thereafter merely to hold them to account for the results achieved. It is in the name of efficiency that this new formula of democracy is advocated. Already it is put in practice under the pressure of military necessity in the belligerent countries. But it was proposed before the war, and it is designed to maintain and fix it after the war. Democracies, it is said, are inefficient, slack, undisciplined. In proportion as the size of democracies increases, as the prolific millions, the hundreds of millions, enter into democratic ranks, the multitude will become more and more unwieldy, its action more and more uncertain and confused. In the interest of the people themselves, therefore, rulership must be exercised by the few, albeit for the benefit of the many. But this is after all the old superman theory revived. The rulers, the supermen, are indeed to be elected by the people. How long will they remain elective under such a system? They are to be accountable for results to the people, and results will mean material results. Then will come an aggressive foreign policy, extension of the territory of the United States to the Panama Canal, exploitation of South America and the Far East, etc. A leading organ in this city which conspicuously urges the new formula recently spoke of the billions of profits that are waiting for us in China. In a word, the masses are to be deprived of initiative, and to be compensated by increased wages and bonuses, the birthright once again is to be bartered for a mess of pottage.

Ominous words, these, but they are prophetic. Will the people heed them?

Literary Specialization

JOHN B. KENNEDY, B. A.

SCORES, perhaps hundreds, of young men and young women arrive in Boston, Chicago and New York every year, and particularly in New York, laden with two or three letters of introduction to journalists or educators, a good stock of more or less conventional talent, and ambition that is abundant but limited. They want jobs as reporters or at anything in fact that has a journalistic or literary flavor about it. About ten in a hundred get such jobs, the remainder join the merry chase for berths until their capital is exhausted, when they either leave the big city, disgusted, or take employment as clerks, time-keepers, or what you will, so that there is an honest and sufficient wage attached. Some of the more weak-minded, and, incidentally, least-gifted, of this majority of disappointed entrepreneurs end their lives in dismal tragedy.

It would profit little to pursue a moral, except that a very old and a very uninteresting sermon could be preached regarding the folly of expecting much more in a big city than can be obtained in a smaller one. Again, there would not be much gained by any research to discover how many of the ten per cent of newcomers that receive journalistic and literary occupation, achieve the high rung for which they strive. One out of every ten might be a liberal speculation.

Yet it would be unwise and far from accurate to conclude from all this that opportunity is scarce, that chance for the success of talented young men who can write prose or verse is so rare and uncertain as to be despaired of.

The world receives no new information when it is written, that with perhaps one exception there is no manner of bread-winning that demands more natural and acquired abilities and offers less proportionate compensation, than literature, along whatever avenue it be pursued. Nowhere in the industrial field, or in the professional field, for that matter, is there such prevalent mental confusion regarding the law of supply and demand, as plagues the market of letters. Of course the supply of literary matter greatly exceeds the demand; this fact can best be summarized by the warranted assertion that for every manuscript accepted by an editor, one hundred manuscripts are rejected. But the literary market, for reasons that become evident after a moment's consideration, presents the unique problem of having no definite stabilizer other than the means of magazine circulation. Editors are judged by the circulation they produce, and they select matter accordingly.

A logical effect of the hazy system by which current literary work by contributors meets assay, is the bulwark of editorial regimen that opposes newcomers. If a manufacturer of shoes who had acquired a good reputation, should one season disappoint his customers with inferior goods, the mistake might be overlooked. But not twice. The rules of the game are definite and valid. But a magazine writer who has earned a reputation by clever work may turn out a good deal of inferior work before his reputation is injured, and a good deal more before editors decline to purchase his wares. There are several reasons for this state of affairs, one of them being that the reading public is loath to forsake its idols; and another is found in the personal relations existing between editors and authors. But whatever the causes, the effect is one, the newcomer cannot market his product unless its quality excels, or at least equals that of the writers who have arrived.

It is impossible for anybody who has not undergone the monotony of mailing manuscripts and receiving rejection slips to realize what a test of the most lively fortitude a campaign against magazine columns can be. Every man who breaks for the first time into the big print of the high-paying publications, does so either through sheer brilliance or because he has undergone arduous self-discipline and labor. We can find what faults we may with the moral tone of magazine literature, it is usually frankly commercial, but it is unquestionably a substantial and permanent medium for the dissemination of ideas and the earning of wages.

Naturally, the one certain way of gaining access to the ranks of well-paid writers is to be highly talented and industriously trained, and additionally gifted as a salesman. It is an easy matter to dispose of young literary aspirants with the advice that they should be able to write, be willing to write, and be willing, further, to tear up what they write. That is negative counsel which cannot much advance a young man as an author, although it may tend to give him the much-coveted sourness of the superficial critic. The young man seeking headway in the literary world today, and by this, of course, journalism is always connoted, for the trade of reporter and novelist are divided by the thin line of fact, must specialize, and not be afraid to scatter seeds by the wayside. By specialization is meant objective as well as subjective work. It would be ridiculous to encourage a man with a bent for humorous writing to think of nothing else but humor, and one with a head built for tragic plots and bitter realism would soon make the world mad, if he was urged to concentrate on his dismal powers to the exclusion of the relief which nature always affords to the most gloomy natures, creative or merely passive.

Literary specialization consists of selecting a range of publications, gaining the atmosphere of each, and then writing copy that will not need acclimatization at the editor's hands. For instance, it is far more probable that the editor of a satirical weekly will accept a manuscript written in a vein that he has trained himself to admire and his readers to accept, than some brilliant piece of work that is foreign to his idea of his publication's requirements. Editors are always modest enough to admit their fallibility: they refuse matter usually because it does not "suit the present needs of the magazine." The writer once made bold to retort that if the magazine did not need his article at present, it might be treated to it as a luxury, and the editor, perhaps in a moment of generous amusement, reread the manuscript and accepted it. But the safest policy is to write to the tone of the publication, always of course presupposing that this is morally justifiable. An author can always elevate his work, if need be, after an editor has accepted him as a regular contributor.

Once regular, bread-winning employment has been secured by the young man ambitious for literary laurels, and it has often been found that more successful authors emerge from the counting-house than from the reportorial den, he should diligently read and write. There are scores of subjects on which a man of general talent can concentrate, outdoor life in fact and fiction, trade and business topics, character, and even scenic sketches, descriptions of the bizarre and the curious in every-day life and book-reviews. From the simple rhyme to the sophisticated satire, a writer can charge his pen and fire at one of a hundred publications, and keep on firing.

Furthermore, during the process of the campaign for recognition the young writer will do well to scatter seeds by the wayside. One of the most popular institutions of daily journalism is the "colyum," so-called. Each "colyum" is edited by an experienced wit and has its own public composed of wags and would-be wags. No money is paid for the contributions printed in the "colyums," but the advertisement attached to the honor of "landing" is tangible. Through the little attention aroused by matter the writer contributed to a New York "colyum" he was requested to write a series of advertisements for a leading food and candy manufacturer.

The encouragement that comes with successful writing of small items is cumulative. It nourishes that first ambition to do great things with which all beginners are fired; it sustains it when it is most in need of sustenance, during the adolescence of style and thought. Perhaps young writers who follow the plan of literary specialization, of composing and selling unconsidered trifles while working for bigger things, may begin and end as the authors of trifles, of printed pieces that are brief in substance and time. Even so, the world will not weep, and neither should the authors. They have, at least profited by the sum of the trifles in the exercise of creation and the pleasure of monetary profit. Those specializers who have the gift for greater things will emerge and do their big deeds, no matter what obstacles may temporarily handicap them.

If the numberless aspirants to the writing trade suffered the full consequences of their reckless desire and purblind labor, a condition approaching feudalism would soon exist in the literary world, each editor having his roster of serfs. Callow litterateurs must blend the spirits of independence and legitimate ambition, and be able to live without the pen, or typewriter, while they are trying their talent with it.

The Old and New Theology

J. D. TIBBITS

SOME years ago, in one of its characteristic articles, the Outlook drew a vivid contrast between what it considered to be the relative conceptions of the New Theology and the Old, and for purposes of illustration it compared them, respectively, to a seed and a diamond. The application was made with much cleverness and much plausibility, and the inference was unmistakable. The diamond, of course, represented what the Outlook regarded as the old view of religion. It was consequently the main task of that religion to guard it with the utmost care, lest it be exposed not only to positive loss, but more particularly, lest it come in contact with any elements which might defile or corrupt it.

The New Theology was represented by the seed, and the seed was typical of the capacity for growth, thus illustrating the dynamic conception of religion. Every day would record a change, and every change an advance. It was eminently a living thing, affecting each age, and affected by it, while its origin would for all practical purposes be lost in an ever-increasing obscurity. It would dwindle each year into greater and greater insignificance.

The conclusion was only too obvious. The diamond, translated into a religious conception, spelt little else than stagnation and antiquarianism, while the seed was the very embodiment of life and health and vigor.

Now striking as this contrast undoubtedly is, its value lies mainly in the fact that it affords a complete and perfect demonstration, first, of the danger of illustrations which fail to illustrate, and second, of the laxity of contemporary Protestant thought. The religious literature of the day is filled with similar examples, all of which are intended to popularize the conviction that the New Theology is really representative of progress while the Old Theology in general, and the Catholic Church in particular, stands by its very nature for obscurantism and reaction. And I have selected the aforesaid illustration not because its absurdities are any more or less patent than the others, but because of the ex-cathedra tone of finality which is common to the Outlook's utterances, and because it is an excellent specimen of the popular theology of the day. It undoubtedly impressed a large number of readers, especially those of that well-known type who have just enough curiosity to read the speculations of other men, but lack either the intellect or the application to analyze them.

No one who understands even superficially the theology and the history of the Catholic Church can fail to note that though it might, in a limited degree, bear comparison with a diamond, yet that degree is so very limited as to render the illustration valueless. And they will note also, that in just about the same limited measure it will bear comparison with a seed; for there is certainly a sense in which the Church may be said to grow just as there is a sense in which she may be said to be unchanging. It is not my contention to dwell upon the question of religious development as such, but simply to direct attention to the laxity in the Outlook's thought, for it is very evident that the comparison of religion with a seed is quite as inapplicable to the New Theology as to the Catholic Church. Indeed the Catholic Church may be said to illustrate it more fully. The growth of a seed is at least an orderly and legitimate process; and in her task of bringing the message of Christ to bear upon the changing conditions of the ages the Church's growth has been almost uninterrupted. Thus the age of St. Thomas Aquinas represented a distinct advance over the age of St. Augustine. The Encyclical "Rerum Novarum" was as truly a milestone of progress as was the Encyclical "Pascendi." Yet the fact remains that in this very progress of the Church her origin has become illuminated rather than obscured; while the remarkable disparity between her own development and that of Protestantism has become increasingly apparent. Catholicism has never disowned its past. If I am discussing a point of theology, it is a distinct strengthening of my position if I can cite St. Augustine or St. Ambrose as on my side. But it would be almost ludicrous to imagine Dr. Lyman Abbott as seriously attempting to buttress an argument by an appeal to Jonathan Edwards or to Archbishop Cranmer. The seed theory of religion has therefore little application to Protestantism. Its history might with far greater fitness be compared to a series of shipwrecks.

But as illustrations appear to be the order of the day, I shall venture to offer one, which, whatever defects may attach to this form of exposition, may yet be of some value in bringing into clearer relief the intellectual basis upon which the theology of the Outlook and its admirers rests.

Those who a generation ago were old enough to be readers of contemporary fiction, will remember a short but singularly clever story by the late Mr. Frank R. Stockton, entitled "The Lady or the Tiger?" The scene was laid in a mythical barbaric kingdom; and the hero, for some reason or other, was obliged to undergo a curious ordeal. He was forced to appear in the amphitheater, and to enter one of two closed doors. One of these doors concealed a lady, conspicuous for her beauty; the other a half-famished tiger. If, therefore, the hero was so fortunate as to enter the former, he married the lady forthwith; if the latter, he was devoured by the tiger in the presence of the vast audience.

Now the princess, who in this case was also the lover of the hero, sat on that day in the royal box. He knew that she possessed the secret of the doors; and he knew, too, that a glance from her would, at the fatal moment, direct him. She however, was beset by conflicting impulses. At one moment it seemed that she would have him live even though he were to marry another; the next moment she decided for the tiger; and these impulses were alternating with increasing rapidity just as the fatal hour was at hand. At length the hour came; the hero appeared. There was one quick glance; one impulse uppermost; the sign given and recognized. The hero walked to the door indicated by the princess, and opened it.

The story ended here. No one has ever known which door the hero opened; but those who lived at the time of this story's publication will recall the curiosity which it aroused from one end of the country to the other. There was much speculation, some of which was really ingenious. At length Mr. Stockton was appealed to, and in a multitude of letters, to reveal the secret; but he declined once and for all; till at length, from mere hopelessness, the guessing ceased and the curiosity evaporated.

The points of resemblance which this little tale bears to the scheme of the New Theology are very marked. Both are stimulating to thought and encouraging to speculation; but there is an even closer resemblance in the utter hopelessness of result. The Christ of the New Theology is neither more nor less than a sort of magnified Mr. Stockton; but distinctly lacking in Mr. Stockton's candor and frankness. The story was indeed a clever trick in literature. It is impossible not to admire it. But that Christ should be made to appear as the author of a similar trick in theology, is not exactly calculated to evoke admiration or even respect. It would be very difficult to show that the New Theology has ever, to any extent, increased respect for religion. It has indeed popularized the theory that all religions are equally good; but it is today reaping its fruit in the growing suspicion, which is all too prevalent among Protestants, that they are equally good for nothing, and if men continue to speculate it is partly because the New Theology has succeeded in concealing their helplessness from them, and partly because the longing for religious truth is so deeply rooted in human nature, that no theology, however new, can wholly eradicate it.

First Centenary of the Brothers of Mary

JOHN E. GARVIN, S.M.

"TINS to mend! Tins to mend!" It was in the city of Bordeaux, at the beginning of the French Revolution, that this cry was heard in the streets of the residence section more frequently than usual. People saw what seemed to be a traveling tinker, a man about thirty years old, looking eagerly about from side to side, a kettle on his back, a kit of tools in his hands, and here and there children would come out as if from their hiding-places in the side streets, and run ahead to indicate the house where the tinker was wanted. It looked like a preconcerted move, and such it was, for the tinker was a priest in disguise. He would enter the house cautiously, but once in the presence of those who had called for him, he was again the minister of God.

This was the life and the work of Father William Joseph Chaminade during four years of the Reign of Terror in Bordeaux. It was not fear that suggested the disguise and dictated the precautions. He protected his life only in order to expose it all the longer in the work of serving religion. Neither was this perilous work in the line of strict duty, for he had joined the hunted clergy of Bordeaux, of his own accord. Since his ordination seven years before, in 1784, he had been employed in the work of education in the diocesan college of Mussidan, a little town about fifty miles northeast of Bordeaux. He had refused the oath to the Civil Constitution of the clergy, and he was served with a warrant to quit the soil of France.

But he chose to remain faithful in a double sense, for he not only refused the oath but he defied it, and determined to continue his priestly ministry in the city of Bordeaux. Disguised as a tinker, or sometimes as a peddler, he often met the fatal tumbrels which were carrying victims to the guillotine; he often passed the dread instrument itself in the "Square of the Nation."

To this humble tinker and peddler in disguise, the Providence of God reserved a most fruitful life of sixty years in the ministry, and the history of the Church in Bordeaux has enrolled Father Chaminade and his labors on one of its brightest pages. When peace was restored he became one of the most useful and active agents in the revival of religion. Within a few years his energy and activity had so impressed themselves upon the people of the city that he was regarded as the apostle of Bordeaux.

According to the testimony of his fellow priests, "His works included everything that was most Catholic in Bordeaux." Every work of piety or charity or education conceived and executed in Bordeaux during the first years of the nineteenth century was in some way dependent upon the activity, the wisdom or the initiative of Father Chaminade. Two of the Archbishops of Bordeaux have given testimony to this effect. Cardinal Andrieu called him "the Vincent de Paul of Bordeaux," and after a careful study of that period of the history of his diocese, Cardinal Donnet declared: "Trace any work of piety, of charity, of education, in Bordeaux, to its source, and there, at the head of every one, will be found the name of Father Chaminade."

The crowning work of the life of Father Chaminade was his sodality, and it was his earliest one as well. It spread and prospered almost beyond belief and in due course of time it saw blossom on its stem two flowers which were at once its glory and its crown, the Institute of the Daughters of Mary and the Society of the Brothers of Mary.

Sodalities were nothing new in the history of the religious life of France, but the sodality as founded by Father Chaminade at Bordeaux, was something quite unique. It was not a resurrection: it was a creation. The sodalities before the Revolution had respected caste and rank, but the new order of things in France had placed real worth before the accident of birth, and Father Chaminade welcomed this new order in a wholesome and Catholic sense. In fact, Father Chaminade was a man of views rather than of traditions; he had no overpowering respect for precedent, and it was amusingly said of him that in the organization of his sodality as well as of the Society of Mary, he believed more in making precedents than in following them.

The Sodality of Bordeaux was founded by Father Chaminade in 1800. Within a few years it was city-wide in its membership, and much more than city-wide in its activity and its interests. As its influence widened, its central administration became more and more united and experienced. By little and little, within the inner circle of the sodality, a select company of members had gathered about Father Chaminade and seconded him in all his undertakings. These chosen souls became his "staff," as he loved to term them, his aids and lieutenants in the various departments of the sodality. Soon they felt themselves attracted to a life of greater perfection. Father Chaminade trained them in an especial manner, and planned to perpetuate through them the various works of the sodality. They lived the life of religious although they were not separated from the cares and occupations of the world by any inclosure or any definite limitations. They received permission to vow obedience to their director, and only waited a favorable time to complete their sacrifice by the vows of poverty and chastity.

This was the origin of the Society of Mary. On October 2, 1817, at the closing of a week's preparatory retreat, seven of the young men of the "staff" declared formally and publicly to their director that they placed themselves entirely at his disposal.

This is the centenary which the Brothers of Mary are celebrating this year. One hundred years of existence finds the Brothers in all parts of the world. France, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland, Austria, Spain, Italy and North Africa have seen their work and even the ends of the world have been reached by their enterprise. Six of the largest and most flourishing Catholic schools in Japan form one of the most important and encouraging fields of the labors of the Society of Mary, and one of the most promising prospects in the gradual enlightenment of this rising nation which is fast becoming the preponderating influence in the Far East.

As early as 1849, one year before the death of their venerated founder, the Brothers of Mary entered the United States, and established themselves at Dayton, Ohio. Today the American provinces number 420 members, employed in sixty establishments. These comprise six colleges, five high schools, and forty-nine parish schools.

The commemoration of the centenary of foundation is threefold, one in August, one in October, and one in December. The first celebration is more in the nature of a family reunion, for all the Brothers of the Province took advantage of their vacation, and attended the ceremony, which occurred at St. Mary's College in Dayton, on August 8, after the exercises of the annual retreat. His Grace, the Most Reverend Archbishop of Cincinnati, presided, and the Right Reverend Bishop of Harrisburg delivered the address for the occasion. The second ceremony will take place on the anniversary of the centenary, October 2, at the new central house of the Society at Mount St. John, some miles east of Dayton. The Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. John Bonzano, will preside, and the Right Reverend Bishop of Toledo will preach the sermon. The final ceremony will be held at St. Mary's College, Dayton, and will be honored with the presence of his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons.

At the completion of a hundred years of service for God and His Church, it is consoling for the disciples of Father Chaminade to pause on the threshold of a new century of prospective effort. The closing years of the century have seen the introduction at Rome of the cause of the beatification of the venerated Founder; the opening years of the second century of his institutes may see him raised to the honors of the altar. It is heartening to look back upon past achievements under the initiative and inspiration of so holy a leader; it is encouraging to look forward to the accomplishment of still greater things for the religious instruction and education of youth.

The celebration of a centenary is a commemoration of time past; it should also be a dedication of time to come. It is at once a prospect and a retrospect. The past is in God's hands alone; the future is largely in our own. The Society of Mary stands upon the threshold of the second century of her existence, and it is with no weariness in well-doing, with no taint of cold formality or morbid institutionalism, with not a sign or semblance of decay, that the Society steps forward into the new period of her work. With the blessing of God and the protection of her glorious Patroness, the Immaculate Mother of God, the Society goes forward. "With legitimate pride in her older children, with confidence in her younger, she hastens to the goal of her desires."

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six-hundred words.

Charity Without State Aid

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On June 28, 1817, three Sisters of Charity, Sister Rose White, Sister Cecilia O'Conway and Sister Felicité Brady, arrived in New York, N. Y., from Emmitsburg, Maryland, to take charge of New York's first orphan asylum, a small frame building, No. 32 Prince Street.

The first year there were five orphans. To provide for them the "Roman Catholic Benevolent Society" was incorporated by the State on April 15, 1817, the first Catholic Society incorporated by the State of New York. Its object was to take care of, clothe and give both a moral and religious education to poor and destitute children left without parents or guardians, to shelter them from vice. For their Christmas dinner that year the orphans had pork, cabbage and potatoes and were glad to get even that.

In 1825 the center part of the larger building in Mott Street, now the parish school, was built, and in 1833-34 the wings were added. In 1852 the new asylums at Fifty-first Street, Fifth and Madison Avenues, were consolidated with those at Prince Street and Peekskill. In 1901 all the orphans were removed to the present institution at Kingsbridge.

The children admitted to these asylums have numbered: 1817-35, 1,200; 1835-52, 2,000; 1852-70, 2,400; 1870-1917, 13,000, a total of 18,600. The three Sisters of Charity increased in the 100 years to 3,000.

No State aid has been given to support these orphans. Catholic charity has been the source of their income. At the rate of $125 a year, the sum the city pays for children in public institutions, the cost for this number of children, based on the annual number the asylums sheltered, would have been $9,375,000. This is a splendid gift to the City of New York.

Brooklyn. T. F. M.

Mr. Atteridge and Air Raids

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It has often been said that Englishmen do not possess a sense of humor, but upon perusing the article by Mr. A. Hilliard Atteridge, in AMERICA for July 21, entitled "An Air Raid on London," I was firmly convinced that I had unearthed a genuine, if unconscious, humorist, not one of your frivolous Yankee variety, but a real, bona fide, dyed-in-the-wool "source of innocent merriment."

In anathematizing the Germans, Mr. Atteridge has curiously failed to recall the familiar household phrase involving a kettle and a pot. A bas the ungodly Zeppelin! Away with German air raids! Down with these cruel assaults upon a nation whose splendid conquests with the sword have insured her right to the title of "God's chosen people!" These attacks are dangerous; people may be killed; therefore, they are to be condemned. "I did not see the material damage," sagely quote Mr. Atteridge. Ergo, Wilhelm II, there was none, and you must discontinue these naughty wickednesses. And to think that it is the merciful and loving Englishmen who are thus attacked, the virtue-cherishing Britons who thank God that they are not as other peoples! Think of the cowardice which reminds the British that they are in a war, and without giving any opportunity to put into practice the revered English belief that he who fights and runs away will live to run another day.

Ah, Mr. Atteridge, you, too, have drunk deeply of the subtle poison which induces the malady known to Americans as Anglomania. With characteristic inconsistency, which, however, is not confined to Englishmen alone, you denounce the Germans, but dexterously forget that you are not without sin in casting the first stone. Yours, I mean your nation's, is the cry of the ancient Roman: Carthago est delenda! Germany, too, must be destroyed, by fair means, if possible, but Germany must be destroyed. And let not the vulgar be so blasphemous as to remind us of our treatment of Ireland or of India. Since we are battling for small nations, we must not be reminded of such silly trifles. We are fighting for civilization, and the account of our barbarities of this war should be consigned to the dusty oblivion of the waste-basket, as the story of the Baralong incident literally was, in a Philadelphia newspaper office. We are struggling for democracy; we have told the United States so, and she believed us, for the newspapers tell us so, and when she realizes the unselfishness of our faithful Japanese democrats, and when she appreciates the parental spirit in which we removed the Irish autocrats of Easter Week, 1916, she will readily understand that, though we love the German people, we must "slay and spare not," according to the Scriptural declaration that "whom the Lord loveth, He chastiseth." Yes, we are warring to civilize and educate and uplift the Germans, and, as Mr. Dooley would say, "We'll threat ye th' way a father shud threat his childher, if we have to break ivry bone in ye'er bodies."

Well, well, we custodians of the "common heritage" and other people's business are certainly a great race. Give us a fair start and we can beat the world—to a telegraph office. We have common impulses—for the same money, and a common language—of slander and abuse. We may be defeated on the battlefield, but in the histories which our children will read, we shall be invincible. Let none dare insinuate that we are evil, as the Germans are. Not for us the women-and-children-killing air raid. No, rather give us the unfailing weapon of starvation, at the use of which experience has made us an adept, and the cool and penetrating instrument which dear, old England insisted upon retaining at the Hague Conference, when the barbarous Teutons voted to abolish it, the sweet and kindly dum-dum. Let none accuse us of being haughty or egotistical, for we are compelled to think well of ourselves in order to prevent the unenlightened contrary opinion from being unanimous.

Aye, there it is, the old, old cry. Is it any wonder that real Americans are nauseated, not with their own war for "democracy," but with Britain's war for hypocrisy? The English are admirable lip-warriors. Having the "ear o' the world," they can appreciate the value of heaving an epithet as well as a bosom, and, as a consequence, many a strong, able-bodied and commercially inclined Briton, who might have made an efficient tonsorial artist, or a skilful guardian of the sliding-shovel, or a stentorian-toned merchant of vegetables, or a fleet Tommy Atkins, is to-day receiving many pounds sterling for suffocating a patient, American public, with literary gases more dangerous than those used to "destroy the Teutons."

Perhaps it is none of our business, being "foreigners," but one cannot help wondering whether England would have been so badly defeated today, if those who attempt to justify her cause in a manner that is ludicrous because of the patent instability of their argumentation, had only carried their hymn of hate to the extent of carrying a musket. Even if it would not have availed to crush the uncomfortably efficient German, it might have had a most salutary effect upon the wearied optics of their American cousins, inasmuch as the various London newspapers published in this country might possibly have been induced at certain intervals, to vary the line of type which is kept ever ready like a trained fire-horse: "We regret to state."

In conclusion, let me say that when "Bobbie" Burns wrote his little wish that we might see ourselves as others see us, he was merely restating the thought of the ancient Diogenes: "Such as have virtue always in their mouths and neglect it in practice, are like a harp which emits a sound pleasing to others, while itself is insensible of the music." As philosophy, it is not half bad, Mr. Atteridge, is it? But what do you and I and other Anglo-Saxons care for Scotch or Greek reasoning? One is a subject race, and the other is now an object lesson, while we—well, we are free and independent, and, with certain restrictions, wish the same blessings of liberty for others. We are civilized, educated, even if we have not studied "Philosophia Moralis" from the German author, Cathrein, and we are democrats with a small "d," earnestly urging democracy for all the world, but, in justice to our Anglo-Saxon race, let us not fail to add that there are certain nations, which, with fine logical distinction, we cannot include within our concept of the world.

Camden, N. J. ALFRED WILKINS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was taught as a boy, at old St. Mary's, at school and in an experience of thirty-five years as an active journalist on the Boston press, that courage was an attribute of the Jesuit. I regret exceedingly to have the illusion so completely shattered (sic). It is cowardly to print one side of a matter of such tremendous possibilities for good or evil—the A. Hilliard Atteridge articles—in these perilous times, when you know that the other side cannot be given a hearing.

Boston. HUGH P. MCNALLY.

"No Priests in the Trenches!"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I note in your columns of a past date a most excellent suggestion, the inauguration among the Catholics of the United States of a movement to have the French Government release the great number of priests who are fighting in the armies of France, from trench duty. Surely they have shown by wholehearted devotedness to their country's cause that being a Catholic and a priest made them but the more eager to sacrifice all, when their country demanded it of them.

Along the lines suggested by the writer, in the article referred to, would it not be possible to have at least a few of the priests relieved from the trenches, for duty as chaplains in the various training camps in the United States? These priests could be used in connection with the noble work undertaken by the Knights of Columbus. How effective would their influence be among the men in these training camps! They would speak from actual experience on the battlefields of Europe, and one word from them would have more weight than a dozen from others of no wartime experience.

As I understand it many priests left the various colleges in this country to fight for their native land. It would not be inappropriate, since our country is now allied with France, for these priests to return to this country, where their influence among the men in training, would be of far more value to the common cause.

Richmond, Va. JAMES M. PURCELL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was, indeed, glad to find in your issue of July 28: "No Priests in the Trenches!" a communication of Paul Bakewell. I was also pleased to note that he called attention to the so-called liberty attained by the revolution in Mexico. Truly, that revolution seems to have been the work of the devil, and the ends attained such as would please the devil. If all governments were of the Carranzista type and all rulers of the Carranza and Viviani type, I think, time would soon have its end, for the world would be so abominably wicked that it would no longer deserve the mercy of God; and the shower of fire and brimstone with which it is threatened 1290 days after the continual Sacrifice is stopped, would, indeed, be imminent. I wish also to call attention to the article: "Viviani Sobs" in the August Messenger, p. 496. From it I quote the following: "Little does M. Viviani care for burning cathedrals." Contrast these words spoken in Boston with his utterances in the French Chamber: "We have driven Jesus Christ from the schoolroom, and we shall not cease our efforts until we hunt Him over the frontiers of France." I sincerely hope that our aid to the French will not strengthen characters of Viviani's type. Surely it is time for the French people to wake up and not let that class represent them.

I heartily approve of Paul Bakewell's suggestion that the Catholic Hierarchy unite in a brief statement as to what the present Government of France has done against the Catholic Church; and that they make a united appeal to our President and Representatives and Secretary of State urging them to request that this course on the part of the French Government cease, and that French Catholic priests be allowed to return to their spiritual duties instead of being forced to take up arms.

Oil City, Cal. P. A. MCANDREW.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reading the letter from the little town in Missouri, signed "O. L. S.," one can well imagine the writer, the simple, courtly type of Catholic gentleman of a day gone by. The world may march on its way, with its modern ideas of coeducation and of progressive thought, but he clings to the old truths of his Mother, the Church, and is content. Surely, "of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." And yet, dear O. L. S., we, especially we of the cities, like that same old Church, must keep abreast of the times, while keeping close to Mary as the model of purest womanhood.

I think this argument started by someone suggesting that a practical way to avert mixed marriages might be to find some means of bringing Catholic young men and women together socially, preferably during their school and college years when friendships are formed which sometimes ripen into marriages later on. Propinquity being so potent a factor in love, surely this is worthy of consideration as a very good preventive measure against the evil of mixed marriages.

If I may be permitted an expression of opinion, I think it would be a good thing for pastors to introduce a little more social leaven into the daily bread of church-life, so that the coming together of the people would not consist mainly of May devotions, October devotions, Lenten devotions, with perhaps a few euchre "frosts," so far as social life is concerned, as dessert. This seems to be the present yearly routine. I have often wondered what the church offered in lieu of mixed marriages. To judge by the average Catholic family, boasting of from two to five or six unmarried eligible, or beyond-eligible, girls, the answer appears to be, no marriage at all for thousands of its women who have the finest qualities for motherhood. I know that the unmarried Catholic woman is the very salt of the church and of church charities. But that prospect alone does not always satisfy, especially the girl with a natural "homing" instinct, and not called by God to the religious life. How can she become acquainted with eligible Catholic young men? Certainly not at any of the above-mentioned euchre "frosts," for nobody worth-while goes.

Protestant churches have the happy faculty of bringing their young people together. I have heard a Protestant father boast that he had married his five daughters among the young men of the church, while his Catholic friend still had his four, the youngest nearing forty, "withering on the parent stem." Indeed, these are the girls who at Catholic missions for unmarried women are called upon by the preacher to sing to Mary to protect her child from "pleasure's siren lay." I do not mean to be flippant, but I always have to smile a little because I know that many of them would like but the chance to hear, just once, the music of that same "lay."

In my own particular case, I have been attending the same church for three years, and I do not know the names of the people in the seat in front, or in the seat behind, or in the seat across the aisle.

As to the wisdom, or not, of coeducation in schools and colleges, I am not in position to judge, and perhaps it is beside the question. But I know many graduates of such colleges, both men and women, and one must admire the frank goodfellowship existing among them; they have known one another and have played together since childhood, and in their association the question of sex is not eternally coming up. They marry among themselves, these good college people, and are progressive, clean-minded and public-spirited. I think Catholic colleges might do well to imitate them; perhaps there would then be fewer Percyes and Juliennes.

Brooklyn. X. Y. Z.

Hospitals and Animal Houses

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly grant me a little space in your columns to express my sentiments in regard to the article of Miss McDonell, to be found in your issue of June 9? I must say that when I read that protest, I was astounded that a young lady proficient in learning and claiming to be a Catholic, should have made the statement that she has never "discovered any great advantage in a Catholic hospital to the patient as far as religion is concerned." Certainly that remark shows either a great lack of experience or a sad cooling of her religious principles. Now, though I have been in many hospitals, I have never been East, but I cannot be persuaded that there is any difference between East and West as far as nursing is concerned. If there is none, then my advice to Miss McDonell is, open your eyes.

Since the sentence reads that she has found no religious advantage as far as the patient is concerned, I take it for granted that Miss McDonell does see such an advantage in young girls being trained for nursing under the personal supervision of the Sisters. Hence I shall say nothing on that point. But let us see if it is not possible to find just a few great advantages that will accrue to the patient from being in a Catholic hospital.

In the first place is there any difference between those in charge of Catholic hospitals and those who oversee the work in non-Catholic institutions? Foolish question! In the one you have women who have sacrificed all this world holds dear, who, for the pure love of God and suffering humanity, have given themselves heart and soul to the care of the sick; in the other will be found many who have likewise given themselves to the same work with great love and charity. But these last, as a whole, cannot work with the same zeal and earnestness as those angels of purity, the Sisters, who are bound by vows to the exact performance of their duties. Compare the amount of charitable work done in Catholic hospitals with that done in other institutions; notice well the care taken of such patients in the former as compared with the latter, and I'm sure a great difference will be found.

Secondly, what is the relation between those in charge of the hospital and the patient? From what I have said in the first point, it is evident that those pure, saintly Sisters will have a much better effect on a patient, than will the ordinary individual, good though he or she may be. This fact is admitted even by Protestants. Right here in Seattle, which is so far from being a Catholic city, the majority of patients in the Providence hospital, our great Catholic hospital here, are Protestants. None of them would think of going anywhere else, though there are several excellent non-Catholic institutions in the city. Why is that? I think the answer should be clear to any one of ordinary intelligence.

Thirdly, what are the relations between the nurse and her patient? Now, it is true that a nurse must always be kind and sympathetic. But if that nurse is not forewarned, if she is not watched over and told plainly what to avoid and where danger lurks, is it not possible that her sympathy may run away with her, to the detriment both of herself and of her patient? And where are nurses better guarded than in our Catholic hospitals, where the Sisters know them well, and knowing them well, know also where their greatest danger lies? Not that I mean to say that no wrong ever takes place in our hospitals. No, nothing is perfect here below. But I do positively claim and can bring forth plenty of proofs for my assertion, that in non-Catholic hospitals, nurses are in greater danger than in Catholic hospitals. How will Miss McDonell answer me if I ask her how is it that in so many Protestant institutions there are no male nurses or stewards? Will she say that I'm narrow-minded, or will she tell me that a nurse must be ready for anything? If she says the first, then I answer, "God pity her"; if she makes use of the second clause, then I say she is absolutely wrong. For there are certain diseases, certain operations with which a young woman should have nothing to do. I don't care how strong she may consider herself, she should refuse the work. All along the Pacific Coast I have seen and been able to compare the nurses of various hospitals. As a result, I positively assert that the nurses, be they Protestant or Catholic, of Catholic institutions, for the most part far surpass nurses in Protestant hospitals, as far as their morals are concerned. Does Miss McDonell mean to say this will make no difference in regard to the religious treatment of the patient? What Miss McDonell says regarding the willingness of Protestant institutions to send for the priest, I take with a grain of salt. I know of more than one case where the patient has died without the Sacraments through the utter neglect of hospital authorities. No, the advice which I, a Catholic, give, and which a vast throng of Protestants likewise give, is: Go to a Catholic hospital, if you want to be sure of being treated as a human being. And to all young girls, desirous of nursing, I would say: Go to a Catholic training school. There you will get a perfect professional training joined with a religious one. Otherwise, though you may get an excellent training in nursing, I have serious doubts regarding your future.

Seattle. S. V. H.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, AUGUST 18, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.

President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00

Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

Playing the Game

LIFE after all, is not so much of a mystery as the pseudo-mystics would have us believe. If there are many things which we do not know, there are at least a few matters on which our knowledge is fairly complete. Life always touches reality when it speaks of love and pain, of sorrow and sacrifice, and most of all, when it speaks of duty. These are not shadows; they are things that we know in part, the real things that make life tangible and worth-while. And duty only means to take the bitter with the sweet, to rejoice mildly in success, and to pay the penalty with good grace. Along that way, and that way alone, lies the truth that makes us free.

> It will be found that in the long run, freedom . . . lies, not in a reckless independence of what may sometimes seem unnecessarily rigid rules . . . but in a disciplined submission to those rules which on the whole, have been worked out for the good of the greatest number.

These simple phrases sum up nearly the whole philosophy of submission to lawful authority, and they are found not in some recondite treatise on jurisprudence, but in a sprightly little volume by Mary Sewall Gardner, R. N., on the duties of a good nurse! For all who serve and all who live, the price of freedom may sometimes be the relinquishment of old conveniences, prestige, or cherished personal privilege. We cannot live in isolated independence, whether our part in life be that of the king in his palace, or of the nurse at the bedside of the poor. Besides ourselves with our undoubted rights, there are about a billion of other people in this world, all of whom may claim rights equally beyond question. It is a humble simile, perhaps, but life is very like a tense game set on a narrow campus. Unless the contest is conducted according to the rules, some players are likely to meet with injury, and if, for insubordination, you are put out of the game, it is you who are the loser, and not the umpire. The only way to freedom is in "a disciplined submission to those rules which, on the whole, have been worked out for the good of the greatest number." As in any game, so in the great game of life, the man who will not abide by the rules is fit only to be cast into the exterior darkness, where anarchy replaces liberty.

Divorce and Cooking

IN an excellent chapter entitled "Marriage as a Business Partnership," in her recent book, "The Margin of Happiness," Mrs. Thetta Quay Franks reminds the public once more that poor cooking is largely responsible for the scandalous growth of divorce in this country. It is probable that nowadays one out of every twelve American marriages is terminated by divorce. "Tens of thousands of homes are ruined by helpless and ignorant housekeepers," is Senator Smoot's conviction; 38.9 per cent. of the divorces granted in the United States between 1887 and 1906 were due to desertion; from 1867 to 1906 divorces for neglect to provide increased by 1331.4 per cent. and for cruelty by 1035.3 per cent. The following item from the Newark News of March 28, 1916, in the author's opinion, explains only too well what caused most of those divorces:

> Women's ignorance and neglect of home-making arts were pointed out as leading causes of family desertion, at a conference yesterday afternoon of social workers at the Wiss building. The meeting was under the auspices of the Bureau of Associated Charities. While touching on what the probation officer is doing to control the present situation, Mr. Gascoyne declared much of the blame for the delinquent husband rests on the undesirable home-conditions caused by the presence of an untrained wife.

Who can doubt it? Many a divorce had its origin at the breakfast table. Watery coffee and leaden biscuits served by a frowsy, scowling wife to an overworked, anemic husband are familiar preliminaries to a petition for divorce based on "cruelty" or "desertion." Often a wife's inability or disinclination to make the home attractive by the amiable exercise of old-fashioned household arts will drive her husband to the cheap restaurant, to the corner saloon, or to the alluring siren, and then follow divorce proceedings, with their train of disgraceful scandals, blasted lives, and orphaned children. Yet all might have been so different if the "innocent party" had only learned before she married how to cook an appetizing, economical meal. All might have been so different if she had only had the desire and the skill to model her wedded life on that of the "valiant woman" in the "Book of Wisdom" who "sought wool and flax" and "wrought by the counsel of her hands," who "bringeth her bread from afar" and has "given a prey to her household, and victuals to her maidens," who "shall not fear for her house in the cold of snow," who "looked well to the paths of her house and hath not eaten her bread idle. Her children rose up and called her blessed; her husband and he praised her."

War and Tobacco

CASSANDRA is speaking through many mouths these days, prophesying dire peril to the nation. Lately her speech moved the distinguished president of the "Non-Smokers' Protective League of America" to petition the President to save the country from the sure defeat that will follow the use of cigars, cigarettes and pipes, by our soldiers. The learned doctor avers:

> The safety of the individual and the victorious culmination of a mighty struggle for the supremacy of vital principles demand the abolition of a practice that lessens muscular strength forty-four per cent; lessens mental activity thirteen per cent; exerts a specially deleterious influence on the heart . . . not infrequently causing sudden death.

In view of these astounding figures small wonder that the petitioner considers tobacco-growers as "land-wasters" who should be treated like alien enemies.

And chocolate is quite as bad! Even the tender Kaiser, who is making every sacrifice for his warriors, has forbidden the vile stuff to the soldiers.

This in all seriousness from a patriotic American! Truly safe and distant concern for the army mothers strange fancies. Far from the shrieking shell the zealous patriot acts coolly and decides what is good and what is bad for those who are playing with death. With unerring judgment he concludes that little comforts which cheer heavy hearts must be forbidden the soldiers, by order of the Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy. The nation were doomed else, and the patriot with it. It is too bad that the men in the trenches and the surgeons at the front cannot express their opinion of this twaddle. Their language would no doubt be inelegant, but their views would be sound.

This whole incident would not be worthy of notice, did it not point to a growing tendency which is working itself out in various forms of fanaticism, like absolute prohibition of alcoholic beverages and tobacco. A persistent and unwise minority, forgetful of the rights of the majority and oblivious of the fact that men cannot be dragooned into virtue, clamor for executive orders and legislation that defeat the purpose in view. Unfortunately such men triumph in the end, only to take to cover when the inevitable reaction against unnecessary and unpopular laws sets in. Let the soldiers smoke, cigars, if they can get them, cigarettes, if they like them, pipes, if nothing else is at hand. And let the poor workman drink a glass of beer at lunch. It will cheer his heart and probably save his wife from many a gruff rebuke.

The Cat and the Bag

NO modern, agile cat can be kept in a bag for any great length of time. The occasion for escape is sure to come, and the last evil is worse than the first.

The war has offered a chance for many a feline to come into the open; as a consequence the country is overrun with the pestiferous creatures, which are doing their best to make discomfort doubly uncomfortable. The most aggressive of these animals have taken the form of forty radical papers which are striving to discredit the Government, some indeed going to the outrageous extent of suggesting a "bloody revolution," in order to cripple the hands of the President. And thereby hangs a tale briefly told. Before the war the majority of these journals bent all their powers to scurrilous attacks on the Church, not because they believed that institution corrupt or dangerous, but simply because it stood for authority against anarchy. And the Government was well pleased with conditions. Though the wretched sheets were vile beyond expression, and caluminous to a degree unexcelled in the history of that crime, yet the mails were open to them and they were carried from one end of the country to the other, leaving slime and hatred in their wake. There is the tale, and the lesson is clear. Such papers exist not to disseminate news or to defend principle, but to reflect the sordid, elemental passions of their editors who grow rich on calumny. And be it remembered that in the list of journals considered enemies of the United States in this, the greatest crisis of the country's history, are the very papers that have made a business of calumniating the Church, priests, Sisters and Catholic laymen. In this fact lie both a consolation and a warning.

"Fortes Creantur Fortibus"

"IF you didn't want to go, Jack, I should feel that I'd been the wrong sort of mother," is the admirable comment made by "The Whistling Mother," the heroine of an excellent war-story that has lately appeared, when she learned that her enthusiastic son was among the first to volunteer. She had little advice to give her boy when the hour of parting came, for, as he remarks: "If she hadn't done her level best, long before that, to teach me to keep clean, and think straight and 'hit the line hard,' it was too late to begin then." Mothers and sons whose sincere convictions nowadays are expressed in words like the foregoing are true patriots indeed. According to the old Latin line: "Fortes creantur fortibus et bonis," "The brave are generated by the brave and good," and it is particularly true of mothers. On no one else does the burden of war bear more heavily. Fathers freely offer their means to their country, sons nobly offer their lives, but mothers in giving their boys, generously offer what is often far dearer to them than life itself. However, if they are not "the wrong sort of mother" they will make the sacrifice bravely, remembering that the call of their country is the call of righteousness.

Moreover, mothers of that kind will have, in all probability, sons who are worthy of them. In the first place they will not be youths who are so enfeebled by self-indulgence and evil living that they are unable to meet a soldier's physical requirements. Secondly, because a patriot-mother has taught them from their earliest years "to keep clean, and think straight and 'hit the line hard,'" they will not easily forget the lesson at the time it is most needed, amid the temptations of camp-life and the horrors of the front. Finally, if the influence exerted by the memory of a thoroughly patriotic mother will do so much to keep our soldiers sober, chaste, and courageous, what high-minded and invincible defenders of their country they will be, if they are also armed with a living practical faith in Christianity, particularly if they are consistent adherents of the only perfect form of Christianity there is: Catholicism?

A Politician in Georgia

"WAY down" in Georgia a fledgling Baptist minister, just twenty-one years old, recently jumped into the State legislature, from an anti-Catholic platform. Naturally many Catholic Georgians were curious to know why the youthful preacher, turned Solon overnight, hated the Church so vehemently. After a while one of these Catholics addressed a query to the flaming Baptist and received in reply the following amusing letter:

You are at liberty to publish this, if you desire, as there is nothing secret about it. J. S. W.

State of Georgia
House of Representatives
Atlanta. July 23, 1917.

Mr. Chas. C. Thorn, General Agent,
201 Trust Co. of Ga. Bldg., Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Sir:

Yours of the 19th inst. received today. It gives me pleasure to state why I am opposed to Roman Catholics teaching in our public schools. 1st. They are the sworn subjects of a foreign potentate, the Pope, who resides in Rome, Italy, and who advocates the union of church and State, the nullifying of all Protestant and civil marriage, and whose decrees, past and present, condemn our public schools, teaching the old, musty slogan of the Dark Ages that "Ignorance is the mother of devotion." 2nd. The Catholics, at the dictates of Bishop Keiley, have defied the law of Georgia, thus proving that they would obey their foreign law in preference to the law of our State, and any person who takes an oath binding him to disregard the civil law when that law conflicts with Roman Catholic law, should not be allowed to teach in the public schools, which are supported solely by the State government. 3rd. There are no teachers employed in Catholic schools, except Catholics. Why? Because they might teach Catholic boys and girls that the Catholic religion is unsound and wrong. According to the same rule, I oppose the employment of Catholic teachers in our public schools, because they might—and it has been openly charged by Dr. Keese, that they do—teach that the Catholic religion is the best and only true religion.

Show to me that the Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, or any other denomination are guilty of the foregoing attempts to defy the law of Georgia, and I will oppose them teaching in our public schools. I have not the least degree of baleful prejudice against anyone, but because the Catholic Church is an organized political hierarchy; because the Popes have always hurled anathemas against all forms of civil and religious liberty; and because they antagonize our public schools, and all independent, democratic forms of government, I am forced to say their followers should not teach their poisonous doctrine in our public schools. You may not be familiar with the teachings of your church and its "infallible heads," but if you will study its doctrines and practices, you will find it exactly as I say.

If you don't know that Bishop Keiley of Savannah, served notice that he would not allow the Veazy Law enforced in his diocese, except on terms specified by him, the Bishop, then you should inquire of some of your Catholic friends and learn if I am correct. I also cite you to the divorce case of Frank Boifeuillet's wife, of the courts of Bibb county (Macon), when she was granted a complete divorce and her maiden name restored, about the first of February, 1916, because her husband told her she was his concubine until their marriage was reaffirmed and sanctified by a Catholic priest (Bachelor, I presume). Are not these instances of papal contempt for our laws sufficient cause for alarm?

I take it you are an honest man, and merely lacking in information concerning your own denomination, therefore I refer you to the greatest living authority on the Catholic question, Hon. Thos. E. Watson, of Thomson, Ga. His writings on all subjects have long since been pronounced standard and authentic, as he refers to the page and title of Catholic authors and theologians, to back his every charge and instead of proving him untruthful, the champions of your creed, including the Catholic Laymen's Association, merely fly off the handle and indulge in abuse. This, I trust, sufficient and satisfactory explanation of my reasons for the platform you read.

Respectfully,
(Signed) J. Seaborn Winn,
Rep. Hart Co.

A mere editor is powerless before such ministerial eloquence, capitalized and uncapitalized, punctuated and unpunctuated. The dear boy-preacher, fresh from school, knows "heaps of things that ain't true," so many "heaps" in fact that they cannot be demolished in one lifetime.

No wonder. His tutor and mentor is the Hon. Thomas E. Watson of Thomson, Ga., a man who is just at present a near-traitor to his country. What patriotic Georgians think of the "greatest living authority on the Catholic question," who sent his daughter to a convent to be educated, may be gleaned from these forceful words of M. L. Brittain, State Superintendent of Public Schools in Georgia, spoken just after his son had enlisted.

But in the sadness there is a pride in his response to his country's call, and I would not change places with those of you in Gwinett who have been led into treason through following that combination of Judas Iscariot and Benedict Arnold called Thomas. E. Watson. Always a common liar by nature and character assassin by trade, he first abused President Wilson for his long patience and delay, and now that war is declared he tries to weaken the President's arm by counseling resistance to the law of the land which has shielded the slacker hides of his deluded followers. Will you follow such a yellow dog?

A Representative from Hart County is actually following Mr. Watson. Poor boy, he has much to learn.

Literature

JUSTUS VAN DEN VONDEL

GREAT minds grapple with great themes. They seize upon them with something of that resistless instinct which drives the eagle in its flight above the clouds. Michael Angelo has no rest until he lifts the Pantheon into the skies; Aristotle must codify the laws of human thought; St. Thomas Aquinas views with unerring glance the whole economy of Catholic theology in a synthesis as vast and harmonious as a Gothic cathedral; Shakespeare takes for his province the mysteries of the human heart; Aeschylus chains Prometheus to the rocks of Caucasus and paints the Furies in their relentless pursuit of the sinner and his crime; Milton views heaven, earth and hell, entrances us with the peace and happiness of Eden's bowers, ravishes us with the melody of the harp and psaltery of angelic hosts or terrifies us with the wailing and the curses of the eternal prison-house. These are the kings by right divine of the realm of letters, philosophy and art.

To this high company belongs Justus Van Den Vondel, the glory of Dutch literature, its most renowned poet, probably its greatest name. His tragedy of "Lucifer" is one of the world's immortal books, massive, terrifying, a brother to the "Macbeth" of Shakespeare, the "Prometheus" of Aeschylus, Goethe's "Faust," and the "Samson Agonistes" of Milton. The "Lucifer" appeared thirteen years before the "Paradise Lost." By some Vondel is said to have inspired the English bard. Many contend that the latter actually plagiarized from the Dutch writer. A list of parallelisms between the "Lucifer" and the "Paradise Lost," originally given in George Edmundson's "Milton and Vondel," is now reprinted in the scholarly translation of the great Dutch master, which appeared some years ago and has again been recently given to the public. (Vondel's "Lucifer." Translated by Leonard C. Van Noppen: Greensboro, N. C. Charles L. Van Noppen.)

The reader can judge for himself how close has been the imitation. More than a hundred passages are given from the "Paradise Lost" to bear out the contention. But they no more prove it than the close similarity between scores of verses in the "Aeneid" prove that Vergil plagiarized from Homer. That Vondel furnished the Puritan poet with material, with inspiration, with imagery, there can be little doubt. But from such assistance to the downright robbery with which Milton is indicted there is a far cry. Great minds, searching into the secrets of the heart, must at times light upon the same revelations of passion and character, and unfold them in the same form. To Vondel, however, must be given the credit of having first treated in large, regular and majestic lines the titanic subject of the fall of the Angels and their Chief. Vondel sings of the fall of Lucifer, Milton of man's first disobedience and the fruit of the forbidden tree.

Vondel's subject, in its main outlines, was not untried before the day of the great Dutch and Puritan poets. It had been sung in Caedmon's story of the creation and fall of the Angels, which Francis Junius had given to the public not long before, in the "Adamo" of Andreini, the "Adamus Exul" of Vondel's great countryman, Hugo Grotius, in Taubmann's "Bellum Angelicum," and Caspar Staphoristius' "Triumphus Pacis." Not many years previously, a Jesuit scholar, James Masenius, professor of eloquence and literature at Cologne, had published a Latin poem on the Incarnation entitled "Sarcotis."

"Sarcotis" and Masenius have given rise to a famous literary controversy, for in 1747, a Scotchman, William Lauder, startled the literary world by an article published in the Gentleman's Magazine, in which he stated that Milton had skilfully and copiously plagiarized from the work of the Jesuit professor. He went further in subsequent papers and attempted to show that Milton had also plundered from the "Adamus Exul" of Grotius and the "Poemata Sacra" of Andrew Ramsay. Even Dr. Johnson seems to have been deceived. But Warburton, Douglas and Bowle detected the fraud. A minute examination of the texts of Masenius proved that the passages which Lauder ascribed to him, were not to be found in the best texts and that they had been interpolated by the skilful forger from William Hog's Latin-verse rendering of "Paradise Lost."

That Milton was influenced by Vondel, is more than likely. But we can acquit him of servile imitation or plagiarism. There were many points of contact between the two men. There burned in the hearts of both the same flame of genuine poetic inspiration. They both had absorbed all the wisdom and the lore of ancient Greece and Rome. But Milton was perhaps the more accomplished scholar. He could compete on their own ground with the most learned men of his time. In the heart of the Puritan, there lingered a spark of the genius of the Hebrew Prophets. From the seers and the singers of Israel, Vondel, in his "Joseph" and "Jeptha," drew his noblest inspirations.

They were both poet-politicians, mingling in the mighty events of a troubled age. Both touched the heights of the sublime. Virility, splendor, strength, depth, substance are the main characteristics of the Dutch as well as of the English poet. They are at home with angelic cohorts, they joy in the shock of onset on the perilous heights of the battlements of heaven. Their harp is attuned to softer accents as they describe the peace and happiness of the earthly paradise. In Vondel, especially after his conversion to Catholicism, there is a softer note than in the stern Puritan. But the flight which buoyed Milton up beyond the "starry bounds of space and time" seems to have lifted him but once to the regions of the sublime. Vondel, no doubt, reached the limit of the sublime in "Lucifer." But this was not the only drama in which he manifested his extraordinary powers in a manner worthy of his genius. In "Palamedes" or "Murdered Innocence" he had immortalized the tragic fate of the aged Advocate of the States-General, John Van Oldenbarneveldt, in a wonderful drama which even to this day stirs the blood of every Hollander. Their emotions are no less powerfully aroused when they read or see the splendid tragedy of "Gysbrecht Van Amstel" as truly a national play as the "Iphigenia in Aulis" or the "Persae."

The "Lucifer" is a daring conception. It is built on the simple but beautiful lines of the Greek masters. From the peaceful joys and the bliss of the angelic cohorts in the bowers of heaven, it passes naturally to the gloom of conspiracy occasioned and motived by the two controlling forces of the play, the envy in the heart of Lucifer and his hosts, of man's power and the jealousy of man's happiness. Through the storms and seas of sedition, it plunges with the force of an irresistible torrent down to the endless gulf of ruin through the flood and flame of the Divine wrath and vengeance. Never did tragedy more perfectly fulfil its purpose, that of moving the sentiment, of pity and terror and of purifying the passions. The "Lucifer" "is the drama of a magnificent ruin." It does not deal with men, but it is full of passion. It seethes with the conflict of the opposing emotions of angelic wills, the wills of Lucifer, of Belial, of Beelzebub, of Apolion, with those of Michael and Raphael, with the irresistible will of Jehovah himself.

The tragedy rises to the very crest of demonic pride and the fiercest outburst of rage and uncontrolled love of power and dominion; it melts to the softest strains of friendship and tenderness in the noble passage where Raphael, "sublime in devotion, infinite in pity, immaculate in holiness," pleads with the rebel Lucifer "overwhelming in passion, gigantic in intellect, resistless in will" to cease from his hopeless and sacrilegious attempt. Never did poet before so strikingly contrast the genius of evil and the spirit of virtue and holiness. The Angels of Vondel, fallen Thrones, Dominations and Powers; the steady squadrons of Light and Love, who remain faithful to Jehovah, are splendidly drawn. They are not mere abstractions. They burn with the fires and the light of their own immortal natures; Lucifer and his "horrid crew" for their own ruin and destruction; Michael and his cohorts and his brother-chiefs, with all the beauty and glory of their devotion. The rays from the throne of God flash on the helms and spears with which they drove the infernal host over the crystal battlements. The action is swift, resistless, a mighty river rolling to a Niagara of defeat, disaster, irremediable doom. And over the clash of onset, we hear in those choral odes, the pride of Dutch lyric song, the shout of defiance of the rebel host, the pæan and the triumphant song of the victorious army of the Living God, the wail of the lost and the damned, the trisagion unending of the armies of light.

Vondel is the embodiment of all that is best in Dutch literature and national life. Catholics the world over have every reason to be proud of the conquest which the Catholic Church made of the intellect and the heart of this great man. Great at all times, even in the earliest essays of his dramatic genius, such as the "Pascha," Vondel reached the full measure of his genius and his art, only after his gifts had been so to say, carried to serener heights and larger horizons by his conversion to the Catholic Faith.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

REVIEWS

A Scallop Shell of Quiet. Introduced by MARGARET L. WOODS. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.60.

This dainty little book is the twelfth number of the "Adventurers All" series of "young poets unknown to fame," and contains four Englishwomen's verses which are characterized as the introduction well remarks, "by a spirit of piety . . . as well as a spirit of pity, and a response to the actual touch of life." The ten poems contributed by Miss Enid Dennis are for the most part fragrant with Catholic devotion. There is a joyous mysticism in "The Blithesome Quest," which begins the volume, and "The Song of the Churchmen" merrily praises the homely utility of medieval England's piety. No doubt Mr. Belloc and Mr. Chesterton will especially admire the stanza which runs:

Who were the taverners, say, in old England?
  The Churchmen? Yea, in sooth,
  For when manners were uncouth,
They dispensed a gentle courtesy in England.
  And they sealed the Abbey brew
  With a double cross, mark you,
Lest the people should go fainting after Mass-time.
  And the brown beer they out-poured
  To the glory of the Lord
When the Feast was still as holy as the fast time.

Most of our readers will probably agree that the finest poem in the book is Miss Dennis's "The Sisters of Perpetual Adoration," of whom she sings:

. . . . They lingered when the banqueting had ceased
To thank Thee—and the moments sped apace:
Still at the undiminishable feast
They say perpetual grace,
Thy guests, dear Lord, who while the years take wing,
Their Benedicite before Thine Altar sing.
For hunger hath not naked left the Board
Whose Heavenly food the quickening spirit held.
That love its gift might render to the Lord,
To stay Thou wert compelled,
Though for the guest Thy Board no more was spread—
How could they let Thee go?—Thou who art Living Bread!

For these brief, beauteous moments of the morn
When Thou didst deign within their hearts to dwell,
Demand the intervening hours forlorn
In which Thy praise to tell.
So must they needs, in love and holy fear,
Adore Thee from afar, who came so near—so near! . . . .

Among the thirteen poems of Helen Douglas-Irvine, the best are those describing the beauty she discerns even in city streets. The following poem, "Flowers to Sell," shows her manner:

Pale gold 'mid dirt and stones
  Radiant, victorious,
Piled high by grim, sad crones
  Who, disillusioned,
Blinded, spill lucent gold,
  Sell gold to Londoners:
Orfevery for coppers sold.

Fragrance of earth and rain,
  Wilderness of springtime,
Brought by the London train;
  Grace that from quietude
Comes to the tortured street,
  Captive incredible,
Lovely, elusive, sweet.

"Mary, Mother, bid voor ons!" is the refrain of Gertrude Vaughan's moving poem, called "At a Field Hospital." "No News" beautifully expresses the author's faith in the ministry of angels and here is her offering to Blessed Joan of Arc, over whose statue hung a lily:

A lily leaned her lovely lips—
  Carmine-stippled,
  Zephyr-rippled—
Until her stamens, pollen-laden,
Thine aureole were, O Warrior Maiden!
And, shrouding thee with lambent flame,
Breathed incense to thy deathless name
And so thine oriflamme became.

Ruth Young, the last of the four contributors to the volume, pays the memory of "an aged priest" a tribute, containing the lines:

Never, since Life began
Death offered less reason for tears!
He rests now, after long years
Of ministry never denied
To all who rejoiced or who sighed.

and the present conflict suggests the well-expressed thoughts in "A Little Tree at Les Posses," "Paris," "Stars" and "A Rainbow in War Time."

W. D.

History of the Spanish Conquest of Yucatan and of the Itzas. By PHILIP AINSWORTH MEANS. The Peabody Museum of American Archaeology, Harvard University.

We all have an idea of Yucatan, and most of us, if given a moment or two for observation, could point it out on the map. Not many of us know anything about the Itzas; and therefore we are under obligation to Mr. Means, a graduate student, and to the Peabody Institute for the light thrown on this subject. It is satisfactory to see that Mr. Means follows later investigators, who reject the claim made for an obvious reason by earlier writers, on behalf of American civilization, of an extreme antiquity, and hold it to be with regard to that of the old world very modern indeed.

For the ordinary reader some points might be made clearer. On page 142, a note gives some explanation of the method of measuring time; but not enough to show how 8.6.2.4.17 correspond to 100 B. C., and 8.14.3.1.2 to 50 A. D. We are sorry too that Mr. Means falls into the tourist trick of jumbling English and Spanish together. Why should we have, "the Reverend Reader Fray," so and so; "Missionary Padre Fray" somebody also; "Beneficiado" and "Maestro de Capilla" mixed up with "singers" and "sacristans"? Moreover, "making continual sacrifices and orisons" is a strange way of expressing the Friars' occupation. As in all publications of this class, we are made to see the virtue of the missionaries and the obstacles put in their way by lay avarice and cruelty. Mr. Means tells it all very sympathetically, and we are most grateful for the detailed account of Fr. Avcudaño's sufferings in the wilderness (pp. 158-173) with their many wonderful interpositions of Divine Providence and the wonderful miracle by which, according to the account of Fr. Avcudaño, they were terminated. This book therefore, is most interesting for Catholics. H. W.

A Standard Method of Testing Juvenile Mentality by the Binet-Simon Scale. By NORBERT J. MELVILE. Illustrated. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $2.00.

The Psychology of Special Abilities and Disabilities. By AUGUSTA F. BRONNER, Ph.D. Boston: Little, Brown and Co. $1.75.

No device of the psychological laboratory has been more misunderstood than the Binet-Simon and similar scales, and this misunderstanding has been furthered by the vagaries of the amateur psychologist proclaiming, as Binet and Simon never did, their complete infallibility. Mr. Melville insists that these tests are worse than useless unless conducted by qualified experts, men broad enough to realize that as yet certain phases of the soul's activities defy analysis and tabulation. They are not automatic methods, "comparable to a weighing machine on which one need but stand in order that the machine throw out the weight printed on a ticket." Hence, "we insist that a Binet age score, a Goddard age score, and the like, be not accepted on their face value, recommending their interpretation in terms of mental growth periods in the light of group norms, and of supplementary data."

Mr. Melvile candidly admits that thus "we seem to open the door to arbitrary opinions, and to deprive our methods of all precision." He thinks, however, that this objection is largely overcome by the fact that the Binet-Simon method "unfolds according to an invariable plan" and compares the replies of the subject "with a norm which is a real average determined by experience." But this is the precise point of the difficulty. A "norm" is fixed and objective, and Mr. Melville admits that the scales are only "partially standardized." But if the length of an inch is the x of the problem, it is no solution to say that one foot is equal to x taken twelve times. It may, however, be the first step toward the solution; and working along the scientific lines traced by Healy, Melville and other investigators of like spirit, psychologists may yet fix upon a standard which will raise the Binet-Simon and similar tests, to a point where their results will be definite measurement, rather than as at present, useful conjecture.

As might be expected from an investigator trained in the school of Dr. William Healy, Dr. Bronner eschews imagination and evaluates her findings in the light of ascertained facts. That the inter-relations of soul and body are exceedingly close, is almost a truism with Catholic philosophers, and has ever been. Who of us has not had a "grouch" before his morning coffee? What appears to be laziness or disorderly behavior in a child, may be traceable to defective eyesight, to occluded nasal passages, or other physical disorders, quite as well as to sloth or malice. Medical inspection has perhaps been overdone in many public schools, but some of our own establishments have sinned by the opposite extreme. Even teachers have dolce far niente days, and under the onslaught of a violent toothache not all of us reproduce the meekness of Moses and the patience of Job. To expect normal progress and satisfactory conduct from an ill-nourished child who cannot see clearly or breathe properly, is the height of unreason. What is here needed is medical attention, not exhortations to emulate the bee. One of the best chapters in this book, which may be cordially recommended to teachers and social workers, is Dr. Bronner's discussion of "Some Present Educational Tendencies."

P. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The latest volume of the English Dominicans' excellent translation of St. Thomas's "Summa" (Benziger, $2.25) begins "The Second Part of the Second Part," and embraces Questions I to XLVI, which treat of the theological virtues, faith, hope and charity, with their numerous ramifications and sub-divisions, and of the vices opposed to them. Those to whom the Latin of the Angelical Doctor shuts his works, are fortunate in having so good a translation as this at their command.——M. H. Gill & Son, Ltd., of Dublin, have placed with B. Herder, their American agents, a new edition of the reformed Roman Breviary. Each of the four 32-mo. volumes is five inches by three and three-fourths, weighs five ounces, is bound in limp morocco, and is printed on gilt-edged India paper. The price is $8.00 a set. The Breviary's rubrics are all done in black, the matter is arranged conveniently and there seem to be as few cross-references as possible. But priests with aging eyes will perhaps consider the print too fine.

In his valuable little book "The House Fly, a Slayer of Men" (Longmans, $0.35), Mr. F. W. Fitzsimons, F.Z.S., F.R.M.S., etc., seems to have gathered enough damaging facts to ruin forever the reputation of the musca domestica. He bids the reader remember that "a single female fly can, under favorable conditions be the parent of 7,000,000,000,000 flies in a season." He shows how these vile insects prefer to feed on the filthiest substances, thus infecting with disease germs all foodstuffs they can reach. He tells of an anti-fly campaign, conducted in Johannesburg, South Africa, that accomplished the death of 61,943,000 flies, "which means that there were the following summer season 67,901,083,980,428,722,176,000,000,000,000,000 fewer flies." These surprisingly accurate numbers represent, no doubt, a very conservative estimate. The author also gives startling figures to show how flies propagate enteric fever, tuberculosis and pneumonia and twenty-two pictures illustrating the nature and the habits of the fly make the book more convincing still.

"Mass in Honor of St. Catherine. Op. 55, S. S. A. with Organ" (Fischer, $0.80), by René L. Becker, and "Mass in Honor of St. Ciro. Op. 105. Unison" (Fischer, $0.60), by E. Bottigliero, are recently-published pieces of church music. The first, by Mr. Becker, in three parts, is well adapted to the average choir of sopranos and altos. It is comparatively simple, with no solo parts, and is especially commendable for its good harmonization and skilful voice arrangement. But it lacks a general theme, being a series of pleasant, but rather secular, melodies, and without very much variety. If a composer does not feel inspired with a definite musical concept, or theme, which will give a certain unity of style and coordination of parts to an entire Mass, why would it not be well to borrow a Gregorian theme and develop it? "The Mass in Honor of St. Ciro" is a good composition, quite melodious, and of medium range. The frequent alternation of solo and chorus parts gives variety, and prevents the monotony which sometimes accompanies unison singing. Some of the passages intended for the chorus are written in a style better suited to solo work, being so sustained as to require the expression of an individual voice. As to the general character of the Mass, it is on the border-line of secularism. The theme is above reproach, musically, but breathes only faintly the spirit of the Church.

The readers of "Christine" (Macmillan, $1.25) by Alice Cholmondeley will probably be at a loss to know how much of the book is fact and how much fiction. It purports to be a series of letters, dated from May 28 to August 6, 1914, and written to her mother by a gifted young English violinist who was studying at Berlin. In the preface we are told: "I am publishing the letters just as they came to me, leaving out nothing," and the publishers then announce that they "have considered it best to alter some of the personal names in the following pages." Yet the writer's keen analysis of the German character, her vivid description of how Berlin behaved during the first few days of the war, her romantic affair with the officer who hated militarism so, the astonishment her skill with the violin caused the Germans, and the wit, cleverness and literary finish of the letters will make the average reader suspect that he is enjoying a book of fiction. "The war killed Christine" writes her mother, for she "died at a hospital in Stuttgart on the morning of August 8, 1914, of acute double pneumonia" brought on by exposure while trying to leave Germany. It would be interesting to know what Berliners made of the author's name.

To those who are anxious to get back to the land Freeman Tilden gives good advice, in his book called "Second Wind" (Huebsch, $1.00). It purports to be the story of a college professor, Alexander Hadlock, who was alone in the world at sixty-two, without money and without opportunity to earn money. He took up farming and made a success of it. The farms are calling for the right kind of people, according to the author, and the right kind of people are splendid failures, successful men and women, and second-wind folk. With energy, persistence and pluck, the right kind of people will prove successful farmers. There must be too, that character-trait that Freeman Tilden calls, the "feeling for excellence." The book is interesting and contains much valuable information for the farmer and would-be farmer.—— "The Book of Camping" (Alfred A. Knopf, New York, $1.00), by A. Hyatt Verrill, is a practical and comprehensive handbook, of necessary information for the prospective camper. A glance through the contents shows a thoroughness of treatment, while even a cursory reading gives evidence of common-sense and experience on the part of the author. But to gain the full benefit of his advice the book must be studied and his directions carefully practised. There are copious illustrations, with pictures and drawings that are easily comprehended.

In a paper on "The Poetry of Circumstance," contributed by Lady Katharine Stuart to the July-August Poetry Review, she includes her two stanzas entitled "Charlotte Brontë in Heaven," which runs as follows:

I saw the dames of honor wait
  Upon the Queen of Heav'n;
So merry, yet withal sedate
  Are they—the sisters seven!
Rosetta holds a deep red rose,
  Jeanne d'Arc, her lilies gay;
Cecilia's canticles do close
  As Agnes kneels to pray;
The fair Elizabeth lets fall
  Her kirtleful of flowers.

Terésa tells her rosary,
  Clare turns her book of hours.
As I beheld a dame drew nigh
  With worship in her eyes.
Cried she: "Alack! What part have I
  In yonder Paradise?"
Then answered the celestial choir:
  "On earth they worship art;
In heaven we cherish and admire
  Humility of heart."

Major A. Corbett-Smith quotes these fine lines from Miss Renshaw's poems on the airmen who sail:

Among wind-music and the great sad dreams
Of dying suns, and frail cloud-drift that streams
Past like a hunted thing! . . .
Almost they brush the splendor of the stars,
And sway the low red lantern of the moon
With wind-beats of swift wings.

And Eric Chilman sings thus of "After-Days":

When the last gun has long withheld
  Its thunder, and its mouth is sealed,
Strong men shall drive the furrow straight
  On some remembered battlefield.

Untroubled they shall hear the loud
  And gusty driving of the rains,
And birds with immemorial voice
  Sing as of old in leafy lanes.

The stricken, tainted soil shall be Again a flowery paradise—
Pure with the memory of the dead
  And purer for their sacrifice.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
Martie the Unconquered. By Kathleen Norris. Illustrated by Charles E. Chambers. $1.35; The Whistling Mother. By Grace S. Richmond. $0.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Canada the Spellbinder. By Lilian Whiting. With Many Illustrations in Color and Monotone. $2.50; America's Case Against Germany. By Lindsay Rogers, Ph.D., LL.B. $1.50; Civilized Commercialism. By Ernest G. Stevens. $1.25; Gone to Earth. By Mary Webb. $1.50.

William Heinemann, London:
France. By Christophe Nyrop. Translated from the Danish by C. A. Bang & A. G. Chater. One shilling.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
War Food. Practical and Economical Methods of Keeping Vegetables, Fruits and Meats. By Amy L. Handy. $0.75; The British Navy at War. By W. Macneile Dixon. $0.75.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
The Journal of Leo Tolstoi. First Volume—1895-1899. Translated from the Russian by Rose Strunsky. $2.00.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Little Pilgrims to Our Lady of Lourdes. By Mrs. Francis Blundell. $1.10; The Mystical Knowledge of God. An Essay in the Art of Knowing and Loving the Divine Majesty. By Dom Savinien Louismet, O.S.B. $0.75.

John Lane Co., New York:
Through the Iron Bars. Two years of German occupation in Belgium. By Emile Cammaerts. Illustrated with cartoons by Louis Raemaekers.

Boni & Liveright, Inc., New York:
Best Russian Short Stories. Compiled and Edited by Thomas Seltzer. $0.60.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
An Introduction to Political Philosophy. By H. P. Farrell, M.A. $1.25; Songs on Service. By Eliot Crawshay-Williams. $0.90; Backgrounds. By Grace Mary Golden. $0.36; The Method in the Madness. A Fresh Consideration of the Case between Germany and Ourselves. By Edwyn Bevan. $0.50; The Public School System in Relation to the Coming Conflict for National Supremacy. By V. Seymour Bryant, M.A. With a Preface by Lord Rayleigh. $0.50; At a Venture. Poems by Eight Writers. $0.60; Aldebaran. By M. St. Clare Byrne. $0.60; First Violations of International Law by Germany, Luxembourg and Belgium. By Louis Renault. Translated from the Original by Frank Carr.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Bromley Neighborhood. By Alice Brown. $1.50; Christine. By Alice Cholmondeley. $1.25.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago:
A Soldier of France to His Mother. Letters from the Trenches on the Western Front. Translated with an Introduction by Theodore Stanton, M.A. $1.00.

Mission Press, Techny:
The Ebb and Flow of Life. New Stories for Old and Young. In Four Volumes. By Konrad Kummel. Translated from the Third and Fourth German Editions with the Permission of the Author. By a Father of St. Bede Abbey, Peru, Ill. $5.00.

C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd., London:
The Menace of the Empty Cradle. Where It is, Why It is and What is Its Cure. By Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J. One shilling.

The Penn Publishing Co., Philadelphia:
Mistress Anne. By Temple Bailey. Illustrations by F. Vaux Wilson. $1.35.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Margin of Happiness. The Reward of Thrift. By Thetta Quay Franks. $1.50.

EDUCATION

"Does Education Pay?"

A GREAT New York department store is now preaching through the pages of the metropolitan press, a sermon most fit for the ears of parents. "A considerable part of a business like ours," writes the manager, "is conducted by boy power." In discussing this phase of modern industry, the manager goes on to score two good points on the training of children, especially boys. "Our trouble," he explains, "is to get the right kind of boy."

After an experience of many years, he finds that very few boys, offering themselves for employment, "have any serious purpose, or attach any value to permanence." In their eyes a "job" is a "job," a source of present income, with little or no reference to the future. Hence "they go on the slightest pretext —an easier job, shorter hours, a trifle more pay." Whether they are really learning anything from their work, or whether the new employment is in any sense fitting them to become productive citizens of the future, are matters with which they do not concern themselves. "It must be," concludes the philosophic manager, "that the fault is not all with the boy." If it is absolutely necessary that a sixteen-year-old boy take some part in the support of the family, the least that parents can do is "to encourage him to get a job in a reputable place, and keep it," to learn all that he can about his employment, and thus fit himself for rapid advancement.

Sacrificing the Future for the Present

OF greater value is the manager's second suggestion. Admitting that his advertisement is "frankly a bid for boys," he writes, "Of course, school is the place for the sixteen-year-old boy, and college for the exceptional boy." Here is food for thought, meat for strong men, especially pastors and fathers. More than once during the past ten years have critics noted that the attendance of boys and girls at Catholic high schools and colleges is low in proportion to the Catholic population. In some parts of the country, the number is, apparently, falling. If half of what the critics say is true, the prospect is somewhat ominous. We cannot play our part in public life, or contribute our influence to the uplifting of the professions, unless we make every effort to give our children an education. In this, we can learn a valuable lesson from the Italian and Jewish immigrants in New York, among whom it is not uncommon to see a whole family living contented, almost in penury, to give the gifted child, first a collegiate, then a professional education. Many American parents, it may justly be feared, are easily caught by the prospect of immediate returns. Why send Johnny to high school or college, when he can go into an office at once, on a weekly honorarium of eight or ten dollars? Could they but look into the future and see middle-aged Johnny still engaged in minor duties at a menial's salary, they would gladly sacrifice present convenience, for the larger opportunities of the future. "Will an education pay?" asks a writer in the current American Israelite. "Pay in what? In money? In nine cases out of ten it does that. Statistics show that the vast majority of men who stand high in business have been educated men." This is expert testimony from one of a race that has always exercised a dominating influence in commerce and finance. As the catalogues of American colleges and universities testify, our Jewish brethren are practising what they preach.

The Early Limit

IN the Borough of Brooklyn dwells an authority on the problems of the boy and the young man, Mr. Patrick Mallon. For about fifteen years, Mr. Mallon has worked in conjunction with the Juvenile Court. The experience thus gathered from thousands of cases involving the reconstruction of the individual and of the home, enables him to speak from full knowledge. Among the causes, both of juvenile delinquency and of failure in after-life, Mr. Mallon enumerates the shortsighted parents who take their children from school at the earliest moment, when with a little sacrifice, they might have given them a high school or even a collegiate education. He continues:

> With the greater facilities for obtaining an advanced education, it is becoming more and more difficult to get a position above the rank of an office-boy or messenger, without a high school education. The lad who left school just as soon as he could procure his working papers is greatly handicapped when he reaches his eighteenth year, because his wants are increased, and he naturally looks for a better-paying position, but finds his lack of education a serious drawback. Under such circumstances many a boy considers that he is not fairly treated by his employer, and throws up his position for a better-paying one. It is while waiting for the better-paying job to turn up that many boys form undesirable acquaintances on the street-corners or in the pool-rooms, and before they realize it they have joined the ranks of those who try to live without working.

"A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush" is an adage absolutely untrue, if made to apply to the pittance which the boy or girl who should be in school, gains at the office or factory. Every social worker has met cases, in which naturally capable young men and women were absolutely unable to make any advance after the first few years, because of their lack of mental training. They have reached their limit, and it is a limit that is rather low.

The Financial Returns of Education

ACCORDING to the Chicago News, parents who wish their children to become "financial successes" ought to know that, generally speaking, a man's earning capacity is in direct proportion to his education. Uneducated laborers earn on an average $500 for forty years, a total of $20,000. The annual average is clearly below the level of a decent living wage for a man of family. Ignorance is thus a fruitful source of destitution. High school graduates will earn during the same period about $40,000. By a clever deduction, the News essays to fix the exact amount which each day of schooling adds to the worker's income. A high school education calls for twelve years of 180 days, or 2,160 days in all. If this total adds $20,000 to the earning capacity, it follows that each day at school means an increase of $9.02 to the total income of forty years. Likewise does it follow, that unless a child leaves school to engage in work for a greater daily compensation than $9.02, he is actually losing money. That seems to show that education pays.

From Chicago also, comes a unique booklet, "Preparing for Success in Life," by the Rev. Fitzgeorge Dinneen, S.J. "Who wins in athletic contests?" asks Father Dinneen. "The trained man. Who wins in the keen competition of business and professional life? The trained mind." Father Dinneen maintains that it "can be proved by history and statistics" that "most successful men, as a rule, are college graduates." Certainly, there are college men who have made a failure of life; not because of, but in spite of, their college training. Since man's will is free, not even a course devised by an archangel could guarantee uniform success. Nevertheless > College graduates make up about one per cent of the total male population of the United States. Yet this one per cent furnishes sixty per cent of the successful and influential men of the country, leaving only forty per cent of the best places for the other ninety-nine per cent of the population.

>
> Furthermore, small as is the percentage of college-bred men, fifty-eight per cent of the men who have been Presidents, Vice-Presidents, Justices of the Supreme Court, Cabinet members, Senators and Representatives, were college graduates.
>
> A boy trained in the common schools has one chance in forty thousand. High school training will increase his chances twenty-three times. A college education will increase the chance of the high school boy nine times, giving him two hundred and twenty times the chance of the common school boy.

Absolute accuracy is not claimed for these figures. But Father Dinneen is right in his contention that they are near enough to the truth to prove that "a higher education gives a man a tremendous advantage. The reasons are obvious: the trained mind and the disciplined will."

"Capitalize Your Brains"

"JIM has at last caught hold," a film manufacturer said to me a few days since. "It may take time, but I've noticed that college boys always do 'catch hold,' and they hold hard. Their brains have been trained. I've always regretted that I didn't go to college. I've got a 'business instinct,' I suppose, for I see a thousand good ways of branching out. But I can't follow them myself. At this moment, college men are following them out for me, and doing what I can't do for myself, for want of an education. Don't get the idea that it's an early start that counts. It isn't; it's brains that count, every time." "I can never be grateful enough," a prominent ecclesiastic recently remarked, "to the old priest who persuaded me to go to college. But for him, in all human probability I should be what many a graduate of the crowded city streets of my boyhood now is: a day laborer, a struggling tradesman, perhaps a vagrant." "I've got four boys," said a lawyer, who after a ten-year struggle, now averages an annual income of $15,000, "and every one of them will go to college. After that, if I have anything to say about it, every one of them will take up a profession. The professional man capitalizes his brains, and that's about the safest investment mankind knows of. The employee is often dependent on the whim of his employer; any man who works for another instead of for himself, must be, to a large extent. If he ever had any ambition, the grind crushes it out of all but the rare exception. The small tradesman may be menaced or wrecked by the swindling methods, euphemistically called 'big business efficiency,' and he has no redress. Capitalize your brains, and you're safe against anything but insanity, and you reduce your chances on that."

The Best Investment

THESE are grimy considerations, perhaps, redolent of the least erected of the spirits that fell. But they ought to have weight with the parent who is anxious to take his boy from school and put him to work, "to help the family," when in point of fact, no real need exists. "Does education pay?" Let us leave out of consideration the new universe which the intellectual life brings into existence, and forget, for the moment, the wider opportunities of helping others that education makes possible, and answer emphatically, "It does pay." There is no better investment. The father who leaves his boys and girls an education has richly dowered them, and they are true benefactors of mankind, working better than they know, who help our Catholic parents to send their children to high school, and when at all possible, to college. The material rewards are great; the returns in things of the mind and the spirit, immeasurably greater.

Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Socialism and the War

A NEW interest in Socialism was aroused by the world-war. The first event that naturally attracted universal attention was the complete collapse of the international Socialist movement at the opening of the great conflict. Socialism, it was found, had never succeeded in extinguishing entirely the fire of patriotism in the hearts of its followers. It was merely smoldering under the ashes. The "comrades," too, were Englishmen and Frenchmen, Germans and Belgians first; Socialists afterwards.

But the war was of service to Socialism in presenting it with unforeseen opportunities of carrying on a new and successful propaganda. If the International had failed; if comrade was ranged against comrade in place of fighting shoulder to shoulder in the great class-struggle; if the loudly advertised general strike, which was to paralyze the countries of the earth in case that war were declared, had now proved an idle threat; if all the literature previously directed against the supposed wickedness and crime of patriotism had not prevented the Socialist delegates from casting their votes in favor of the huge war-budgets laid before them in the parliaments of the nations, yet Socialists were not discouraged. What they had lost in unity they gained in notoriety. Divided among themselves, they yet succeeded in centering upon themselves the limelight of the press. In Germany their importance soon became strikingly evident. In Russia a unique opportunity was offered them in the revolution. Their peace movements and peace conferences kept the cables busy and filled the columns of the daily papers.

Socialists in America

IN America the situation was more perplexing and led to defections from the Socialist party, though not necessarily from Socialism itself. Individual American Socialists declared themselves in favor of the war or in full accord with the action of the Government, but the great body of the party members drew up resolutions strongly denouncing the war. The following passage taken from the "Proclamation and War Program," which was issued by the National Office of the Socialist party, is sufficiently expressive of their attitude:

> We call upon the workers of all countries to refuse support to their governments in their wars. The wars of the contending national groups of capitalists are not the concern of the workers. The only struggle which would justify the workers in taking up arms is the great struggle of the working class of the world to free itself from economic exploitation and political oppression, and we particularly warn the workers against the snare and delusion of defensive warfare. Against the false doctrine of national patriotism we uphold the ideal of international working-class solidarity. In support of capitalism we will not willingly give a single life, or a single dollar; in support of the workers for freedom we pledge our all.

Practicability of Socialism Established?

BESIDES calling attention to Socialism in a particular manner, the world-war gave prominence to it in other ways. "Did it not prove," men asked themselves, "the practicability of Socialism?" Even non-Socialists viewed this question in a new light, while Socialists were not slow to propose it in a triumphant tone. The intervention of the State in the private life of citizens, the daily apportionment of food by public decrees, the conscription of raw materials for war purposes, the drafting of men for economic service, the control of railroads and public-service institutions, the provisioning of vast populations and the governmental supervision of war factories were all events that came to be looked upon as so many arguments for the practicability of Socialism. Socialists themselves were well aware that nothing of all this can rightly be defined as Socialism. But it was pictured by them as a first step and approach to Socialism.

But plausible as their arguments might seem, they are entirely deceptive. During the moment of extreme need and peril, and in the name of patriotism, men are willing to place themselves at others' disposal for the common good. They sacrifice private rights and conveniences to aid the nation in its struggle. It does not follow, however, that they would as readily submit to the same governmental control when the particular reason for it had ceased and the hour of danger was past. It is precisely in anticipation of a larger or more secure freedom, held out to them, that they are induced momentarily to surrender their personal liberties at the call of duty, and are willing for a time to become mere cogs in the complicated machinery of the civil or military administration.

But Socialist reasoning often assumes another form. "Has the war not demonstrated that such enforced co-operation presents the most efficient method of production, and would it not be well, therefore, to perpetuate it, with due modifications, in a socialistic commonwealth?" Here is the real kernel of the Socialist contention. Yet there is no reason for answering the question in the affirmative, as Socialists do. The supposition itself which underlies the question must be denied. The actual economic production for war purposes, though stimulated and even controlled by the various Governments, was not ordinarily co-operative, but capitalistic in its nature, and depended for its success upon individual efforts and the hope of profits.

In regard to enterprises conducted more directly under governmental supervision or ownership in the different belligerent countries, it would be difficult to show that they are more economic than private ventures. It is of importance only that the latter be properly regulated and controlled. As for the treatment of labor, Socialists themselves have been loudest in the condemnation of conditions existing in strictly supervised munition factories. Politicians and strike-breakers, a Socialist journal tells us, in a certain instance obtained positions of responsibility. The workers were mere slaves, overworked and underpaid, meanly housed and carelessly exposed to industrial accidents. They were not free to leave their employment nor to agitate for higher wages. Such without doubt would be the probable result of a system of enforced Socialism established in any country, when all labor would be controlled by a clique of Socialist politicians holding the reins of power.

Economic Lesson of the War

THE two real civic advantages of the intervention of the State during the great crisis of the war have been due to the spirit of co-operation, wherever this was effectively promoted, and to the principle of seeking above all things the common good. These are not Socialist but Catholic ideals whose perfection was achieved in the medieval gilds. Yet men have come to attribute to Socialism these notions which have been only perverted and distorted by it. The success of Socialism among thinking men has been due to what it has borrowed from Catholicism. It is important that we make clear to the world that Socialism has never attained to more than an outward resemblance of Christianity, while its inner motives and purposes are dark and destructive.

The economic lesson of the war has not been that Socialism is a practical working principle, but that Christian co-operation should be promoted to the utmost, according to the earnest admonitions of the Holy See, and that the intervention of the State is timely and desirable in so far as it serves to promote the common good and to protect the real interests of the laboring classes and the poor. It is in brief a confirmation of the great social Encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII and not of the theories of Socialism.

Joseph Husslein, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Carnegie Foundation Bulletin

THE Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching has issued its tenth bulletin, a study of Federal Aid for Vocational Education, by Dr. I. L. Kandel of the Foundation staff. In the third part of the bulletin, the writer says:

> The conclusion is reached that the recently passed Smith-Hughes act is reproducing the history of the Morrill act in involving the Federal Government in great expenditures of money before a sound educational policy and system of supervision and control have been formulated. There is a danger that this important defect may lead to a repetition of the development of the land grant colleges, which for more than thirty years failed to make any great contribution to education, as is shown by the small number of students and the inadequacy of the curricula which are compared at intervals of about twenty-five years. The success of the land grant colleges was not assured until each State recognized the need of them and began to make contributions which have far outstripped the contributions of the Federal Government. State generosity is not stimulated merely by Federal bounty, but by a recognition of the educational need. The greatest contribution that the Federal Government can make at the present time is to establish a strong and influential department of education for the purpose of conducting educational inquiries and of serving as a clearing house for the best educational information of the day.

Needless to say the Foundation considers itself qualified to conduct "educational inquiries." If money is the only requisite for pronouncing on the educational needs of the country the Foundation has the money. A few more acts of Congress, and the Foundation will become the greatest educational trust in history.

Sacrificing the Nation's Womanhood

IT is right that the attention of the nation should be called to the needless employment of women in occupations for which they are physically unfit. It is a sacrifice of womanhood which the war does not demand of us. In the American Federationist President Gompers writes:

> In Cleveland between 75 and 100 women are running Bradley hammers in one shop. Women are wiping engines in the running house at Akron, Ohio; many are running engines in the machine shops and doing other laborious work around large manufacturing plants. One woman has been employed by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad as a shop hand; she packs journal boxes, which are on the axles of wheels and must be filled with waste and oil. Flag women have appeared on railroads. Women are employed in the foundry trade, in machine shops and munitions plants. One lumber yard in Chicago is reported to be employing women to handle lumber. Truly there can be no justification for employing women with so little discrimination. We cannot disguise the fact that during the progress of the war women may be employed in constantly increasing numbers, but surely our nation has enough intelligence to see that women are not employed in handling Bradley hammers and doing the roughest sort of manual labor for which they are physically unfit.

Even should the drain upon our manhood during the course of the war become a serious problem for the nation it would still be our duty to consult the principles of humanity and of religion in preserving woman to the utmost from tasks for which she is not adapted.

Italian Freemasons and Patriotism

ITALIAN Freemasons are no little disconcerted, according to a special correspondent of the London Tablet, about the publicity given to the recent resolution drawn up at the Paris meeting of Masons. Texts of the actual resolution vary somewhat, but among them is a carefully revised version issued by Ettore Ferrari himself, the Grand Master of the Italian Grand Orient. The variations, moreover, do not affect the vital fact that in the autocratic reorganization of Europe, undertaken by the Masons of the allied and neutral countries at that meeting, Italy was entirely ignored.

> Italian papers unanimously—except for two or three notoriously Masonic organs—ask: What were Ferrari and Nathan, and Rome's late Syndic in the uniform of an Italian officer (which, by the way, is against the regulations) doing at a meeting which settled Europe and forgot Italy? And, happily, the publicity has given an opportunity for criticism and attack, of which many Italian papers, including the Catholic Corriere d'Italia, have taken advantage. "What is the reason," they ask, "of this bottling up, this sabotage, of Italy at the Congress?" It is not enough to restate in answer the well-known fact: "Freemasons first, citizens of their country afterwards."

Whatever truth may be contained in the interpretation of the Masonic resolution which suggests treasonable motives, it is more than curious that Belgium likewise is entirely neglected in it. The reason may be found in the allusions made to that country, in the Idea Democratica, as the "clerical Mecca" whose "religious drunkenness" is a "blot" on modern Europe which should not be tolerated by the Masonic brethren. European Freemasonry has worked successfully in secret, but it cannot come into the open without drawing down upon itself a storm of indignation. Publicity caused the downfall of Nathan and of many of his anti-clerical associates. It is just now bringing to both Nathan and Ferrari another very unpleasant experience.

The Crop Forecast

THE Department of Agriculture in its July report predicts a production of 6,093,000,000 bushels of principal food-stuffs:

> This approximates an increase of more than 1,000,000,000 bushels over last year's production. The corn crop is expected to show an increase of 541,000,000 bushels over last year, with a total yield of 3,124,000,000 bushels. The acreage planted is fourteen per cent. larger than last year. The wheat report might be more satisfactory, but it is at least a matter for congratulation that this year's crop will exceed last year's by 38,000,000 bushels, with total yields of 678,-000,000 bushels. Barley will exceed last year's production by 33,000,0000 bushels, with an output of 214,000,000 bushels. Oats look promising and may exceed last year's crop by 201,000,000 bushels, and the forecast of the total is 1,453,-000,000 bushels. This will not quite equal the record, but harvest time may show figures far beyond the above conservative estimate. The probable production of other crops is as follows: White potato, a record crop of 452,000,000 bushels, or 167,000,000 bushels more than last year; rye, a record crop of 56,100,000 bushels, or 8,700,000 bushels more than last year; rice, 34,400,000 bushels; sweet potatoes, 82,200,000 bushels, or 11,000,000 bushels more than last year.

If the fate of the war and the nations rests upon the American farmer as the President said in April, there is every reason to be optimistic.

The Thirty-nine Articles and the World-War

WHEN in 1563 the two Houses of Convocation drew up the Thirty-Nine Articles and England was Protestantized, the framers of that document little thought of the changes which were to take place in the Anglican Church and of the interpretations that were to be given to these very Articles. While at one extreme the most fundamental doctrines of Christanity are denied by Anglican divines, at the other there is a constant approach to the true beliefs of the Catholic Church. Reference has already been made to the new attitude which Episcopalians in England and America are assuming towards the doctrine of purgatory. Article XXII reads:

> The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshipping and adoration, as well of images as of reliques, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.

Place side by side with this the latest pronouncement of the Right Rev. Charles D. Williams, Episcopal Bishop of Michigan, as suggested by the clarifying experience of the world-war:

> Thousands of young lives in the very dawn of their promise are passing out daily, suddenly and unprepared, to the unseen. The world that looks on at that spectacle must renew its faith in immortality or go mad. People are following their dead into the unknown with their hearts. Even in extreme Protestant churches and families prayers for the dead are being offered. God is becoming the reality, Christ a near presence. As the veil of sense falls away men are seeing the invisible. The letters of soldiers at the front and the new poetry inspired by the war testify to this fact.

Saints, too, are honored and their images may be seen in Protestant homes and churches, nor is it any longer considered "a fond thing, vainly invented," to erect chapels in their name in the stately Cathedral of St. John the Divine. So the light of the truth is slowly piercing the clouds of the Thirty-Nine Articles which have long shrouded from sight the splendors of that Church which Christ built upon Peter.

Parents and Vocations

IT is easily intelligible, says Henriette Eugénie Delamare, in the Catholic World, that Protestants and unbelievers should assert that the religious life makes people gloomy, self-centered and lacking in affection. But it is a matter of astonishment when Catholics entertain such a view and lament when they hear of the religious vocations of their sons and daughters.

> Nothing could be more false than this idea, for none have a firmer or more intense human love than the religious and the Saints of God, and this is perfectly natural, for every faculty, either of body or soul that is much practised and labored over, becomes all the more developed. An athlete's limbs grow abnormally strong; the vocal organs of a professional singer develop unusual power and richness of tone, the brain of a mathematician or scientist acquires wonderful clearness and insight. And in the spiritual life this also holds good. One who is constantly endeavoring to bear crosses with fortitude becomes a model of patience and one who is constantly fighting against pride will attain to saint-like humility, for the virtue they are thus striving to acquire finally becomes, as it were, a second nature. Is it not natural, therefore that a soul in union with God, who is love itself, a soul which is ever striving to attain to more fervent love of Him, will become all the more capable of love for its fellow-men, and specially for those united to it by ties of kindred and friendship?

While other children may at times become a source of grief and sorrow, or of heart-breaking anxiety, the sons and daughters who have faithfully followed the Divine call are the parents' truest joy in their declining years and a hope that reaches beyond the grave.

Armenian Proverbs

A NUMBER of Armenian proverbs are translated in the literary section of Ararat, a Searchlight on Armenia. Many of them readily recall their equivalents in other languages. "A black donkey with a crimson crupper," is a picturesque allusion to the "purple patch" made famous by Horace. "To go out from under the rain and get under the water spout," is no less happy than its English parallel. The following saws explain themselves: "The egg thief will one day become a horse thief," "It is the smallest sparrow that swallows the biggest mulberries," "A mangy goat always drinks from the middle of the spring," "A fool threw a stone into a well, forty wise men could not fetch it out," "It is the best swimmer that is carried away by the water," "The river does not always bring a red apple," "If love does not come naturally, it will never come even if you drag it with golden chains." Reference to the camel occurs in many of these popular sayings. "The camel's tail will reach the ground," expresses the impossible; "To give the camel water in a thimble," conveys the idea of utter inadequacy. A hopeless failure is described by the camel's own allusion to its form: "Can you see anything symmetrical in my anatomy?" So too the futility of attempting to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear is described in the little story of the camel which was asked what its occupation was. "Silk weaving," it replied. "That," came the answer, "is apparent from your lips." The following is the advice given to a lazy person begging for help: "If the camel needs thistles let it stretch its neck for them." The donkey too receives considerable attention in these proverbs. "A donkey's pranks," we are told, "will always commence when crossing a bridge." Wine is cautiously described by the Armenians as "the staff of old age and the vanquisher of youth."

NOTICE TO READERS: When you finish reading this magazine place a one-cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No wrapping; no address.—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

AUGUST 25, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Science, Specialization and the Classics

Richard A. Muttkowski

When You Go to San Remo

Joseph Francis Wickham

Developments in the Church of England

A. Hilliard Atteridge

An Efficient Catholic Organization

Edward F. Garesché

Crimean Relief Work and the Aftermath

Gerald C. Treacy

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
August 25, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 20

PAGE

CHRONICLE 485–488

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Science, Specialization and the Classics—When You Go to San Remo—Recent Developments in the Church of England—An Efficient Church Organization — Crimean Relief Work and the Aftermath.....489–498

COMMUNICATIONS 498–499

EDITORIALS
The Pope and Peace—The Afflicted Church in Mexico "The Starving Out Process" — "Le Panache" — Broadway — Cooperation and War.....500–503

LITERATURE — "Father Stanton"—The Flail of God—Reviews—Books and Authors 503–508

EDUCATION—The Return to God 509–510

SOCIOLOGY — "Sets" and "Notions" 510–511

NOTE AND COMMENT.....511–512

Candlestick No. 7617

16 in. high, $10.00 each
18 in. high, $11.00 each
21 in. high, $12.50 each
24 in. high, $13.50 each

FOR
ECCLESIASTICAL NECESSITIES in ORIGINAL DESIGNS and BEAUTIFULLY FINISHED

At prices which place these articles, heretofore beyond the consideration of poor and rural churches of moderate means, now within their reach; watch this space every week. This is the start of a series; first we recommend a candlestick, our No. 7617.

A fine piece for the fitting of an altar is, as a general rule, very expensive.

After long experiment we have succeeded in getting the manufacturing cost of this really beautiful design of Candlestick down to the quoted figures and within the reach of the church with only moderate means.

DESCRIPTION

The base, knob and bobache are ornamented in high relief, while the shaft is of smooth heavy brass tubing. The finish is optional and can be had in polished lacquered, brush, old brass and verde antique.

Machine work is the only thing that makes the price possible.

Mail orders solicited

The W. J. FEELEY COMPANY
10 E 50th St., opposite St. Patrick's Cathedral New York City
Factory, Providence, R. I. Established 1870

The latest and best pamphlet on the subject

What Luther Taught

THE country is now flooded with literature commemorating the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's rebellion. So every Catholic ought to have at hand a brief and trustworthy guide. Fathers Husslein and Reville, of the AMERICA staff, have prepared from the very words of Luther himself just the pamphlet you need.

Price 15 cents
$10.00 a hundred

The AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83RD STREET
NEW YORK

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

"BRADFORD PRESSED BRICK"
(Trade-mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Office)
THE STANDARD RED BRICK OF AMERICA
Write for the RED Catalog
"BRADFORD REDS"
"BRADFORD RUFFS"
BRADFORD PRESSED BRICK CO.
We also make Fireproofing and Hollow Block
"The Red Brick People" BRADFORD, PA.

Change of Address
should be sent ten days before the new address is to go into effect
The America Press
59 East 83rd Street New York

Before placing your order for Fall Janitors' Supplies, write to RICHARD M. MURPHY
MANUFACTURER OF
UNION LEAGUE PREPARED WAX POLISH
Manufacturers Selling Agent for STERLING METAL POLISH
HIGH GRADE BRUSHES
of Every Description and Cleaning Supplies
For Hospitals, Schools, Institutions, Hotels, Clubs, Etc.
250 Third Avenue NEW YORK
Telephone Gramercy 706

Ellen Kirk Downs
The well-known lecturer on art and travel, invites attention to A Special Lecture for Teachers
"A VISIT TO ROME"
illustrated by 115 slides, explained from an historical and artistic standpoint. All pictures are taken from original negatives—many from private galleries unknown to tourists.
Special rates made until Oct. 15
35 East 27th St., New York, N. Y.
Telephone Madison Square 5450

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils
Catalogue "M" FREE upon request
French Cooking Ranges and Broilers
Cooking Equipments of Every Description
JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 20
WHOLE No. 436

AUGUST 25, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—On the western front local engagements have taken place between Cerny and Craonne, the Germans vigorously attacking south of Ailles. Violent artillery duels were reported in Champagne, on both banks of the Meuse and in Parroy Forest, but the heaviest fighting during the week was done on the Steenbeke, at Langemarck and Lens. On August 14 the British pushed across the Steenbeke River, east of the Ypres-Thourout railway and reestablished their lines on the eastern side of the stream. The following day the Canadians moved forward on a front of nearly three miles north and northwest of Lens, penetrating to the depth of a mile and taking Hill 70, a mile and a half north of Lens. That town, which is the most important railway and coal center of this part of France, is now encompassed on the north, south and west by the British. Hill 70 gives the British command not only of Lens, but of the Loos sector also. On August 16, striking together on a nine-mile front east and north-east of Ypres in Flanders, the British and French troops made substantial gains. On the left, the French drove the enemy from the tongue of land between the Yser Canal and the Martjevaart and captured the bridgehead of Dreigrachten. In the center Haig's troops captured the village of Langemarck after a stubborn resistance and pushed half a mile beyond. On the right British troops attempted to seize the high ground almost directly east of Ypres, which lies north of the road to Menin, but were counter-attacked by the enemy and forced to yield part of the terrain they had won. The British claim the capture of nearly 2,000 prisoners and some heavy guns. Denial of the British victory was at first issued from Berlin, but finally the capture of Langemarck was conceded. Later the British line moved forward 500 yards on a mile front on both sides of the Ypres-Poelcapelle Road east of Langemarck.

Bulletin, Aug. 13, p.m.-Aug. 20, a.m.

The Italians have begun another offensive against the Austrians in the Isonzo region, where fighting is in progress over a thirty-seven mile front, from the region of the Tolmino to near the head of the Adriatic Sea on the Carso Plateau.

On the eastern front the advancing armies of Field Marshal von Mackensen in the beginning of the week captured the Rumanian railway junction at Pantziu in Southern Moldavia after a stubborn defense by the troops of General Tcherbatcheff. The advance of Mackensen's troops created a distinct menace to the rear of the Russo-Rumanian units which had moved up between the Putna and the Cassin valleys upon the Transylvania border. Continuing his advance Mackensen drove the enemy across the Sereth, capturing, according to the Berlin report, 3,500 prisoners, sixteen cannon and fifty machine guns. The Russo-Rumanians were forced to retreat out of the angle between the Trotus and the Sereth valleys. Petrograd also announced a "strategic withdrawal" to the Sovela-Monastirska-Voloshkani line in northern Moldavia. According to official announcements, since July 19, the troops of the Central Powers have captured in Eastern Galicia, Bukowina and Moldavia nearly 42,000 prisoners, 257 guns and 548 machine guns.

The Russians have resumed their offensive on the Caucasian front on a small scale, while a Turkish advance against Baneh has forced them to retire in the direction of Kharput.

Since August 14 China has been formally at war with Germany and Austria-Hungary. Neither the declaration of war nor the other documents relating to the conflict makes mention of the association of the Chinese Republic with the Entente Powers. They indicate that China's action will be entirely independent. The formal declaration of war created little excitement in Peking or the other north China cities. The Netherlands Minister to China immediately took over the Austrian interests and received the arms of the Austrian guard. The doors of the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank were sealed. At Tien-Tsin Chinese troops took over the Austrian concession, and the German Bank and barracks. Regulations issued by the Government permit the departure of Germans and Austrians within five days, require registration within ten days, of subjects of the Central Powers, as a condition under which they may continue doing such business as does not affect China's welfare. Enemy subjects may not travel without permits and if troublesome are to be interned.

China at War with the Central Powers

The declaration of war which was signed by President Feng Kwo-Chang, reviews China's efforts to induce Germany to modify her submarine policy. It states that respect for international law and protection of the lives and the property of Chinese citizens forced China to sever relations with Germany, and now compels China to declare war against Germany and Austria too, as it is not Germany alone, but Austria-Hungary as well that pursues this policy. The proclamation declares that all treaties, agreements, protocols between China and the Central Powers have been abrogated; that China will respect the Hague Conventions respecting the humane conduct of the war, and in conclusion asserts that China's object in entering the war is but to hasten peace.

No Delegates to Stockholm

No permission will be granted by Great Britain, France, Italy and the United States to any persons from those countries desiring to attend as delegates the International Socialist Conference at Stockholm. Such was the announcement made officially in the House of Commons on August 13, coinciding with the long-expected statement of Arthur Henderson, Labor leader and Minister without portfolio in the War Council, who resigned a few days ago, following a rebuke by Premier Lloyd George, because Henderson had urged the British Labor Party Conference to send delegates to the Stockholm gathering. During the session of the Commons Lloyd George reiterated the Government's position in opposition to such participation by subjects of Great Britain. On the same day it was officially announced that George Nicoll Barnes, Minister of Pensions, had been named to take the place of Arthur Henderson as Labor member in the War Cabinet. The appointment, according to the semi-official announcement, has the approval of the other Labor members of the Cabinet. Thus the crisis, which for a moment seemed to threaten the existence of the Government, has at least been temporarily solved, and unless unexpected developments take place, it is not likely that there will be an appeal to the country.

The Pope's Appeal

On Wednesday, August 14, Pope Benedict XV issued an appeal "to the leaders of the belligerent peoples," petitioning them in the name of religion and humanity to make a sincere attempt to compose their differences and thus bring this disgraceful war to an end. On Thursday, August 15, this version of the Pope's document was cabled from the British Foreign Office to America:

Since the beginning of Our Pontificate, when the horrors of a terrible war were let loose on Europe, we have had in view three things above all else, to preserve perfect impartiality toward all belligerents, as is suitable for him who is the common father of all and who loves all his children with equal affection; continualy to attempt to do all the good possible, and that without exception of persons, without distinction of nationality or religion, as is dictated to us by the universal law of charity confided to Our keeping by Christ, with the Supreme Pastorate; finally, as Our mission of peace also requires, to omit nothing, in our power which might contribute to hasten the end of this calamity, by trying to lead people and their leaders to more moderate resolution, and to hasten a serene deliberation of a peace just and durable.

Whoever has followed Our work during those three painful years which have just passed, has been able easily to recognize that, if we had always remained faithful to Our resolve of absolute impartiality and to Our attitude of benevolence, we have not ceased to exhort the peoples and the belligerent brothers again to become brethren, although publicity has not been given to all that We have done to attain this very noble aim.

Toward the end of the first year of the war We addressed to the nations in conflict most lively exhortations; moreover We indicated the part to be followed to arrive at a stable and honorable peace for all. Unfortunately Our appeal was not heard and the war continued desperately for another two years with all its horrors. It became even more cruel and was extended further over the earth, over the sea and in the air, and one saw desolation and death descend upon the cities without defense, upon peaceful villages and on their innocent population, and now no one can imagine how the sufferings of all will be increased and aggravated if other months or, worse still, other years are about to be added to this sanguinary triennium.

Is this civilized world to be nothing more than a field of death? And Europe, so glorious and so flourishing, will it, as if stricken by a universal madness, run to the abyss and lend its hand to its own suicide?

In such a terrible situation and in the presence of a menace so serious We who have no particular political aim, who do not listen to suggestions or to the interests of any of the belligerent parties but are solely compelled by a sentiment of our supreme duty as the common Father of the Faithful, by the solicitation of Our children who implore Our intervention and Our pacifying word, through the voice of humanity and of reason, We once more utter the cry of peace, and We renew a pressing appeal to those who hold in their hands the destinies of nations.

But in order no longer to speak in general terms as the circumstances had counseled us to do in the past we now wish to make more concrete and practical proposals and to invite the Governments of the belligerent peoples to come to an agreement upon the following points, which seem to be a basis of a just and durable peace, leaving to them the task of analyzing and completing them.

First of all the fundamental points must be that the material force of arms be supplanted by the moral force of right, from which shall arise a fair agreement for the simultaneous and reciprocal diminution of armament, according to the rules and guarantees to be established, such armament being maintained as is necessary and sufficient, for the preservation of public order in each State. For armies should be substituted arbitration with its noble function of preserving peace, according to the rules to be laid down and the penalties to be imposed on a State which would refuse either to submit a national question to arbitration or to accept the decision rendered.

Once the supremacy of right has thus been established all obstacles to the means of communication of the peoples would disappear by assuring, by rules to be fixed later, the true liberty and community of the seas, which would diminish the numerous causes of conflict and would also open to all new sources of prosperity and progress.

As to the damages to be repaired, and as to the war expenses, we see no other means of solving the question than by suggesting as a general principle complete and reciprocal condonation, which would be justified moreover by the immense benefit to be derived from disarmament; so much so that no one will be justified in defending the continuation of carnage solely for reasons of an economic order.

If for certain cases there exists particular reasons for indemnity they would be deliberated upon with justice and equity, but these pacific agreements with the immense advantages to be derived from them are not possible without a reciprocal restitution of the territory at present occupied. Consequently on the part of Germany the complete evacuation of Belgium with the guarantee of Belgium's full political military and economic independence, the evacuation of French territory on the part of other belligerent parties similar restitution of the German colonies.

As regards the territorial questions, as for example those which have arisen between Italy and Austria and between Germany and France, there is reason to hope that in consideration of the immense advantages of a durable peace with disarmament the parties in conflict will wish to examine them with a conciliatory disposition, taking into consideration, as We have said formerly, the aspirations of the peoples and the special interests and the general welfare of the great human society.

The same spirit of equity and justice ought to be followed in the examination of other territorial and political questions, notably those relative to Armenia and the Balkan States and the territories making a part of the ancient Kingdom of Poland, whose noble and historical traditions and sufferings endured especially during the present war, ought to conciliate the sympathies of nations.

Such are the principal bases whereon We believe the future reorganization of the peoples ought to be built. They are of a nature to render impossible the return of similar conflicts and to prepare a solution of the economic question so important for the future and for the material well being of all belligerent States.

Therefore, in presenting them to you who direct at this hour the destinies of the belligerent nations We are desirous of seeing them accepted and of witnessing thus the conclusion, at an early date, of the terrible struggle, which more and more appears a useless massacre.

The whole world recognizes that the honor of the armies of both sides is safe. Incline your ears therefore to Our prayer. Accept the fraternal invitation which We send you in the name of the Divine Redeemer, the Prince of Peace. Reflect on your very grave responsibility before God and before man.

On your decision depends the safety and the joy of innumerable families, the life of thousands of young people; in a word, the happiness of a people for whose welfare it is your absolute duty to labor.

May the Lord inspire your decision in conformity to His holy will. May God grant that while meriting the applause of your contemporaries, you will also obtain in the future generations the splendid name of pacificators.

As for Us closely united in prayer and in penance with all those faithful souls who sigh for peace we implore for you light and Divine counsel.

This epochal letter is but a fuller expression of the ideas that his Holiness has pressed upon the nations since the beginning of the present war; moreover, it is quite in accord with the original claims of the Allies and with President Wilson's statements, and, if accepted, it deprives the Central Powers of any chance of aggrandizement. As a consequence there is no ground for a reasonable refusal to listen to the Holy Father's appeal.

A Japanese mission to the United States arrived at "a Pacific Port" on August 13, and declared that its members came officially "as comrades in a gigantic struggle which involves the liberties and the sacred rights of mankind." Responding to an address of welcome from the Mayor of the City, Viscount K. Ishii, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary said: "We are here as the representatives of Japan, on a mission of friendship and good-will. We come as allies in a common cause." In a more extended statement, the Ambassador said:

The Japanese Mission

We are particularly glad to be here just at this time, when all America is showing a courage, patriotism, energy, and wholehearted zeal. Naturally Japan is interested in your preparations. We are glad to see them. Not a sensible person in Japan sees anything in your preparations but great benefit to both countries in the future. We have always had confidence in the fundamental justice, sound sense, and broad vision of Americans. We are glad of your preparations on land and sea, because we believe they mean an earlier peace.

The Ambassador added that it was the desire of the Mission to impress upon the American people the solemn fact that Japan stood with them, heart and soul, in their "lofty purpose to make the world the abiding place of liberty, justice and fair play."

Mr. McAdoo, the Secretary of the Treasury has informed Chairman Simmons of the Senate Fnance Committee and Chairman Kitchin of the House Committee on Ways and Means that the Government would need additional credits of $10,000,000,000 through a new bond issue at the present session of Congress. He furthermore informed the Congressional leaders that the Government would need an additional $1,000,000,000 to be raised by taxation over and above the $2,000,000,000 carried in the revenue bill now pending in the Senate. Of the $10,000,000,000 bond issue asked between $3,000,000,000 and $4,000,000,000 will be required to meet the demands of the Allies before June 30, 1918.

Additional Credits

The demands of the Secretary came as a surprise to the two leaders, as the previous estimates had been $4,000,000,000 under the figure announced by him in his new estimate. Thus the cost of the war for the first fifteen months, including loans to the Allies, will amount to about $18,000,000,000. Next winter the figure may even be increased. After the conference of the Secretary with Chairman Kitchin, plans were under way for the raising of the money. A meeting of the Ways and Means Committee was called for August 25, and arrangements made for the House to resume its regular meetings on August 27 and expedite financial legislation.

Mexico.—The Archbishop of Guadalajara who at present is hunted like a wild animal, by the Mexican patriots, has issued from his hiding place, this opportune pastoral letter as a protest against the injustice of the Mexican Constitution:

An Opportune Pastoral

We, Doctor and Master Don Francisco Orozco y Jiménez, by the grace of God and of the Holy Apostolic See, Archbishop of Guadalajara.

To the Dean and Metropolitan Chapter, to the Venerable Secular and Regular clergy and to all the Faithful of the Archdiocese. Peace, health and blessing in Our Lord Jesus Christ.

Motives of prudence have prevented me for some time from communicating directly with my beloved flock. But I did not on that account forget to watch over its well-being. Today I deem it my duty to address you a few brief words, and thus to break a silence which would render me responsible for the great spiritual harm of which it might otherwise be the occasion.

You are all aware that the new political Constitution, though recognizing many political rights of the people, entirely ignores and sets aside the Catholic Church, under whose shadow, so to say, the great majority of our countrymen live, although all do not profess our holy religion, in all its purity, infected as some are by modern errors. This Constitution even tries to subjugate and oppress the Church, and so far shows its contempt for it as even to suppress its name. Can this be reconciled with the sacred and inalienable rights of its Divine institution? And can Catholics ignore a state of things which obliges them not only to renounce the highest gift from Heaven, namely, true liberty of conscience, but even to ratify by their submission such an oppression?

I see myself, therefore, obliged to protest, as I hereby do, as the representative here of the Catholic Church, against the new Constitution, and I hereby make my own the protest formulated by a large part of the Mexican Episcopate in the United States on the twenty-fourth of last February, a protest with which you are, no doubt, acquainted. The measured words, the convincing reasons and declarations there put forth will give you to understand, in a general way, what must be your fair and reasonable judgment of the spirit of the new Constitution and what must be your conduct as Catholics and faithful sons of the Church. You will make the enemies of the Church realize that it is not the spirit of sedition or conspiracy which animates the pastors of the Church, or its venerable clergy and the Faithful.

I know, dearly beloved Brethren, that the fate of the Spouse of Christ is not different from that of her Founder. Tribulations, persecutions, sorrows and trials, blood, martyrdom are her patrimony and heirloom. "The disciples are not more than the Master." "If they have persecuted me, they shall persecute you." The history of the Church teaches us this lesson. But it also teaches us that what happened to Peter's bark on the Lake of Genesareth will happen to her also; the tempest will be followed by the calm.

But now that we see the Divine prophecies realized, let us not be satisfied with empty laments and regrets. Let us endeavor to draw profit from our sufferings, and, complying with the designs of God, let us endeavor to purify our souls. Let us strengthen them with the irrefragable principles of our holy religion, which teach us the love of virtue and the hatred of vice. Let us endeavor to walk always in the holy fear of God. Let us strengthen our hearts with the hope of better times and of those eternal rewards to which, above all else, we must aspire.

It is time that the genuine spirit of Christ should be revived in our midst, that certain compromises with modern errors condemned by the Church should disappear, and that the wheat should be separated from the chaff. Thus in daily life the splendor of the noblest Christian virtues will shine forth to all, and the very enemies of the Church will do her homage and praise God and His Christ.

We exhort and urge in every possible manner our venerable clergy to be the model of their flocks. Let them put their hands to the plough to work out that personal sanctification which is required by their high estate. The Faithful also, whatever be their condition, hearing the words so clear and positive of the Divine Master, who now in His loving Providence chastises with the whip, must also earnestly work out their own sanctification. Otherwise we would have every reason to fear that we might be abandoned by the Divine Mercy, and that the dreaded day might overtake us when the Sun of Divine Justice would forever hide its beams.

May this Sun of Justice enlighten our souls and grant us not only to find the truth, but that our Faith may be revived, that our charity may be enkindled! May we then resolve to serve and love the Lord our God with all the powers of our soul. May the Holy Virgin of Guadalupe be favorable to us! May she obtain for us those powerful graces which will enable us to resist in the hour of temptation and tribulation and keep our Faith and our lives untainted.

In closing, I beg you, beloved Brethren, now that I am in a position in which I can say that I have really begun to be a follower and a disciple of Christ, that you will continue to beg Heaven to help me and to give me that store of virtues and that strength I need in order not to frustrate its high designs.

Confession of Loot

The consciences of some of the Mexican bandits are evidently a bit ill at ease, for El Democrata under date of July 1, 1917, confesses that paintings, other object of arts, archives, etc., all of great value, were stolen from Catholic churches "under the shadow of the inevitable disturbances of the revolutionary movement." The paper proceeds to say that the property belonged to the nation, a bare-faced fabrication. Article 16, section 2, of the Reform Laws reads:

> The direct ownership of the churches which, in accordance with the law of July 12, 1859, were nationalized and which were set aside for Catholic worship, etc., will continue to be vested in the nation, but their exclusive use, maintenance and improvement will pertain to the religious organizations to which they have been granted, so long and while the consolidation of the property is not decreed.

Herein nothing whatever is said of works of art, archives, etc. Moreover Article 15, Section 2, of the same iniquitous laws expressly declares that such properties belong to the organization using the churches, not to the Government. But this did not prevent the theft.

Coming Conferences

Russia.—More than 1,000 persons including the members of the four Dumas, other prominent public men and representatives from the chief political, economic, commercial and scientific organizations, have been invited by the Government to assemble at the Kremlin Palace, Moscow, on August 25. Premier Kerensky will open the Conference with an explanation of the country's present state and of his program for the future.

A report in a London paper that the coming Stockholm Socialist Conference is personally opposed by the Russian Prime Minister evoked the following denial, which was published by the semi-official news-agency of Petrograd:

> The Government considers that the solution of questions affecting war and peace appertains exclusively to it in unison with the allied countries. The Stockholm Conference, as pointed out hitherto, is one of the particular political parties and as such cannot lay claim to formulating decisions which bind the Government in any way. The Government always has been far from refusing passports to Socialists, believing that questions concerning war and peace may be submitted for decision to the Socialist Internationale.

News came on August 16 that ex-Czar Nicholas, with his family, has been removed from the palace at Tsarskoe Selo and sent to Tobolsk, a town of Western Siberia, 1,500 miles from Petrograd.

Science, Specialization and the Classics

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, Ph.D.

SPEAKING of the qualities of the biologist Professor Conklin of Princeton University has said: "Immense enthusiasm and intense concentration in his work distinguish the biologist first of all." But he adds:

> Intense devotion to work is a fine thing and has cultural value if properly balanced by a true sense of proportion, but the effect is otherwise if this concentration blots out from one the rest of the universe. The evil effects of overspecialization are shown in many ways among biologists, not only in the lack of ability to understand or appreciate many other lines of work, but also by the very prevalent notion that the biologist who engages in economic work or who devotes himself to public service has somehow lost caste, and also by the contrasting opinion held by some 'practical' biologists that 'academic biology should be classed with embroidery.' (Science, March 5, 1915.)

These words indicate a double dispute, that between pure and applied science and that between science and the cultural studies. The purposes of the groups are often represented as opposed and the war is supposed to have accentuated the issues. Nothing is farther from the truth. The war has demonstrated the mechanical efficiency of the applied sciences, but while this efficiency has aroused our wonder and admiration it has also hardened our hearts by its relentless mechanical cruelty. Military science, and behind it the various groups of applied sciences, dominate our lives for the present. But this domination brings with it the germ of rebellious reaction, and one can confidently predict that the close of the great war will witness a marked turning to cultural and humanitarian pursuits, if only to get relief from the mechanics of present-day warfare. This, however, is not strictly to the point, although indirectly so.

"Biology," says Professor Conklin, "occupies a unique place among the sciences in its cultivation of esthetic appreciation and broad sympathies." In other words, the interest of biologists is both scientific and cultural. At the present time the struggle between pure and applied science has reached its greatest proportions. There are those who would abolish all phases of scientific work whose immediate practical use is not demonstrable. Primarily, these advocates are the products of overspecialization, they have lost their sense of proportion, of relative values. More experienced and farsighted men, however, are energetically stressing the fact that applied science must have pure science as its forerunner. During the present year a considerable number of leading articles in Science have emphasized this attitude. (Science, Feb. 16, March 9, 16 and 23, April 20, the four May numbers, and June 1.)

For instance, says Professor Raiford in Science for May 27:

> All the great commercial successes rest upon principles formulated by research workers who . . . labored . . . without any expectation that their work would immediately benefit mankind. But no one can tell at what instant some such observation may become of immense importance ... Was Röntgen thinking of the extraction of bullets, the reduction of dislocated limbs or the setting of broken bones when he discovered the X-rays? . . . Or Helmholtz, did he have in mind the prevention and cure of eye diseases when he worked out the principle of the ophthalmoscope? . . . Was Cavendish . . . . . thinking of providing food and war munitions when, 132 years ago, he read before the Royal Society his paper on the fixation of nitrogen? . . . The lesson is, learn the facts, and the application will be forthcoming.

In the biological field I might note the much disputed sponsorship for the Panama Canal. Engineer, statesman and biologist claim the major share of the enterprise. But as to the biologist: who of the many specialists in biology should receive credit for the practical solution of the mosquito menace, which made the building of the Canal possible, the morphologist who studied the anatomy of the mosquito and determined its point of susceptibility, the physiologist and ecologist who studied field conditions and determined the habits of the creature, the protozoologist, the cytologist, the parasitologist who labored hand-in-hand to develop a special microscopic technique which would permit the discovery of disease germs spread by mosquitoes and other carriers? All of these surely have a share in the credit of making the Canal Zone habitable, likewise the economic entomologist who devised means of suppressing the menace, likewise the surgeons who combated the diseases. The instance might be carried to infinite detail to show the multitude of workers who had contributed to the success of the enterprise. Yet perhaps not one worked with the "practical" or "applied" view in mind. And applied science is nothing else but the application of the accumulated minutiae of thousands of workers.

The quarrel is regarded by many as the outcome of the "era of specialization." They also point out that the climax of this "era" is past and that reaction has begun. In perfect illustration of Hegel's axiom of progress by thesis, antithesis and synthesis the universities which a few years ago were still keen for specialization among their graduate students are forming new regulations aiming toward consistent generalization. Specialization as an experiment has been a dismal failure. It was thought that a race of super-scientists would be produced, endowed with fine abilities, broad sympathies and splendid accomplishments. Yet the opposite, the unexpected, happened. Specialists became so absorbed in their particular specialties that they lost touch with even their own branch of knowledge. They lost their perspective, they became narrow-minded, with a small view of life, and with little or no sympathy for the attainments of others. The individual stones of the mosaic, so to speak, seemed more important to them than the picture.

Specialization has been most pronounced along so-called "practical" lines, and "practical" men are the avowed antagonists of pure science and the humanities. This has called forth the reaction in the schools, as typified by the modern graduate school in its insistence that thorough generalization precede specialization. Besides their own field, students are exhorted to learn the interrelations of the sciences. One zoologist puts it thus: "We wish to train zoologists who know zoology, not merely men who know all about a chromosome and nothing else." Or to extend my simile of the mosaic, the picture is now stressed, not the stones that compose the mosaic.

Of course, this reaction does not in the least appeal to professional men who demand early and intense specialization and a complete slighting of the so-called "cultural" studies. In their radicalism they say that the high schools as conducted at present are merely preparatory schools for the universities, and they demand that these schools be changed completely into professional schools. In larger cities the modern high school has been converted largely into a vocational school. Still other "practical" men clamor for even earlier professional training and do not hesitate to advocate its inception in the grades. From a psychological standpoint such early "forcing" is dangerous, and from an individualistic standpoint it is unfair. Only a fraction of the potentialities of each person can be realized in the course of life, and hence it is desirable that early education should be of a type that will put each child in the way of realizing the best of these potentialities. There are certain essentials which should be the part of the equipment of each child, and too early professionalism limits the opportunities for attaining this equipment. The three R's are recognized essentials and one might well add a fourth, religion, which is unfortunately omitted from the secular curriculum.

Relative to the second phase of my topic: each international scientific congress for the past twenty-five years has dealt with one of the greatest needs of science, an international language. Science is international and exchange of the scientific results of the workers of all nations is essential to progress. The mere knowledge of French, German and English, the minimal linguistic equipment of every modern scientist, is palpably insufficient and has been so for a long time. This insufficiency pertains particularly where the Slavic, Scandinavian, certain Latin and the Oriental tongues are concerned. Now Scandinavians, the Slavs and the Latins have furnished many great scientists, and national pride is justifiably so pronounced as to demand that the scientists write in their native tongue. Japan in her recent emancipation is producing her quota of scientists and many of these write in Japanese. India and China are beginning to issue scientific journals in their own languages and before long the Moslem nations will do the same. How then solve the problem of international communication of scientific results? Some have suggested, "Let articles be written in the languages spoken most commonly." "Very well," is the answer. "Then we must learn Chinese, and Arabian, and Malayan, for these tongues are more common than European tongues."

"No, we mean the languages of commerce," comes the retort.

"These are English, French, Spanish, German, Arabian, Chinese, Malayan and others. And what of the rest?"

The suggestion is arrogant and fraught with dangers of national jealousy, and in these days of the equalization of nations it sounds perverted to select a few and to slight others. Besides, the nations that are numerically greatest are not most productive scientifically. Furthermore, the linguistic equipment demanded is too considerable.

"A happy solution: an artificial tongue!"

This has the demerit that it remains artificial, that it has no ideals, no literature, and except from its purely utilitarian inspiration will find no further interest.

As a matter of fact, the obvious solution is presented constantly. Quite generally it has been urged that summaries of articles be given at the end of each paper in one or more standard languages, such as French, English and German, but preferably in Latin. Various countries have institutions which take over the work of abstracting papers in definite fields of research, but these, too, must meet the language difficulties. Taxonomists dealing with hundreds of thousands of descriptions of species written in dozens of languages have felt the need keenly and have asked a Latin diagnosis for each species, and certain scientific societies make a practice of offering such diagnoses and summaries in Latin. Since the nomenclature of practically all sciences is of Latin origin the adoption of Latin as an international language, at least in summaries, would mean merely a partial return to the former method of writing scientific papers entirely in Latin. It would furthermore abolish the bogey of national jealousy.

It is countered that a year of drill in Latin etymology and syntax without resort to classic authors would supply sufficient training for the practical needs of professional and scientific men. Such a statement is silly. It is against all principles of sane pedagogy to confine instruction to a mere drill. Why not turn a task into a pleasurable one? Every language absorbs something of the civilization of the people that speak it, their ideals, their habits of thought, their aspirations, which is expressed in the classics of the language. And there are certain methods of expression, certain inflections and a certain music in the sounds of a language which can be appreciated only in the original and which cannot be reproduced in a translation. Hence in the study of any language it is essential to refer to their classics for a real appreciation. To use an old simile, "scientific music" may be written with correct harmony and even some sort of rhythm, but such music lacks true melody, it lacks inspiration, its progress is unnatural and strained. That is precisely the difference between grammatical and classical writing, the former sounds correct but not melodious. The classics of a language carry inspiration, for they express the ideals of a people. Such is the relation of literature to any language, of the classics to Latin and Greek, and of the "classics" to a liberal education.

The solution given above does not merit the indifference with which it is received. And although the suggestion may seem far-fetched I can account for this indifference only on the basis that modern scientists have become tainted with the modern craze for "easy, simple methods." There can be no doubt of the fact that educators are attempting to mold educational methods along the "line of least resistance." But the plea for simplification is not a valid one. A theory cannot be made more simple than the facts permit. But it sometimes seems as if scientists shirked the mental effort needed to learn the language and desired some "simpler" way out, and that their opposition rises from this purely opportunistic motive.

To some extent the cultural groups have themselves to blame for the opposition. First of all they have fostered the Spencerian philosophy of Socialism, in which not the individual but the State is the unit, the individual being only a small cog in a large machine. From such a mechanist standpoint anything that does not contribute to the material welfare of the State must logically be abandoned. Secondly, there is the personal equation. The humanities have been very much in the habit of assuming a superior attitude toward the sciences and useful arts, particularly toward the "applied" phases. Some teachers systematically derogate the sciences in the classroom, as if, in the words of Dr. Conklin, "these had somehow lost caste." When a teacher superciliously and dogmatically, and even spitefully, maintains that the only things worth knowing are English, Latin and history, he represents an extremism which can be equaled only by the contrasting extreme that all the Latin, English and history in the world will not produce food, build houses and make clothing. Somewhere between the extremes lies the truth. But bickering obscures the truth. Science must be interested in the fostering of the cultural studies, for while scientists increase knowledge of nature, heighten production and better the mechanical appliances for increased production, they must also recognize that a gladiatorial existence is not a very high standard. Man's relations with his fellow-men in business and social intercourse must be outlined. We hear much these days of ordering our lives strictly according to scientific tenets. In the first place such a demand has not yet sufficient force to deserve complete attention, for the progress of science is after all comparatively recent. Yet even this ordering might be achieved if science were constant and not vacillating. And this gives us the second objection, that science attains not absolute truths, but only relative truths. There is a sense in which this is true and as our knowledge of material things progresses our conceptions of these things change continually. Note the truism: "The hypothesis of today is the truth of tomorrow," and its converse: "The scientific truth of today is the absurdity of tomorrow." But the ideals of friendship, sympathy, love and sacrifice are as old as mankind, and it does not fall within the province of science to teach these. Plainly in man's dealing with man a common ethical standard is essential, expressed in what we call character in the individual, and civilization in the State. Since character is more elemental and far-reaching than knowledge and must therefore supersede knowledge, it follows that development of character in the child should be the main purpose of education and that mere acquisition of knowledge should be secondary to it. It follows from this that if development of character be important in the child it is no less so in the adolescent. It follows at last that education should be of a type which develops sound principles of right and wrong, and ideals of service and sacrifice.

It is a fact, however, that the three R's do not fulfil this function, for they are principally concerned with the additive side of the mind, that is, with the acquisition of knowledge, not the development of ideals. The strongest agency for character-molding and for the establishment of ethical principles, namely religion, is entirely abolished from the educational curriculum. To the adolescent student the wholesome study of the classics will at least partly supply the deficiency. In Catholic schools and colleges, it is true, religion is part of the curriculum. But it is also true that students in Catholic colleges are better versed in classic history, classic customs, classic philosophy and especially classic mythology, than in Catholic history, customs, philosophy, and anthology. Parenthetically, I will say that the average graduate of a Catholic college will write a splendid dissertation on the family trees of the classical gods, and yet be probably unable to write even a passable apology to any of the usual objections offered to his creed and Church. That is perhaps the only valid argument that can be made against the classics, and it is not so much directed against them as against an educational system which elevates them to an exaggerated, indeed dominating, position in its curriculum. It is indeed an anomaly that the Church which supposedly is "inimical to and intolerant of" non-Catholic education makes pagan literature and philosophy the major elements in the education of her advanced students and her ministers. "She preserves the ideals of the classics!" But is it necessary to make an encyclopedial study of mythological family trees to perceive these ideals? The objections of scientists to the classics center markedly on this over-emphasis of mythology as contrasted with the real intrinsic values. Many scientists praise the mental discipline gained through the study of Latin and the classics, but they add that if these are to be studied for their idealism, their internationalism, then this should be duly emphasized. "Behold, the sun doth shine!" Ah yes, the sun doth shine, behind clouds.

To summarize, specialization without precedent generalization narrows the point of view, tends to destroy the sense of proportions and is apt to stress mechanical perfection too much, with a loss of sympathy and fellow-feeling. If only as a "counter-irritant" to rigid professionalism, the cultural studies would have their place. But their position is better grounded, for their relation to education is what the history of a people, of a science, of any type of progress must be to civilization, namely, inspiration. The classics are part of our history, they form the initial stages of our literature and permeate its later development, our ideals are based on them, our very ideas are molded after their example, and to make our civilization comprehensible and appreciable the classics must form a vital part at least in so-called "higher education." Besides these antecedent values the classics are character-forming in that they create ideals, inspire service and discipline the mind. Finally, there is also the "practical" value of the language of the classics as a medium of intercommunication of scientific results.

When You Go to San Remo

JOSEPH FRANCIS WICKHAM, M.A.

"THE Signorino will take coffee?' old Marietta asked, as she set the fruit before him.

"Peter deliberated for a moment; then burned his ships."

I wonder if you remember when you last saw these words. Deliberate for a moment yourself, and it will all come back, for surely they once looked at you from the first page of one of the most delightful novels in the world. And if they did not, I can only say in a paraphrase of Wordsworth, Oh, the difference to you!

Who speaks of the "Cardinal's Snuff-box" now? Even Henry Harland's most faithful devotee will confess that the living men, and not the dead, are on the lips of the world. But such men as Harland really never die; and I fancy that many grateful souls that loved him once often lose themselves in mellow recollection of the joy they had when first they knew his smiles.

It was the capital city of the newest republic that gave Harland his first welcome into the world, the St. Petersburg of the ancien régime. But he was destined to be nothing if not cosmopolitan. In his early youth he came to the United States with his parents, to learn the ways of a land he claimed as his own. His comrades of the olden days will remember him as a student at the College of the City of New York and at Harvard. In the legal circles he is recalled for his connection with the surrogate. Those who knew him under the nom de plume of Sydney Luska in his early literary ventures will sometimes hark back to "As It Was Written" and his other stories of Jewish life in America. It is idle to guess in what a lifetime in America might have resulted in Harland's literary development. Very possibly it might have meant an earlier cutting of the thread of life, as it was for his health's sake that he went back to Europe, to live for much of the time in London, and to write prose tales of Continental life for the journals of the day. Harland soon became known as a master-craftsman in his field, and it was no surprise to his circle of friends when in 1894 he was made literary editor of a new publication, The Yellow Book. This magazine lasted but three years, not a very long life, indeed, but long enough to enhance the reputations of such men as Lionel Johnson, Ernest Dowson, Mr. Max Beerbohm and Mr. Arthur Symons; long enough, too, to win a substantial place in the history of modern periodicals through the talent of its art editor, Aubrey Beardsley, and through the brilliant editorship of Harland.

It is hard to be happy with ill-health as a constant companion; to look forward to the morrows as to a succession of grey days is anything but a fair prospect; but in these years of London life Harland did it, and ever the while kept his heart free from the bitterness and morbid gloom that assail the souls of a weaker strength. Perhaps only those who have passed through a similar crisis can appreciate the new color that life assumed for him after the year 1897; for in that year with his wife he entered the fold of the Catholic Church, seeking and finding there the greater peace that makes bodily pain a thing endurable, and hopeless ills a promise and a pledge.

Ordered south, like Stevenson, he now wooed the smiles of robust health beneath Italian skies. Under the kindly influence of the milder clime he began to write the novels which made him famous, and which in their own field have never been surpassed. In 1900 appeared the "Cardinal's Snuff-box," in 1902 the "Lady Paramount," and in 1904 "My Friend Prospero." He was at his best now; his style was ripe, and his art a thing of exquisite perfection. But fame is no fairy medicinal tonic; and the climate of Italy had done its utmost. So Harland died in his prime, in 1905, five days before the feast of Christmas. It was in the little city of San Remo that he went away, the fair city of sunlight that he loved so well, and that loved him for the sunlight of his heart. He now lies buried beneath the turf of the family plot in Norwich, Connecticut, asleep with his New England fathers, with a Roman cross marking his consecrated grave.

To go to Italy is perhaps a reward large enough for any man before he goes to heaven; but to go to that land of beauty as an artist, with eyes that see the color of life and a soul that feels its pulse, and, in precious addition, with a felicity of voice to give expression to the wonder that is Italy, this joy was the gift of Henry Harland. His was not that great genius that marks him a large figure in the history of the novelist's art; he was not of the fiber that gave Thackeray his fame, or George Eliot, or Dickens; in very truth, one of his most recent critics has placed the work of his Italian years in the "marshmallow school" of literature. But Professor Phelps, I am sure, will permit me to suggest that if "My Friend Prospero" is no better than a candied sweet, it is surely a very delicious bon-bon, a work of art in its own class, for which the author need ask no pity, nor a ballade of vain regrets. Harland's fame rests on the artistic perfection he won in expressing the beauty of the the Italian lake country; on the fine deftness and brilliancy of phrase in conjuring before our eyes a scene almost visible in its vividness; on his power of creating situations of more or less obvious surprise without our feeling the approach of the inevitable; and on his skill in adorning his dialogue with a rare and delicious humor, light and joyous as a sunbeam in Bellagio. How sweet youth is in his novels; how lovely is love; how fragrant the summer. The idyl of youth, of love, of summer sunshine, none has achieved it more refreshingly than Harland. Harland is more than a story-teller; there is something of magic in his art.

For the playful humor of Harland, a quality in which he excelled in a way altogether his own, the chapter in the "Cardinal's Snuff-box" on Marietta's troubled conscience is a choice example. It is impossible to suggest the peculiar ease with which the author mingles humor and reverence in touching upon the peccadillos which weigh like the burden of Atlas upon the Italian woman's heart; only a reading of the scene will yield that pleasure. In connection with this chapter it would be interesting to know how many have Harland to thank for their revised opinions as to the birth-place of St. Anthony. I fancy that the single line of hagiography has startled many a lover of the wonder-worker of Padua out of a placid innocence of erudition in the matter of the holy one of earth.

How colorful Harland could make description! To listen to Susanna picture the island of Sampaolo is a temptation to retire prematurely from active occupation, and while away a year or two in Italy:

> At a distance, as your ship approaches it, Sampaolo lies on the horizon like a beautiful soft cloud, all vague rose-colors and purples, a beautiful soft pinnacle of cloud. Then gradually, as you come nearer, the cloud changes, crystallizes; and Sampaolo is like a great wonderful carving, a great wonderful carved jewel, a cameo cut on the sea, with a sort of aureole about it, an opalescence of haze and sunshine. . . . Orange-trees are in blossom at Sampaolo the whole year round, in blossom and in fruit at the same time. The olive orchards of Sampaolo are just so many wildernesses of wild flowers: violets, anemones, narcissus; irises, white ones and purple ones; daffodils, which we call asphodels; hyacinths, tulips, arums, orchids—oh, but a perfect riot of wild flowers. In the spring the valleys of Sampaolo are pink with blossoming peach-trees and almond-trees, where they are not scarlet with pomegranates. Basil, rosemary, white heather, you can pluck where you will. And everywhere that they can find a footing, oleanders grow, the big double red ones, great trees of them, such wonder-worlds of color, such fountains of perfume. The birds of Sampaolo never cease their singing—they sing as joyously in December as in June. And the nightingales of Sampaolo sing all day, as well as all night. Tiu, tiu, tiu—will, will, will—weep, weep, weep—I can hear them now. But I must stop, or I shall go on forever. Believe me, the beauties of Sampaolo are very great.

If you will believe me and your own recollections, the joys of the Lady Paramount are very great.

But to believe in me and to give oneself to the introspective joys of recollection is not to do the novelist justice. You must read him again. Even Bacon would not read Harland by deputy; and memory, after all, is only memory. A truly great novel merits many readings in a lifetime; five or six, perhaps; it may be twice as many—who knows? I should not venture to say how many times you should renew your soul in the flowers of Harland's later years; I only suggest that in his gardens of gladness you refresh your heart again, just once more, before you say a farewell forever to all his roses of summer. It may be long ere you see his like again. Novelists are not writing in his way now; there live writers as good as he, aye, and better; but none quite like him. For he knew, as few know, the art of creating a little wonder-world of happiness, of sheer joy, out of simple things like the smiles of mortals and the sunlight in the blue sky; but perhaps those are the magic-weavers of most things beautiful. In his pages you learn the beauty of life by a contemplation of its beauty, not by an analysis of its blots; and the gladness of living by living with people who are glad and full of hope and clean of heart. In those later novels you learn, too, the joy the writer had of his new faith, a sacramental blitheness of soul that of itself tells its tidings to his readers without his voicing a message of his own.

That this man, this artist and craftsman of exquisite finish, should die in Italy seems altogether the fitting thing. He was the voice of her hills, of her flowers, of her villas, of her wonderful sunsets, of her precious olden joy that has defied the pillage of modernity. He had culled the sweetness of her meaning, and had given it to a million hearts; and then he died. Down in San Remo he died, where many like him have gone for health, and found it; where many like him have gone to take passage for the last long voyage home; in that little city, where men have come to dream of days gone and to see visions of days ahead wrought a little closer to their hearts' desire; where countless throngs of holiday hearts have come to beguile the present hours, gladdened by the sunshine, and the magnolias, and the music, and the dancing blue waters of the Mediterranean; for San Remo ever calls to the world as a sweet song that would be heard. Into the dreams of how many, I wonder, has been woven the one little memory that Harland, master-dreamer and builder of dreams, came here to enjoy his last dream before going to sleep. I am sure that the southern sun remembers him, and that the waves of the sea, washing the wondrous beauty of San Remo, often think of the heart that once became still in the little city. For the light of the sun was in him, and the glad song of water.

Developments in the Church of England

A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE

MORE than fifty years ago Newman wrote of the Church of England that it had "hitherto been a serviceable breakwater against doctrinal errors more fundamental than its own." But, he added, "How long this will last in the years now before us, it is impossible to say, for the nation drags down its church to its own level." The "dragging down" has made considerable progress in recent years and the breakwater has given way at more than one point. Side by side with the party in the Church of England, which in its teaching and its practice is approximating more and more to Catholic ideals, there is another party which for years has been explaining away what were once regarded as fundamental tenets of every Christian body. In 1911, Dr. Hensley Henson, then a canon of Westminster Abbey, preached a strange Christmas sermon, in which he described the opening chapters of St. Luke's Gospel as a beautiful piece of poetry, which formed no part of the original Christian message. In the following Lent he arranged for a course of sermons at St. Margaret's, Westminster by Professor Thompson, on "Christianity without Miracles." Among the miracles excluded, or explained away, was the virgin birth of the Redeemer and His Resurrection. Of course there were protests, but there was no official censure. On the contrary, Dr. Hensley Henson was shortly afterwards promoted to the Deanery of Durham, a diocese important for the fact that its cathedral city is the seat of a small university, devoted almost entirely to clerical education for the Church of England.

Those who felt alarmed at such instances as these were told that the party to which the Dean and his like belonged was not an important one, and could not speak for the Church of England. But within the last few days there have been other instances which suggest that this latitudinarian party is very influential. It is, of course, always difficult to say what body in the Church of England can speak with anything like authority on a question of doctrine. But if there is any organized body which can speak for it, it would seem that this must be the Bishops, assembled together and assisted by the representatives of the universities and the whole body of the beneficed clergy. Convocation is such an assembly of the bishops and the clergy, these latter being represented by their elected proctors. In the province of York both bodies meet in one assembly. In the more important province of Canterbury the Bishops form an upper house, and the clergy sit separately as a lower house. Convocation is a development from the old synods of the pre-Reformation Catholic Church in England. It was indefinitely prorogued in 1717 and did not meet again until it was revived by Queen Victoria in 1852. Once the parliament of the clergy, to which the English kings referred all questions of taxation of church property, it has no longer any direct legislative power. It is an advisory body and can only take effective action on questions referred to it by the Crown in what are known as "Letters of Business." Such Letters of Business were addressed a few years ago to the Convocation of Canterbury, directing it to consider and report upon the revision of the Book of Common Prayer. This report is now all but concluded, but practical effect cannot be given to it until an Act of Parliament is passed amending the Prayer Book, as suggested.

The procedure adopted by Convocation had been to refer each portion of the book to a committee whose report was then put first before the Upper House of Bishops and then the Lower House of the Clergy. A number of remarkable changes have been introduced. In the baptismal service the allusions to the Deluge and the passage of the Red Sea, as types of Baptism, have been struck out. In the marriage service the same course has been taken with the references to Adam and Eve and Isaac and Rebecca. The apparent reason for these changes is that the people who call themselves "higher critics" have been arguing that all these matters are unhistorical. But the most remarkable change was made in the sitting of July 4. The matter under discussion was the Report of the Revision Committee on the Ordination Service, as already adopted by the Upper House of Bishops, and it was moved that instead of the subjoined passage, consisting of a question asked by the Bishop and the answer given by the candidate for Orders: "Do you unfeignedly believe all the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments?" Answer: "I do believe them," the following formula should be substituted: "Do you unfeignedly believe all the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, as conveying to us in many parts and in divers manners the revelation of God, which is consummated in Jesus Christ?" Answer: "I do so believe them."

Dr. Wace, the Dean of Canterbury, opposed the change. He pointed out that such a formula might be accepted even by one who believed neither in the inspiration, the historical accuracy, or the authority of the Scriptures, and proposed instead as an amendment the formula: "Do you acknowledge that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were given by Divine inspiration?" The proposal was rejected by 63 votes to 5. A proposal to insert after "conveying" the words, by "Divine authority," was rejected by 52 votes to 31. A suggestion that the last words should be: "In Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God" was defeated by 52 votes to 21. A further attempt to amend the formula so that it would end with the words, "Fulfilled in the Incarnate Word, Our Lord Jesus Christ" was negatived by 45 to 19. Finally after the words, "In Our Lord Jesus Christ," had been added, the original formula was accepted by 74 votes to 4. It would seem then that both the Bishops and the representatives of the clergy have agreed to sweep away further barriers against unbelief and to remove one more obstacle to representatives of the higher criticism and the latest forms of Modernism entering the ministry of the Established Church. There is much talk of the "comprehensiveness" of the Church of England. Here we have the representative assembly of its clergy practically refusing to assert the inspiration of Holy Scripture, and further rejecting the proposal to add a distinct assertion of the Divinity of Christ. In the debate the reason chiefly put forward was that the formula should be so drafted as not to "trouble the consciences" of candidates for ordination. The Established Church declares in its Articles that it accepts the early Councils. These Councils assuredly never dreamed of drafting their decrees so as to have loopholes for the doubter and the unbeliever. But this is what the Convocation of Canterbury has done. Surely thoughtful men in the Church of England must ask themselves if it is any longer a victim to the truth or a barrier against error. To a plain, straightforward man it would seem that a church which does not teach is a church only in name.

An Efficient Catholic Organization

EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

SO many excellent suggestions have been made of late in the columns of AMERICA that if all had been carried out one feels sure that the needs of the Church would have been supplied for many years to come. There is scarcely any want either in the way of lay action or of parish or city organization that has not been outlined and defined, and the cumulation of the comment and evidence leaves no escape from the conviction that we must somehow organize to meet these needs or we shall blush on the Day of Judgment. We are indeed all agreed that something should be done. But when it comes to deciding on the action then the clash of opinions begins.

It is most significant that in most of the suggestions made the writer proposed some new form of organization to meet a special need. It would be interesting, if time served, to count all the new societies that have been suggested, sometimes in detail, with their names and all else. If all the associations for this or that admirable purpose that have been suggested had been set afoot, it would need a volume as big as the "Catholic Directory" merely to record the names of their officers. But be merciful, dear suggesters. Only think what a huge trouble it is to get even one society thoroughly organized and to find the proper men or women to act as leaders. And the inauguration, agony that it sometimes is, is easy, compared to the task of keeping up energy and enthusiasm. While you are suggesting the excellent activity which you have perhaps thought over from every angle and know quite thoroughly in every detail, someone else is no less convinced that another activity, equally praiseworthy, likewise deserves a society all to itself, and is busy planning one. And after this zealot comes another and another, until the air is full of by-laws and constitutions, and we are undone by the very number of our combinations!

This has been going on for a long time. We have been astonished in the course of wide observations to see the multiplicity of our Catholic organizations. They say that at Atlantic City it is impossible to suggest any name that has not already been pre-empted by some hotel. The same seems almost literally true of Catholic societies. In some places every parish has its own original societies, with new names and functions, not affiliated with anything else under heaven, and many of these new associations, in their zeal, hope to get outside the bounds of the parish and to spread their name and their work through the nation.

I know of one parish where there are actually, I have it on the word of the pastor, twenty-three societies of one kind or another, and as there are only three priests in the parish it is clear that the priests have a merry life. If we keep on we shall be hopelessly disorganized by our organizations; completely disunited by our various unions; and utterly dissociated, one from the other, by the very multiplicity of our associations.

Well what is the remedy? We surely need more organization. When one has a definite plan to propose it is natural that he should suggest as well a definite form of organization to promote it. A definite form, I answer, but not necessarily a different form. Let us use what we have, instead of trying new and confusing experiments in organization. Most of the good ideas that have been proposed through the pages of AMERICA could be put into effect most practically and with great economy of effort through the organization which we have everywhere, in schools and parishes, and which we call in many places the sodality.

Why does not the sodality occur more often to the minds of zealous suggesters as the means of carrying out their excellent plans? Perhaps, alas! it is because the sodality has suffered so much at the hands of its friends. There are in too many places throughout our country moribund and ambiguous societies, vague in their purposes, spasmodic and ill-organized in their activities, utterly neglectful of the traditions and rules of the sodality, which to the great injury of a noble name, call themselves "Sodalities of the Blessed Virgin." We name no names, nor have we at this moment any particular instances in mind, for all the sodalities with which we are acquainted are either good sodalities or are striving to become so. Whom the cap fits let them wear it. But we merely wish to emphasize that it is not for such equivocal affairs that we bespeak the attention of zealous planners. It is the zealous and well-organized sodalities, whose members and whose director know and strive to put in practice those excellent rules promulgated in 1910, as the authoritative expression of the ideals and methods of sodalities of this present time. If you can find or originate such a sodality in your neighborhood you will have no need of beginning a host of new societies for the promotion of whatever work needs to be done for the neighbor and the Church. For by means of sections of the sodality you will be able to manage them all.

Notice that the chief want of the Church today in the matter of effective lay-organization is not good ideas. Those who are familiar with the needs of the day and who keep in touch with conditions are pretty well agreed as to the things that need to be done. The problem is to arouse sufficient energy and self-sacrifice in our people and then to set them systematically to work to do each one a little part of the task before us. The most hopeful means of arousing this zeal and training this leadership is to be found in the sodality.

The difference, too often not sufficiently regarded, between our Catholic activities and the multifarious enterprises of the sects is that our Catholic action to be fruitful must be founded on supernatural motives and helped by the grace of God. Non-Catholic social activities aim for the most part at natural ends which can be sufficiently attained by merely natural efficiency and the employment of natural methods. We are forever aiming at something beside and beyond all that the world can give or understand, and even our ministrations to the body are directed to the welfare of the soul. Hence, in all Catholic activities there must enter something of the supernatural. We must lean on the arm of God. Now there is no surer guarantee of the supernatural spirit than the patronage and intercession of the most Blessed Virgin. The growth of the spirit of supernatural self-sacrifice is in direct ratio to the increase of truly fervent sodalities. It is a sad fact that this devotion has somewhat languished among us. In the past generation there were far more sodalities of men, for instance.

Again, we need some one society that will serve as a link to bind the various classes and divisions of our people together. By the formation of sodalities for young and old, men and women, according to the suggestion of the present Holy Father, we shall have a bond of union for the whole parish. Whoever has studied the workings of successful parish sodalities will realize the force of this suggestion. We have not space to develop it here. A general meeting of all the divisions of the sodality with reports from the various sections will acquaint all the active members with the work that everyone is doing.

Finally the flexibility and indefinite adaptability of sodality organization make it possible to meet at the minimum of effort any need of the parish, new or old, which is not already being attended to by some other organization. One can begin a new section at a moment's notice and when the need passes the section may be disbanded while the members go on to some other activity. Permanent sections may be kept for permanent needs, and each section may take just as many members and have as many meetings as are needed for the successful conduct of that particular activity. Meanwhile, in the midst of this various activity, the sodality itself through its regular meetings and the spiritual influence it exerts, supplies the permanent element in the work and is ready to furnish volunteers not only for its own activities but also for the other societies of the parish whose rights it will carefully regard.

Withal the prime purpose of the sodality is the cultivation of an ardent and active devotion, reverence and filial love toward the Blessed Virgin. Its first aim is to develop the personal holiness of the sodalist through the imitation of her virtues. Work for the neighbor and the Church are but a means to an end. But it follows from this very subordination of the material to the spiritual in the sodality that it is a most potent instrument for promoting even the social activities of Catholics. For all that Catholics agree on is the Faith. We are separated by every accidental difference that can divide mankind. In nationality, class, wealth, location, education, training, we differ endlessly. If then we are ever effectively to come together it must be on some supernatural basis that will minimize our differences and emphasize our one point of unity.

Given then a well-organized and flourishing sodality, it will be clear how many of the good suggestions offered in these pages of late may be carried out without the trouble or the anxiety of establishing a new organization. Men and women, old and young, may work together each in their own division and yet all cooperating according to their powers. Whether it be a question of some social activity, such as making our young folk better acquainted, or looking after strangers, or of some intellectual work, such as study clubs or night classes, or of constructive charity, the most needed of all amongst us, or of helping the missions or instructing children in their catechism, think of the sodality and you have at once a means of speedily interesting just the ones most suited to the work of organizing them with the least expenditure of energy and time and of coordinating their activities with the other works of the parish. All this is not mere theory and a hope. It is impossible, we dare say, to describe the different works that may be undertaken by the laity, but there is not a single one of these good works which is not being carried on successfully in the manner just described.

Crimean Relief Work and the Aftermath

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J.

IN these days of highly efficient relief work in war it is interesting to go over forgotten records of other wars and glimpse the patient labors of brave women who silently passed up and down the wards of hospitals, tending the wounded and nursing the sick, without the aid of any relief organization officially sanctioned by a government. The good work done by Florence Nightingale, Mary Stanley and a great many others whose names have not lived in connection with the Crimean hospitals is all the more remarkable for the fact that there was no tradition to guide them: they were blazing new trails. Even the Sisters who were trained to care for the sick as a part of their apostolate had never met the sick under conditions so strange as those prevailing in the eastern hospitals. For them it was a new venture, as it was for the lady volunteers, and the paid nurses, and great credit is due to all who had a share in mitigating the horrors that followed fast upon the glories of Inkermann.

There is a certain charm in the simplicity that marked the directions given to the group that first left England under the direction of Florence Nightingale to do relief work for the British Government. It will be remembered that it was composed of divers elements. It is with the Sisters of Mercy in that party, that this paper is chiefly concerned. They were given a set of rules, a modification or adaptation of their ordinary rule of life, intended to meet extraordinary circumstances. Briefly they were to act as follows: (1) The Sisters are to attend to the spiritual and temporal wants of the Catholic soldiers in the hospistals, but to the temporal wants only of the Protestant soldiers. (2) They are not to enter into controversy or discussions but to inform the chaplain of any non-Catholic desirous of instruction in the Catholic Faith. (3) The interests of religion being so nearly concerned in union and good order, the Sisters are to observe that silence in the hospitals that their rule directs.

Every Catholic in England was concerned about the mission undertaken by the Sisters. Their lot was to be cast chiefly among those not of the Faith, and they were to take their orders from the lady superintendents, not one of whom was a Catholic. If the Sisters failed to win universal respect, if the least incompetence or want of prudence was shown by them, there would be sad hearts in communities and congregations at home. How heartening then to those interested in the mission to hear week after week of the splendid work done in the East. From commanding officer to private, from the chief medical authority to the simple orderly came a united tribute to the untiring, skilful, and gentle nursing of the Sisters of Mercy. Hence the joy in every convent when official commendation reached the quiet of the cloister where prayers were constantly ascending heavenward for the success of the Crimean mission. In a report to the War Office, December 24, 1855, the Deputy Purveyor-in-Chief wrote: "The superiority of the Order system is beautifully illustrated in the Sisters of Mercy. One mind appears to move all and their intelligence, delicacy and conscientiousness invest them with a halo of extreme confidence. The medical officer can safely assign his most critical cases to their hands, doses ordered every five minutes will be faithfully administered, though the five minutes' labor were repeated uninterruptedly for a week."

The following year, 1856, when the Sisters were leaving Balaklava, Sir John Hall, Inspector General of Hospitals in the East, paid them a visit to express his thanks for the work they had done. Moreover, he forwarded a letter to the superior, Madame Bridgman, who was resigning the charge of the General Hospital into the hands of Florence Nightingale. His letter, in part, read:

MY DEAR MADAME:

I cannot permit you and the Sisters under your direction to leave the Crimea without an expression of the high opinion I entertain of your ministrations, and of the very important aid you have rendered to the sick under your care. I can most conscientiously assert, as I have on other occasions stated, that you have given me the most perfect satisfaction ever since you have assumed charge of the nursing department in the General Hospital at Balaklava. I do most unfeignedly regret your departure. . . . I enclose a letter from Sir William Codrington, Commander-in-Chief, expressive of the sense he entertains of your services, and I feel assured you must leave us with an approving conscience, as I know you do with the blessings of all those whom you have aided in their hour of need. To Him who saw all our outward actions and knows our inmost thoughts and wishes I commend you. And may He have you and those under you in His holy keeping is the prayer of

Yours Faithfully,

JOHN HALL,

Inspector General of Hospitals.

Balaklava, April 5, 1856.

The letter enclosed was addressed to Sir John Hall. In part, it read:

SIR:

I regret to learn that Madame Bridgman, the Mother Superior of the Roman Catholic nurses, is to quit the General Hospital and to proceed to England. I request you to assure that lady of the high estimation in which her services and those of her Sisters are held by all, founded as that opinion is, upon the experience of yourself, the medical officers, and of the many patients, both sick and wounded, who during the fourteen or fifteen months past have benefited by their care. I am quite sure that their unfailing kindness will have the reward which Madame Bridgman values, viz., the remembrance and gratitude of those who have been the objects of such disinterested attention.

W. CODRINGTON,

General Commander.

Military men of every rank were loud in their praises of the heroic work done by the Sisters. Soldiers invalided home would never pass a convent of the Sisters of Mercy without paying a visit, and red-coats were familiar sights in the corridors and convent chapels. The daily post, too, brought letters from men who were still in the East. There was a story current at one of London's clubs, a good many years ago, that shows a soldier's high appreciation of the Sisters' devotedness. Colonel Connolly, a Protestant officer, was traveling through Ireland after the Crimean War, when he heard a fellow-traveler speak disrespectfully of Sisters. The Colonel jumped up from his seat and delivered a warm defense of the ladies who had nursed him in the hospitals of the East. Then he handed the maligner a card, saying: "If you say another word against these saintly gentlewomen I shall call you out directly. Choose your weapons." The cowardly slanderer subsided. It must be added for the sake of historical truth, that the Colonel's lifelong regret was that he did not "have a shot at him."

The British Government expressed its thanks for the Sisters' labors among the sick and wounded, and Lord Panmure, Secretary of State, requested that they "might be informed of his satisfaction at the work which they had performed with so much zeal and devotion." He expressed his "thanks and cordial approval of the services rendered by them to the sick and wounded of our army in the East." This, however, was by private letter. It was the Sultan of Turkey who really thanked them officially. In December, 1856, Bishop Grant was officially informed that the Sultan wished to present the Sisters who had nursed Turks as well as Christians in the Ottoman Empire with a testimonial of his appreciation of their services. In making this communication to the Bishop, as it had come to the War Office in London from the Sublime Porte, Lord Panmure added that he wished the Sisters to realize the "sense entertained by her Majesty's Government of their devotion to the sick and wounded soldiers in the East." As might be expected, the Sisters whose services were wholly gratuitous, declined to accept any gift that might savor of remuneration. Cardinal Wiseman and Bishop Grant would not allow them to send an absolute refusal to the kind offer of the Turkish Sultan. The War Office, too, did not wish the offer of a foreign potentate to be refused. It was agreed by the ecclesiastical authorities and the Government that the Sisters were to receive the money from the Sultan and to devote it to the use of the sick and the poor among whom they were laboring. A letter from Lord Panmure, Secretary of State, to Bishop Grant, assigning to each community that had sent volunteers to the Crimea, a definite sum of money, closed the matter. The Sultan's gift amounted to £230. Strangely enough the sum received from the Sublime Porte was the only royal recognition the Sisters received for their labors among the sick and wounded of all nations, classes and creeds, in the Eastern hospitals during the Crimean War. Twenty-four of their number had gone to the front. Two found graves on the heights of Balaklava. The others returned to their convents to pass their lives in prayer and labor for others. Years after the Crimean War Queen Victoria sent to the survivors the Order of the Red Cross, a decoration for distinguished service in military hospitals, and in recent times the British War Office has sent a military escort to the funeral of any Sister of Mercy who was with Florence Nightingale in the East.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six-hundred words.

What Ireland Wants

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It may be that, as my friend Father Dooley, says, the Sinn Fein party does represent the real Ireland of today, politically and numerically. On the other hand it may not. And whether it does or whether it does not, is precisely what I want to know. It may be, as Mr. Joseph Forrester says, impossible to determine with absolute certainty, whether "colonial Home Rule or the hope of the Sinn Fein for a free and independent Ireland represents Irish opinion today," if by "absolute," Mr. Forrester means "mathematical." But British Empire or no British Empire, whether Ireland is in the main for one or for the other ought to be ascertainable with enough certainty to warrant us in accepting it.

What Ireland, herself, wants should be what Americans of Irish birth or ancestry should want for her. Such, it seems to me, is the heart of the matter. Let us find that out and when we find it out let us agree upon it, and help her, in so far as we properly can, to get it. And, meantime, it will do us no hurt always to remember that we are Americans and have a war upon our hands which takes precedence over all other business.

Mt. Vernon, N. Y. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We are today participants in a world-wide war, forced upon us, that we may help preserve the right to self-rule of free peoples. Great Britain is the backbone of this fight; without her the cause would be lost. Any internal dissension among her people only serves to put the cause in jeopardy. Now, Ireland is unquestionably entitled to self-rule, and if she be united as to its nature she should have it; indeed, had she been united, she would have had it long since. Her leaders, with England's consent, are now threshing out the question, and the hopes of the world are centered upon their efforts. If successful, who knows but that eventually she may realize her very highest aspirations? In the midst of this national and peaceful deliberation a bomb has been cast with intent to sow death and destruction and put in deadly peril the very cause for which its authors claim to be fighting. The Sinn Feiners know full well that any present attempt to create an independent State would inevitably cause civil war in Ireland, even if England were agreed to it. It would be a stab in the back of all the nations now fighting for liberty, for it would weaken the resources of Great Britain, and, consequently, of her allies, just when they are most needed.

Sinn Feinism, while a laudable aspiration in times of peace, which would have the sympathy of all free peoples were the Allies to win in this war, is, therefore, today, under the circumstances, downright treason, not merely against Great Britain, but against the United States as well. And it is just as well for those of your correspondents who so glibly uphold it as justifiable at the present time to realize this fact. Their attitude is just as inimical to the cause of free peoples as if they openly proclaimed the Germans as their allies.

Philadelphia. J. PERCY KEATING.

Mr. Wells's Invisible God

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is not my purpose to attempt to justify the religious fancies of Mr. H. G. Wells. On the contrary, in my analysis his mind stands out as characteristically Protestant. Not only is it divorced from fundamental religious facts such as, for instance, that God's existence can be proved from reason; but it appears never to have freed itself from that peculiar Protestant subjective twist which renders the mind incapable of squarely facing our integral human nature in all its complexities. This state of mind, however, is in no way incompatible with the ability to see that Protestanism itself, in all its phases, does actually contradict man's nature and can therefore lay no just claims to being a true religion. This is a point which Father Stack seems to have overlooked when in AMERICA for August 11, he takes exception to some of Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock's statements with regard to that "portent of the times," the spirit of Mr. Wells' book, "God, the Invisible King."

What the real religious attitude of Mr. Wells and others like him formerly was has been very definitely stated by a German Catholic theologian. He says:

> If we trace the origin and literature of rationalism and, furthermore, read the personal views of prominent Free-Thinkers we again and again find that their antagonism to positive Christianity is based upon an understanding of its doctrines which are not those of the primitive and Catholic Church, but of the orthodox Protestant body, and based upon Luther; it comprises his theories of the complete absence of free-will, of the power of original sin, of justification by mere faith and imputation, and of the impossibility of fulfilling the law and attaining to sanctity. These misunderstandings extend to most recent works on ethics and are responsible for the resulting aversion towards all that is specifically Christian. (Mausbach, "Catholic Moral Teaching and Its Antagonists," p. 32).

To expect a mind of this stamp to return to Protestantism is really asking too much. On the other hand the assertion made by Mr. Wells that "It is not that we . . . have turned back and are returning. It is that we have gone on further" may be accepted on its face value and taken as additional testimony regarding the failure of Protestantism. With this latter Mr. Wells is undoubtedly thoroughly acquainted. But such a statement has nothing to do with the full truth, the Catholic religion, about which he is quite ignorant. He may, indeed, feel sure that he is backing away from the religion of his youth, thus falling in line with Hazlitt, Carlyle, R. S. Stevenson, and a long host of others. He may even be convinced that he is running away from that bogie Catholic Church which exists nowhere else but in the Protestant imagination; but as far as the real Church of Christ is concerned, he has no means of judging whether he is actually coming or going. On this point I had much sooner trust to the judgment of Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock than to that of Mr. Wells himself. Certainly, as far as I can see, a mind which had no sympathy with spiritual religion should suddenly realize, however gropingly, the need for a belief in a God of some kind or other marks a decided advance in the direction of truth.

The difficulties underlying the religious thought of most non-Catholics today are chiefly imaginative, ethical, historical and psychological. This being a fact of which they themselves frequently do not seem to be fully aware, are not we individual Catholics sometimes in danger of shutting the door forever on further discussion by neatly decapitating the theological arguments of those whom we are only too prone to regard as "adversaries?"

Woodstock, Md. MOORHOUSE I. X. MILLAR, S.J.

Catholic Prayers and French Priests

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for July 28, in an article contributed by Barbara de Courson, entitled "The Brave Sons of France," there appears the following statement: "On the body of a soldier who was killed in Artois was found a paper with the following prayer: 'My God I accept now with an obedient heart the kind of death that it shall please Thee to send me with its sorrow, its anguish and its pain.'" In Catholic churches, frequented by English-speaking people, after the beautiful prayer recited after Holy Communion, beginning "Behold, O kind and most sweet Jesus," we have the prayer: "My Lord God, even now resignedly and willingly, I accept at Thy hand, with all its anxieties, pains and sufferings whatever kind of death it shall please Thee to be mine." These prayers are used by myriads of Catholics, and copies of them may be obtained from the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, New York. I presume that in every nation this prayer is in use among millions of Catholics.

Another item. I should be very glad if the French Government which has so willingly accepted the loan of American money and the assistance of our soldiers, than whom there are no better, would graciously consider the fact that to millions of American citizens as well as to a large percentage of soldiers in the army, the Catholic religion is so dear that injustice to Catholic priests by the French Government is deeply resented. While no Catholic priest shrinks from the post of danger, it would be a wise act for the French authorities to call the French priests out of the trenches and relieve them from the horror of killing their fellow-men.

Northampton, Mass. W. THORNTON PARKER, M.D.

St. Patrick's Purgatory

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is only due to the devout and historically minded, who have been distressed by the recent lawsuit in which the scene of St. Patrick's Purgatory in Ireland has been the subject of litigation between the Bishop of Clogher and Sir John Leslie, to say that in answer to inquiry I hear the matter has been amicably settled out of court and without the assistance of English law, as all Irish disputes should be. A letter to me on the subject reads:

The case was to be tried to day at Lifford. Your father and Skelton attended. Meantime through the intermediary of a friendly priest, the Bishop was approached for an amicable settlement. It is not the moment when strife is rampant everywhere to be tenacious for material rights. The legal documents never refer to the Island. The feeling was that your father was a kind of ground landlord and that the church buildings belonged to the Church. As you know relations between the Church and the landlord have been good. However today when your father and the Bishop agreed to settle things out of court, they soon arranged matters and the Island is now the recognized property of the Church and your father agreed to let them have the ferry, as the Bishop had wanted for the last year to buy it. It is more dignified for the Bishop to be the recognized owner. He was so pleased with the arrangement that he pressed your father and Felix McKenna to come to a collation.

This happy result is an omen of good-will in Ireland.

St. Johnsbury, Vt. SHANE LESLIE.

Quoting the Classics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. Anweiler, by his example of the ready application of the classics to conditions of the hour, will probably arouse to tediousness certain leisurely and less-discriminating persons, perhaps numerous, who may be tempted to turn from amateur farming in an arduous age to the pleasant business of culling apothegms and capping citations. Thus a man of noble intent may plague his generation.

By way of assistance to the front-porch grumblers, who have been complaining sotto voce about our opposing militarism with "militaristic methods" might be offered that neat summary by Cicero in the "Pro Milone," "Haec ita gesta sunt, judices; vi victa vis, vel potius oppressa virtute audacia est." The tense is enheartening. At a time when, on our own Capitolium, blindfolded Fates in Palm Beach vesture are drawing medicated lots, the sober lines of Horace in the "Ode on Contentment" gain a new appropriateness:

. . . . aequa lege Necessitas
Sortitur insignes et imos;
Omne capax movet urna nomen

And then, with singular unkindness toward those who may be wondering whether they will be included among the first to be drafted:

Districtus ensis cui super . . .
Cervice pendet, . . .
Non avium citheraeque cantus,
Somnum. . . .

There is a vivid reality in "Cras ingens iterabimus aequor," and an echo of the nation's present spirit.

Mansfield, Mass. L. J.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.

President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00

Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

The Pope and Peace

FOR a long time the bleeding heart of the world has been torn by a mighty desire that no man dared express. Men, women and children, one in the kinship of Christ, the Prince of Peace, looked out over the earth saturated with human blood and longed for the day when a voice that could command reverence, would be lifted up in the cause of civilization ruined by a monstrous war-passion. The day has come; the Prince of Peace has spoken through His vicegerent, the Pope, imploring men to take thought over their differences, before their nations are shattered beyond repair. His Holiness has given the world a document remarkable both for its vision and courage, in which he invites the belligerent Governments to open communication with each other in the hope that the terms he suggests may prove available as a basis for further negotiation. In this Benedict XV has but expressed the longings of a world weary of slaughter; he has simply made articulate the cry of humanity shocked beyond measure by strife that is at once a reproach and a danger to manhood.

What effect his plea will have on the Governments of the nations at war, it is hard to say. But this much is certain, the effect on the world at large will be incalculable, if for no other reason than that His Holiness has set morality over against ruthless, brute-force and challenged men to choose between them. The nation that refuses to harken to such a call writes itself down not as a vindicator of justice but as a monster lustful of men's blood. This should give the strongest of them pause.

More than that, in the Providence of God the Pope is appearing on the scene in the nick of time to save governments from a new menace that grows more threatening at every roar of the cannon. Let neither the Kings nor the Presidents of the battling countries deceive themselves, they are living under the shadow of a danger that lowers threateningly. Radicalism is advancing by leaps and bounds, strengthened by the very passions that war arouses. The safety of constitutional government is in the balance. Which way shall the scales be tilted? The wrong way, if the war is prolonged without due necessity. The truculence of labor here, the insistence of anarchists and Socialists abroad, bear with them a serious lesson. The latter have even gone to the extreme of telling the world that if they are refused passports to the Stockholm Conference, they will do their best to upset their respective governments. There is a clear issue, an issue between the sane conservatism represented by the Pope's document, and the destructive radicalism illustrated by the words and actions of men who are willing to take any advantage to score a victory over constituted authority.

What will the nations do? Two standards have been set up before the face of the world: the Pope's bears the inscription "Peace with Honor"; Radicalism's reads "Down with Governments." The choice must soon be made. An evil selection means confusion worse confounded to a world red with the blood of its noblest sons, and nauseated with crimes that have come up from the bottomless pit.

The Afflicted Church in Mexico

PERSECUTION of the Mexican Church is persistent and brutal. Government officials are stalking priests as the hunter stalks deer. And the outrage of it is that the savage process is "constitutional." There is another outrage, too, that lies nearer home: it is that America is directly responsible for Carranza's present position and power. One inference from this fact is clear and need not be enlarged upon. A second is not so clear, and demands mention at least. Reparation is due to God for the part our nation played in the catastrophe that has overtaken the Church in the Republic just beyond the Rio Grande. For us who are followers of Christ there is now but one way of making amends, by prayer. Time was when American Catholics could have prevented the awful ruin that come upon a once-fair institution, but that time is past. Thanks to sordid politics played by a dozen and one men who paraded themselves as "prominent" Catholics indignant at the "interference of the clergy in politics," many of the altars of Mexico are desolate and the bread of life is not broken to multitudes of her children. The deed is done and the prominent Catholics who abetted it may well listen to hear if the echo of "Is it I, Lord?" is in their hearts.

But for us, there is another more pressing occupation, prayer for Mexico, prayer for its afflicted Church, that God may soften the hearts of tyrants so that His saving word may be spoken freely once again to people who are athirst for the fountain of life. This is the September intention of the League of the Sacred Heart sent forth to the world with the approval of His Holiness, Pope Benedict XV. True, the intention is for all the world, but for us it has a special significance. And it is to be hoped that every American Catholic, in fact that every American who values the interests of religion and morality, will storm Heaven with petitions for those Mexicans to whose physical sufferings are added trials of spirit almost beyond counting. The Pope, in his recent letter to the Mexican Archbishops and Bishops, sets aside the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, December 12, as a special day of prayer for Mexico and its Church. It is but fitting that we should join our afflicted brethren in the Faith, at the common altar of Christ, that day, praying the Prince of Peace to bless abundantly the war-riven land and the prostrate Church sacrificed in His Blood.

"The Starving-Out Process"

NOT long after Father Bernard Vaughan published in the Nineteenth Century his plain-spoken article on "The Menace of the Empty Cradle," he received from "a distinguished American citizen in Orders in the Anglican Church," a description of our "best people's" attitude toward birth-control, and an account of "the starving-out process" to which ministers with large families are subjected: sad commentaries on Protestant morality in this country today. Father Vaughan's correspondent wrote:

> Oh! that we Anglican clergy could do as you have done! But alas, if we did, at any rate in the United States, we should be "starved out." . . . I have been through the process (starving out) . . . many times in my ministerial career! But somehow or other we have survived. God has come to our aid just as the hours seemed darkest. In my case the "starving out" always came about (and doubtless the same thing will happen here) for talking to my congregation occasionally about their own sins instead of the sins of the people in the Bible. It was the same "lack of tact" (truly Satan's device for clergy who want to be well spoken of) in the case of St. John Baptist, you will remember. But the chief cause always in my case has been that I am the father of . . . children, and have plainly said in my pulpit that to be married and to be childless (unless God himself denies the gift of children) is to be living in the very worst kind of sin. . . .
>
> Ministers' wives are like all the rest, and avoid maternity. I have spoken to many, to hundreds in fact, of our younger clergy, hoping to influence them, and they all acknowledge that they use artificial means in order to "keep down the size of their families!" And they do not seem to have any sense of sin about it at all. Truly, as Mr. Gladstone once said of our American Protestant theological writers, "They do not seem to have any sense of sin." Truly we are growing rotten. What would De Tocqueville say now? A clergyman, known to me, has been actually refused admittance to the rectory on arrival in his parish when the good people discovered that he had "such a disgracefully large family." (Their ipsiss. verb.) "Why," they said, "it's a beautiful new rectory, and those children will scratch it all over." Parishes are pretty wise, and when they can find out about the "new minister" before he is accepted, the man with a family "disgracefully large," will never be hired to preach the Gospel to them. Fancy Christian people talking about "disgracefully large families!" The really great sin today among married people is that the families are "disgracefully small."
>
> Oh! that we could handle these poor, sin-ridden people as you Romans do. But we can't, that's all there is about it. We have no authority, no confessional, or at best only here or there penance can be done in some Ritualistic church—the majority of our clergy would not know how to hear a confession. And then, too, our clergy thinking in dogma and morals so widely apart as they do, what can be done? The only Church in America that can really do anything in the way of controlling and shaping the morals and the thought of its people is your own, as the Church Times (Anglican) said some time ago about you: "The Roman Catholic Church and her clergy (to their everlasting credit) here always "set their faces like a flint" against the small-family heresy.

That minister's words call for little comment. Protestant clergymen are finding it increasingly difficult to keep their independence, self-respect and their pulpits too. Many a minister with a family to support is forced to take up some commercial pursuit instead of, or in addition to, his regular calling. The realization, moreover, that only from the pulpits of the Catholic Church is God's truth fearlessly spoken today is doubtless leading numberless members of the Protestant clergy and laity to consider more seriously than ever before the claims of Catholicism.

"Le Panache"

"TO the primitive folie héroïque is added a courteous, knightly respect for woman, and occasionally an exaggerated consideration for the opponent. It is this blending of bravery and pride, of gallantry and generosity that the French call le panache." That is the description Christophe Nyrop, Professor in the University of Copenhagen, in his recent book, "France," gives of the admirable military spirit of that country as it has manifested itself all through her history. Originally le panache meant the knight's graceful plume, and then it came to symbolize all the virtues of le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. Le panache led Roland, dying in the Vale of Roncevaux, to yield his gloves to no one but God, his highest Liege-Lord; le panache made St. Louis, the captive-king, the "proudest Christian" the Saracens had even seen; le panache led the gallant Godfrey de Bouillon, when chosen king of Jerusalem, to refuse to wear a crown of gold where his Saviour had worn a crown of thorns; le panache inspired Joan of Arc's invincible leadership and unbounded patriotism; le panache made the Chevalier Bayard the mirror of every knightly virtue; le panache shone bright on the disastrous fields of Crécy, Poitiers and Agincourt, and likewise lent a romantic grace to the victories of Condé and Turenne; le panache, too it was, which dictated the renowned utterance of the Count d'Auteroches at the battle of Fontenoy, when he rode forward, saluted the enemy, explained that the French never fired first and then cried: "Messieurs les Anglais, tirez les premiers!" In the present war also it is that same spirit of le panache that has so often made the French stay with a bulwark of steel the advance of the invader and made deeds of splendid heroism a daily commonplace.

Now that our own soldiers will soon be at the front engaging the enemy let them learn if need be from their French companions-in-arms all the qualities of the Christian warrior that are implied and connoted by the term, le panache. We have entered the war with the high purpose of vindicating our rights as a nation and of restoring to Europe that long-desired peace which her kings, diplomatists, statesmen and captains have shown themselves either unable or unwilling to secure, but which must speedily be made or the civilized world will madly rush to complete self-destruction. Motives less worthy than those must not animate our fighting men, and they never shall, please God, while, like the chivalry of France, the American soldier keeps le panache his watchword.

"Broadway"

WHEN written between quotation marks the name stands not for a street but for a national institution. It represents succinctly that aggregation of theatrical enterprises of which the material habitat is on or near the great thoroughfare and somewhere between Madison Square and Columbus Circle. It is a national institution, national in its reputation, national in its sources of supply, national in its field of exploitation and national in its influence.

Such an influence is worthy of our serious investigation, indeed compels it. The admirers of the drama reiterate, somewhat wearisomely, that the theater is a school. Taking them at their word they cannot complain if "Broadway" is considered one of our greatest national universities.

One is justified then in asking a few questions about this great educational institution, for educative it undoubtedly is and equally unquestionable is its character as an institution. Lacking, indeed, the unity of architectural design and of administrative machinery and the pedagogical plan observable in most American universities, it is to be likened rather to those looser gatherings of faculties and colleges which flourished in the Middle Ages at Paris, Oxford, Salamanca, Bologna and elsewhere. Like them it possesses a certain recognized group of professors, a certain trend and standard of ideals and fairly well-defined lines of teaching.

Fair questions about Broadway are: What is it teaching the nation? What sense of their responsibility have the deans of its various faculties? What qualifications worthy of a student's confidence have those professors, instructors, lecturers and demonstrators who nightly address audiences, for the most part youthful, in New York and the other centers of our population? For be it ever remembered that Broadway like Chautauqua has its traveling lecture-courses equipped with everything capable of initiating the "provinces" into the mysteries first revealed to a metropolitan audience.

The above questions are not unanswerable. Most of the leading lights in this great university have their names in "Who's Who," and their pictures accompanied by numerous "intimate glimpses" are displayed in the leading magazines, technical and general. No educational institution in the United States enjoys for its personnel, its fabric and its courses a tithe of the publicity enjoyed by Broadway.

Equally easy to answer are questions anent the teachings of Broadway. For example: What is Broadway teaching about woman? A fair question to put to a national university. In this case it is easily answered. Select at random any seven theaters in Broadway and on six consecutive nights observe what may be seen or heard behind the footlights. When Sunday comes you will have the answer to your question and food for a day's reflection and prayer beside.

What is Broadway teaching about the family? That is a question touching the foundations of the nation and not to be lightly touched by a university of national scope and influence. Let the average theater-goer supply the answer. Or suppose the question be put thus: What is Broadway teaching about divorce? The answer will be more easily reached and formulated even without the laboratory method suggested above.

In these days when the nation's soul is drawn to its tensest pitch, another fair question might be: What is Broadway teaching about self-sacrifice and all those virtues which make the true patriot? What contributions to moral preparedness for war are the managers and producers, scenic and choric artists, making by way of "doing their bit."

If Broadway can satisfactorily answer these and kindred questions its function as an educator is being fulfilled with honor to itself and with nation-wide beneficent results. If not, then it is no exaggeration to say that there does not exist within our broad boundaries a single concentrated localized menace to the national welfare comparable in intensity, subtlety and diffused influence to the aggregation of theatrical enterprises commonly known as Broadway.

Cooperation and War

THE war emergency has affected every phase of national life. The day has passed when only part of a nation goes to war. To train an army to take the field and wage battle for the welfare of the country is today a small part of the preparation. As President Wilson has stated: "It is not an army we must shape and train for war; it is a nation." Small differences must merge into the paramount interest of the hour. Industry, commerce, labor must present a united front, if our armies in France are going to achieve the task set before them. Cooperation is the watchword of the day.

And for cooperation the Government looks to the religious bodies of the country. They are paid a handsome tribute in the "National Service Handbook," issued by the Committee on Public Information.

"The desire to cooperate has nowhere been manifested more splendidly than in the work of the religious bodies within the nation. . . . It would be well if every clergyman, every priest, and every rabbi in the country would consider himself a special agent of the community's welfare, and work now as he has never worked before for efficient and harmonious cooperation."

At the outbreak of war the Catholics of the country were reminded of their duty in the national crisis by the Archbishops in session at Washington. Recruiting statistics demonstrate that they have not been deaf to the country's call. Those who cannot go across the seas have been shown a sphere of action whereby they may help in a very definite way the cause of our armies by aiding Catholic chaplains in the field and at the camps. By a successful million-dollar drive the Knights of Columbus, officially acknowledged by the Government as the relief organization for Catholic soldiers and sailors, has made it clear that cooperation is no novelty among Catholics. The story is the same the country over. Social and civic organizations in parishes and dioceses have been energetic and active in doing their bit. In Washington, a week ago, Catholic activity found concrete expression in the Catholic War Congress when representatives from every section of the land met to deliberate on the best means of helping the nation's cause. Catholics are in earnest about this war; they have given themselves to the country for service and desire but one thing, victory for our arms.

Literature

"FATHER" STANTON

"TO be curate to a Protestant bishop is a horrid position to be in." "I said at a meeting last night that if Mr. Mackonochie's suspension did anything to kick over that foul 'rooks' nest,' the Establishment, I thanked God for it." "I have been weaned long ago from the Established Church." "I have and do pray the good God to dispel Protestantism." "The work of the Gospel is being done in a negative way, if the Ripon people can be made to loathe Protestanism as simply virtual infidelity." "Please God, they shall never make us either cowards or Protestants."

When our readers are assured that the foregoing quotations express the sincere convictions of "Father" Arthur Stanton, an interesting memoir of whom has lately been written by the Right Hon. George W. E. Russell (Longmans), they will naturally wonder why the well-known curate of St. Albans, Holborn, never became a Catholic. It was because he held so tenaciously, notwithstanding his remarkable Catholic-mindedness, to the Protestant principle of private judgment. Father Stanton used to describe himself as "politically socialistic, in faith Papistical, in church policy a thorough-going Non-Conformist," and his fifty years' curacy in the High, High Anglican church of the London slums was a practical exposition of his tenets. He enthusiastically seconded his vicar, the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie, in adopting the Catholic ritual almost in its entirety, and in teaching the Church's doctrine in nearly every detail except the "Petrine claims." In his eagerness to reach the working man, Father Stanton started "St. Alban's Club," where liquor was served and card-playing encouraged; and he was at odds, as a rule, with his Protestant diocesan, but generally ended by doing as he liked.

Father Stanton had a fine scorn of bishops' inhibitions. When his vicar was suspended and he himself was forbidden to officiate at St. Alban's, he led his congregation to another Ritualistic church, where they all heard "Mass." He keenly felt the injustice of the poor little church of St. Alban's being persecuted for its "Roman" practices, while wealthy Ritualist congregations were left unmolested.

"One of the most stupid boys who ever left Rugby," Stanton was hardly keen enough of intellect, it would seem, to see the untenableness of his position. He thought himself a real priest, though the bishop who ordained him certainly had no intention of making sacrificing priests, even if his lordship had been a duly consecrated bishop and had not used maimed rites. "I should become a Roman Catholic tomorrow," Father Stanton remarked, "if I could be persuaded to say . . . that we were no priests after all." Whatever misgivings he had about the reality of his priesthood and the consistency of his position, he seems to have quieted by the well-known Anglican expedient of throwing himself whole-heartedly into his work. He was as devoted to the poor as a Catholic priest would be, and in an Anglican that, of course, attracted attention. Why, he actually succeeded in getting men and women to come to his services in their working clothes, an unheard-of thing in the eminently "respectable" Establishment. He was ever at the beck and call of the wretched and the poverty-stricken, and Mr. Russell's memoir contains amusing stories about Father Stanton's way of dealing with them. Here, for instance, is an anecdote he tells himself:

> One morning I was very busy, and a knock came at the door, and the maid said, "Please, sir, a man wants to see you." So I said, "Tell him I'm very busy and can't see him." Then she called up, "Please, sir, he says he wants to see you spiritooal." So I said, "Oh, well, if he wants to see me 'spiritooal' I'll come." So I went down, and in the hall was a poor chap very much out at elbows. I took him into the dining-room and shut the door and said, "Well you want to see me spiritooal, do you. Now what is it?" And he said: "I say, 'guv'nor, have yer got an old pair of trousers?" And I replied "Yes, I have, and I've got 'em on." And then I said, "Now what do you mean by coming 'round here and interrupting a busy man and saying you want to see me 'spiritooal' when you only want to beg?" And the man said, "Well, look here, guv'nor, if you had nothing inside you for three days and you thought there was a silly parson 'round the corner what you could get something off of, don't you think you'd have a try?" And I replied, "Well, upon my word, I think I should."

Father Stanton once said to a priest of his acquaintance: "I have made a complete mess of my life in our church. Should I have done any better in your church?" "I don't think you could have been a success in any church where obedience is required," was the candid answer he received. But he used to think in his old age that "I might have made a better thing of it if I had become a Catholic." Father Stanton was not particularly fond of Jesuits, nor did a letter from Father Albany Christie, S.J., who reminded him that "You are before God a mere Protestant and the Minister of a Miserable schism," seem to increase perceptibly the recipient's admiration for the Society.

But when all is said the subject of this memoir was a stanch lover of Our Blessed Lord and of His poor, and fought valiantly for more than fifty years to make the Establishment tolerate Catholic practices and Catholic tenets. "It is the nativity of the dear Mother of Jesus," he once wrote his sister. "I went to the R. C. church for five minutes and kneeling before the altar in the presence of the adorable Sacrament, asked God to hasten His time when all Christians should be of one heart and mind again." "He loved the Blessed Mother," one of Father Stanton's fellow-ministers testifies, "with the tender devotion and reverence of a son." And to his mother he wrote: "If you did love the adorable Sacrament of the Altar even as much as I do, you would never think candles, vestments, meaningless ceremonies." Early in life he learned the value of "Confession to a priest," and always taught and practised it. When Pope Leo XIII passed away, Father Stanton called him "a man sent from God" and "by God placed in his right position." "His personality, strong and attractive, challenged our littleness, his power of mind our respect, and his goodness, which is the gift of the grace of God, our love." What a striking contrast, finally, to the opinions of many an Anglican minister of his time was Father Stanton's fearless defense of a book of "Catholic Prayers for Church of England People," which he had compiled. The Bishop of London had called it "a thoroughly disloyal work," whereupon Father Stanton replied:

> You may think "Catholic Prayers" disloyal to the principles of the Reformation and to the Advertisements of Elizabeth, but this I will say to you about the book: There is not one single word in it against the inspiration of the Word of God, there is not one word in it against the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, there is not one word in it against the Atonement of Our Blessed Lord and Saviour on the Cross or His Resurrection; nor is there a word in it against the Sacraments or the Saints.

Poor Father Stanton! Had he only been gifted with a humbler heart and a clearer head, what an admirable Catholic he would have made!

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

THE FLAIL OF GOD

O Mother of God and Mistress of men,
Out of the heart of heaven when
Oh, when will the fire-shod Angel fare
Forth through the still stars unaware,
And leap like a bolt through the distance down
Upon fleet, upon fosse, upon flaming town,
And silence the guns on land and sea?

Wars there are and rumors of war,
Nation and nation, king and king,
Battle anear, and battle afar,
Till the world girt with a fiery ring
In one place quake of the earth slew all.
Mammon and Moloch call and call,
Famine there is and pest shall be.

Ah, well we know the end is not yet:
But, Mother of Pity, look thy fill
Where women work that men may kill,
And their eyes with blood are wet.
Children are reckoned to fill spent files,
The wounded lie in cathedral aisles,
God and His people bivouac without.

Thousands are blown like shards into rain:
Thousands slip down in the deep by night:
Thousands are mown like ripe, red grain:
Thousands are blasted and burnt in flight:
And the wounded lie, and die, and die,
A roaring hell is God's blue sky,
And the sick are forgot in the rout.

Oh, ask of God to punish no more;
To stay His flail on the threshing-floor:
For millions are dead, and millions are maimed;
The people are weary, their princes are mad;
Sinned have we all, and our pride is tamed;
Even the child unborn is sad.
O Mother Mary, hear our plea!
Peace, oh, peace, let us have of thee!

Rome. C. M.

REVIEWS

The Monks of Westminster. Being a Register of the Brethren of the Convent from the Time of the Confessor to the Dissolution. With Lists of the Obedientiaries and an Introduction. By E. H. PEARCE, M. A., Canon and Archdeacon of Westminster. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.00.

A list of monks of the great English monastery from Edwin and Alwold in 1049 to Richard Morton and John Vernon in 1540, a catalogue of abbots, priors, sub-priors, wardens of St. Mary's Chapel, sacrists, chamberlains, almoners, cellarers, infirmarers, refectorers, precentors, kitcheners, wardens of the churches, wardens and treasurers of Queen Alianore's manors, pitancers, granges, bailiffs and abbots' stewards: such is the substance of this scholarly volume. We can readily believe the author's statement when he says that it needed some courage to undertake the task. At first sight, the work might seem to be one devoid of interest, except to the learned few who delight in ransacking the dusty corners of old libraries, but when the reader has glanced even cursorily through the volume, he finds the past made more vivid and lifelike. With the author himself, after he has read the names and the notes which everywhere shed light on the times and the life of the old monastery, the reader will find "The medieval Abbey no longer ghostly and unreal but flushed with all the signs of a vigorous circulation."

Mr. Pearce is not the first to delve into the archives of the Abbey. As Dr. Armitage Robinson pointed out in the Church Quarterly Review, Richard Widmore in his "History of the Church of St. Peter, Westminster" (London, 1751), had already made interesting researches into the history of the old convent and Dean Stanley had familiarized the English public with the influence exerted by the abbey and its monks on the life and policies of the nation. But Stanley at least, as Dean Robinson says, "had no kind of sympathy with the monks." "His heart," says Mr. Pearce, "was with the kings and the queens, the courtiers and the statesmen, the men of arms and of the toga . . . rather than with those whose lot was to offer incense." It is not so with Mr. Pearce. He has a real sympathy with the abbots and their monks. He enters into their life and seems to understand their purposes and aims. To him they are the chief actors in the varied drama of the existence of the abbey in the 500 years of its splendid service to the nation and the Church. Some of England's greatest names are found on the list of the abbots, Ralph de Arundel, for instance, Richard de Berking, Richard de Crokesley, Walter de Wenlok and William de Curlington, and the life of the abbey is there in all its phases. Both from the scholarly introduction and the illuminating notes accompanying the names of the higher monastic authorities and those of the lesser brethren, we are led into the very heart of their monastic life. We learn the date of the first Mass of the priests, their appointments, all the little duties they had to perform. There is much about deeds and property, of temporalities. At times there is a glimpse of petty squabbles and rivalries which threatened the peace of the cloister. But on finishing the book the reader will have a high opinion of the famous abbey, its work and its brethren. Now and then the world and its passions crossed its portals, for it was a part of the busy life of the nation. But the main purpose of its founders was on the whole fulfilled within its walls, for it ever remained the home of virtue and faith, a sanctuary of peace and a house of prayer. J. C. R.

Evenings with Great Authors. Vol. I, How and What to Read; Shakespeare; Lincoln. Vol. II, Scott; Dickens; Thackeray. By SHERWIN CODY. Chicago: A. C. McClurg and Co. $2.00.

Classical authors, it would seem, are losing their power to charm, if one may judge by the increasing production of condensed, selected and abbreviated editions of their works. Such volumes, accompanied by explanatory notes on the author's life and rules for appreciating his books, are commendatory, in so far as they cultivate a taste for good reading and serve as an introduction to further perusal. But one is inclined to believe, that too often the excerpt is deemed a sufficient substitute for the original whole, and that the reader, satisfied with his shallow knowledge, is not prompted to take the entire volume down from the bookshelf. To the experienced reader, however, such editions are sometimes of real value. If the selections are well chosen, he will find his favorite passages in convenient form for frequent re-reading.

To meet these two requirements, Mr. Cody has prepared his "Evenings with Great Authors," and if this method of inducing readers to love the great writers is of value, he is successful. His condensed form is not offered as a substitute for the original, but rather to present a bird's-eye view of some favorite work, that may be read in a single sitting. "Ivanhoe," the complete story in condensed form, represents Scott; the "Pickwick Papers," Dickens, and "Vanity Fair," Thackeray. Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice," "Romeo and Juliet," and "Hamlet" are synopsized, and the reader will probably find very few of his favorite passages omitted. In the biographical sketch of the author, the personal, human element is insisted on, rather than mere data of his life.

As introduction to the volumes, Mr. Cody has an illuminating section on "How and What to Read." It may, no doubt, be useful as a work-a-day manual of appreciation and as a rapid survey of the prominent landmarks in the history of literature. Here, also, there is the danger of substituting shallowness for deep knowledge, a few ideas, adapted to conversational glibness, in place of deep feeling and thorough appreciation. The principles, however, are for the most part solid, well-expressed, and certainly helpful as an introduction to the authors.

F. X. T.

Inside the British Isles, 1917. By ARTHUR GLEASON. New York: The Century Co. $2.00.

The English-Speaking Peoples. By GEORGE LOUIS BEER. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

The first of these books contains a series of essays in which the author professes to record the most prominent movements and theories noticeable within the Britain of the great war. At first sight, the essays seem to have nothing more in common than that they deal with England, yet closer observation lends plausibility to the author's own remark: "The book has coherence because the theme is the principle of democratic control." He thinks, in other words, that the fundamental driving force of movements so widely divergent, as that of "Labor" "Woman" and "Ireland," is none other than democracy asserting itself in the world, much as it did, at the time of the French Revolution. The theory is good, but the author missed the chance to be original when he neglected to follow up the idea by proving the assertion.

Originality, however, Mr. Gleason seems to disclaim. The value of the book is rather in that it has caught and in the main faithfully registers currents of opinion, theories and movements which are unquestionably agitating the public mind, not only in England, but throughout the world. It is unfortunate therefore that the writer is not always true to his professed purpose, that of giving facts, and that he does not avoid taking sides. Nowhere is his failure in this respect, more regrettable than in the chapter on feminism. Here Mr. Gleason has been at pains not only to explain, but to propagate in its most dangerous and radical form a movement which no consistent Catholic can further.

One of the theories matured if not actually originated by the war, is the necessity of some rapprochement between the English-speaking peoples of the world. Mr. Beer's book is an important contribution to the theory. In unmistakable terms he proceeds to establish his thesis that not only their own interests and their own ideals but the good of humanity in general, demand a breaking down of the political isolation between the American people and the people of the British Commonwealth. He uses the word "Commonwealth" to designate not the people of the British Isles alone, but also such great democracies as those of Australia and New Zealand. The book is characterized by its thorough preparation of material, sequential thinking and grace of expression. Catholic readers will hardly agree with all the author's statements, however, and will marvel that while Grotius and Hobbes get merited mention as leaders of thought on international relations, Suarez, the keenest of them all, is passed over. G. D. B.

The Centenary of the Brothers of Mary. By Brother JOHN E. GARVIN, S.M. Illustrated. Mt. St. John, Dayton, Ohio: The Brothers of Mary. $1.50.

On October 2, 1917, the Institute of the Brothers of Mary will commemorate the one-hundredth year of its foundation. The present volume is written to mark this important event. It contains an historical sketch of the founder of the society, the Rev. William Joseph Chaminade, and an account of the Brothers of Mary in the United States. The society was introduced into the United States during the lifetime of Father Chaminade, in the year 1849. Father Leo Meyer was the pioneer of the Congregation in this country, opening the first school in Cincinnati, and in the following year beginning a novitiate, normal school and college at Dayton, Ohio. Today in America and the Hawaiian Islands the Society of Mary numbers 420 members, employed in sixty establishments. The Brothers have under their charge about 18,000 pupils, in six colleges, five high schools and forty-nine parish schools. The Brothers of Mary were first called to the United States in the interest of the parish school, and it is the parish school that has ever remained their chosen field of labor. They have acted an important part in the general advancement of Catholic education in this country, and their devotedness and self-sacrifice have done much in furthering God's [illegible]. The story of their labors is well told in this volume of nearly 300 pages. G. C. T.

Latin Sentence Connection. By CLARENCE W. MENDELL, Ph.D. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.50

This book is an exhaustive, close analysis of the psychological inter-relation of sentences in sustained discourse and the means by which such relation can be made and defined. The sentence is defined from the view of both writer and reader as "the relevant part of the conceptional unit which first appeared in the mind of the speaker or writer." Coordination and subordination are artificial distinctions. The completeness or incompletenesses of a sentence is logical not syntactical. The author goes back to three fundamental means of conjoining sentences which existed before the advent of conjunctional clauses, namely, repetition, change, and incompleteness. Each of these in either semantic or functional form was able through logical subsequence or juxtaposition to indicate, and in some cases to define the relation of sentence to sentence. Repetition and change are necessarily retrospective means of relation; incompleteness relates both by anticipation and retrospect; it figures also in the use of parentheses. From a wide reading of the Latin authors the writer has collected over 14,000 instances of such non-conjunctional connections. Conjunctions developed gradually and naturally according as need of greater exactness was felt. They are a supplementary force defining more precisely the already indicated relativity of sentences. The author suggests further study in the development of conjunctional clauses as a supplantation of the more fundamental means of connection and points out workable lines of investigation.

The chief merit of the book is its brief yet thorough treatment of the subject. There are many valuable sidelights on syntax and the origin of certain constructions. The author's strong grasp of his matter is shown in the careful differentiation of forms which at first sight appear to be virtually the same. This is especially noticeable in the chapter on semantic repetition. The whole work is especially interesting as a piece of research showing the development of the language from the rougher and more fundamental means of sentence connection to the smoother and yet more intricate uses of the conjunction. It should find favor with the philological seminar. F. A. M.

Poems of Charles Warren Stoddard. Collected by INA COOLBRITH. New York: John Lane Co. $1.25.

Miss Ina Coolbrith, a lifelong friend of the late Mr. Stoddard, made, at the cost of much time and labor, a collection of the verses he published in newspapers and periodicals, and now Mr. William Walsh has chosen from her book the fifty-four poems he considers the best. The opening selection is deservedly "The Bells of San Gabriel," with its pealing refrain:

> And every note of every bell
> Sang Gabriel! rang Gabriel!
> In the tower that is left the tale to tell
> Of Gabriel, the Archangel.

And then come the fine stanzas on the "Albatross" and on the "Palm of the Sea." Natives of the Middle West will particularly enjoy "Indiana," a "name so like a lullaby"; "In Clover" is a true nature-lover's rhapsody; and the Catholic poet appears in the fine imagery of "Sanctuary" when he describes the calla thus:

> A perfumed satin altar cloth
> With one tall, golden candlestick;
> A velvet butterfly's the moth,
> That frets thy rosy wick.
>
> Thy spotless napkin doth enfold
> Such balm and costly frankincense,
> As shrouds the swinging censer's gold
> In clouds that struggle thence.
>
> But now I hear the vesper call
> Of floating air-bells, deftly tipt;
> The dove's at her confessional—
> The monk-mole in his crypt.
>
> And flowery fields my eyes engage;
> The rivulets, the winding ways—
> A missal, whose illumined page
> Is given up to praise.

And in these lines "To the Unseen" Mr. Stoddard reaches the high spiritual note that Catholic poets often attain with little difficulty:

> I know of One who is so true to me,
> We may not parted be.
>
> Though I have strayed on the uttermost
> Yet is His voice not lost.
>
> If I am madly-deaf, for having erred,
> Still may I hear His word.
>
> If I have sinned, behold a crimson flood—
> The river of His blood.
>
> Wherein I find redemption: tenderly
> He woos my fear away,
> And searches out some star of hope above,
> So boundless is His love.
>
> Though I am weak, there is a hope of power:
> He is my mighty tower.
>
> Like as the sun that frights the gloom away,
> He is my perfect day.
>
> E'en as the moon that is the charm of night,
> He is my full delight.
>
> His beauty lights a mansion in the sky—
> Alas! and what am I?

W. D.

Political History of Poland. By EDWARD H. LEWINSKI-CORWIN, Ph.D. New York: The Polish Book Importing Co. $3.00.

"The Polish Question," Napoleon said, "is the key to the European vault." The author of this latest history of Poland reiterates this statement and further declares that "On its proper solution the future peace of Central Europe will largely depend." The question has become one of international importance since the recognition by the Central Powers, on November 5, 1916, of the independence of the Kingdom of Poland. Russia, too, has been making rosy promises, but it is yet an open question, awaiting the close of the war, as to whether the nations concerned will add another blot to their escutcheons at the expense of Poland, or whether reparation will be made for the "greatest crime of modern history." By the total dismemberment of the Polish Republic, in 1794, between Russia, Prussia and Austria, Poland as an independent State ceased to exist. But the Polish people, developing under entirely different conditions in three sections, have retained an intense and vigorous nationality. With each European upheaval, their unceasing passion for freedom has shown itself by the sacrifice of men and money, but treachery and injustice have hitherto been the only reward granted for blood and bravery.

Therefore, this volume, treating of Poland's history from the earliest times to the entrance of the United States into the war, is quite opportune. It is well illustrated by numerous pictures and maps and has a very useful key to the pronunciation of Polish names. The author, who remarks that most works on Poland, in the English language, are "either prejudiced and unfriendly, or sentimental and uncritical," has not remedied this defect, but has aggravated it rather. For Dr. Lewinski-Corwin's anti-Catholic prejudice has betrayed his judgment. A history of Poland openly inimical to the Catholic Church and characterizing its endeavors as "fanaticism," strikes a dissonant note. It were well if the author remembered throughout his work his own forced admission of "the identification in the popular mind of Catholicism and patriotism. The future history of Poland but tended to merge the two conceptions into one." He endeavors to separate these "conceptions" and thereby mars his work. It is equally false to blame the clergy for Poland's lack of unity in the early days and to state that the Reformation was accepted by the educated classes and rejected by the masses and those of a lower grade of mentality. He continually stints the praise of the latter-day Catholic patriots and dismisses the glorious struggle of the priests for the social and economic development of the people, by remarking that they "subordinated the national interests to those of the Church." As to the Jesuits we are told "That their pupils were brought up in a hitherto unheard of fanaticism and in an abject servility to the mighty," and their suppression by Clement XIV demanded "The organization of popular education which had hitherto been, with such disastrous effects, in the hands of the Jesuits." But Poland's union with Rome cannot be slighted by any author who undertakes to give an accurate and just account of that country's political and social evolution. F. X. T.

America's Case Against Germany. By LINDSAY ROGERS, Ph.D., LL.B., Adjunct Professor of Political Science in the University of Virginia. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

The British Navy at War. By W. MACNEILE DIXON, Professor in the University of Glasgow. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $0.75.

A Soldier of France to His Mother. Letters from the Trenches on the Western Front. Translated, with an Introduction, by THEODORE STANTON, M.A. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.00.

German Prisoners in Great Britain. London: Tillotson & Son.

Professor Lindsay Rogers takes up the war-question from the standpoint of international law, and traces the origin and development of the controversy which was the immediate cause of the conflict between the United States and Germany. His purpose is to furnish a chronological account of the President's policy, neither critical nor defensive, but explanatory. The legal grounds of America's position are set forth briefly and as untechnically as possible. The question of the submarine, the status of armed merchant-ships, the problem of munition exports, and the difference between the English and the German blockades are dealt with thoroughly. Every intelligent American citizen will find in this volume all the material necessary for the understanding of his country's entrance into the war. Professor Dixon, of Glasgow University, in "The British Navy at War," explains the part that the navy of England has played in the world-conflict. He gives a telling account of the Jutland sea fight, and describes other engagements, of greater or less moment, in the general struggle Great Britain has maintained to hold the supremacy of the sea. The volume contains good maps and illustrations and an interesting chapter on the work of the submarine. The author was given every facility for gathering the information that is contained in his little volume.

Under the title "Lettres d'un Soldat," these letters of a soldier to his mother had great vogue in France, where they were first published. The present English translation is accurate and interesting, unfolding the thoughts of a French artist called from an intellectual atmosphere to take his place in the trenches as a private soldier. It is, as might be expected, a very real chronicle of thought and feeling. The Catholic reader will miss in these letters the spirit of faith so prominent in the writing of those who, although not considered artists by a Parisian academy, were true artists of God as they clung close to the truths of religion during the hard life of camp or trench or field work. In response to a request from the American Ambassador at Berlin, the book of photographs, entitled "German Prisoners in Great Britain," was issued. The photographs in the book cover six of the largest prison or detention camps in England, and show with the accuracy of the camera nearly every phase of the life led in camp by England's prisoners of war. The captives look quite comfortable and contented.

G. C. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Though the lecture on "Popular Errors About Classical Studies" was first delivered at Holy Cross College, Worcester, by Father Thomas E. Murphy, S.J., more than fourteen years ago, it is still one of the best defenses of the "old ways" in education we have, for the arguments he uses are quite as convincing and the authorities he cites are just as weighty now as they were in 1903. As the pamphlet, however, has long been out of print, AMERICA'S readers will doubtless be glad to learn that the August 22 issue of the Catholic Mind contains Father Murphy's excellent lecture. It is particularly seasonable now that boys and girls are choosing the school to which their parents will be permitted to let them go. The paper is followed by a short article on the admirable slogan: "Every Catholic Child in a Catholic School!"

The most attractive qualities of Sara Agnes Ryan's recent book, "Christopher Columbus in Poetry, History and Art" (Mayer and Miller Co., Chicago), are the illustrations and the wealth of poetical passages bearing on the discoverer's life and achievements. The author includes in the volume a paper on "Lourdes and the Eucharistic Congress" and another on "Mexico."——Dr. James Bayard Clark has written "Some Personal Recollections of Dr. Janeway" (Putnam, $1.00), the eminent diagnostician who died six years ago. "Dr. R. is an excellent doctor. He won't do you any harm," was high praise from the subject of this sketch. The author, who often writes in a rather awe-stricken manner, well remarks: "In days when doctors are flying from creeds and more—from faith, seeking to solace their souls in science alone, this great man's simple adherence to the teachings of Christ become dramatic proof of his powers of vision."

"My Mother and I" (Macmillan, $1.00), by E. G. Stern, is a touching life-story of a Russian Jewess who has become Americanized. Born of non-English-speaking parents her early days were spent in the Ghetto of one of our large cities. Attending high-school and college, she became wholly cut off from her people and their old-world customs and was fully merged in the conventional stream of American life. The book is cleverly done, presenting intimate and vivid pictures of life and sentiment in the Jewish colonies. Particularly charming and delicate is the story of the estrangement between the daughter and the mother, who helped so much towards the Americanization, but could not become part of it. The author's experience shows that our melting-pot is doing its work; that the process is slow is due not to lack of opportunity, but to the tenacity with which our foreign-born population clings to the traditions and customs of the fatherland. The foreword is by Theodore Roosevelt.

Among the valuable pamphlets and little books that have been gathering on the reviewer's desk is Father Walter Drum's well-reasoned apologetic on "The Divinity of Christ" (Woodstock College Press, Md., $0.05 a copy, $3.00 a hundred). It is one of his lectures on the fundamentals of faith delivered two years ago at the Brooklyn Academy of Music and is just the thing to give Unitarians and non-Christians.——"The Master Key in the Hand of Joseph" (Loyola University Press, Chicago, $0.05 a copy, $3.00 a hundred), is an admirable character-study of Our Lord's Foster-Father, by the Rev. Joseph Conroy, the well-known Jesuit missioner. It should be widely circulated among old and young.——"The House in Order" (Dutton, $0.25) is a "true tale," by Louise Collier Willcox, about a despondent old man who had decided to do away with himself, but to put everything in exact order first. He thus found so many kind and useful things to do that he gave up altogether the thought of suicide.——"Leaves of Gold" (Benziger, $0.50), a new volume of the "Angelus Series," contains Fiona McKay's selections from the Books of Proverbs, Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus.

The great prophet of Homeric higher criticism has truly fallen upon evil days. It was sad enough to see the theory of Frederic Auguste Wolf discarded by critics of the twentieth century, to have all his arguments destroyed by archeology and by still higher criticism, but now comes a French author, Victor Bérard: "Un Mensonge de la Science Allemande" (Paris: Hachette, 1917), who hoists Wolf with his own petard and proves, so Pere Laurand asserts in the July 20 Etudes, that Wolf owes his theory to "Conjectures Académiques" of Abbé d'Aubignac and that Wolf's "Prolegomena" is a mosaic of various works: Wood's "Essay on the Original Genius of Homer," Merian's "Examen de la Question si Homère a Ecrit ses Poèmes," Billoison's "Prolegomènes" and the "Bibliotheca Graeca" of Fabricius. Wolf turns out to be the original bear-beiter, who figures so prominently in nineteenth-century Homeric criticism. Wolf was such an adept at working over and patching together separate compositions that naturally he saw no difficulty in making the Iliad a crazy-quilt. To add insult to injury, A. Beaunier in the Revue des Deux Mondes declares that the Abbé d'Aubignac was only joking and that Wolf took him seriously. Can it be that the century-old scandal of Homeric scholarship took its rise from misapprehended irony? Alas, poor Frederic Auguste Wolf!

There is more bitterness than poetry in most of Sir William Watson's recent book of verse, "The Man Who Saw and Other Poems Arising out of the War" (Harper, $1.00). The following sonnet, entitled "Commemorative," is among the less war-like ones in the volume. The reader should not fail to look up the meaning of "purfled":

Now doth the Year, with gorgeous ritual, don
Raiment of priesthood, cope o'erlaid with gold,
But soon from autumn's purfled scarf unstoled,
The grey cowl of November must put on;
And shaking the thinned locks that shall anon
Cumber his ways, he hears around him rolled
A nation's knell for Youth and Valor tolled.
Heroic Youth and knightly Valor, gone
Where, after clangorous day, is evenfall;
Love's requiescat after battle's throes;
After the cannonade and bugle call,
Earth's whispered leave, in pace to repose;
Lull after hurricane; and crowning all,
Glory's white lily after war's red rose.

"Aloysius Ignatius Fiter, Director of the Barcelona Sodality" (The Queen's Work, St. Louis, $0.50), by Father Raymund Ruiz Amado, S.J., and translated by Father Elder Mullan, S.J., is a little book giving an interesting account of the man and the methods that made the Barcelona Sodality of Our Lady a model and inspiration for all similar associations. On page 2 we read of a "Bishop of Tarragona." Can this be intended for "Tarazona," a suffragan of Saragossa? Tarragona has been an archbishopric, possibly since the fourth, certainly since the sixth century. Indeed it is the oldest and for a long time was the only metropolitan see in the whole Iberian peninsula!—"My Reminiscences" (Macmillan, $1.50), by Sir Rabindranath Tagore, seems to be one of those books that would hardly see the light if it were not for the author's vogue. It is a rambling account of this high-caste East Indian's early life. Hermione and her little circle will just love the pundit's picture which is the volume's frontispiece.

"Our Country in Story" (Scott, Foresman), by the Franciscan Sisters of the Perpetual Adoration, is a text-book excellently adapted to the history schedule of the fifth and sixth grades of the grammar school. With an appreciation of the imaginative powers of the child, the chief events of our country's history up to the time of the Civil War, are told in simple story-form, each tale being centered about some notable character of the period. The psychological value of such a method of presenting events, their causes and effects, is quite apparent. The laborious memorizing of cold facts is done away with, the free curiosity of the child is excited, and its lively imaginative powers are appealed to continually. Another feature of the book which deserves commendation is its justice to the early heroes in the great Southwest, the Jesuit and Franciscan padres, whose deeds receive but scant recognition in most non-Catholic histories.——The latest of the "Loyola English Classics" is "The Dream of Gerontius," by Cardinal Newman. Edited for School Use, with Introduction, Questions and Glossary, by John J. Clifford, S.J., (Loyola University Press, Chicago, $0.10). The poem would make an admirable text-book for the English class in our Catholic high schools, academies and colleges during the Easter season. The noteworthy features of the edition are a discerning introduction, a chronological life of Cardinal Newman, a glossary, an explanation of the literary laws governing religious dramatic dialogue, a list of poems for comparative reading, some excellent suggestions for essays in criticism to be written by the students, and a remarkably thought-provoking series of questions on the content and form of the poem.

"The Margin of Happiness: The Reward of Thrift" (Putnam, $1.50), by Thetta Quay Franks and "War Food, Practical and Economic Methods of Keeping Vegetables, Fruits and Meats" (Houghton, Mifflin, $0.75), by Amy L. Handy, are recent books that housewives will find valuable. The author of the first has excellent chapters on such subjects as a "A 'Square Deal' for Wives," "Housekeeping as a Profession," "The Art of Spending Money," and "A Test of Household Efficiency," topics which have a much more important bearing on our national morality than the general public realizes, for good cooks and economical housekeepers keep down the number of divorces. The author finds that "Dissatisfaction with extravagance and inefficiency are frequently responsible for divorce." There is an amusing story in the volume about a bride who indignantly returned a dozen eggs to the grocer because they proved to be ducks' eggs instead of hens' eggs, which was shown by the fact that "they floated" when she put them in water. The other book tells thrifty housewives how to help Mr. Hoover win the war by using the author's numerous recipes for drying, canning, or pickling various kinds of fruits, meat and vegetables.

"World Voices" (Hearst's International Library Co., $2.00) is the title of a volume of verses by Ella Wheeler Wilcox which she has contributed to the "popular" magazines. The book contains numerous pictures by fifteen illustrators, some "poems of passion," an occasional sermon in metrical form, one on birth-control being particularly sound in doctrine. The following stanzas entitled "Interlude" represent the author at her best:

The days grow shorter, the nights grow longer,
The headstones thicken along the way;
And life grows sadder but love grows stronger
For those who walk with us, day by day.

The tear comes quicker, the laugh comes slower,
The courage is lesser to do and dare;
And the tide of joy in the heart runs lower
And seldom covers the reefs of care.

But all true things in the world seem truer,
And the better things of the earth seem best;
And friends are dearer as friends are fewer,
And love is all as our sun dips west. . . .

The attractive little book of "Notre Dame Verse" (Notre Dame University Press, $1.00), which Speer Strahan and Charles L. O'Donnell, C.S.C., have compiled and edited, as an appropriate jubilee offering to their Alma Mater, contains some thirty authors' contributions to the Notre Dame Scholastic. The following sonnet, entitled "An Evening," by Maurice Francis Egan, is a fair example of the volume's quality:

The tender Mother as she sat among
The home-made toys that scattered on the floor,
Showed that a young Child played within her door,
Took up her weary Son, and softly sung
The low, sad Psalms that dreary days had wrung
From Israel in exile,—now, no more
She sang triumphant, for her heart was sore,
For on the time the sword its shadow flung.

She could not gaze upon His golden hair
Or in her hand His dimpled fingers hold,—
Or feel His Heart beat next her Mother-heart,
Without forecasting that His forehead fair
Should bear the thorns, and His soft flesh grow cold,
As fiercest pangs through palm and side should dart.

EDUCATION.

The Return to God

"DOES Sir Robert Peel mean to say," wrote Newman in his Oxford days, "that whatever be the occult reasons for the result, so it is; you have but to drench the popular mind with physics, and moral and religious advancement follows?" With keen insight into the future, Peel had elaborated "a theory of morals and religion," which feared nothing so much as the very notion of the possibility of a supernatural revelation. It was plausible enough to become popular, so plausible that with the majority of non-Catholic teachers in England and the United States, it was soon the accepted educational doctrine. The "theory," as interpreted by Newman, is simply that "education is the cultivation of the heart and of the intellect, and Useful Knowledge is the great instrument of education." Furthermore, education, thus understood, "is the parent of virtue, the nurse of religion; it exalts man to his highest perfection, and is the sufficient scope of his most earnest exertions."

"Useful Knowledge" and Education

THE sentiment is familiar; it perseveres to this day. Elaborated in flowing periods, time and again it is poured out in sounding streams of eloquence over thirsty multitudes, assembled to dedicate homes of learning, ranging from the little red schoolhouse of romance, to the university's prosaic physical laboratory. That "Useful Knowledge" is at once the aim and sole instrument of education, is a string that was plucked with wearying reiteration by Herbert Spencer, and today vibrates in the vagaries preached by Dr. Flexner, and in the aberrations of that pedagogical nightmare, the Gary Plan in New York. In reality, it is nothing but a page from the gospel of secularism, a sordid philosophy, which if it grudgingly concedes God an existence, denies the possibility of intelligible communication between God and His creatures. Under the influence of this secularism, morality has become another name, and a name not popular, for convention, and religion is held to mean either superstition, or a police measure, indispensable in the work of holding the lower classes to a full sense of their duty towards their betters.

Truly, it is difficult to see how any other result could have been looked for. With the rejection of supernatural religion, the old landmarks in morality and civilization are shrouded with the fog of doubt or indifference. It was an astronomer who said that almost anything might be proved by mathematics, were the sum of two plus two admitted to be a variable quantity. A divergence so small at the outset as to be of little consequence, widens by degrees into a gulf, over which the mind in its search for truth cannot pass. As Dr. Keating, Bishop of Northampton, wrote last October, a fundamental principle, which must exercise its influence in every sphere of human activity, education not excluded, is that God made man to know Him, love Him, and serve Him in this world, and to be happy with Him in the world to come. Thus it follows that "Our supernatural destiny is a law in the moral order as indefeasible as gravitation in the physical order. To ignore it or to defy it, is to insure disaster."

Salvation Through Education

OF that supernatural destiny, education under the shaping care of secularism, decided that it could know nothing, thereby excluding from man's life the highest sanction of morality, and, in consequence, of civilization. That men of undoubted intellectual ability could have worked into a philosophy of education the palpably false theory that to know evil is to avoid it, seems almost incredible. But one cannot argue against the facts in the case. Against whatever conclusions might be drawn from history and from daily experience, the promoters of secular education set it down as a self-evident truth, that to know the good is to embrace it, that evil need only be seen to be avoided. Yet, as Newman pointed out in homely phrase, writing against Peel, in 1841:

> To know is one thing; to do, is another; the two things are altogether distinct. A man knows he should get up in the morning; he lies abed; he knows he should not lose his temper, yet he cannot keep it. A laboring man knows he should not go to the alehouse, and his wife knows she should not filch when she goes out charing; but, nevertheless, in these cases, the consciousness of duty is not at all one with the performance of it. There are, then, large families of instances, to say the least, in which men may become wiser without becoming better. ("Discussions and Arguments," p. 262)

Neither at that time nor afterwards, was Newman disposed to underrate the value of intellectual culture, but he had no idea that it could supplant religion as a force making for right living.

> To say . . . that the mind is changed by a discovery or saved by a diversion, and can be amused into immortality—that grief, anger, cowardice, self-conceit, pride or passion, can be subdued by an examination of shells and grasses, or inhaling of gases, or chipping of rocks, or calculating the longitude, is the veriest of pretenses which sophist or mountebank ever professed to a gaping auditor. If virtue be a mastery over the mind, if its end be action, if its perfection be inward order, harmony and peace, we must seek it in graver and holier places than in libraries and reading-rooms (Id., p. 268).

Salvation through Useful Knowledge, acquired in libraries and reading-rooms, is still a doctrine sacred to the multitude, and even to many schoolmen. Yet, here and there a cry of protest arises.

"Cultured Pagans"

WRITING in School and Society, for June 30, Dr. Carl Holliday of the University of Montana, asks whether it is not time for education to begin the "return to God." Reviewing the story of education in the past century, he finds it full of sound and fury, as rich in the promise of enlightenment, as it was poor in actual performance. "For nearly ten decades," he observes, "the new education has toiled with unsparing pains and with colossal confidence, and has produced—a cultured pagan." True, except for Dr. Flexner, and some other remnants of the Spencerian school, we no longer go beyond bounds in stressing Useful Knowledge as the main factor in education. We do not think that the whole duty of the educator in Chicago is absolved, when he has instructed the children of that metropolis in the best methods of conducting a stockyard, or that Kentucky teachers ought to confine themselves exclusively to the consideration of stills, worms, and mashes, with elective courses, in the mountain districts, on how to discern and extinguish Federal revenue officers. There are some who have seen, and yet see, that the ability to appreciate a Greek chorus or a Turner, although this ability cannot be put up in packages and sold, is not wholly despicable. In fact, the esthetic type of education finds almost as much favor in certain quarters today, as does the school which, proclaiming that the child must be prepared for "actual life," understands by "actual life," the ability to make money. But as a substitute for the supernatural in education, estheticism is hardly more acceptable than commercialism. As Dr. Holliday well says, > Surrounding Tom, Dick and Harry with fine pictures, noble buildings and orchestras breathing forth delightful harmonies, does not make Tom, Dick and Harry any less selfish, any less a cheat, any less a liar, any less a murderer at heart, if not in actual deed. Abe Lincoln could hardly have known an oratorio from Yankee Doodle; he probably would not have made much distinction between the Sistine Madonna and a chromo; but he was, nevertheless, a highly civilized man, supremely civilized, because his moral emotions were so highly developed that his every thought and action seemed to have constantly in view a relation with the highest Good.

Is not education, then, the panacea for the evils afflicting society? Not unless estheticism is equivalent to morality, and Useful Knowledge to invincible spiritual strength.

In England as well as in America, there are encouraging signs of what Dr. Holliday aptly calls "the return to God in education." Early in July, the Upper House of Convocation of Canterbury, referring to certain proposals for the reorganization of public education, resolved that "A united effort should be made to secure that adequate religious instruction be an essential part of the education given." In moving the resolution, the Bishop of Winchester "called attention to the need of religion as the basis of our educational system," a complete if tardy recognition of the teaching of the Church on education. "The fear of secularization" continued the Bishop, "was increasing in the whole nation . . . . but he was optimistic enough to hope that we might open a new chapter in this matter." In closing the discussion, the Archbishop of Canterbury remarked that "it was a mistake to separate education and religious instruction. They were really inseparable." Commenting editorially, the London Times admitted that the "fear of secularization," expressed by Convocation, was widespread, and expressed the hope that "all the Churches will find a line of joint action, the line of maximum spiritual power, at the earliest possible moment. This is no time for delay."

Thus is the ancient wisdom of the Church justified by modern instances. May the lesson not be lost on those "weak-kneed" Catholics who, blinded by the lying promise of worldly advantage, expose their children to loss of faith as well as of true intellectual culture, by placing them in schools which know not God.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S. J.

SOCIOLOGY

"Sets" and "Notions."

THE Uplands made a very happy place for Wolfdom. There were woods and streams, and game in plenty. With little to disturb such peace as wolves desire, they increased and multiplied, but, as often happens, prosperity brought about strange developments. All did not prosper in equal measure, so that prosperity turned out to be a creator of wolfish "sets" and "classes," rather than a leveler of wolfish ranks and distinctions. Thus there grew up the rich set who would live only in luxurious dens, and dine on tidbits supplied by underlings. Freed from the necessity of hunting their food, and yet forced to spend the time somehow, they formed the "Philolykoi," or, as we should say, "the philanthropic set." The object of this set was the most unselfish in the world. The members were never to think of themselves save vicariously by minions who would furnish ample provender for the body, and invent "notions" for public meetings and exploitation. The Philolykoi being themselves permanently "uplifted," although no one knew by what process, were to give thought only to uplifting their benighted brethren who had to work hard for a precarious living.

LEADERS AND PLEBEIANS

WHAT an insight into the popular mind these Philolykoi showed! In one way or another they came to realize that for the propagation of "notions" there is nothing so effective as that social aggregate called a "set." They argued with almost human accuracy that everybody who pretended to be anybody would yearn to belong to the set; or, if they could not belong to it, at least to ape it at a distance by following its dictates and furthering its notions. The more so, as ideas, clean cut and understandable, are uncalled for, and even a stumbling block, in the set. The all-essential is devotion to that imaginative will o' the wisp, a "notion." The fact that the chase of this ignis fatuus "thorough brush, thorough brier," often ends in a bog, is taken as part of the game. But to return to the Uplands.

The set gradually established the notion that all save themselves must live in the Lowlands. When the plebeians complained that food was scarce in the valley and that their wolflings were suffering, they were asked very pertinently how the lower strata were to be uplifted if it were allowed all the advantages the set enjoyed. And if all were unhappily uplifted, how would the uplifters spend their superfluous time? Life would be unbearable. As for the wolflings, it was quite clear that too many young throats howling for nourishment must needs diminish the larder of the elders, and add unnecessarily to parental anxiety and labor. The poor plebs were too stunned to make an answer, but they soon recovered their composure. Had not the set spoken? Anything was better than being counted out of the set. Besides, as was agreed, their betters, bred in the rarefied atmosphere of the Uplands, with leisure to spare, and opportunities for probing life to its depths, must know the wisest thing to be done.

THE SETS AND PUBLIC OPINION

I AM aware that a fable should be brought duly to a conclusion, and pointed with a moral. Perhaps I shall endeavor to finish my fable according to accepted rules, perhaps not. At any rate, I am moved just now to enlarge somewhat on the influence of the set in forming public opinion. Had I not better say, a certain kind of public opinion? You may observe without much trouble, that many who will not hear the pulpit will obey with alacrity a hint from the set which they affect. For them the voice of their set is as the utterance of a Solomon. No word from Cumaean tripod ever fell on hungrier ears than those which listen for the latest edict of their set. But, then, public opinion is a thing rather of feeling, imagination, fancy, than of the judgment. Public opinion rests mostly on what is roundly stated as fact: and the more positive the statement, the more it impresses the multitude. Public opinion is impatient of reasoning. It suspects the logician. It feeds on lists dubbed statistics, on declamation, on frequent repetition. It seeks what will confirm its prejudices, gratify its whims, flatter its likes and dislikes; not what will enlighten the reason, and lead to a sound conclusion that they may prove unwelcome. Reiteration it takes to be an argument in itself. It fancies that if a story is shouted in its ears persistently enough, the tale must be true somehow. And nobody knows how to deal with public opinion better than the sets.

Notice their ways. They never doubt. Their policy is always determined. They don't opine; they assert, and there is little of hesitancy in their affirmations. They leave their followers slight room for pausing between two sides. Their fashion is not so much to say a thing, as to utter it in pronunciamentos. Indecision and stammering are not in their manner. In their assumed knowledge and righteousness, they would imitate, clumsily enough, Horace's brave man, standing unmoved in the wrack of beliefs, of discoveries, of science, of hopes, of men. They blame, they condemn; they ridicule, what pleases them not. They praise, they exalt, they glorify the notion it suits them to adopt. They give out their puny deductions, their puerile reasonings, their surmises, their very regrets, with an oracular cocksureness that would astonish Delphi. So they catch the public, so they impress its imagination, and, by a narrow persistency worthy of a bluebottle fly, win for themselves first, attention, then notoriety, and finally dictatorship over a weak-headed crowd. So do they make and wield at their nod, that strange, untutored, fickle power we call public opinion.

A MODERN INSTANCE

A WRITER whom none but the respectable care for, tells us that what is put before us with pomp of action, and interpreted with suitable adjuncts, impresses us more than what we merely hear narrated or read about. How differently an audience is affected by a story read and a story acted, needs no demonstration in these days. Now, we are forced to admit that the sets can take a hint, and are skilled in their craft. To find a notion with buoyancy enough to float a propaganda, is only the beginning. A set will make the old tub, no matter how unsightly and ill put together, take the water with such a splashing and wild burst of huzzahs, that half the town will run to see what is astir.

First the press is used; then, for example, a secret clinic wherein are taught doctrines damned alike by the decent public and common-sense. A secret clinic, mark you! Withal the police must be made cognizant of its existence, else no arrests would follow, and the set be denied the advertisement of being "martyrs" for the "cause." Real martyrdom must be a glorious achievement indeed, for the shoddiest imitation of it excites wonderment. Playing at martyrdom has come to be a fad of the sets.

Veiled Justice

THE next scene of the low melodrama is enacted in a place sacred to justice. O, there are more reasons than one why Justice should be represented with eyes veiled. Watch the culprit as she paces along with the lofty mien of a discredited goddess. See, she nods approval at a motley procession of women who have been drummed into line to push go-carts with babies in them, their own or borrowed for the occasion, and thus prove convincingly that babies are too common; in fact, almost vulgar. She enters the court room, leers at the judge, smiles at the silks and satins who have run to her rescue; and finally, she defies the law; the law of the State and nature's law. To further voice their approval of the whole nauseous business, a great public meeting is arranged; the high silks in the boxes, the low cottons anywhere. To top it all, we are told that no law is too sacred to break. If she, the American woman, must break the law in order to establish her right to voluntary motherhood, the law shall be broken.

Come hither, my old companion whom I love so heartily, whom I know so well, albeit you are called "My Unknown Chum;" come, and for my solace and my comfort in this sickening turmoil, let me copy a sentence from your pages of wisdom: "The parchment on which the constitution and laws of a country are written might as well be used for drum heads when reverence and obedience have departed from the hearts of its people." Yea, old chum; and let me venture to add that the day will come when even the sets will gnash their teeth because they have despised the mandates of the Lord of heaven and earth, for the sake of their "notions," a bit of play-acting, and the applause of unintelligent and irreverent groundlings.

F. J. McNiff, S. J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Jesuits and Jesuit Students in the War

THE number of Jesuits who have sacrificed their lives in the war is considerable, but by far the heaviest loss has fallen upon the French Provinces. Out of 600 French Jesuits in the army 122 have been killed. The Belgians have lost 5, the Irish 2, the English 1, the Italians 5, and the Germans 18 members of the Society of Jesus. A partial record of the part played in the war by Jesuit students of the English colleges can be gathered from a recent compilation of college notes. Of the old Stonyhurst students 787 are mentioned in the Stonyhurst Magazine as serving in the army and navy, 81 have been killed, 8 died from disease, 10 are missing, 113 have been wounded, 11 are prisoners of war, 66 received honors, and 82 have been named in dispatches. Of Mt. St. Mary's alumni 32 have fallen, 48 have been wounded, and 27 have received honors of one description or another. Beaumont has paid a death toll of 80, while 3 others are missing. The list of heroic "Old Boys" from St. Francis Xavier's, Liverpool, includes Brigadier-General Paul A. Kenna, V. C., D. S. O., and Lieutenant G. Conry, V. C. Two others have won the D. S. O., 10 the Military Cross, 2 the D. C. M., 4 the Military Medal, 1 the Medal of St. George (Russian), 1 the Meritorious Service Medal, 1 the Albert Medal, 1 has been commended for "distinguished service," and 9 others have been mentioned in dispatches. Wimbeldon College, which celebrates its silver jubilee this year, has a list of 85 killed, 90 wounded, and 15 taken prisoners, two have received the Victoria Cross, 6 have gained the D. S. O., 22 the Military Cross, and 60 have been mentioned in dispatches. So far the English Province has given 72 chaplains and the Irish Province has sent 24.

The Knights of Columbus Campaign

THE success of the Knights of Columbus in securing the million-dollar subscription asked for their War Camp Fund, and their worthy ambition in straightway proposing to launch a new campaign for still larger sums, show that Catholics are responding generously to the demands made upon them. The rank and file of the army, the officers' training camps, and all departments of the service contain an exceedingly large percentage of men of our Faith. While Catholics are approximately twenty per cent of the population, it is acknowledged that they constitute at least one-third of the enlisted men. "Is not our duty written large and clear?" asks the Columbiad:

> Shall we see men of our own Faith go down into furious battle without the consolation of religion? Shall we be complaisantly idle, doing nothing or little to add to their comfort, during the strenuous weeks of training for the supreme test of the battlefield?

The position of the Knights of Columbus in this campaign, and their prospective work are thus outlined in the Caravel, the organ of the Knights in the State of Iowa:

> The selection of the Knights of Columbus as the official agency of Catholic service in the army and navy is a direct result of the efficient work done for the soldiers on the Mexican border. In selecting the Knights of Columbus for this work the war department places the great Catholic fraternal Order on the same basis as the Y. M. C. A. . . . The Knights of Columbus will work in co-operation with the official Catholic chaplains and will also have to pay the expenses of many other unofficial chaplains. The Knights will have to erect Catholic centers and suitable places for the celebration of Mass in each of the sixteen cantonments to be established in this country. In these Knights of Columbus Centers all men in the service will be made most heartily welcome.

The greatest opportunity since the foundation of their Order has come to the Knights of Columbus, and they are nobly rising to the occasion.

Parallel Church Schools and Public Schools

THAT an intelligent study of the Bible, taught through a system of religious schools which will parallel the public schools, is the only salvation of American democracy, was the substance of a discourse delivered before the Bible School Union at Auburn, N. Y., by Professor Walter S. Athearn of Boston University. He realizes the utter inadequacy of the public schools from a Christian point of view: "The ethics of Jesus must become the basis for the morals of the American people. These are not found in the public schools, yet the children are sent to them." He likewise understands the futility of merely reading the Holy Scriptures:

> There was a movement launched to put the Bible in the schools to be used for historical and literary purposes, but this is a reflection on the old-time Sunday schools. A study of the Bible cannot be made by reading it daily, or having it read by the teacher; the Bible must be taught and so presented as to give students a religious value. It must be so read to the boys and girls that they, through this study must act religiously, have religious motives and feelings.

'This purpose, he rightly maintains, can be compassed only by teachers especially trained for the work, yet such specific interpretation of the Bible can evidently not be given in the public schools. The Sunday schools he considers wholly inadequate. "Thirty minutes a week is not enough to give to this teaching. After a survey of Boston it was found that the Protestant children had 24 hours of religious teaching a year, Jewish children 180 hours, and Catholic children 480 hours of teaching a year." In view of these facts, Professor Athearn pleads that religious schools be conducted parallel with the public school, so that the child may attend both. The former are to be erected on the local church grounds. This is a new makeshift that cannot fully solve the difficulty. The failure of the public-school system, as here indicated, has taught Protestants a salutary lesson, but they will not find a perfect solution until they realize that religion must permeate the entire education of the child, a principle put in practice in the Catholic school alone.

"Brother" William Hale Thompson

ON the score that it is "an insult against Masonry" an irate correspondent in the Chicago Tribune, signing himself O. Schmidt, attacks the editor's criticism of Mayor Thompson. "I am a true Mason," he writes, "and it is to the efforts of the Masons that Brother William Hale Thompson got elected to the highest office in this city." Masonic journals lash themselves into paroxysms of patriotic rage over imaginary political intrigues ascribed to the Catholic Church. Masons themselves, however, are wholly innocent. But from time to time the bag is opened and the Masonic cat escapes. "I give Brother Thompson credit for his stand," continues the writer, "and I and my friends will stick to him to the bitter end." So, no doubt, they will. The present incident is a mere trifle, but in Mexico, in Portugal, in France, in Italy and elsewhere the Masons have set in action all the machinery of politics against the Church. It is because Catholics have been indifferent to the political intrigues of their enemies to such a degree as not even to secure for the Church the most fundamental civic rights that she has fallen a prey to Masonic politics in so many parts of Europe and America.

Bexhill Catholic Free Lending Library

"HE that observeth the wind, shall not sow; and he that considereth the clouds, shall never reap." In applying this text to their own work of spreading the Kingdom of God by the diffusion of good literature, the librarians of the Bexhill Catholic Free Lending Library unquestioningly trust the public in lending books without fines, without fees, and without any formalities. Their confidence, we are assured, has been fully justified. The passer-by can enter the porch of the Church at Bexhill-on-Sea, where this library was first established, select a book and take it away without further ado. No one will question him, and it is presumed that sooner or later the book will find its way back upon the open shelves. Volumes are taken to distant parts of the country, but "after many days" they are returned. Hence that other text chosen for their work by the librarians: "Cast thy bread upon the running waters: for after a long time thou shalt find it again." The same system has now been applied to a postal library service. Volumes not in the library are supplied at request, if finances permit. The following details are sent us by Constance E. Bishop, an enthusiastic promoter of this work:

> Borrowers merely pay postal charges. A catalogue is given them and books are in circulation in all districts within the postal union. Twenty per cent of the borrowers are non-Catholics, and these invariably require books of theology, apologetics, devotion and biography. Quantities of some individual book, such as a spiritual work by Mgr. Benson or Father Maturin, are in constant circulation. "Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist" by Professor Dwight has been of immense service. Sir Bertram Windle's works are in demand. Light literature is well represented and books upon Lourdes are very largely asked for. Borrowers have been appreciative, and donations, some very generous, have resulted. Catholic authors have presented copies. Now and again a private library has been bequeathed. Then interested people soon realize that the home bookshelf, dusty and untouched because too well read, is a talent wrapped in a napkin. Clearance results; the library benefits and also the donors, as a monthly Mass is offered for all benefactors, living and dead.

Affiliated libraries have been opened in twelve different English cities, and even South Africa and India have branches of the Catholic Free Lending Library. The librarians now extend an invitation to the Catholics of the United States and Canada to do as they have done, and cast their bread upon the running waters.

Our Just Due

IN commenting on this sentence from one of Mr. Root's speeches in Russia, "With many shortcomings, many mistakes, many imperfections, we have maintained order and respect for law, individual freedom and national independence," the Nation recently said: "Thus in one sentence Mr. Root made concession to the criticism of extremists and claimed for ourselves our just due." In a spirit of fair and friendly criticism. Mr. Philip Stein, of Chicago, who wore the judicial ermine for eleven years, asked the Nation whether it is certain that Mr. Root claimed only our "just due":

> There is no civilized country in the world where there is less order and respect for law than ours. What of the lynching bees, the appalling number of homicides as compared with those in other countries, and the prevailing general disregard for laws and ordinances? I also have my doubts on the subject of individual freedom. There is with us more interference with the personal rights of the individual than elsewhere. As one illustration, I cite the prohibition movement, in which a set of well-meaning fanatics seek to deprive their fellow-citizens of their rights.

Maybe, too, the disgrace connected with the names of Goldman and Berkman, and the crime of East St. Louis were in the mind of the former judge.

Prohibition and Patent Medicine

THE Rochester Post Express remarks:

> Among the prominent and ardent prohibitionists of New York City, and one of the active members of the committee of sixty to get the "demon" down, is the manufacturer of a proprietary medicine which is thirty-five per cent alcohol and widely advertised and strongly recommended for neurasthenia and mental troubles. And there are a legion of other medicines, tonics, bitters, cordials which contain a large content of alcohol. Congressman Meeker, of Missouri, gave the House a list of 746 of them, more than half of which contained over twenty per cent. of alcohol, while four of them contained ninety per cent. These preparations are extensively advertised, in papers that will take that kind of advertising, as splendid remedies for most of the ills that flesh is heir to and as good for all other human ailments. Their sales are so large in the dry States of the Union that such localities hardly know that they are dry; yet no suggestion of taxing them has been made, notwithstanding that the drug content of many of them is entirely negligible and they are nothing but whiskey of exceptional rankness, flavored and stained.

The Prohibition movement in the country must be rid of hypocrisy and commercialism to do real good. Less advertising, with more truth, would accomplish real reform in the drink evil.

NOTICE TO READERS: When you finish reading this magazine place a one-cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No wrapping; no address.—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

SEPTEMBER 1, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Russia's New Nationalities
A. Hilliard Atteridge

The Breakdown of Protestantism
J. D. Tibbits

The Art of Joyous Living
L. M. Dodge

Juvenile Literature and Public Libraries
Martina Johnston

Sisters of Mercy and the Civil War
Gerald C. Treacy

Gossiping with Riley
T. A. Daly

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
September 1, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 21

PAGE

CHRONICLE 513–516

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Russia's New Nationalities —The Breakdown of Protestantism—The Art of Joyous Living—Juvenile Literature and Public Libraries—Sisters of Mercy and the Civil War.....517–524

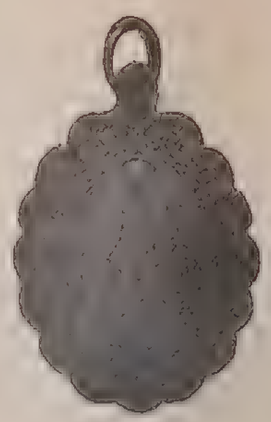
COMMUNICATIONS 524–527

EDITORIALS

Remember Those in Bonds —The Neglected Estate— Our Educational Quacks— A Chaplains' Reserve Corps —Be Worthy of Liberty— Honor the Physician.....528–530

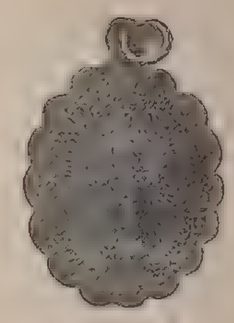
LITERATURE — Gossiping with Riley—Cloistered Love —Reviews — Books and Authors 531–533

EDUCATION—The Catholic School for the Catholic Child 533–535



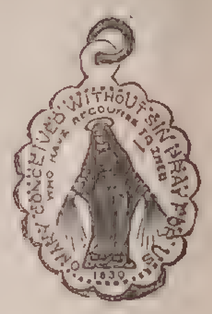
ECONOMICS — Interest.... 535

NOTE AND COMMENT.....535–536



SEVEN DOLORS ROSARIES

ROSARIES COMPLETE
Cocoa Wood Beads, Sterling Silver Medals and Chain.... $3.00
Cocoa Wood Beads, Aluminum Medals and Steel Chain..... $1.00



MEDALS ALONE
Medals in Sterling Silver..... $1.50
" " Brass ..... .50
" " Aluminum ..... .25

No. 23

MIRACULOUS MEDALS

No. 48

No. 43

No. 47

No. 42

No. 0

No. 346

Factory Providence, R. I. Established 1870

The W. J. FEELEY CO.

Opposite St. Patrick's Cathedral

10 East 50th Street New York City

Who's Who

THOMAS AUGUSTINE DALY, who contributes the literary paper entitled "Gossiping with Riley" to this issue of AMERICA, was born in Philadelphia in 1871; was educated at Villanova College and Fordham University, receiving from the latter institution the degree of Litt.D. in 1910. Was editorial writer on the Philadelphia Record; managing editor of the Catholic Standard and Times, and is now on the staff of the Philadelphia Public Ledger. He is the author of "Canzoni," "Carmina," "Madrigali" and "Songs of Wedlock."

Read AMERICA and Keep Up with the Best Current Thought

ORGANIST and CHOIRMASTER

DR. JOHN PHILIP FOLEY, the noted New York organist and choirmaster, is free to accept another position in the Fall. Dr. Foley has been associated with the most prominent churches in New York City, including Holy Name, St. Ignatius Loyola, and St. Patrick's Cathedral, and has been particularly successful in boy-choir work. During the past year he was elected an honorary member of the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music at Rome, Italy.

Address
HUNTER'S REST CAMP,
RAQUETTE LAKE, N. Y.

ADVERTISE IN AMERICA
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83rd Street, New York City

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

"BRADFORD PRESSED BRICK"
(Trade-mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Office)
THE STANDARD RED BRICK OF AMERICA
Write for the RED Catalog
"BRADFORD REDS"
"BRADFORD RUFFS"
BRADFORD PRESSED BRICK CO.
We also make Fireproofing and Hollow Block
"The Red Brick People" BRADFORD, PA.

The latest and best pamphlet on the subject

What Luther Taught

THE country is now flooded with literature commemorating the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's rebellion. So every Catholic ought to have at hand a brief and trustworthy guide. Fathers Husslein and Reville, of the AMERICA staff, have prepared from the very words of Luther himself just the pamphlet you need.

Price 15 cents
$10.00 a hundred

The AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83RD STREET
NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 21
WHOLE No. 437

SEPTEMBER 1, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—On the British fronts, at Lens and before Ypres, the fighting has been almost continuous. The British launched a partial attack from the Ypres lines, which at first carried them into and beyond the enemy's positions, but under the savage counter-attacks of the Germans they were forced to yield back some of the territory won on the Ypres-Menin Road. Before Lens, following up the advantages gained as the result of the capture of Hill 70, the Canadians have gone forward steadily. They are actually in the city itself, around which the fighting was of the severest character, especially around the great strategic slag-heap "the green crassier" on the southern edge of the town.

Bulletin, Aug. 20, p.m.-Aug. 27, a.m.

On August 20 the French made a heavy attack on the German positions around Verdun, north of the city and on both banks of the Meuse, advancing to a depth of a mile on an eleven-mile front and capturing, according to their report, 4,000 unwounded prisoners. On the left bank of the Meuse they took Avocourt Wood, the two summits of Le Mort Homme, Corbeaux Wood and Cumières Wood. On the right bank they captured Talou Ridge, Champneuville, Hill 344, Mormont Farm and Hill 240, north of Louvemont. Holding their gains against the fiercest counter-attacks, they again moved forward on August 24 on the left bank of the Meuse between Avocourt and Le Mort Homme, taking the strongly fortified Hill 304 and Canard Wood to the west, gaining also on the south bank of Forges Brook between Haucourt and Bethincourt. Hill 304, together with Le Mort Homme, commands all the ravines and approaches as far as Douaumont. The loss of these positions deprives the Germans of all observation posts from which it is possible to watch the French movements. By August 26 the French were practically on the lines they occupied when the Crown Prince made his first attack on Verdun at the end of February, 1916. They claim over 8,000 prisoners. A further advance on the right bank of the Meuse on August 26, brought them a gain of about two-thirds of a mile on a front of two miles and a half, giving them possession of the Fosses and the Beaumont woods and bringing them to the outskirts of Beaumont.

The Italian offensive, whose initial movement was recorded last week, has been so far on a greater scale than anything Italy has yet attempted. More guns are reported in action, more men engaged, the front of attacks longer, thirty-seven miles in the first stage, and the movement is pushed with greater intensity than in the case of any other operation on this front. On the first day of the offensive the Italians had crossed the Isonzo north of Gorizia between that city and Tolmino, and had taken over 7,000 prisoners. They then pressed forward past Canale to occupy the entire "bulge" of the Isonzo on the front of attack. As soon as the river was crossed in safety the line from Gorizia to the sea took up the fighting and directed its efforts towards the Carso and the belt of country between the Carso and the road from Gorizia to Aidussina. By August 26, official reports from Rome claimed that the number of prisoners so far captured amounted to 600 officers and 23,000 men with 75 heavy guns, while Vienna claimed 250 officers and more than 8,000 men prisoners and many machine guns. The Italian troops were reported to be paying a heavy toll for their success, but steadily pressed forward, until on August 25, their Second Army Corps under General Capello captured the strong positions on the Monte Santo, five miles northeast of Gorizia, and 2,240 feet above sea-level. The capture of Monte Santo clears the way for the Italian armies both to the north where they were held back at Tolmino, and to the south where they have been held back by the Carso plateau. Italian monitors have bombarded Hermada whose volcanic mounds bar the way to Trieste.

With Riga as their probable objective, the Germans have launched a determined offensive on the extreme northern end of the Russian line and have achieved some initial success. The Russians were compelled to withdraw between the River Aa and the Tirul marshes, the enemy pressing them back across the low lands which extend from the Aa to the Dvina. By August 25 the Russians seemed to have put up a little stiffer resistance, although it is almost impossible to speak accurately of the military situation as there is evidently a strict censorship. The Russians now seem to realize the danger which the capture of Riga and the subsequent threat to Petrograd would mean to the country both from a military and political point of view.

On August 20, the first definite step to set in motion the machinery by which the Government will gain complete control of the coal industry of the nation was taken by President Wilson, when he designated Robert S. Lovett Federal Agent under the Priority Shipments act. The latter directed forty-six railroads to give bituminous coal shipments from the mines for the Northwest via the Great Lakes, precedence over other business. Among the railroads placed under this order, are the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio, and other systems which carry coal from most of the great bituminous fields. The President acted because of information that coal was not being shipped to the Lake ports for reshipment by water to the Northwestern States in quantities deemed necessary to meet the unusual war conditions.

Coal Traffic Head

On August 23, by an executive order the President named Dr. H. A. Garfield, President of Williams College, Coal Administrator, fixed the price of anthracite coal at the mine, ranging from $4 to $5.30 a ton, according to the grade, and named the conditions under which jobbers would be permitted to operate. The regulation of the retailers was left in the hands of the Coal Administrator with authority to use drastic power and with instructions to use every effort to bring relief to the country. It was generally thought in Washington that the action of the President would mean a considerable drop in the price of anthracite coal. Dr. Garfield is already at the head of the commission to determine the price for the wheat crop of 1917. In a statement to the New York Times he declared that in his position of Coal Administrator three cardinal principles would be observed: Fair treatment of operators under conditions that would stimulate production; fair treatment of the jobbers with restrictions which would prevent this branch of the trade taking advantage of the retailer; fair treatment of the retailer, with restrictions, if necessary, which would prevent exorbitant profits. Dr. Garfield is resolved, as far as lies in his power, to do away with coal-waste and profiteering.

Coal Administrator and Anthracite Price

Mexico.—There is still great restlessness and persecution in Mexico. Last week Villa made one of his spectacular raids in the North and, a short time before, according to private but reliable information, Felix Diaz defeated a force sent against him by Carranza. Despite his many difficulties, however, the First Chief is active in his campaign against religion. His attitude towards the priests and churches in Guadalajara called forth this protest from the inhabitants of that city:

A Notable Protest

A Protest presented to the President of the Republic by a large group of workmen and students of Guadalajara, against the recent insults and outrages committed by the authorities of that city in their systematic hostility to Catholicism.

To the President of the United States of Mexico:

On the eleventh of the present month, by the order, as is known, of the District Judge of this City, the Municipal Council unjustly ordered and carried out the search of certain Catholic churches, and arrested Catholic priests, under pretext of complicity in the crime of rebellion attributed to the Most Rev. Archbishop of Guadalajara for having published a pastoral letter, which without cause or reason was called seditious.

The above-mentioned arrest of the priests and the search of the churches took place in violation of all decency and were accompanied by indignities, such as the following: for several hours, all those, most of them women and children, who at that time were in the church where the search was going on, were prevented from leaving the building.

With the purpose of protesting peacefully and respectfully against the above-named facts, on the twelfth inst. a group of more than 2,000 persons of all ranks of society started from the garden of the Santuario towards the center of the city in orderly manifestation. During their passage the number of manifestants increased rapidly, a proof that the great majority of the people sympathized with the protest which was being made. The attitude of these protestants was orderly, peaceful and respectful; more than this, during the whole course of the parade, absolute silence prevailed. The object of the parade could be known only by two placards which headed the procession and which read: "We protest against the attempted search of our churches," "We protest against the imprisonment of our priests." Suddenly and without provocation a band of police reserves, in obedience to the outrageous command of the Municipal Chief, Don Luis Castellanos Tapia, made a dastardly attack, revolver in hand, on the above-named placards, with the purpose, which they at last accomplished, of wrenching them from the hands of the bearers whom they insulted and brutally struck. As if this were not enough, they inflicted the same savage treatment, insults and blows, on many of the manifestants, among others, on women and girls, with the result that the procession was broken up. Meanwhile some of the marchers and others who took no part in the procession, went to the Municipal Chief to beg him to stop the outrageous conduct of his subordinates. Instead of obtaining their request, the delegates were arrested, together with some of their friends, who attempted to investigate their arrest and to intercede for them.

Moreover after the parade was broken up, certain other persons were also arrested. The number rose to twenty-six, nearly all of them young students. Several of them were driven with blows to prison. One individual, named Sandoval, Chief of the Bureau of Safety, distinguished himself above others by the cruel treatment he inflicted upon the prisoners. On the following day, four or five of the prisoners were given their liberty, the others were transferred to the State prison, and condemned to a fifteen days' confinement or a fine of 200 pesos. In the prison they were subjected to the harshest treatment, obliged to carry wood from the outside of the prison, to sweep and scrub the floors. Finally on the night of the sixteenth of the same month, the Presidencia Municipal, on the order of the Governor of the State, who in his turn was authorized by you, Mr. President, proceeded to close eight churches, the most revered by the Catholic population of this city, on the ground, absolutely unfounded, that a work of sedition was going on in them.

The aforesaid facts conclusively establish a deliberate attempt on the part of the authorities who took part in them to outrage openly the religious sentiment so deeply rooted in the soul of the people of Guadalajara, as well as in that of the people of Jalisco and of the majority of the population of the entire country. In order to crown with success this work of systematic opposition, these authorities have never scrupled or hesitated to violate again and again the fundamental laws of the country.

To attempt to prevent the mere circulation of the pastoral of the Most Rev. Archbishop, a document which no one can look upon as seditious, to persecute its author and the priests who read it, is a violation of the Sixth and Seventh Articles of the Federal Constitution: these guarantee the right of the free expression of ideas, the privilege of committing them to writing and publishing them, a thing which all men look upon as a natural right and which is recognized and respected among all the civilized nations of the earth.

The Sixteenth Article of the Constitution lays it down that no one can be curtailed in liberty except for some determined crime which the law punishes with imprisonment and unless some formal complaint or indictment be brought against him, to deprive him of that liberty. But the same Article declares beforehand that the inquiry must be limited to the objects sought, and in due relation naturally to the subject under investigation. If this be so, by what right are the priests who read the pastoral letter brought to court and imprisoned, since in this act there is not a single constituent element of any crime whatever? Since these priests were accused of the crime of rebellion for having read the letter alluded to, why was the search made in the churches not confined to the mere search for the letter? Why was there an organized hunt for documents in general, a crime prohibited by the law? Why were papers seized which had nothing to do with the above-mentioned fact, and even books from the private libraries of these priests, against the decision of the Articles 154 and 158 of the Federal Code of Criminal Procedure?

The arrest of the priests, the beginning of the criminal proceedings against them, the declaration that they were formally prisoners are by the very fact a violation of Article Fourteen of the Constitution, inasmuch as the acts took place, not only without any legal foundation, but against the express provisions of the law, against Articles 107, 130, and 142 of the Federad Code of Criminal Procedure. For these make it clear that the basis of criminal procedure is the existence of some fact or the omission thereof which the law considers a crime; that before the order of arrest or imprisonment be issued there exist the suspicion that one is guilty of a crime and that in case of formal imprisonment the existence of some illegal act be proved.

In the breaking up of the public manifestation which was organized to protest against the search of the churches and the imprisonment of the priests the Sixth and Ninth Articles of the Federal Constitution were openly infringed. These give the right of public manifestation and expression of opinions under the condition, verified in the case, that there be no attack on morality, or the rights of a third party, that there be no incitement to crime and that the public order be not disturbed. The aforesaid articles also grant the right of association or peaceful gathering, the right even to protest, as was the case against the acts of the authorities, on condition that authority be not insulted and that threats of violence be not used against it. It is said that there is a regulation prohibiting these manifestations without a special license. As this regulation imposes a condition not recognized by the Constitution, it is evidently unconstitutional and should not be complied with. To require a license in order to exercise a right recognized by Article Nine, is to nullify the guarantee which it gives. In the arrest of some of the marchers, and their detention in a narrow, unsanitary and ill-ventilated prison, in their imprisonment there a whole night, the Sixteenth and Nineteenth Articles of the Constitution were violated. In the imposition of the sentence of fifteen days' confinement or a fine of 200 pesos. Articles Fourteen, Twenty-one, Twenty-two, of the Constitution and Articles 116, 118, 121, 122, of the Penal Code were likewise infringed.

The young men arrested were obliged to perform humiliating labors, only to cause them greater humiliation. Articles Sixteen and Nineteen were thus violated; the former because discomfort was caused them without the written and legal warrant of the proper authority, the latter because it expressly and formally forbids that such discomfort be caused in the prisons without legal authority. In the imposition of forced labor, the Fifth Article of the Constitution was also violated.

Finally, since the action begun against the Most Rev. Archbishop and the arrested priests is unjustified and groundless, we must consider unjustified likewise and unreasonable the closing of our churches, ordered by you and due undoubtedly to false information which you have received about the incident.

In view of the above, we the undersigned Catholic workmen and students of this city, expressing as we do the common sentiment of the people of Jalisco, protest, Mr. President, with all respect, but with all the energy of our souls, against the unjust and arbitrary persecution of which this Catholic people and its pastors are victims, a persecution in violation of the clearest and most emphatic articles of the law, as we can prove by the series of outrages above mentioned. We ask redress for these insults and outrages, liberty for the prisoners and the reopening of our closed churches.

We trust that in your sentiment of rectitude and fair play, you will know how to do us justice, for the happiness and the honor of the country.

At last reports, Carranza had not answered the protestants.

An Interesting Sidelight

The following letter written to AMERICA by a prominent Yucatanian throws an interesting sidelight on some features of the Mexican revolution for liberty, equality and fraternity. As usual it contains revelations about the robbery of churches by those in power:

I am sending under separate cover La Vox de la Revolución for June 24 and June 27. You will find therein an open letter by Victor Rendon, a man without a country, to Alvarado. Rendon was born here in Yucatan; but in 1904 he took out his first papers in Los Angeles, California, thereby renouncing allegiance to every foreign power, and particularly to the Republic of Mexico, as the declaration of intention reads. Ten years after that he posed as a leader in Yucatan, in a grand rally to stimulate feeling against Yankees; shortly afterward, this man, who was first a Mexican, next a quasi-American, after that an anti-American, during Huerta's régime, became a newfledged Constitutionalist. So great and important were his services to the revolution headed by Carranza, though no one knows what he did, that in March, 1915, he was appointed Yucatan's Secretary of State. Some time after that. Alvarado sent him to New York with full powers to manage, direct and administer the affairs of the money-making concern La Comision Reguladora del Mercado de Henequén, an institution established for the purpose of protecting the interests and rights of the sisal farmers during the régime of Madero, but which at present is the most powerful tool in the hands of Alvarado to send money to Carranza to prop up his miserable government. Well, this prominent self-styled thinker and financier, Doctor Rendon, had his own way, for a while, and he and Alvarado were firm friends. But even the best of friends must part. Alvarado dismissed Rendon and threatened him with criminal proceedings, but I am inclined to think that those proceedings will not be instituted, because Alvarado and Rendon and Rendon and Alvarado impersonated the same character, and what one did was approved by the other. We don't know what the trouble was, but as already stated Rendon was threatened and then the Spanish saying was fulfilled: Cuando se pelean las comadres, se dicen las verdades. "When gossips quarrel, they insult each other." "The truth will out." In the aforesaid letter to Alvarado, Rendon urges Alvarado to state publicly the whereabouts of the gems of great value that were taken from the churches, in order to stop all gossip on the matter. Strange that Dr. Rendon did not give this good advice to the brave General before he was threatened with criminal prosecution. But that cannot be explained, except perhaps by the fact that both belong to the grand old party of the revolution.

One word more. In the same letter Rendon refers to the various amounts of money spent by Alvarado, inviting him to inform the people under what authority he spent those enormous sums, especially those applied to his own propaganda. He forgets that Alvarado was, in Yucatan, General-in-Chief of the Army of the South East, Governor and Military Commander of the State of Yucatan, with extraordinary powers granted by the First Chief, Carranza. Has Dr. Rendon forgotten that? Does he not remember that only on account of the said extraordinary powers could Alvarado appoint him, a Mexican renegade, to be Secretary of State of the down-trodden State of Yucatan, one of the States of Mexico? Again, the money that Alvarado used for his own personal advancement, as he believes, was it not paid out of the funds of the Comision Reguladora del Mercado de Henequen, and was not that money, when those payments were made, exclusively in charge of the thinker and financier Dr. Rendon? Is it possible that this great thinker, who is half a Mexican and half an American, does not know that a public official has no right to apply any money belonging to the State or to the Government except to purposes determined by law? Would Mayor Mitchel think of using one cent of the moneys belonging to the Government of the City of New York to his own advantage, say for instance, in his campaign for reelection?

But it is useless to ask this Carranzista any such questions. He knows that he is safe. He knows that no one will dare journey to New York to disturb him in the peaceful enjoyment of his prosperity.

Mexican politics are evidently not all blood.

Russia.—The Extraordinary National Council opened at Moscow, August 25, in the large State theater. The makeup of the Council was as follows: One hundred representatives from the Councils of Workmen's and Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies, 5 from each of the Nationalities, 10 from the Cossack Council, 15 from the Petrograd municipality, 14 from the universities, and in addition delegates from Zemstvos, labor unions, academies of science and arts, the women's unions and the Orthodox Church. The army was represented by delegates from committees at the front and from other army committees. According to forecasts that came from Petrograd August 23 the Council was expected to result in a struggle between the Cabinet, backed by the Socialist Left, and the bourgeoisie, consisting of Constitutional Democrats, discontented business men and dismissed generals. The Moscow labor unions, it was announced on August 25, were opposing the Council, on the ground that it was "counter-revolutionary," and so constituted that democratic organizations could not participate in it. Maximalists and Social Revolutionists were also against the Council because it is not, as they maintain, representative of the people. They announced in advance that they would abide by none of the Council's decisions.

The National Council

The Council of Cossacks, however, voted full confidence in Premier Kerensky and in Lieut. Gen. Korniloff, Commander-in-Chief of the Russian armies. In reply to a demand made by the Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates that Korniloff be dismissed, owing to his severity, the Cossacks adopted a resolution approving his course, denying the Delegates' right to interfere, and calling Korniloff "the only General able to restore order and lead the country out of a critical situation."

The Commander-in-Chief has demanded the militarization of railways, in order to forestall a general strike and prevent a total collapse of the railway service. M. Shubersky, Chief Traffic Manager, in a recent report he made, says there are 700,000 less freight cars in Russia now than there were a year ago, and twenty-five per cent of the locomotives are out of commission.

Owing to differences with Premier Kerensky, M. Savinkoff, the acting Minister of War, has resigned. The Constituent Assembly has been postponed from November 25 to December 11. Finland is still in a state of turmoil. No Cabinet has been formed and the Socialists persist in attempting to renew the sessions of the Landtag, but Premier Kerensky has ordered Governor Stakhovitch to force, if necessary, the members to disperse.

At a preliminary conference presided over by L. Rodzianko, President of the Duma, Prince Troubetzkoy bitterly attacked the Government, declaring that the "sacred revolution" had fallen under the "coarse claws" of selfish plunderers. As Petrograd, which dominates the Government is the "center of rottenness" the speaker urged the transfer of the capital to Moscow. Premier Kerensky was the only one who escaped the Prince's general condemnation.

The First Session

The Council formally opened at 3 p. m., August 26, with a speech by the Premier which lasted an hour and a half. In the course of his address he said:

> Those who think the moment has come to overthrow the revolutionary power with bayonets are making a mistake. Let them take care, for our authority is supported by the boundless confidence of the people and by millions of soldiers who are defending us against the German invasion.
>
> The Provisional Government is convinced that all of you who have come here will forget everything except your duty toward your country and the revolution. The Government believes it can tell the truth, not only to our friends but also to our enemies, those who are destroying our troops and those among us who are waiting for the moment when they may be able to raise their heads and pounce on the free Russian people.
>
> I say again I will hide nothing from you, for we have come together for the first time to speak to you frankly, to tell you of the unbearable, the immense responsibility which we are carrying despite all the blows we are receiving. Citizens, the State is passing through a period of mortal danger. I do not say more, for you all understand.

The Premier warned certain turbulent nationalities in Russia not to take advantage of the present difficulties in order to violate the country's free-will, and told the Maximalists not to corrupt the army's discipline.

Russia's New Nationalities

A. Hilliard Atteridge

MANY interesting problems are being raised by the Russian Revolution and the internal chaos that has followed it. It would be exceedingly rash to prophesy what the state of things will be when the deluge of disorder subsides and the firm land appears again. But it seems fairly certain that, in our future maps of Europe, Russia will not appear as one single State extending from the Vistula into Asia. Czardom is gone, and with it the idea of monotonous unity and despotic centralization.

The tendency of modern European politics is to recognize very fully the principle of nationalities. The Allies, who are opposed to the League of Central Europe, have recognized this principle in every statement of their war aims. And, though the new Government of Russia has formulated no very distinct policy, many of its acts point to a readiness to recognize the rights of the smaller nationalities in the Russian Empire. Perhaps the revolutionary parties are all the more ready to take this line because it is a distinct departure from the old policy of the Czars. Their ideal since the days of Peter the Great was to extend one dead level of uniformity to all their dominions, and as far as possible make all their subjects Russian in nationality and "Orthodox" in religion. Now many of the peoples of the Russian empire are not Russians, and even in the Russian race itself there are several marked varieties. To take only one instance, in language, traditions and feeling the "Little Russians" of Kief differ as much from the "Great Russians" of Moscow and Novgorod as the Lowland Scots differ from the Englishmen of the southern shires.

When the last Russian census was taken, in January, 1914, the census papers were printed in no less than seventy-two different languages. Of course, this was partly due to the fact that a great part of Asia had to be included in the census; but even in European Russia there is a wonderful variety of races, languages and religions. The official mind of old days looked forward to a time when they would all have learned to speak Russian, would accept Orthodoxy as their religion, and forget their local feelings of nationality in devotion to Panslavism and loyalty to the Czar.

Russian policy had long been working in this direction. The treaties of 1815 had established a Polish Kingdom. At Warsaw, the Czar was only King of Poland. The earlier treaty, by which Finland was annexed, in 1809, had given that country semi-independence. Once he passed its boundaries the Czar was only the Grand Duke of Finland. But after 1830, the Czar Nicholas I. swept away the local independence of Poland, and in the last years of the nineteenth century, under Nicholas II., the policy was adopted of undermining and destroying the home rule of Finland. As the State Church was an all-important factor in producing official uniformity, the Catholic Church was now persecuted, now barely tolerated; and the attack on Polish nationality was largely motived by the fact that the Poles are a Catholic people.

In the last years of the Empire, there were several local nationalist movements in progress in Russia. The official maps of European Russia show the country divided into a number of provinces, mostly named from their chief towns. But to understand anything of Russia, one wants another kind of map, showing the distribution of its population and their various nationalities. The 150 millions of European Russia are very unevenly distributed. The greatest density of population is found in Poland and in the rich agricultural lands of southwestern Russia between the Dnieper and the Pruth. Thence, northward and eastward, the country becomes less and less populous. There are few great cities, but in the south and center there are thousands of small villages. Russia is a land of villages. These are more scattered in the north, till at last one reaches the barren region of half-frozen marshes; but everywhere there are wide tracts that are almost uninhabited, marshy forests, swamps, and almost treeless steppe. Now, the more populous regions of the west and southwest are amongst those where the people are either non-Russian or differ from the Russians of the center and north; and these peoples have languages of their own and strongly cherish national traditions. The Russia which dominated all the rest of the country, and which the Czars took as the model to which it was all to be reduced, is the land of the "Great Russians," the central mass of the country around the upper Volga and stretching northwards towards the White Sea. It made up most of the empire which Peter the Great inherited, with Moscow for his capital, before he built his new city of St. Petersburg among the swamps at the head of the Gulf of Finland. In those days Poland was a great kingdom and the Turks held the northern shores of the Black Sea. But Peter's empire included the lands of the upper Dnieper and the city of Kief.

Before the Turkish inroads, Kief had been the capital of an earlier Russia. It had been the first Christian city in the days when SS. Cyril and Methodius began their mission to the Russian people; and it is still the nationalist capital of the race known in Russia as the "Little Russians," and in the rest of the world as the Ruthenians. Political and national boundaries do not always correspond in Europe, and the country of the Ruthenians stretches beyond the frontiers of Russia. There are some millions of them in Hungary, Galicia and southern Poland. Nor is it easy to define racial boundaries. Political motives lead to exaggerations on the subject, and the Ruthenians claim as their own all the country as far as the Black Sea, including the port of Odessa, though in these southern lands the population is certainly very mixed.

In Galicia and Hungary, and in southern Poland, the Ruthenians are mostly Uniats, sometimes loosely described as "Greek Catholics," but really using not a Greek but an Old Slav liturgy, and in union with the Holy See. In their case, religion is linked with nationality, and the union with Rome is strengthened by the fact that it is also a protest against the official Panslavist propaganda of Russia. Among the prelates at Lemberg are a Latin and a Uniat archbishop. When the Russians occupied the place in 1914, they turned even the local sympathizers against them by handing over Uniat churches to the schismatics and carrying off the Ruthenian archbishop, Mgr. Szeptycki, a prisoner into Russia. In the Russian districts inhabited by the Ruthenians, the Uniats are a small minority, as a result of the persecuting policy of the Czars; but after the proclamation of religious liberty in 1905, so many of the people returned to union with the Holy See, that a few years later the new policy of toleration was abandoned. But there is a marked tendency towards reunion, for even the Orthodox Ruthenians have long been restless under the domination of the Russian State Church. There has been a still greater restlessness in the sphere of politics. Among the national heroes of the Ruthenians are the leaders of unsuccessful revolts in earlier days when their land was known as the Ukraine, that is, "the border land" between Poland and the Turkish dominions. The only name known to English-speaking people among these national heroes is Mazeppa, the ally of Charles XII of Sweden against Peter the Great. The Ruthenians regard the Russians of the north as an inferior race, a mixture of Slavs, Tartars and Finns. They themselves are a prosperous people. They possess some of the finest wheat lands of Russia, rich pastures abounding in cattle, and a growing woolen industry in some of the towns. Before the war there had been a well-organized home rule movement in the country in close relation with the Ruthenians of Austro-Hungary and the exiles and emigrants in other lands. The Czar's Government treated it as an artificial movement promoted by Austria, but there is no doubt it was a spontaneous national movement.

The Russian revolution of last March led to a crisis. No longer compelled to act in secret, the Ruthenian National Committee met openly at Kief, the old capital of the country. When the Petrograd Revolutionists began to drift into communism, and over the greater part of Russia the peasants began to divide up the lands, the Kief Committee declared against the new policy, and demanded semi-independence for the country with the creation of a national army. Kerensky hurried from Petrograd to Kief to negotiate with the Ruthenian Committee, and found that the only way he could prevent an open revolt was by promising nearly all they demanded, with the result that when he returned to Petrograd several of his colleagues in the Government resigned as a protest against his concessions. He told them that if he had not given way, 30,000,000 in the south would have separated from Russia. The result is that the old lands of the Ukraine now possess a kind of informal home rule, with the Ruthenian Committee at Kief acting as the Government and claiming Odessa as its outlet to the sea. It will be difficult to reverse the step thus taken, and it points to the probability of the Russia of the future preserving its unity by recognizing home rule, not only at Kief but in other centers, and becoming the "United States of Russia."

The official title of the emperors used to be "the Czar of all the Russias." This itself is a good precedent for the recognition of the various nationalities by the republic; and already these nationalities are asserting themselves in all the western provinces of old Russia. The claim of Poland to home rule has been formally recognized by the new Government of Russia; and it would seem that some of the Russian leaders are even willing to accept the creation of a Polish kingdom. Their anxiety is that it should be a real kingdom, and not a mere tributary of Germany. Finland has demanded autonomy on so wide a scale as almost to amount to independence, and the dispute between the Finns and the Russians is now not on the question of home rule but on the extent of autonomy to be conceded by Petrograd.

A fourth nationality is asserting itself in Lithuania, the country extending from the north of Poland towards the Baltic and the Gulf of Finland. Most people have heard something of Poland and Finland, but less has been heard of Lithuania. It is mainly a Catholic land, with a long record of suffering for the Faith. The Lithuanians and their kindred race, the Letts, are found in Russian Lithuania and East Prussia. Their language is the oldest form of Aryan speech in Europe, still keeping many of the grammatical forms of Sanskrit. In the early Middle Ages they were the pagan tribes against whom the Teutonic knights carried on a long warfare. Converted in the fourteenth century, Lithuania united with Poland, and then passed under Russian rule in the eighteenth century. Polish nationalists often assert a claim to Lithuania as a Polish land; but the nationalist movement among the Lithuanians is strongly opposed to the idea. In our own time the movement has been largely based upon the revival of the national traditions by education, the culture of the language, and the creation of a new patriotic and religious literature. Suppressed by the Czar's Government, these writings were printed by the exiles in foreign countries, including the United States, and smuggled into Russia. Amongst the popular authors of this new literature are two of the Catholic bishops. In recent years the St. Petersburg Government has become more tolerant, and in 1905 the Czar allowed a Lithuanian National Congress to meet at Vilna. The claim of the country to autonomy was raised in the Duma, and the national movement has made such progress that in one form or another it is certain to receive recognition in the resettlement of Russia. Lithuania has suffered terribly during the war; and amongst the kindly acts of Benedict XV has been the sending of more than one donation to the Catholic primate to relieve the sufferings of the people, these gifts being accompanied by letters in which the Holy Father speaks of "the faithful people of Lithuania" as having a special claim on the sympathy and charity of the Catholic world.

The Breakdown of Protestantism

J. D. Tibbits

WHEN we speak of the breakdown of a religion, we are accustomed to regard it as the effect of certain definite causes one or more of which are considered, by most religious historians, to be invariably present. Thus, the religion in question, may have been possessed of so vast a degree of wealth that its ideals were lost in worldliness. It may, too, have been invaded by moral corruption, either in the persons of its ministers or its members. Again, its energies may have become dormant from lack of active opposition or paralyzed from its close connection with an indifferent or hostile State. These are what one might call the conventional prerequisites in the philosophy of religious decline. The philosophy, however, is but partial, for if the above reason be ever so briefly analyzed, they will be found, without exception, to be external. The remnant of the religion which survives its breakdown, if any does, will survive intact.

Now the breakdown of Protestantism furnishes a typical illustration of the incompleteness of the current theory. All the conditions, commonly regarded as essential, are conspicuous only by their absence. Although the many denominations have seldom been lacking in the goods of the world, yet their wealth has been rarely so vast as to arouse the cupidity of politicians. Competition, friendly or unfriendly, has been their invariable and inevitable portion. Their relations with the civil power, whenever any real intervention has occurred, have been, in the main, favorable to themselves. And no one can justly charge either their clergy or laity, with anything approaching moral corruption.

The reason, then, for the almost spectacular decline which we are now beholding, must be sought within rather than without; and in order to understand fully both the reasons and their significance, it will not be unprofitable to take a rapid glance at the contrast which is presented by the Protestantism of our time as compared to that, say, of a century ago; for in the very nature of the change which this religion has undergone will be found the key to one of the most important phenomena in the theological world of today.

Every student of history is obliged to admit that the Protestantism of a hundred years ago was a religion both of force and of power. To this fact many causes doubtless contributed; but it can hardly be questioned that the primary cause was to be found in the note of positiveness which was then universally characteristic of its teaching. It stood for a definite idea, both as regards this world and the next. That it was erected upon foundations which had no support in reason is not at all to the point. It was definite and positive none the less, and as long as its foundations were unquestioned or were explained with some measure of plausibility, the power and force remained. It is true that the various sects differed among themselves upon many points of doctrine, but there was a much larger body of doctrine which practically all regarded as fundamental. Thus one might or might not believe in Infant Baptism; but to deny the Trinity, or the Divinity of Christ, was unthinkable.

The ministry of that period reflected the force and power of the religion. The clergy were, as a rule, men of character and authority; and their authority was derived, first, from the fact that they represented a profession more or less sacred, and second, from the superiority of their education. They controlled the seats of learning and directed its course. The average minister of that day was at home in many fields utterly unknown to the average layman. He knew, at first hand, the classics of Greece and Rome. He knew something both of physics and metaphysics. The texts from which he preached he could quote in the original tongues. And he was not infrequently a man of practical affairs.

To these conditions, the Protestantism of today offers a most striking contrast. The history of the last century is a history of the gradual fading away of positive religion. The field of dogma, heretofore considered essential, has steadily contracted before the constantly widening field of speculation. The process has been described by various terms. "Liberalism," "Breadth," "Modernism" are but a few of them. At length the speculative has completely triumphed over the positive, while the idea that one religion is as good as another has been carried to its logical conclusion of general indifference to all. It is a remarkable illustration of the confusion of faculties and the distortion of perspectives; but it is the legitimate fruit of the Reformation.

And these conditions are reflected, not only in the Protestant clergy of today, but in the seminaries which train them. That there are among them many really great scholars, I have no wish to question, but the truth is that these scholars are found in the seminaries rather than in the churches. It is the education of the rank and file that has declined, and it has declined partly from the fact that it has attempted too much and accomplished too little, and partly from the fact that the function of the ministry has wholly changed. The classical and linguistic training of a century ago has given way to the opinions of critics and the theories of sociologists, for the aim of it all is to produce, not religious teachers, but religious entertainers; and hence it is far from surprising that the minister should find himself surpassed in education by what is oftentimes a large proportion of his congregation, and that his profession should have come to be regarded as of all professions the least learned. The mutual relation, therefore, between pastor and people has been largely reversed, and we are treated to the curious spectacle of the flock leading the shepherd; while the supposed independence of the pulpit is confined to those subjects with which the congregation agrees, or to which it is indifferent. The contrast is indeed pitiable; but as a result it was none the less inevitable.

For these conditions Protestantism has only herself to blame. She has surrendered her foundations in the supposed interest of a misnamed and utterly misunderstood rationalism, and in so doing she has reduced her theologians to mere guessers and her message to mere guesswork. It is no wonder that her appeals are unheeded by the vast multitude of churchless people, and that her pretensions are ridiculed by those who take the trouble to analyze them. There is no question here of any external cause, nor could any external cause have wrought so complete an effect. Unfriendly forces may, and often have done much to injure religion. They may persecute it and render it for all practical purposes useless. But they cannot reduce it to intellectual absurdity.

And the absurdity to which Protestantism is reduced is not merely confined to its intellectual aspect, but it has invaded, and seriously invaded, the field of ethics. The curious notion that somehow or other theological speculation is a form of spiritual progress has been transferred to the domain of morality, with the inevitable result that many of its truths are sharing the same fate as those of theology. Principles which a century ago it would have been impious to question are now legitimate subjects for debate; while it is becoming increasingly apparent that for the really serious evils of the day, Protestantism possesses no remedy. All that remains to it is a capacity to discuss them.

Yet were further proof of the completeness of its breakdown required it would be found in the character of the appeals which it is constantly making to a generation, for the most part, indifferent. To the educated it offers the superficially plausible theology of the Outlook type. To others it offers various forms of recreation and entertainment, either within or without the pulpit; while as the readiest and least troublesome means of repairing the ravages of a declining birth-rate it is engaged in a systematic and highly developed attempt to proselyte the children of the prolific and self-respecting Catholic races. That all this may be done through disinterested even if mistaken zeal, is not at all to the point. Anyone may act through comparatively low motives and yet be sincere. But there is no small evidence of the bankruptcy into which Protestantism has fallen in the fact that the motives which it offers as an approach to religion are substantially those which one might expect from the proprietor of a moving-picture show.

The Art of Joyous Living

L. M. DODGE

THERE used to be a popular idea that the student of the art of joyous living, in his search for first-hand information, needed but to spend the hours between sunset and sunrise on Broadway, along the district that lies between Thirty-Fourth Street and Columbus Circle. That idea is practically dead; partly because it never at any time had the least particle of truth in it, and, partly, because the Mayor of New York ordered the cabarets to close at about the hour when the Carthusians are finishing the second nocturn at Matins.

The mayoral order made no reference to the Carthusians, but the connection between them and the art of joyous living is not so remote as it appears. For that art has nothing at all to do with hectic living, but it has a great deal to do with Catholicism, of which the Carthusians are so illustrious an adornment. But what Broadway lacks of this art can be seen in some of its most perfect examples at the Metropolitan Museum of Art on Fifth Avenue, especially in those sections devoted to Gothic art and to ecclesiastical fabrics and textiles.

Perhaps it is in the first-mentioned section that the influence of Catholicism on art is more pronounced; for while textile fabrics and vestments constitute but one branch of art, the general art section covers a greater variety of subjects. The period to which these objects of art belong is commonly known as the "dead ages," presumably on account of the fact that the artists and craftsmen are dead—a classification that might be more profitably applied to the Georgian and Victorian ages. But that these ages were very much alive is shown by the work of the craftsmen, which is today instinctive with life, though the makers and workers have long since returned to the dust whence they came.

So the visitor who gazes on these exhibits will find that the workers of those by-gone days loved life passionately and Christianly, by two very outstanding characteristics: these characteristics are their love of color and their love of a crowd. Their love of color is obvious. And this color that they loved so well was not something sad and dreary, as of a genteel paganism; something that tried to merge all the brightness of the world in one somber hue that spoke feebly of eternal melancholy. Their color was something robust and riotous and Divine; it was something that shouted of heaven and of earth, of time and of eternity. They saw in the sky the blue of Mary's mantle; in the flaming red of the sunset the fire of the Holy Ghost; in the green of the grass and the trees the abiding hope of God's mercy, and they caught them all and consecrated them to the Giver in the service of Catholic art.

But these workers, in their intense love of color, did something more than this. They gave expression to a fundamental article of the Catholic Faith; they showed that there was a very vital connection between their art and the truth that God is the Light of Light, Lumen de Lumine. For the sum of pure colors that made their work endure in all its beauty until our own day, was a type of spectrum of the pure light of God's majesty. It was not, as many well-intentioned but misinformed persons would affirm, that these workers had crude ideas that found gaudy expression; but it was that they saw in the colors of the spectrum a figure of the unity of all things in God. So they understood life, and lived joyously.

Now this art of medieval coloring is almost, if not entirely, a lost art: it may be a coincidence, or it may be a vital fact, that it passed away after religious dissension came into the world. But the truth remains that it is practically lost. And so these few remains of the ages of faith are valuable both from the point of view of art and of the influence of religion on art.

Here, the exhibits of exquisitely embroidered copes and chasubles and dalmatics and altar frontals, in which God and the Saints are surrounded by a multitude of winged Cherubim and flocks of gaily-colored birds; of processional crosses, croziers, and reliquaries glorious with enamels of enduring beauty; of stained-glass windows that are gay like a summer garden, and altar-pieces that are glowing as the vision of St. John in the Apocalypse, sum up in one moment of beauty the truth that they are the work of makers whose every act was guided and inspired by their religion. A very fine example of late work of these days is to be seen in two stained-glass windows which Prior Wary de Lucy gave for the adornment of the choir of the abbey church of Flavigny in Lorraine. The windows were made by a certain Valentin Bousch, and date from the years 1531 and 1532. They represent a period when the old influences were passing, and the newer influences were beginning to make themselves felt. But they preserve many of the older traditions of the earlier workers, and much of their happiness of life. For the donor immortalized his gift with a happy conceit on his name and labeled it with the motto "Fraus Inimica Luci," which is too delicate and whimsical to appear baldly in English.

It has been said earlier in this article that another characteristic of the medieval workers was their love of a crowd. This, too, is an expression of their religious ideals. For if by their devotion to color they showed that mankind is a brotherhood, because it has one source; so in their love of a crowd they proclaimed the fact that men should get together, which is an early Christian doctrine, for the early Christians were all of one heart and one mind.

To enumerate all the instances of this kind would require a volume all to itself. But they may be seen in the pages of illuminated Missals and the great choir books, in the tapestries, and in the exhibits already mentioned. Some time in the fifteenth century Don Dalmacio de Mur, Archbishop of Zaragoza, commissioned Johan de Vallfogona to execute an alabaster altar-piece for his private chapel. The archbishop is long dead, and so is the artist; but the work which they both gave to the world still lives in New York. It never entered into the head of the artist that certain events should have happened by themselves, but that they should happen before a crowd, that the good things of heaven and earth should be shared by as many as possible.

So, in this beautiful alabaster altar-piece St. Martin divides his cloak with the beggar, but there are other people standing by to be edified by the deed. As St. Martin lies on his death-bed and the Lord Christ appears to him, there are witnesses to share the vision with him. So it is with the panel portraying the day of Pentecost. Nor may St. Thecla die in the midst of flames for the Faith without a company of witnesses; nor sit at a window at Iconium to listen to the preaching of St. Paul, except as one of the crowd. The idea was that man neither lived nor died to himself alone.

And in the other statuary groups this Catholic idea of getting together is the main inspiration of the whole work. Christ cannot be born in the crib at Bethlehem by Himself and so the Nativity is crowded by numbers of figures that include not only Our Lady and St. Joseph, but shepherds and kings and a company of people garbed in the costume of the time when the sculpture was made. Or take the tapestries depicting the Seven Sacraments. The man who is receiving Extreme Unction is attended not only by the priest and his acolyte, but there are people kneeling on the floor praying, there are people standing around the bed praying, and the dying man delivers his soul into the hand of God from out the midst of his friends and acquaintances, a farewell on the last journey. Or, again, there is the Entombment of Christ, a life-size high relief on which the color is just beginning to fade. The Sacred Body is borne to the tomb accompanied by as many persons as may be crowded into the space, and above winged angels are in attendance, that heaven and earth may be present as Christ is laid in the grave. Yet even thus, the worker was not content, but he must show on the sides of the sepulcher the imprisonment of Jonas in the whale and the sacrifice of Isaac.

It is not, then, with the merely idle curiosity of the sight-seer that these objects of Catholic art in the Metropolitan Museum are to be viewed. Their enduring beauty, their loveliness of form and color, the solemn sense of awe that their presence induces are but reflections of the spirit that inspired them, the spirit of joyous living. And the spirit of joyous living comes not from riotousness, but from a just appreciation of man's place in the universe and his relation to his Creator. The golden age of art is not had when the artist must exceed even the fantastic in order to express himself, but it is had when he cannot make even so insignificant a thing as an incense-spoon without impressing upon it something that is not of himself but is of the Giver of all gifts.

Juvenile Literature and Public Libraries

MARTINA JOHNSTON

A PUBLIC library should be administered for the good of the whole community. It is no place for narrowness; neither sectarian nor political views should be permitted to influence its management. If its affairs are ever administered on other than a broad and liberal basis it will fail to accomplish its true purpose, which is the best culture of the masses of the people for whose benefit it is maintained. The admirable spirit of fairness manifested in the management of the British Museum should be the rule in all public libraries, whether on this or the opposite side of the Atlantic. In theory this proposition would probably not be gainsaid by anybody, but in practice it is too often forgotten. It is a well-known fact, easily verified, that in many of our public libraries, supported by general taxation, the great Church which Catholics believe to be the Church of the future, no less than of the past, is not adequately represented, while much space is afforded works which misrepresent her doctrine and studiously disparage her incalculable work in the development of modern civilization and the progress of the human race. From this policy, if policy it be, consequences both serious and far-reaching are apt to result; indeed, we have been reaping its fruits for years.

In all our public libraries today there is a children's room, or shelves set apart for children, where the little folk are at liberty to take from the shelves and read any book they may fancy. This plan presupposes a careful selection of the books offered for their instruction lest the tots imbibe a lurking poison while drinking at the springs of knowledge. The impressions of childhood and youth strike deep into the receptive soil of the youthful mind, where they germinate and bear fruit of good or evil, according to their kind. Most frequently they are enduring and become a permanent factor in the life of the individual, coloring all his ideas in certain lines of thought, and his feeling and action throughout life. From this it follows that whatever is false or distorted, whether ignorantly or maliciously it matters not, should not be presented to the mind of the child to warp the judgment, cloud the understanding, and close the avenues to reason with triple bars of prejudice, long before he is capable of exercising that faculty intelligently.

One of the surest ways to this end is through alleged "child's histories," and stories, with a historical setting, in which the facts of history are perverted to suit the prejudices, and we may add, the culpable ignorance of the writers. Any one who undertakes the writing of history should be a seeker, and also a lover of truth, for truth's sake. In the domain of religion he should endeavor to find out what Catholics really believe, instead of what other people think they believe, which is usually something very different; he should go to the proper sources to find out about a Church which traces her line back to Imperial Rome and the Cæsars, and yet is so democratic that she takes the multitude, the world over, to her great heart.

The amount of harm done by books of this kind is incalculable. How else account for the bigotry which to this day is both felt and manifested by persons otherwise sensible and kind-hearted? On all other subjects these folk are sane and liberal-minded, but when there is question of the Church, all the unreasoning antipathy imbibed from the untruthful literature of their childhood days, reinforced by that of riper years, asserts itself.

One of the greatest offenders in this regard, chiefly because of its charm of style, is Dickens' "Child's History of England," also his "Pictures from Italy." Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" is another. The works of Charles C. Coffin are intolerably offensive, besides others that might be mentioned in the same category. The writer of this article succeeded in having the works of Coffin removed from the children's room of the public library of Seattle by a courteous protest to the librarian. The same means would doubtless be successful in other places where this wretched stuff is poisoning the springs from which the little ones drink. Catholic tax-payers support those institutions equally with their non-Catholic fellow-citizens, and they should not be compelled to pay for books which outrage their holiest feelings.

The dearest asset of the Catholic Church is her children. For them no sacrifice is too great. She safeguards their innocence by teaching them early to know, to love and to serve God, and to think highly of the things of the soul. This may seem foolishness, a mere relic of an outworn superstition, to the disciples of modern pantheism who are striving with might and main to dominate the educational system of the nation and to eliminate God from His universe, but it is what the Catholic Church believes and teaches, and her members are shocked and outraged on finding that much of the literature they have helped to pay for, is nothing else than an atrocious libel on those beliefs and teachings.

One of the many methods for conveying misinformation to the youthful mind is by non-Catholic translations of Catholic works, in which, by omissions and interpolations, the vital principle of faith is practically eliminated, and something differing widely from the original is produced and labeled a Catholic book. Even the "Imitation of Christ," the immortal work of a Kempis, has not escaped such desecration. Another book professing to be about some of the Saints, speaks in the introductory of "those outgrown beliefs of an earlier day," "listened to for centuries, with a dreamy faith which we of the present day could not imitate if we would and would not if we could." The contents of the book are in every way worthy of the introduction. Certainly the perusal of this devitalized narrative will never inspire the young reader to a life of spirituality or self-sacrifice. There is such a wealth of all that is beautiful, noble, and heroic in the lives of the Saints that it is a pity that all the children, Protestant as well as Catholic, should not enjoy the privilege of learning about them at first hand, as they really were, and not as seen through distorted lenses. The stories of our boy martyrs like Pancratius, of our young heroines like St. Agnes are as fascinating as a romance; the histories of our saints and martyrs which thrill the pulses and inspire great things for Christ: of these there is a doleful dearth, while on the open shelves from which the boy may help himself at will is a miscellaneous assortment of works which pervert the truth and steal the Faith from out young hearts.

The reason for the meager supply of Catholic literature in this or other departments of the public library must lie in one or other of two things, or possibly in the two combined: Either those who make up the catalogues are astonishingly ignorant of that great Church which is not only of "the past and the multitude," but is very much alive today, or Catholics are themselves to blame in not investigating the prevailing conditions, and insisting on a change, whether it be in placing works on the shelves which should be there or in removing such as are objectionable. If this course is pursued, firmly, courteously and patiently, it cannot fail to produce a salutary change; one which will be of incalculable benefit to all who use the library, whatever religious views they may profess.

The public library is a place where the scholar, the student, and those who have been less favored may turn for information and quiet study, where truth is valued and made easily accessible to the seeker. If it fails to do these things it does not fulfil its mission.

The signs of the times, however, are encouraging, prophetic of a coming understanding of the spirit of justice which will rule those great institutions. Scholars and writers are beginning to perceive the treasures of knowledge stored in the archives of the Church, and to acknowledge the world's indebtedness to her for whatever is best in human progress even to the present day. May the light continue to spread until the clouds of ignorance and bigotry are dispelled. As the night has been long and dark, so will the dawn be bright that ushers in the day of fairness to all, with peace and good-will; and each one of us, in his way, may help a little to hasten these desirable conditions.

Sisters of Mercy and the Civil War

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J.

IT is worth knowing that the Sisters of Mercy, who did so much for the sick and wounded in the Crimea, were also found ministering to the Blue and the Gray during the days of our own Civil War. It is rather difficult to chronicle their labors in detail, as their "Annals" place war activities among a list of countless labors that engaged the Sisters from the day that they first came to the United States. However, we know for certain that six Sisters of Mercy left Chicago in August, 1861, under the escort of Lieutenant Shanley of the Irish Brigade. This regiment was organized by Colonel Mulligan in Chicago at the outbreak of the war and saw distinguished service on many fields. At the battle of Winchester, long before Appomatox, its colonel died fighting at its head. Colonel Mulligan's wife and her sisters were educated by the Sisters of Mercy, as was also one of his own sisters, so it was not surprising that this gallant soldier, whose command was made up largely of Catholic troops, should have called upon the Sisters of Mercy to furnish nurses at the outbreak of hostilities.

The Irish Brigade of Chicago first encamped at Lexington, Missouri. Lieutenant Shanley who was conducting a detachment of troops to Lexington, sailed on the Sioux City from Jefferson. With him went the first band of nurses. They never reached Lexington, for as the ship got within sight of Glasgow, a small town on the Missouri, it was fired upon. Confederate troops were on both banks of the river. No one on board was wounded, but the boat was badly damaged and had to put back to port. In justice to the Southerners, it should be stated that they afterwards declared that they did not know there were ladies on board with the troops when they opened fire on the Sioux City. The Sisters finally landed at Jefferson, far from the Irish Brigade at Lexington, which was receiving its baptism of fire. General Price had attacked the Chicagoans with a superior force, and after three days' gallant resistance they were forced to surrender in September, 1861. Their supply of water had been cut off for forty-eight hours.

The Jefferson City hospital for the sick and wounded soldiers was now put in charge of the Sisters of Mercy, as their original project of going to Lexington had to be abandoned. They found the hospital in a deplorable state. There was little hospital equipment, poor enough at best in Civil War days, and the only nurses to attend the sick and wounded troops were convalescing soldiers. As no religious women had ever been seen in Jefferson before, the Sisters met with a cold reception. They showed neither surprise nor resentment at this, but went about their work thoroughly and efficiently until prejudice gave way to appreciation and gratitude. The superior of the band had hardly assumed charge when she came across a poor soldier in a corner of the ward, lying on a blanket laid on the floor. She asked the first man she met to get her some water, with which she bathed the face and hands of the sufferer. The unofficial orderly watched the hygienic "first-aid" operation with great interest, and at its conclusion remarked: "May I ask, Madam, is that soldier a relative of yours?" "No, sir," she replied. "I never saw him before; we are here to take care of the sick and we attend every patient as we would our nearest and dearest relative." In brief time the good-will of patients and officers was gained and the hospital prospered. General Fremont and his staff visited Jefferson soon afterward, and granted every request made for the improvement of conditions that would benefit the soldiers.

Jefferson City was not alone in having the benefit of the Sisters' ministrations. The Department of the East needed nurses, and in 1862 the Secretary of War applied to the convent of the Sisters of Mercy in Houston Street, New York, for volunteers. Nine Sisters took ship from New York harbor and began hospital work at Beaufort, North Carolina. A large hotel in Beaufort had been converted by Government order into a hospital. It was a good-sized frame structure, containing about 500 rooms. As the town had been recently sacked by Northern troops, the condition of the hotel was deplorable. Hardly any furniture was in the building and but one broom was available. There were no candles or lamps of any description, while along the shore lay the scattered remains of pianos, tables, chairs and glass. The men guilty of the vandalism were then suffering from lack of the bare necessities of life. At once the Sisters set to work. They made a requisition on General Foster for hospital supplies and soon the sick had everything they needed. From that time on the authority of the black-robed nurses was established. After a general house-cleaning, the routine work of the hospital was carried out with great exactness. Many of the sick and wounded were Confederate prisoners, and among the keepsakes brought back from the front to the quiet of convent homes after the war were shreds of "gray," as well as "blue," little tokens of appreciation from soldiers who fought under either flag. When the autumn came the hospital was removed to Newbern and the residence of Governor Stanley was placed at the disposal of the Government. After the raid at Goldsborough, towards the close of the year, the wards were crowded, as the wounded were taken directly from the battlefield to Newbern. It was before the days of first-aid knowledge and the condition of the men as the stretcher-bearers brought them into the hospital was pitiable in the extreme. Clothing clung to ghastly wounds and clotted blood, while dirt and disease made the task of the nurses more difficult. Yet everything that could be done for the sufferers' comfort was done by these volunteer nurses, who had left the quiet of the cloister at the call of the Government. If supplies were not to be had from the steward the Sisters appealed to the highest military authorities, and their appeal never went unheeded. Local officials soon learned that neither incompetence nor neglect would be tolerated by the Sisters, and their own sense of duty, humanity and religion they sought to instil into every official and subordinate with whom they came in contact. The hardships suffered began to tell on them and two of the Sisters died. Their places were supplied promptly by more recruits from the Convent of Mercy in New York. The hospitals at Jefferson City, Missouri, and Newbern, North Carolina, remained in their charge as long as United States troops were in those parts.

It was in February, 1862, that the Mayor of Cincinnati applied to the Archbishop for Sisters to nurse the sick and wounded of the Ohio regiments. Mother Teresa Maher, with several of her community, took passage on board the Superior, a transport, that brought them down the Ohio to the scene of suffering. The Union and Confederate forces had clashed at Shiloh, and that name had gone down into history. The number of wounded was great and there had been little provision made for them up to the arrival of the Sisters. The work of Jefferson City and Newbern was repeated at Shiloh. Volunteer ladies assisted the Sisters till smallpox broke out among the troops, and then the black-garbed nurses were left alone. During this awful scourge Mother Teresa signalized her charity and tenderly dressed the pustules of the sufferers, as the disease developed into its most fearful stages. Love of adventure is said to bring men and women to the battle-front, but it was nothing short of Love Divine that could have kept these women of refinement near to the cots of men writhing in the agony of smallpox. It must not be forgotten that Chicago, too, in the early days of the war held many wounded, and with them were the Sisters of Mercy. Not only Union soldiers, but Confederates as well were served by the Sisters in their hospital at the Lake City. We find them also in the Military Hospital at Washington all during the Civil War. How fully they possessed the confidence of the President may be seen by the following incident that is chronicled in their annals. Secretary Stanton on one occasion refused to furnish the rations requisitioned by the Sisters for hospital use. They appealed from him to the President, who issued to the military authorities the following order:

"To all whom it may concern:

"On application of the Sisters of Mercy, in charge of the Military Hospital in Washington, furnish such provisions as they desire to purchase, and charge same to the War Department.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

The North was not alone in receiving the ministry of the Community that had upheld the hands of Florence Nightingale in the Crimea. The Sisters of Mercy lived up to their name in the Southland which felt the rough hand of war more keenly than did the North. They cared for the sick and wounded successively at Mississippi Springs, Oxford, Jackson, and Shelby Springs, and the burning regret of the modern historian who goes over the records the Sisters kept in those trying times is that they made too little of the days of sacrifice and heroic suffering, and chronicled barely the essentials of an apostolate that meant much for the country in the throes of a civil war. There is a note of pathos in an after-war tribute paid to these women who made no distinction between friend and foe in their ministry on the battlefield. Many years after Appomatox a number of Sisters of Mercy, while traveling through the South, met Jefferson Davis. The former President of the Confederacy noticed their garb as they got on board his train. He went from his place to the section of the car that the Sisters occupied, and said in a very quiet voice: "Will you allow me, Ladies, to speak a moment with you? I am proud to see you once more. I can never forget your kindness to the sick and wounded during our darkest days. And I know not how to testify my gratitude and respect for every member of your noble Order."

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six-hundred words.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Referring to "Let Them Get Acquainted," those in authority in Catholic schools certainly do all in their power to prevent mixed marriages, but when I attended school, they also considered it their duty to keep the boy and girl pupils so much apart that they grew up without even a bowing acquaintance. This would certainly seem to defeat the very purpose of the Church concerning mixed marriages. Further, Catholics seldom get acquainted, except with an odd few, even though they belong to the church societies and attend the church socials. I mention church societies to show that Catholics keep in close touch with the Church.

I have often been impressed strongly with the thought that when the Church exacts what it does from its members, there certainly should be well-organized movements under way by which to bring Catholic young people together and thus aid our own cause.

Brooklyn, N. Y. M. E. M.

Wellsian Theology

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Perhaps the best answer I can make to Father Stack's criticism of my view of the Wellsian theology is a frank statement of the difficulty that I found in executing AMERICA'S commission to review the book.

There were many ways in which, it seemed to me, the review might have been written. I might have devoted the space allowed me to an exposition of Mr. Wells's logical, historical and metaphysical blunders, or such portion of them as could be dealt with in that space. I might have tried to trace these blunders to their probable sources in order to see whether or not any definite philosophic trend could be observed at work. Or I might have ridiculed the whole affair, which could easily have been done by quotations from the book itself without any comment from me, and dismissed it as without any significance or importance.

But it seemed to me after I had finished my reading of it, in the first place, that the book was sincere in its intention and, in the second place, that it did give semi-articulate utterance to what was at bottom a real cry of the heart even though it was little more than that of > "An infant crying in the night

> An infant crying for the light," and I thought that on the whole, if I had to select some aspect of the book for emphasis that it was best to select this one.

I admit freely and cheerfully that Mr. Wells's "present position," that is, the position expressed in "God, the Invisible King," for he may be somewhere else by now! is from a philosophic point of view not an improvement upon anything, for it is not consistent with itself or with anything else in heaven or on earth. To be plain-spoken, it is simply a mess. But if people's hearts are at last crying out for a "God" and for His Kingdom upon earth and for His will as a law, and if these are the people who before this war put their trust in Spencer, I still think it is something that we can afford to sympathize with, even if their notions of a God are infantile, and I still think that there is good ground for hoping that it may help more of them to the truth than it keeps away from it.

Mt. Vernon, N. Y. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

Doing Their Bit

To the Editor of AMERICA:

During these days of national stress, it must be a most gratifying thing to the President and to those who are associated with him in an official way, to observe how universal is the anxiety to do something for the success of the national cause. It is gratifying to note that Catholics are injecting into their full cooperation with the Government's designs the supernatural lessons taught by their religion. This, of course, is the normal thing, the true thing, the logical thing. While they have generously and promptly offered themselves and their possessions for the defense of their country's honor their ears are not deadened to the ever-practical application of our Lord's significant question: "What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his soul?" While they have not lost sight of the importance of the physical well-being and of the proper facilities for the recreation of those who will follow the flag even to the "jaws of death," if need be, they have also made extensive and detailed plans for the spiritual care of the Catholic soldier in the field. They have determined that he shall not go forth into the dreadful struggle with his spiritual needs untended, nor die on the battlefield, if such be his lot, unfortified by the Sacraments of Christ.

What an array of apt and opportune assistance comes to his aid at this crucial time, like a Macedonian phalanx to oppose his three-fold enemy, the world, the flesh and the devil. These forces are led by the Apostolic Delegate, himself, the personal representative of the Holy Father, then the Cardinals, the Archbishops, the Bishops and the priests. Then the innumerable spouses of Christ, within the quiet of their convent walls, far from the noisy glory which most of us need to do things well, are praying and offering Communions that the influence of Christ will dominate the hearts of our Catholic soldiers.

In addition to this, there is the spontaneous, practical and whole-hearted work of the Knights of Columbus, which is bringing so much glory to them and which will reap a harvest of genuine and lasting good. There are also many smaller societies in various cities of the country, whose officers have written to chaplains, offering to help in some practical way, and many individuals, too, who have caught the spirit from the generous encouragement of the Catholic press and have promised to send regular supplies of Catholic literature, medals and beads. Indeed, innumerable phases of practical activity could be mentioned to show the thoughtful solicitude of our people and their timely anxiety for the spiritual welfare of our Catholic soldiers.

And to those who have not already thought of it, let me suggest a further and very potent means of keeping the absent soldier loyal to the grand old Church and faithful to her precepts. His new environment will be a real trial and may be provocative of dangerous laxity. The absence of home influence and the difficulties of a new mode of life may help to crowd out the interests of his soul and furnish a ready excuse for remissness in what his Faith exacts from him.

Furthermore, he will have to contend with human respect, a foolish timidity that makes one do weakly and stealthily and soon forego altogether, the things which profit us most to do and which God wants us to do.

The relatives of soldiers have an excellent opportunity to help them over these pitfalls. They must continue to wield the same influence which was so effective at home. Let them write regularly and frequently to their soldier relatives, urging them to be faithful to their religion, to frequent the Sacraments and to attend Mass regularly, even if it entail some sacrifice. Let each member of the family take part in this sort of correspondence and help to ward off any tendency to religious indifference or neglect on the part of their soldier relative.

Fort Rosecrans, Cal. EDWARD F. BROPHY,
Chaplain, U. S. Army.

Hospitals and Animal Houses

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Why is it that whenever a Catholic offers anything in the nature of a criticism of a Catholic institution that person is almost sure to be accused of being a poor sort of a Catholic, as in the case of S. V. H.'s communication regarding Miss McDonell's comparison of Catholic and non-Catholic hospitals? Are we to assume that because an institution is Catholic, it is therefore above criticism or, that because our religious are religious they are not to be criticized in their work as nurses, teachers or in other lines? This indeed seems to be the general assumption, but it is not justified. Even though a Catholic should hardly criticize a religious, as a religious, he may still be able to see where such a religious fails as a nurse or as a teacher or executive, as many of us could give evidence from personal experiences. Conscientiousness is not ability and is no guarantee of competence. If criticism is well founded and justly merited, why should we not express it with the same freedom with which we assail the non-Catholic institutions? The Church is the only Catholic institution with a claim to exemption from criticism. As for our other institutions, a Catholic may be a very good Catholic and very loyal, while calling attention to the defects in these institutions just as an American can be a good American while calling attention to the defects in President Wilson's administration with regard to the troubles in Mexico, as did both Father Tierney and Father Kelly. Moreover, such criticisms, well considered, might be very profitable for the institutions themselves where the need exists, as it often does.

And if we cannot see the room for criticism in our own institutions, those outside the Fold can. They can see, also, the sublime and colossal conceit in our attitude toward our own institutions while we are assailing theirs. Let us be honest and courageous and humble enough to see these things for ourselves.

Shelbyville, Ind. M. M. C.

Jew and Catholic Blacklisted

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The enclosed correspondence may be of interest to your readers and may serve to arouse the Jews and Catholics of New Jersey to a realization of their rights:

Miss Lottie Berman, Stirling, N. J.

Dear Miss Berman: I have your letter of the 19th ult. applying for a position as a teacher in our schools. In reply we will offer you our seventh grade at a salary of $55 per month, provided you are not a Catholic or a Jewess. Please advise me by return mail whether or not you will accept the position as we have other applications under consideration and cannot hold this position open long.

Yours very truly,
C. J. GARWOOD,
Secretary Board of Education,
Medford Township, Medford, N. J.

After reading this letter, I wrote as follows to the Commissioner of Education:

Stirling, N. J., Aug. 15, 1917.

Commissioner of Education, Trenton, N. J.

Dear Sir: I append herewith a copy of a communication received by Miss Lottie Berman, a Jewess, from the secretary of the Medford Township Board of Education, Mr. C. J. Garwood. Do you not think it is about time that the State Board had the courage to proceed against local Boards that discriminate against Catholic and Jewish teachers?

The action of this Board is entirely illegal and would be quickly changed, if it were suggested that by its illegal action it forfeited its proportion of the State school tax.

I am a Catholic and feel that if my coreligionists are good enough to be included among the first fighting men of the National Guard to be sent to France, their sisters are good enough to teach any child in South Jersey.

Very truly yours,
VINCENT M. MALLON.

As yet I have received no answer. But what are the Jews and Catholics going to do about it?

Stirling, N. J. VINCENT M. MALLON.

The Home Rule Bill

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In connection with the catalogue of the restrictions and powers of the Home Rule bill enumerated in such praiseworthy detail by Mr. Shane Leslie, in your issue of August 11, might I be permitted to ask this gentleman a few questions? (1) Why, in his attempt to be "quite fair," does Mr. Leslie leave out all mention of the veto? (2) Does not the bill give the Lord Lieutenant the power of vetoing any measure passed by the Irish Parliament? (3) Has not the English Parliament the power of vetoing any measure passed by the Irish Parliament? (4) What are the nature, character, purpose, objects, and effects of these vetoes? (5) If these vetoes render, or are capable of rendering, the powers conferred by the act null and void, is not then the Home Rule bill worthless? Can it be said to be a whole loaf? (6) Upon what grounds does Mr. Leslie assert that the Sinn Feiners condemn the Home Rule bill simply because "They fear they would be unlikely to enjoy a full share of patronage?" (7) Do the Sinn Feiners condemn the bill for this reason alone, or have they other reasons for denouncing it? (8) If so, state those other reasons. (9) If, as Mr. Leslie asserts, all of the three Home Rule bills have been "rapturously applauded by the majority of the Irish at home and abroad" why then did Mr. John Redmond at a national convention, held in Dublin, move the rejection of Campbell-Bannerman's Home Rule bill, and why did the Irish at home reject it? To applaud rapturously and then reject unanimously, appears to me a very strange thing. I am sure, however, Mr. Leslie will clear up this seeming contradiction with his usual lucidity.

In quoting a statement made by Dr. Kelly, Bishop of Ross, on the financial blessings of the Home Rule bill, Mr. Leslie says that Dr. Kelly's "economic knowledge of Ireland is greater than that of any single individual in America." Economic and financial knowledge are not, I imagine, identical things, and though Dr. Kelly has certainly made a name for himself as an authority on agriculture—his leaflet on the rearing of calves being still remembered with pleasure by the farmers of his diocese—he has had no reputation at any time in Ireland of being a financial expert. Despite this, however, Dr. Kelly, in the statement quoted by Mr. Leslie, certainly displays financial ideas of a highly original character. He states, for instance: "Under the new bill, Ireland will have the expenditure, for her own benefit, of every penny of taxation raised in Ireland for many years to come. Even the increase of taxes created by the Lloyd George budget will now be spent in Ireland." Triflers will no doubt draw a parallel here between this roseate picture and the happy fate of the camel who is able to support life by drawing on the flesh of its own hump. They may even go further, and say, that, inasmuch as a camel with two humps is in a more favorable position than a camel with only one, so in like manner, the more Ireland is taxed the more prosperous and contented she will become. The financial picture here displayed opens up enormous possibilities, but I am somehow, not satisfied. Perhaps Mr. Leslie will kindly tell us what Dr. Kelly means.

New York. DAVID O'CONOR.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Shane Leslie takes slightly over a column of your space to laud the physical perfections of a corpse. The Irish Land act of 1914, strangled at its birth by the Suspensory act, is as dead as the dodo, and as unlamented. Why, then, dissect it now except to prove that while its little lungs were fairly good, its heart and other vital organs were so vitiated by the germs of Anglosis as to render certain for it a sickly life and early dissolution.

But as Mr. Leslie has exhumed the malformation and exhibits it as an infant Hercules, or Apollo in swaddlings it may be worth the effort to give your readers a microscopic view of it and prove that his post-mortem encomiums are as wide of the truth as they are unnecessary. Of course, no imputation of Mr. Leslie's truthfulness is intended. He has simply committed an error of judgment, and this error is not the less great because sustained by Mr. John Redmond, chief apologist of the Home Rule fiasco.

The act of 1914 does not give Ireland unfettered authority to legislate on any question beyond the purview of central and local authorities, as at present constituted, and the enumeration by Mr. Leslie of twenty-six heads under which powers are conferred upon the Irish legislature is most misleading, seeing that those powers already exist. Ostensibly the act grants national autonomy to Ireland, yet in every instance of possible conflict of authority between the Irish and the Imperial parliament that of the latter is emphasized, asserted and maintained. For instance the parliament in Westminster can impose taxes upon Ireland without the concurrence or authority of the Irish parliament and any act of the latter can be amended or repealed by the English legislature at will. All acts of parliament affecting Ireland and passed at Westminister would supersede those passed in Dublin, so that in point of fact both parliaments should be in perfect accord before that in Ireland could pass laws for the Irish people. Is this national autonomy and is national autonomy further on better illustrated by the fact that, apart from these powers of the British parliament to reverse or annul the legislation of the Irish parliament, the British Cabinet can direct the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to postpone for an indefinite period his assent to any act passed in Dublin?

And even if an act passes the Irish parliament and receives the royal assent it may at any time be impugned by an individual or corporation. Such a law may exist for years, but if legal proceeding for its nullification be taken, as the Home Rule act provides, a judicial committee of the British Privy Council, sitting in London, has authority to determine whether the enactment is a bona fide law or not. The Irish parliament is given power to impose some taxation in Ireland, but, incredible though it may appear, is deprived of the power of either collecting or disposing of it. A British tax-gatherer collects the money and turns it over to the British exchequer. This latter appoints a committee of five, three representatives of the British treasury and two of the Irish, who decide upon the probable expenses of carrying on the government of Ireland. For this amount the British treasury issues Ireland a check, and coolly places the balance of the tax-collection in its own pocket, to be used later on some public improvement in England, Scotland, or Wales. Does this indicate free and unfettered legislative independence for Ireland? In effect Mr. Redmond says that it does, and Mr. Leslie, as in duty bound, echoes the cry.

Mr. Leslie quotes the Bishop of Ross as stating that Ireland, in the Home Rule act, is treated financially "with much generosity." As against his lordship, whose economic knowledge of Ireland is, Mr. Leslie asserts, greater than that of any single individual in America, may I quote the opinion of Mr. William M. Murphy, proprietor of the Irish Independent, one of Dublin's most enterprising and successful business men and one of the foremost financial authorities in Ireland?

The financial clauses of this act and their acceptance by Irish representatives has placed this country in a most humiliating position. If this act had been put into operation in 1914 we should be in the same position financially, notwithstanding our "charter of liberty"—a phrase used by Mr. Redmond in describing the act—as we are today. That is to say, the British parliament would be drawing, as they now are, £24,000,000 ($120,000,000) a year out of Ireland and handing back about £8,000,000 ($40,000,000) in pay for Irish services, retaining £16,000,000 ($80,000,00) for British purposes. Neither this act nor anything like it will settle anything. It will not make for loyalty or content.

What has Mr. Leslie to say to this?

Philadelphia. J. St. George Joyce.

What Ireland Wants

To the Editor of America:

As one who has traveled through your grand republic from coast to coast, and lectured in the cities and universities, both here and in Canada, may I be permitted to make a few observations on the present Irish situation? I most emphatically believe that the present is no time to stir up acrimonious discussions about the weaknesses of either Parliamentarism or Sinn Feinism. Our duty now is to stand by the Convention and give Mr. Redmond our entire support. It is futile to say that England has very cleverly removed the solution of the Irish problem from London to Dublin, and to argue that had Lloyd George lived in the days of Christ he might have been Pilate. Such remarks lead nowhere. We have a Convention and let us demand that Mr. Redmond asks for Home Rule for all Ireland. After all, this is what Ireland has demanded since 1799. In general this is the demand of the Irish Episcopate, the older Irish clergy, and the people who stand for something in modern Ireland.

To suggest an Irish republic now would alienate American opinion. I have met the leaders of thought in America and Canada, and can say that they in nowise favor an Irish republic. Furthermore, official America won't support this plea, and official Canada won't touch an Irish republic. The Irish in Great Britain who, to a man, still remain true to Mr. Redmond, who have made as many sacrifices as their kinsmen in Ireland, are averse to an Irish republic. They believe Mr. Balfour when he says: "England would sooner allow India, Australia and Canada to go than tolerate an Irish republic." I say, therefore, shouting something—which all Irishmen would wish were it possible—impossible at this moment will alienate American, Canadian and Irish opinion in Great Britain. It will entitle England to say: "The Irish refuse to accept what they have been asking for, namely, Home Rule."

I am not saying that we Irishmen should accept a Home Rule so completely emasculated as the one hitherto offered. It was not even a decent sop to keep the people quiet. It had not even the semblance of a measure of freedom. Indeed, I think Ireland would have been better off in the status quo ante bellum than under the oppression of the heavy and fruitless taxes enacted for a mutilated country with a simulacrum of liberty. Better no bread than three-quarters of a poisoned loaf. It would have been the height of madness to accept a shadow at a time when the substance was never so closely within reach. Never was England, since the Norman conquest, in such straits as at the present. Why not press the advantage? Why not make the most of an hour that may never occur again? It is now or never. Centuries are depending on the movements of the present. We must press the advantage at the Convention and if England fails to hear the plea of the majority then "the blood is on her." It will then be seen if the "defender of small nations" is playing openly or above board or cunningly and hypocritically as "the Defender of the Faith" did with Catholicism some four centuries ago.

Of all the small nations of the earth, Belgium, Poland, etc., Ireland, by reason of her lengthy oppression is entitled to our first and greatest consideration. And this is her momentous hour. England is on trial. But Ireland is watched. Let Irishmen meet around a table and discuss their country's future—Mr. Redmond loves Ireland, and so do Sir Horace Plunkett, Sir Edward Carson, Bishop Kelly, and the others. Like the three men who see Killarney they all see it differently. If they refuse to exchange views, they can never see it the same. For, often in life, the only point of view worth having is the point of view you get when you give your own away. On our present actions will depend our names in history as the saviors or makers of our country. The most unselfish, the most whole-hearted and active endeavors are needed from us now to guide us in steering a weighty and most precious bark through the deadly Scylla and Charybdis of politics which lie at the entrance to the golden Ausonia of peace and prosperity beyond. The finest qualities are needed today, a man must be a hero and a statesman. Self-sacrifice, courage, love of Ireland, and not hatred of Irishmen who differ from us, etc., are all needed at this moment when England has asked Irishmen to settle their own problem. Any virtue carried to an excess becomes a vice. This is especially true of patience, for when carried to excess it encourages one nation to make a door-mat of another and treat it as a fool. This is poor Ireland's story. But, let her sons and daughters support Mr. Redmond now, by sending him cables even, in his plea for "an Ireland as free as Canada" and then we can turn to England and say: "You know now what we want. Give it or face the everlasting anger of a sorely tried people."

Corning, N. Y. Robert O'Loughran.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.

President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00

Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

Remember Those in Bonds

THE suffering which today afflicts so many nations should stir us, whose burden is lighter, to deeds of love and mercy. Americans are proverbially generous, and their response during the last three years to many appeals, has well upheld their merited reputation. They have opened their hearts to the needy, they have had regard for the widow and the orphan, they have succored all whose only credentials were their distress. This generosity will draw down the biessing of God upon our people. Now that war has come to us, many worthy agencies, notably the Knights of Columbus and the Red Cross, have appealed in behalf of our soldiers in camp at home, and of our Ambulance Service abroad. To both associations, as was fitting, the response has been both ready and liberal.

But there are charities, dear to the Heart of Christ, for which our generosity can surely find some added support. Thousands of dependent little children, and of old people whose race is nearly run, are cared for in this country by the loving ministrations of men and women consecrated to God, and to the service of their least brethren. Doubtless, one or more of these establishments can be found in your own city. The stress of the times presses very heavily upon them. The cost of maintenance has greatly increased, and in many instances the alms upon which they relied in former years, have now been diverted to other purposes. Their claims upon your charity, if less striking than those of the soldier in camp or hospital, since they have about them no reflection of military glory, should be none the less appealing. The Sisters and Brothers, in charge of these establishments, ask your aid in the name of the most helpless of our race, our little children, made weak and tender by Almighty God that their very dependence might stir the human heart to cherishing love, and in the name of those whose hearts in life's evening become once more as the heart of a child.

Do not say that you have only a little to give. Give that little in His Name. Make some sacrifice, and give not according to your straitened circumstances, but according to the need of the children and the aged. Then will the task of our Sisters and Brothers be lightened; somewhere an aged man or woman, even as your own old father or mother, will find new joy in life, somewhere the heart of an innocent child will be made glad, because of your charity.

The Neglected Estate

IN the course of a lecture on "The Mystery of Life," John Ruskin was once giving, he expressed his astonishment at the "intense apathy" the common run of Christians feel regarding the object of their existence in this world. With that sincerity and honesty so characteristic of him he said:

> Just suppose I was able to call at this moment to anyone in this audience by name, and to tell him positively that I knew a large estate had been left him on some curious conditions, . . . and that there was a chance of his losing it altogether if he did not soon find out on what terms it had been left to him. . . . Would you not think it strange if the youth never troubled himself to satisfy the conditions in any way nor even to know what was required of him, but lived exactly as he chose, and never inquired whether his chances of the estate were increasing or passing away?

Ruskin then reminded his hearers that there was not only "a quite unlimited estate" awaiting them in heaven, if they would but take the pains to please the holder of it, but that, on the contrary, "an estate of perpetual misery" would be in store for them if they displeased "this great Heaven-Holder."

Many believe that the world of today has far less faith in the reality of a future life than did the world Ruskin addressed. That may be, but the widespread scourge of war has without question awakened in numberless hearts a keen interest in that hitherto neglected "estate" lying beyond the grave. Proof of this is the vogue "psychic" books like Sir Oliver Lodge's "Raymond" have been having, and particularly the eagerness with which non-Catholics are taking up the Church's practice of praying for the dead, for an American Episcopalian bishop attests that "Even in extreme Protestant churches and families prayers for the dead are being offered."

But to our Catholic soldiers who in such throngs are preparing for the front, and to their dear ones also whom they leave behind, that heavenly estate Ruskin speaks of is without the shadow of doubt a glad reality, and is the rich inheritance awaiting all brave soldiers who die in God's grace. For they know with the certainty of Divine faith that the Just Judge will render in that day a crown of justice to all that love His coming, and will say to them, "Come ye blessed of my Father, possess you the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

Our Educational Quacks

IT was a clever gentleman, connected with the Brooklyn Tablet, who fused sincerity with wit in the remark that the New York public schools give the children a little of everything but education. Any crank, with sufficient backing, can secure access to the educational machinery of the city. It costs about forty-two million dollars a year to keep that machinery in some kind of languid motion, but what are a few millions among friends? These tinkers need not prove that they know anything whatever about machinery, either educational or of any other variety. They do need, however, what is commonly termed a "pull," for that, among other undoubted advantages, secures exemption from the Civil Service examinations. As all know, to subject an "expert" to any kind of an examination, by Grand Jury or other inquisitors, is ranked among the cruel and unusual punishments interdicted by the Constitution. It is also advantageous to hail from another city; but this point is sometimes waived for henchmen in need at home.

The "pull" secured, unless the dear public can demonstrate, beyond the traditional fear of contradiction, that the self-styled "expert" is the merest of quacks, the said "expert" may proceed to take the schools apart to see what makes them wobble on a level stretch, and lie down under a load. Whether or not the expert will be able to put the pieces together again is a matter of secondary importance. What is of prime concern is that the lean and hungry "expert" be supplied with a choice place at the city's financial trough. This may seem like charity, a most excellent virtue, but after all, justice comes first. "In such a contention," writes the President of the Board of Education, moved to righteous wrath because the Superintendent of Schools thinks that the Gary Plan ought to prove its superiority before adoption in New York,

> The burden of proof rests upon you to show affirmatively that a plan which on its face promises such great economy for the city, and at the same time such advantages for the children, is so defective that it should not be adopted.

"A promising face," decrees the President, "is the same as performance." This is the logic that has sold many a goldbrick in New York. But most of us come from Missouri: we do not replace old things with new, until we are assured that the new are better. We have long since learned to distrust the patter of the book-agent, and the roseate optimism of the man with a mine to sell. As the harried Superintendent neatly counters:

> According to this theory, we should adopt any plan of education that promises to cost less and do more for the school children, and set aside in its favor the established order of school-keeping and school-teaching. . . . To cost less and do more is the cry of every promoter of every quack nostrum in finance and medicine as well as education. . . . So far as New York is concerned [the Gary Plan has] nothing to recommend it but the claims of its advocates. I take the ground that every new theory of education must be fully tried and tested before adoption. In the meantime, the burden of proof evidently rests, not upon the supporters of the established order, but upon the advocates of the innovation.

For all this correct logic, the Superintendent is as guileless as the President. He really seems to think that the Gary Plan will be accepted or rejected in New York on its merits. A tincture of serpentine wisdom would teach him that it is nothing but a grimy pawn in a sordid political game.

Perhaps it is all part of a merry world, but if it be asked what interest we Catholics have in the whole affair, one answer may be that the vagaries of public school education in America have long since ceased to be amusing. The schools are assuming too close a resemblance to child-clinics in charge of quacks. Meanwhile we foot the bills, and they are not light.

A Chaplains' Reserve Corps

THE recent Catholic War Congress closed its session after unanimously voting to ask the Government to create a Chaplains' Reserve. The resolution was proposed by a regular army chaplain whose experience with troops has extended over a period of twelve years. Owing to the increase of our forces necessitated by the state of war now existing, the Government has created an Officers' Reserve, covering all arms of the service. At the same time it has been made clear that the moral welfare of the men at camp or in the field is of deep concern to the authorities at Washington. Indeed the United States Government stands unique today among all the Governments at war in maintaining that absolute continency is to be the moral code of its army, and wherever American troops are found, the Government means that womanhood, the womanhood both of allies and enemies, shall be reverenced and protected. The Secretary of War has spoken strongly of the need of keeping our camps at home clean in the true sense of the word. The community that refuses to cooperate with the Department in the cause of camp morality, will lose the honor of having the nation's defenders concentrated in its vicinity. The Secretary of the Navy has been no less clear on this point. For that reason every religious organization has been asked to help the Government make good soldiers by making good men. For no other reason has the number of regular army and navy chaplains been increased.

Yet organizations can never do what a corps of chaplains could do, authorized and empowered by the Government to minister to the spiritual wants of the soldiers who will shortly concentrate in such numbers that the regularly commissioned chaplains will find it difficult to attend to them. The regular chaplain follows his regiment, and many regiments may have a chaplain whose belief is not that of the majority of the regimental units. In that event what organization can substitute for the ministry of the chaplain? A case in point is the position of our expeditionary force in France. There is one priest with the forces as far as we know, yet viewing the official religious statistics of the enlisted personnel of the army, it is no exaggeration to say that one Catholic chaplain is not sufficient for the number of Catholics in the army now in France. As the war continues, wounds and death will take their toll of chaplains, as well as of doctors. The Medical Reserve is created to meet that situation in the medical corps. No Reserve as yet can meet the situation that is inevitable in the chaplains' corps, unless the Chaplains' Reserve proposed by the Catholic War Congress is instituted.

Be Worthy of Liberty

THE Russian revolution and the leaders who guide its destinies will gain little sympathy from sane and generous-hearted men, if they treat the ex-Czar, his wife and children with unnecessary harshness or cruelty. It is an ignoble weakness of human nature that it can so lower itself as to gloat over the misfortunes of the fallen great. If the new Russia, whose collapse before the enemy, it must be acknowledged, far surpasses any disaster suffered under the rule of the deposed Czar, does not want to lose the respect of the world, it should treat its former master with that dignity and moderation which become a great people. In doing so it will prove itself truly worthy of the liberty for which it is struggling.

The press has told us, not without some tone of cruel triumph, that the former ruler of the Russias and his family have been exiled to Tobolsk. It seemed to find a fitting irony in the nemesis which overtook the Czar and sent him to that same land of exile and suffering to which he had so often doomed others. To every victim sent to Siberia, whoever he be, we give our sympathy. We cannot even withhold it from the last and most prominent sufferer. For there is something in our nature that makes it linger over that page of history that tells of the sudden fall of monarchs, their trials, their sufferings, their departure from the palaces where they lived in splendor to face the road of exile, or the headsman's axe. Their sufferings are not greater in themselves than those of the humblest peasant or toiler, for he like them is a man and feels as a man must feel. But they teach a larger lesson. Their sorrows are more tragic. Their fall is to a greater depth, and from a loftier height. What a change from the glories of a throne to the gloom and suffering of a dungeon! How different the sneers and insults of today from the low courtesies, the plaudits, the respect, the subserviency of a few hours before! Formerly the monarch's word was law, now, none so poor to do him reverence. These changes, these sudden vicissitudes of fate, teach us the supreme lesson that men cannot rely on power or wealth or the prestige of birth or name or the might of the sword. The hour comes sooner or later when none of these avails a whit. He that leans upon them leans upon a broken reed. But the lessons of history are there also to teach us that men disgrace themselves by cruelty and heartlessness, even when a fallen tyrant is the victim. One faithful slave was found to scatter violets even over Nero's grave. The poor creature honored himself in doing so, more than he honored the dead emperor.

Americans who love true liberty, love it so dearly that they cannot hear with satisfaction of any cruelty done to the former Czar, who has been more sinned against than sinning, to his wife and daughters, or to the sick and weak boy, who has been dragged from the scenes he loved, without guilt of his own, to face the rigors of a Siberian winter. It is a sad tale. If the Russian nation has been freed by the fall of the Czar, we rejoice at the new light which has dawned over its suffering millions. For after the grace of God there is no greater gift than the charter of liberty. If the Russian people write at the head of that charter the sacred words justice and self-control, they will win the admiration of the world.

Honor the Physician

THE advice is good, even hallowed. It is taken from Holy Writ. From time to time we break our small wit upon him, we mad wags; we refer to his blood-brotherhood with the sad mortician, and some have even been known to remark upon the exemplary ease and comfort of the doctor's life. But when this machine which is to us, is up to the hubs in mire,

> When the blood creeps, and the nerves prick
> And tingle; and the heart is sick,
> And all the wheels of being slow the masque of Comus falls away. We are never so serious as when we want to get rid of a pain. We call upon the man of lore and medicines, and if of the male variety of the human species, we while away the interval of waiting by almost causing those about us to regret that we shuffle off this mortal coil so tardily. The disciple of Esculapius arrives; tired after a long day's work, dragged out of his bed, perhaps, to minister to our needs, supposed or real. Peace is all about him, healing is in his wings. If he can't do anything else, he gives us a word of cheer, and most probably leaves something that will put us to sleep. There is no doubt that in these emergencies the physician shall not lack his meed of honor. Then he looks to us as Aunt Polly did to Huck Finn, "as sweet as an angel, half full of pie." But afterwards the glamor may vanish. Things appear different when one is well, particularly if the physician, despairing of ethical hints, has properly "rendered" an equally ethical bill. It seems an imposition to pay out so much for the removal of one small distemper. Besides, most doctors are wealthy, and all of them "can get along somehow."

Yes, they can, and that is precisely what most of them are doing. The average income of physicians, all of whom invested a pretty sum in their education before they ever saw a patient who possessed anything that looked like money, is $700. That is a smaller sum than the annual stipend recommended for street-cleaners in New York. Honor the physician by all means, but honor alone makes an empty platter. Pay him what you owe him, and don't make him cringe, hat in hand, while you dole out what is his. There is really an obligation in conscience, to pay one's debts, even to a physician.

Literature

GOSSIPING WITH RILEY

SOME time in January, 1907, James Whitcomb Riley wrote in the forefront of one of his volumes of verse:

> Arrah! had the most thoughtless, unruly, but highly > Inspired heart-singer of "Kelly and Burke and Shea."
> But 'ave sung in alongst of the glorious names of them
> Daly an' Foley an' Riley, what a masterpiece it'd be.

So when I met the "Hoosier Poet" for the first time in March, 1909, it was natural that most of our talk should be of Ireland and of those who were best expressing her spirit at the moment. He was especially fond of Moira O'Neill's work, her "Songs of the Glens of Antrim" were then beginning to have some vogue, and I recall with no little pleasure how he held me on a blustery street-corner while he recited several stanzas of "Johneen." His love for the old country was deep and sincere, but his appreciation of things Irish was hardly more than intuitive. He had been removed too far, and for too long a time, from this old sweetheart of his to have much understanding of her soul. He took a delight in the writing of Irish verse but he was never quite at home in that work. This, after all, is not surprising, for poets seem to be in the habit of setting most store by those things of their creating which the general public least esteems. This is, perhaps, more true of poets employing dialect as a medium than of those who keep to the king's highway.

Burns thought pretty well of his straight English, and Tom Hood wished most to be serious. I never heard Riley recite anything of his own in dialect, but I sat beside him one January day in 1913 while he rolled his tongue with unction around his plain English "Moon-Drowned."

After the poet's right side became helpless he fell into the habit of entertaining visitors in his limousine and only his very intimate friends saw him at the house in Lockerbie Street. He would sit in the right-hand corner with his afflicted side against the tonneau and dispense the hospitable cigar with his good left hand, while the chauffeur rolled the car slowly through the streets of Indianapolis.

I hadn't exactly asked nor had he directly confessed which of his poems he liked best, but there was pride in his face and an extra deep tone in his voice as he laid a hand upon my knee and reveled in the wealth of words he had woven into his rhyme:

> The far-away lilt of the waltz rippled to us,
> And through us the exquisite thrill of the air:
> Like the scent of bruised bloom was her breath and its dew was > Not honeyer-sweet than her warm kisses were.
> We stood there enchanted—And O the delight of
> The sight of the stars and the moon and the sea
> And the infinite skies of that opulent night of > Purple and gold and ivory.

The diapason closed full in "purple and gold and ivory" and he held the taste in his mouth for long. But it was just Riley, the country boy, that fell thrall to the opulent glamor of these lines. The full-grown artist in him knew them to be as beautiful and perhaps as enduring as the gilt and crimson paint of the circus wagon.

He told, with a good deal of awe, the story of his writing of the lovely twelve lines which he called "Bereaved" and which came to him in the night and pulled him out of bed. The call was so insistent that he got up, and hunting paper and pencil set down the first four lines:

> Let me come in where you sit weeping, ay,
> Let me who have not any child to die
> Weep with you for the little one whose love
> I have known nothing of.

But there was more than that in the night air and whatever spirits were abroad they wouldn't let him rest until he had also put upon paper the other two stanzas:

> The little arms that slowly, slowly loosed
> Their pressure round your neck; the hands you used
> To kiss—Such arms—such hands I never knew.
> May I not weep with you?
>
> Fain would I be of service—say something,
> Between the tears, that would be comforting,—
> But ah! so sadder than yourselves am I,
> Who have no child to die.

He read the poem over in the morning and sent it at once to the Century Magazine. It was accepted by Mr. Gilder almost by telegraph. Riley was not surprised at that, but what continued to puzzle him was why he, a bachelor, without a relative or friend who had recently lost or was in danger of losing a child, should have been impelled to write such a thing. The next day's mail brought a letter from his old friend and platform-mate, Bill Nye, announcing the death of his child on the night of Riley's strange visitation.

Riley had the simplicity which is the concomitant of a great heart and he had more modesty than most poets, though some of his modesty was affected. He was a great actor and he knew the value of a modest bearing in the presence of one's audience. He was lovable for his uniform kindliness, and the affection in which he was held by his neighbors was in no little measure due to their feeling that "he was too modest for his own good." On the other hand there were those among the country folk of his native State who accused him of maligning his own people and who rather resented his Hoosier poems, or some of them. This is natural enough, for no people like to be told that their speech is less than the best; and there you can lay your finger upon dialect's chief drawback. As natural in its way, too, is the poet's fear that it may be said his work succeeded solely because of its motley dress of distorted orthoepy. It was then an excusable vanity which promoted the publication, in 1911, of a neat and thin book of 650 pages of India paper, bearing on the title-page the legend "The Lockerbie Book, containing poems not in dialect. By James Whitcomb Riley." In the introduction by his friend, Hewitt Hanson Howland, you may read:

> In the fourteen volumes that now represent his collected verse, almost every poetic form finds a place, and normal English, in distinction from dialect, holds an equal authority. Yet if you say "Riley" to the man in the street he will reply: "When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock." The poet, I am sure, has no grievance with this answer; nor is there quarrel anywhere with the fixed association of Riley's name with his homelier form of verse. Such an alliance is as worthy as it is inevitable. His destinies are garlanded with old-fashioned roses and time will judge him and reward him accordingly. As a consequence, however, his normal English verse is not, perhaps fully recognized either for its extent or for its quality.

Well, you never can tell how "time will judge and reward" a writer who dabbles in dialect. In Quiller Couch's "Oxford Book of Victorian Verse," Lowell is represented by "The Courtin'" and a tiny bit of straight verse, while more than ten pages are given to the pompous piffle of Whitman, who was careful never to be caught in the indiscretion of a smile.

Riley has been dead just a year, as I write, and it is too soon to appraise him to a t, but—applying to him the sextet from his own sonnet to the memory of Eugene Field:

His tribute:—Lustre in the faded bloom
Of cheeks of old, old mothers, and the fall
Of gracious dews in eyes long dry and dim;
And hope in lovers' pathways midst perfume
Of woodland haunts; and—meed exceeding all—
The love of little children laurels him.

T. A. DALY.

CLOISTERED LOVE

Sealed, set apart and hidden by your love
You walk in silence on your chosen way,
Enclosed by love around, beneath, above,
Love in the weary night, the arid day.

The earth which yields her heart to the lonely rain
Is not more consecrated than are you
In that rough sergé of drab enwoven pain.
They whom the eager feet of God pursue

Shall know it hard the face of God to find,
Shall prick their fingers when among the flowers,
And hear a fleeting voice upon the wind,
And see a tremulous war . . . but oh, the hours
When God shall come at last, at last, in fire
To consummate and burn away desire!

THEODORE MAYNARD.

REVIEWS

Luther. By HARTMANN GRISAR, Professor at the University of Innsbruck. Authorized Translation from the German by E. M. LAMOND. Edited by LUIGI CAPPADELTA. Vol. VI. St. Louis: B. Herder. $3.25.

The sixth and last volume of this work puts the finishing touch to the picture of the great Reformer which we have seen growing under the pen of the learned Innsbruck professor. It was not to be expected that the Jesuit should approach the study of Luther with anything like love or affection. But he has done so with the open-mindedness and impartiality of the historian. He has let Luther tell his own story, and as far as possible, kept himself in the background. If Luther knows how to be his own apologist, he is more often still his own accuser. His self-indictment is unconsciously far more severe than any that his opponents can bring against him. Grisar, unlike Denifle, does not descend to impeachment or incrimination. He arrays facts, and lets them speak, and Luther by no means comes out unscathed.

The present volume is most interesting for it deals with such important questions as Luther's attitude towards society and education, paints the darker side of Luther's inner life, his fits of fear, his swoons, his irritability, his nervousness, his temptations, his inconsistencies, his contradictions, his feverish polemics; describes his rather cold, hard and commonplace death and submits to a keen analysis the unfounded rumors that the Reformer either committed suicide or had a violent end. To all these questions the historian brings his usual qualities of accuracy, research, a thorough knowledge of the immense literature of the subject and an evident desire to get at the truth.

On closing the volume the fair-minded man, who hitherto on the strength of the great Protestant tradition, firmly believed in the greatness of Luther, will have his faith rudely shattered. A great man is not so selfish, so violent and foul of tongue, so reckless of the truth, so intolerant of the views and opinions of others, so cringing to the great, so heartless and cruel, so absolutely self-conceited and self-centered, so coarse and so gross. Judged by the standards of true greatness, Luther fails. But he was a strong man. He had the strength of the unfettered forces of nature, of the raging storm, of the torrent breaking its bounds. He knew it, and he made use of that strength for his own ends. His success was undoubtedly great. But as Grisar well notes, the striking results which Luther accomplished by his work of destruction, ever an easier task than that of reconstruction, were not solely due to his efforts alone, but were rather the outcome of the circumstances in which he lived, the product of the divers factors in the history of the times. The storm had long been brewing, its first mutterings had been heard. Luther unloosed it in its fury. He cared little what destruction and ruin it might work in its path. The men who do such work have a certain glamor about them which fascinates the vulgar. Luther had besides astounding mental gifts and incredible capacity for work, a thorough knowledge of the meaner side of the masses, and a wonderful psychological instinct which told him what passion to stir and what instruments to use for his sordid and selfish purposes. Moral greatness, the majesty of self-control, humility, the spirit of Christian charity, the chastening sense of his own limitations, a decent regard for the opinion of others, and the spirit of tolerance he lacked completely. The fourth centenary of the dawn of Luther's rebellion is drawing near. The world at large is not likely to celebrate it now with much pomp or solemnity. With the cool and calm verdict of the historian, Father Grisar gives every fact to make us realize that there is very little reason to regret the fact. Judge him from whatever point you may, the Reformer of Wittenberg is not entitled to the honors so long claimed for him. His life was not that of a prophet and a man of God. His work is not such as common-sense, reason and faith can look upon as bearing the approval and the stamp of the Divine Founder of Christianity. It was ever full of self, of haughtiness, of the spirit of pride and passion. On the whole it has been a work of spiritual ruin and death.

J. C. R.

The Sorry Tale: a Story of the Time of Christ. By PATIENCE WORTH. Communicated through Mrs. JOHN H. CURRAN. Edited by CASPER S. YOST. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.90.

It is hard to know just what to think of this book. According to the preface which is written by Mr. Yost, editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, "The Sorry Tale," a story of 640 closely-printed pages, was dictated by the aid of the ouija-board by "Patience Worth" to Mrs. John H. Curran, of St. Louis, who is described as "a young woman of normal disposition, intelligent and vivacious," who "has had no experience in literary composition and has made no study of literature, ancient or modern," and whose knowledge of Palestine and of the origin of Christianity is that of "the average communicant."

Beginning July 14, 1915, and dictating from 300 to 5,000 words at a sitting, till the story was completed, Patience Worth tells in what purports to be seventeenth-century English, the story of "Hatte," an illegitimate son of Tiberius Caesar, born at Bethlehem, the first Christmas night. He comes into contact from time to time with Our Divine Lord and dies beside Him at last as the Bad Thief. Few readers will have the courage to toil through the hundreds of prosy pages of dialogue and description the volume contains. The most interesting portions of the book are those giving pen-pictures of Our Lord and paraphrases of His recorded words. For strange to say, though the story has been communicated through a planchette, there is little said or done by Him that is out of harmony with the Gospel story. For instance, here is a description of Our Lord and an account of one of His little sermons:

> And His feet were bared, and His mantle wet of young dew, and His eyes deep, deep blue, even as the sky, the sign of the might of God. And His locks flamed within the light and hung long and o'er His stooped shoulders. And the brow gleamed stained of the sun's heat, and His thin beard hid not the sweet that clung His lips. And lo, when He raised His hand, it was even as the soft skimming of a swallow's wing. And the sun kissed the bended back whereon earth's woes should rest; and the grasses lay soft 'gainst His feet and even clung . . .

And it had come that multitudes had cried out: "Master, who among us is greatest?" And He had taken unto His breast a babe and let His blessed lips to lay upon the golden crown and had spoken: "Behold the undoer of Heaven! I say unto ye, no man whose faith is not like unto one of these may know the Father. The fields of earth are like unto man, o'erfull of grain. Then how may ye become greater who are already full? Behold ye, he who filleth up on mighty things may forget bread! But the babe thirsteth for its mother's breast and knoweth not why nor yet whither from the fount. Except as thou becomest as one of these, thou mayest not see the Father. Behold ye the eyes of this one! unto all earth it turneth fearful, yet unto its mother, knowing. Even so the son of man shall be.

Is Patience Worth a clever fraud or a minion of Satan with a touch of an angel of light? W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

A little son of Mrs. Francis Blundell, the well-known Irish novelist, was once so ill that the doctors thought he could hardly recover. At the boy's own request his mother then got him some Lourdes' water and on her own initiative telegraphed for Masses and prayer in honor of Our Lady of Lourdes. "A few hours after that," Mrs. Blundell attests, "the child fell asleep, and awoke on the following morning perfectly cured." As a thank-offering for her boy's marvelous recovery she has now written a book of thirty-one chapters, suitable for May readings, entitled "Little Pilgrims to Our Lady of Lourdes" (Kenedy, $1.10), in which she tells all about Bernadette and the wonders of Lourdes, adding practical lessons for her youthful readers' instruction.——"The Mystical Knowledge of God" (Kenedy, $0.75) by Dom Savinien Louismet, O.S.B., is described as "an essay in the art of knowing and loving the Divine Majesty." There are practical counsels in the beautifully printed little book on how to attain by prayer an intimate knowledge of God, and how to find Him in His creatures.

Both those who visit New York and those who live there would do well to equip themselves with Florence N. Levy's excellent "Guide to the Works of Art in New York City" (Fine Arts Building, New York, $0.60). The author outlines four "art pilgrimages" and tells where a number of the most artistic buildings and pieces of sculpture in Greater New York are to be found. Some tourists however, may wonder why the only Catholic churches in the city worthy of mention are St. Patrick's Cathedral and Our Lady of Hope. If room is found for a complete list of the "artistic" statues in Central Park and for numerous Protestant churches of scant architectural beauty, perhaps a little space might have been spared to call attention, for example, to the Church of St. Ignatius Loyola, with its fine mosaics, or to the new Regis High School. However, Catholics who follow this guide through the Metropolitan Museum of Art can hold their heads high, for, without question, the richest treasures there are the work of Catholic artists.

"Day and Night Stories" (Dutton, $1.50), by Algernon Blackwood, is made up of fifteen of those "psychic" and "spookish" tales this author tells as a rule with such literary skill. Some of these stories, however, seem too overweighted with "psychology" to be complete artistic successes. "The Touch of Pan," the second tale in the book, is shamelessly pagan in its principles and descriptions, while "The Wings of Horus" and "The Occupant of the Room" are the most creepy.——Sarah Johnson Cocke's "The Master of the Hills" (Dutton, $1.50), a tale of the Georgia mountains, seems to be too conventional in plot and treatment to hold the reader's interest.——"The Slate Picker Soprano" (Mission Press, Techny, $0.60), is the latest of Father William W. Whalen's books. Its best pages are those describing a boy's life in the Pennsylvania coal mines.——"The Sublime Sacrifice, a Drama of the Great War" (Torch Press, N. Y., $1.25), by Charles V. H. Roberts, is an attempt to develop the literature of the present conflict on the tragic side. The episode of Edith Cavell furnishes the author with his theme.

EDUCATION

The Catholic School for the Catholic Child

REALLY, the facts in the case are rather simple. Consider for the moment, that entity, generally conceded to be human, Johnny, over whose unconcerned head ten perilous summers have passed, and as many hazardous winters. The apple of your eye when he is good, and the bane of your existence when he is bad, or when you have a headache, he is always the object of your solicitude. Just now the light that shines from Johnny's countenance is occasionally dimmed and his feet drag more heavily than is their wont. But jump not to the conclusion that his health is failing. He is only sicklied o'er with the pale cast of unaccustomed thought. He is pondering upon days soon to dawn, dark days, schooldays, which only those whose senility is truly doddering consider overcharged with happiness. And if Johnny is about to "resume his studies," in Dr. Blimber's phrase, at a public school, he is right in marking each day in that school with a very black stone.

Why Johnny Exists

FOR Johnny, small and inconsiderable as he may seem, is a person of tremendous importance. He is made in the image of God. As he came from the hand of God, so is it part of the infinite design that he return to God who made him. Whether or not he will bring himself into complete harmony with the Divine will, which sincerely desires the eternal happiness of every human creature, is left to his own choice. He may cooperate with or, if he so wishes, spoil the plans of God in his regard, and instead of glorifying God's mercy in heaven, witness to the Divine justice in hell. His life, therefore, is not bounded by the things of this visible world but stretches beyond these confines into eternity. In the days of his choice he may make himself a wise, helpful man, for whose presence the world is truly bettered, or he may become an Ishmaelite. Upon him and his small sisters and brothers depends the future of our race. They will fill the world with happiness or with untold sorrow. Their influence will mold the destinies of generations yet unborn. Therefore, rich in unmeasured potencies of good and evil, these children are at once the world's most precious possession and its most dangerous liability.

The Rights and Duties of Parents

TO sit in judgment upon the conflicts of men, to decide with authority derived from God, hazards of life and death; to lead an army against the foes of liberty and civilization; to receive the story of man's transgressions and to impart in God's name Divine forgiveness; all these are offices of tremendous trust and responsibility. But what of the office and function of parents, particularly of Catholic parents, to whom Almighty God has entrusted the care of the child? Upon their faithfulness to their great charge rest, in large measure, the child's influence in this world and its eternal salvation. It is fairly obvious that parents are strictly obliged by the natural law to protect the child against all harm, and to give it that training which will fit it to take its place as a useful member of society. To the Catholic parent another obligation, sanctioned both by the Divine and the natural law, ought to be even more apparent. It is the right, sacred and beyond the reach of any human jurisdiction, and the duty of training the child from the earliest possible moment in a sense of its obligations towards God. If he neglects any means, within reason, of strengthening this realization in the soul of the child, he fails in his most important duty. How he can be excused from crime, if he entrusts the impressible child to the forces of an education which will not even admit that God exists, may be left to those lax moralists who work continually in the shadow of condemned propositions.

Secular "Education"

AS a Catholic, he knows that he is bound to lead the soul of his child to God. Can he possibly fulfil that obligation by sending the child to a school which has dispensed with God? For such, precisely, is the nature of "secular education," "non-sectarian education," using the term "education" by the courtesy of usage only, since there can be no true education without a knowledge of God. Let us forget for the moment the palatial buildings, paid for in part by Catholic money, of the public school, along with such well-founded claims of efficiency in teaching as it possesses, and its prated pretensions. Stripped bare of all sham, non-sectarian education means an education from which all mention of God, save perhaps as a myth or a superstition, has been sedulously eliminated. It means that in a system which, by supposition at least, prepares the child for life in its fullest sense, no reference to God as man's Creator and last end may be tolerated. It is a training founded on the principle that revelation has no place in the formation of the child; that faith is an emotion, and religion as purely a matter of natural preference as one's tastes in automobiles or neckties; that man can attain perfection by himself, without help or hindrance from the supernatural; in short, that since man is self-sufficient, and therefore independent, the question of God's existence is at most only a matter of curious speculation.

Education Without God

TRUE, some men are better than their principles; true, also, that even from stones can God raise up children to Abraham. Therefore is it true that a public school training does not in every case turn out what a modern non-Catholic professor has aptly termed "a pagan." Like an overdose of an opiate, its effects can sometimes be counteracted by vigorous efforts outside the school. But its natural tendency is towards paganism; in fact, towards a standard lower than enlightened paganism. There were pagans who, reaching some notion of God by a consideration of His works, were not ashamed to acknowledge Him in every sphere of human activity. "Ignorance of the true God," wrote Plato, "is the greatest pest of all republics; therefore whoever destroys religion, destroys the foundation of all human society." "The first thing is the worship of the gods and faith in their existence," teaches Seneca, "and we are next to acknowledge their majesty and bounty." Thus does "secular education" fall even below the ideals of paganism. "This belief in the moralizing effect of intellectual culture," writes Herbert Spencer, "flatly contradicted by facts, is absurd a priori. What imaginable connection is there between learning that certain clusters of marks on paper stand for certain words, and the getting of a higher sense of duty?"

> How does knowledge of the multiplication-table, or quickness in adding and dividing so increase the sympathies as to restrain the tendency to trespass upon fellow-creatures? . . . One who should by lessons in Latin hope to gain a knowledge of geometry, or one who should expect practice in drawing to be followed by an expressive rendering of a sonata, would be thought fit for an asylum; and yet he would scarcely be more irrational than are those who by discipline of the intellectual faculties expect to produce better feelings.

"Literature, reading, writing, arithmetic, history," asks Cardinal Manning, "can these things make your children, children of God?" As Spencer, no studied friend of any Catholic principle, is forced to acknowledge, the belief that they can is simply "irrational."

May Catholics Approve "Secularism"?

TRUTH can never tolerate error. In these days of weakening faith there is a tendency to "tone down" the attitude of the Church towards purely secular education. "It is constantly asserted," writes a Catholic essayist, "that Catholics are opposed to the public school system of America. On the contrary, Catholics approve . . . the public schools." If they do, it is in defiance, or in ignorance, of the Catholic attitude, expressed very forcibly by Pius IX, in condemning the proposition that > Catholics may approve of the system of educating youth, unconnected with Catholic faith and the power of the Church, and which regards the knowledge of merely natural things, and only, or at least primarily, the ends of earthly social life.

There is need of much careful distinction and subtle subdistinction before one arrives at the very small grain of truth about which the somewhat common sophism, "Catholics approve the public schools," has been spun. Furthermore, it is not quite clear why disapproval or even absolute condemnation of the public schools should be considered un-American, or in any sense a defect either of good citizenship or of good sense. The principles of the public school, as it now exists, never entered the minds of the founders of this Republic, or of the framers of its Constitution. It is not a national, but a local or a State institution. All the early American schools were distinctly religious in foundation and purpose. So widely separated is the non-sectarian school of today from an American origin, that it traces its ancestry across the bar-sinister of irreligious French philosophy of the eighteenth century back to that charming character, Julian the Apostate.

What Catholics Think

IT is in the utterances of those whom the Holy Ghost has set to rule the Church of God, and not in abject pleas for the favor of a faithless world, that the Catholic doctrine on education is to be sought. "Daily experience has demonstrated beyond doubt," is the pronouncement of the Fathers of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, "how grave are the evils, and how deep-seated the dangers to which Catholic children in this country are frequently exposed by attending the public schools." The Fathers of the Third Council speak in the same sense. "It follows naturally, and is proved by sad experience," they write, "that an education merely secular so degenerates by degrees, that it becomes irreligious and impious, and pernicious in the extreme to the Faith and morals of the young." "It is of the highest importance," counsels Leo XIII in the Constitution "Nobilissima Gallorum Gens," "that the children of Christian parents be instructed in due time in the principles of religion, and that the training by which youth is advanced in knowledge and culture be joined with religion." "Full of danger," writes the same Pontiff in the Constitution on the Centenary of Blessed Peter Canisius, "is that educational system in which there is either a false religion, or, as is usual in the schools termed 'mixed,' no religion at all."

> Let no one rashly conclude that piety can be safely excluded from education. For if at no time in life may the duties of religion be set aside, either in public or private affairs, much less should that age so devoid of experience, so inconsiderate in thought and action, and exposed to the allurement of corruption, be removed from the influence of religion. . . . Not only is it necessary that certain hours be assigned for religious instruction, but the whole system should be redolent of Christian piety. If this be wanting, if this sacred inspiration does not pervade and guide the minds of teachers and pupils, little profit will be drawn from any training, and dangers of no small moment will often follow.

In keeping with this doctrine, the three Plenary Councils of Baltimore have condemned the public school as dangerous to the Faith and morals of the Catholic child.

> The Church whose mission is to lead, from the dawn of reason, all men reborn to Christ in baptism, in the ways of truth and justice, to their supernatural end, can by no means permit Catholic parents, to whom pertains by the natural and the Divine law the right and duty of providing their children with a Christian education, to give them a purely secular training. For this can in no wise supply them with the necessary means for knowing and attaining their last end. (Conc. Balt. III, 194.)

These words manifest the ardent desire of Jesus Christ and of the Church, that every Catholic child should be sent to a Catholic school. Fearful indeed, particularly in these days, is the responsibility of the Catholic father who, in the foolish hope of worldly advantage, disregards this wish of the Divine Lover of children. "It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he scandalize one of these little ones."

Where Christ is Welcomed

LET us choose nothing but the best for our little ones, made in the image of God and bought by Christ at the price of His most precious Blood. Many are the schools which can supply their needs in secular instruction. One alone, besides developing them by applying the sanest principles of pedagogy, will teach them to grow daily in the most excellent knowledge of Jesus Christ, and in this knowledge to find new motives for serving Him more faithfully and loving Him more ardently. It is the parochial school, the only school which has a welcome for Him in every classroom and in the heart of every teacher and pupil, and which is brave enough to confess Him before the face of a world that hates Him. To the Catholic school alone may so holy a thing as the soul of an innocent Catholic child be safely entrusted.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

ECONOMICS

Interest

IN the early days in Greece, when men failed to repay the money they had borrowed, they became the slaves of their creditors. Solon exempted the person of the debtor from the rapacity of the creditor, and made the latter depend for the recovery of his money upon the property by which the debt was secured. During the Empire the same law was enacted in Rome, where the rate of interest varied from 4 per cent on first class paper in the city, to 50 per cent in the country.

When Europe became Christian, lending money at interest became the chief employment of the Jews, who were excluded from most other occupations. Their function was that of the sponge, to sop up the money from the people and, in their turn, to be squeezed by the kings and princes.

Early Views

IN the Council of Vienne, held in 1311, it was decreed that stern measures were to be taken against those who persisted in declaring that it was not a sin to practise usury. The distinction which is made today between "interest" and "usury" was not then understood. Money was regarded as a measure of value and a medium of exchange, but not as an element of production. Money was barren metal. In moral theology the lending of money was discussed under the title "Contractus de Mutuo." When an object passed from the hands of one person into those of another, under this contract, the borrower was not obliged to restore the same individual object, but another of the same sort and value. If a woman borrowed a loaf of bread from her neighbor for her husband's dinner, evidently she could not be expected to restore the identical loaf. It would suffice to return another just as good. By the moralists money was put in the same category with bread, and hence the difficulty in justifying the taking of interest. The moralists taught that, in certain circumstances, the person who had, was required by charity to lend to the one who had not, even money, if money happened to be what was needed; and, so far as could be seen at that time, the only reason for lending money was to afford relief to one in need.

But even when putting money on a par with the loaf of bread, moralists felt that there were certain circumstances in which it might be permissible to take interest. Thus they invented many extrinsic titles, such as "the loss sustained," "the interruption of gain," "the danger to the principal," "delay in repayment," and many others.

The Newer Attitude

THE progress of industry, however, compelled men to assume a new attitude towards the taking of interest on money lent. Under the former system of domestic production, the producer used his own money entirely, or almost entirely. If any man lent him money to be used for purposes of production, he was considered to have become a partner, and thus to be entitled to a share in the profits. Such loans, however, were necessarily small. There were no large manufacturing establishments, and no great investments of money in any one plant. But with the advance of industry, particularly after the invention of machinery, the factory took the place of the home, and the stockholder and the bondholder took the place of the partner. All money became potentially capital, and capital was recognized as one of three elements of production, the other two being nature and labor. At last a use was found for money which would clearly justify the taking of interest.

An Element in Production

LENDING money was no longer to be catalogued as an act of charity, exclusively. The attitude of moralists towards money underwent a change similar to that which came over the business world with regard to gasolene, cotton-seed and coal-tar when a use was found for them. At one time coal-tar was considered a positive menace. The owner was usually compelled to dig a hole in the ground, and bury it. Yet today coal-tar is very precious, yielding products by the thousands, and is appreciated accordingly. Money, too, in the olden times was buried, not because it was considered a menace, but for safe keeping, because there was no use to which it could be put. Hence the "treasure-trove." But with the advent of industrialism a use was found. It became an element in production.

Moralists now saw that as the man who owns the land is justified in taking rent for the land, as the laborer who works is entitled to his wages, so the man who furnishes the capital, is entitled to interest on the money he supplies. The laborer who saves part of his wages and deposits his savings in a bank is entitled to receive interest on his deposit. For the bank will lend the money to the manufacturer, who will employ it in production.

Money, Potential Capital

THUS all money is potentially capital, and as such entitled to interest. In our country the different States have fixed a legal rate of interest. By special contract with the borrower, a higher rate of interest may be exacted, but in most States there is a limit set even for contract rates. To collect interest beyond this rate is usury, and is punishable in various ways.

The principle for which the Church stood in the olden times is the principle for which she stands today: that when a man performs an act of charity for another, he should not demand payment for it. There are acts for which he can demand payment, but they are not simply and solely acts of charity. In former days, the lending of money was regarded by Church and State as an act of charity. Today it is an essential part of that complex institution which we denominate "business." If we lend money to be employed in production, we can claim our share of the product. Conditions have changed, but the principle upon which the Church resisted the taking of interest is as true today as it was six-hundred years ago.

JOHN X. PYNE, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Fairyland No Longer a Myth

WHILE planning their own lavish, and often entirely joyless, because most selfish, vacations, too many of the rich forget the wants of the poor during the warm summer months. A little outing given to the children of St. Vincent's Hospital, New York, is an example of that wise charity which is twice blessed. An invitation was extended to the Sisters and their charges by the owner of a beautiful estate at Roslyn, L. I.

> Promptly at nine o'clock a huge motor car arrived at the door of the hospital. Into it as promptly went twenty-three little ones, ranging in age from three to ten years, accompanied by two Sisters of Charity and a nurse. Arrived at the scene of festivity, the party was received by the master of the estate and his family with gracious courtesy and almost medieval reverence and hospitality. It was a welcome to Christ's little ones for Christ's sake. Light refreshments having been served, everything was placed at the disposal of the guests, the mansion, the porches, the lawns, the swings "up to the trees," the pony-carts, the playhouse with its beautiful toys. And then the dining room with all its wonderful appointments! To the children it was fairyland, with the beautiful fairy princesses, the daughters of the house, flitting about and making sure that the stately butler in his handsome uniform had attended to every wish of the little guests. Fairyland was no longer a myth.

Wisely the writer from whose letter we quote remarks that if, as in the Ages of Faith, those blessed with a superabundance of this world's goods would bestow upon their poorer brethren, not of their wealth only, but also of their respectful, loving, personal service, such kindness would go far towards solving many of the perplexing problems of the present day.

Leonardo da Vinci and the "Tank"

AN Englishman, according to the San Francisco Town Talk, has discovered that the modern steel juggernauts of the grim war god, prosaically known as "tanks," are not a modern invention after all. Ages before Holt had dreamed of his caterpillar engine a "poet-architect-painter-engineer" had already conceived the idea of it. In a letter to Ludovico Sforza, then Duke of Milan, the celebrated painter Leonardo da Vinci wrote: "I can also construct covered waggons, secure and indestructible, which, entering among the enemy, will break the strongest bodies of men; and behind these the infantry can follow in safety and without impediment." The citation of the passage is interesting at the present moment, but the editor of Town Talk entertains a serious apprehension. He believes that the discovery will not rest there. He writes:

> The Times will be flooded with letters, all beginning, I'll wager, with the words: "There is nothing new under the sun," and proving that the "tank" was invented by Hannibal, by Alexander the Great, by Rameses, by Solomon, etc., etc. And then some Oxford professor will write to say that in a fragment of a Greek play just dug up at Oxyrrynchus the "tank" is accurately described by some forgotten dramatist who wrote a play about the Seven Against Thebes.

Yet we shall not, for all this, find fault with the first writer who was unable to rest easy until he had communicated his original discovery to the "dear ole Lonnon Times." It presents the painter of the famous "Last Supper" under an entirely new aspect to many modern readers, and aptly illustrates the versatility of these great Catholic masters who could with almost equal skill turn their hand from painting to sculpture, to architecture, to poetry, and even, as in the present instance, to engineering.

The War Debt of the Nations

AN attempt is made in the Journal of Commerce to offer a conservative estimate of the world's war expenditures during the three years of this gigantic struggle. The conclusion arrived at is that the total cost, exclusive of the contributions of Japan and the United States, considerably exceeds $90,000,000,000. We may not therefore be far wrong in placing the absolute total at almost $100,000,000,000. Add to this the "ghastly debit" of human lives. Estimating the number of those killed, dead, or permanently incapacitated from earning a livelihood at 6,500,000, and ascribing to each man an average potential economic value of $3,900, the Journal concludes that from this source alone there is an additional aggregate loss of $25,350,000,000. Without taking into account the incalculable material damages to the territories ravaged by the war and the dislocation of trade contingent on it, we may therefore roundly estimate the total economic loss to the nations, in money and men alone, at about $125,000,000,000. According to Professor Seligman the war bill of the United States for the first year of its participation in the conflict will approximate to $10,000,000,000. Account must, furthermore, be taken of the interest constantly accruing on the money already borrowed by the various belligerent nations. Thus the national debt of England alone will entail an interest of about $1,500,000,000, while the annual interest of Germany is said to be well over $1,000,000,000. In the former case the staggering liability has actually been met up to date by the new English war taxes, but the revenue thus gained can provide for little more than the bare interest. German war taxes, it is claimed, do not even remotely cover the interest. However this may be, no one can fail to see the alarming character of the heavy annual liabilities of the belligerent nations. "Countries that have been piling up debt without proper provision for adequate revenue expansion may have to confess bankruptcy before the obligation of repayment matures."

Catholic Schools for the Colored Race

NO report of the Catholic Board for Mission Work among the Colored People in the United States has ever been more consoling than the one just issued. Eight new primary schools and two schools partly of a high-school character have been opened. In Mississippi, according to the statement of Mgr. Burke, Director General of the Board, great impetus has been given to the educational missionary propaganda by the Fathers of the Divine Word, and in Louisiana the Fathers of the Holy Ghost have energetically cultivated the new field opened to them there by the late Archbishop Blenk.

> One of the comforting signs of the sterling Catholicism that exists in all parts of the country was offered by the generosity of a family in Boston. A struggling pastor in the South wrote to Mgr. Burke that a school was absolutely needed in his place if the children were to be held to the Faith. At the moment the Director General was not in a position to supply the demand. Shortly afterwards he brought the matter to the attention of the Richards family of Boston, whose father was the most prominent American brought into the Fold by the Oxford movement. Father Richards, the eminent Jesuit, is a member of the family. His brother and two sisters gave the funds needed for the erection of Father Massey's school in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in gratitude for the grace of conversion granted to their father. If more of the generous Catholics of the country could be brought to the realization of how much the schools mean to the colored race, and how many thousands might be saved by their instrumentality, there might be more imitators of the generous Richards.

About $3,000 is expended monthly by the Board for the support of schools and churches in the South devoted to spreading the knowledge of the Faith among the colored population. Protestant denominations have expended large sums upon the work of "evangelizing" these people. Methodists in particular have organized extensively for this purpose. We must answer by deeds the taunts cast at us that we are neglecting them.

magazine place a one-cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No wrapping; no address.—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

SEPTEMBER 8, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

The Passing of a Theory
Richard A. Muttkowski

Anglicanism at the War Front
E. L. Millard

Who Are Our Soldiers?
Charles Phillips

Our Unassimilated Immigrants
J. B. Culeman

The Sisters in the Civil War
Gerald C. Treacy

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
September 8, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 22

PAGE

CHRONICLE 537–540

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Passing of a Theory—Anglicanism at the War Front—Who Are Our Soldiers? Our Unassimilated Immigrants — The Sisters in the Civil War.....541–548

COMMUNICATIONS 549–551

EDITORIALS

The President's Reply — The Parochial School—A Native Clergy—The Heart of an Apostate—Why?—Masonic Truth and Catholic Mummery.....552–554

LITERATURE — Swinburne Decadent—Reviews—Books and Authors—Books Received 555–557

EDUCATION—Jacopo Sadoleto 558–559

NOTE AND COMMENT....559–560

SOCIOLOGY—The Circle and the Triangle.....557–558

Ostensorium
No. 7003

Price, $40.00

FOR
ECCLESIASTICAL NECESSITIES in ORIGINAL DESIGNS and BEAUTIFULLY FINISHED

We again call you attention to this space and recommend for your approval this week an

OSTENSORIUM,
OUR NO. 7003

DESCRIPTION

Only an artist could have so symmetrically incorporated so many striking points into 18 inches, which is the height of this Ostensorium. The base has a diameter of 6½ inches and is richly decorated in high relief.

Mail orders solicited

The W. J. FEELEY CO.
10 East 50th Street
New York City
opposite St. Patrick's Cathedral
Factory, Providence, R. I. Established 1870

Who's Who

CHARLES PHILLIPS, author of "Who Are Our Soldiers?" in this issue of AMERICA, was born at New Richmond, Wis., 1880; educated in the New Richmond High School, De La Salle College, Toronto, and the Catholic University, Washington, D. C.; sometime managing editor of Northwestern Chronicle, St. Paul, and the New Century, Washington, D. C.; formerly editor of the Republican Voice, New Richmond, and the Monitor, San Francisco; contributor to Catholic World, AMERICA, etc.

Read AMERICA and Keep Up with the Best Current Thought

ORGANIST and CHOIRMASTER

DR. JOHN PHILIP FOLEY, the noted New York organist and choirmaster, is free to accept another position in the Fall. Dr. Foley has been associated with the most prominent churches in New York City, including Holy Name, St. Ignatius Loyola, and St. Patrick's Cathedral, and has been particularly successful in boy-choir work. During the past year he was elected an honorary member of the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music at Rome, Italy.

Address
HUNTER'S REST CAMP,
RAQUETTE LAKE, N. Y.

Change of Address

should be sent ten days before the new address is to go into effect

The America Press
59 East 83rd Street New York

"BRADFORD PRESSED BRICK"
(Trade-mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Office)
THE STANDARD RED BRICK OF AMERICA
Write for the RED Catalog
"BRADFORD REDS"
"BRADFORD RUFFS"
BRADFORD PRESSED BRICK CO.
We also make Fireproofing and Hollow Block
"The Red Brick People" BRADFORD, PA.

The latest and best pamphlet on the subject

What Luther Taught

THE country is now flooded with literature commemorating the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's rebellion. So every Catholic ought to have at hand a brief and trustworthy guide. Fathers Husslein and Reville, of the AMERICA staff, have prepared from the very words of Luther himself just the pamphlet you need.

Price 15 cents
$10.00 a hundred

The AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83RD STREET
NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 22 }
WHOLE No. 438 }

SEPTEMBER 8, 1917

{ $3.00 A YEAR
{ PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The British have had some slight success north of Ypres, and the French have advanced some distance on a mile front in the vicinity of Hurtebise; they have also recaptured the Beaumont Woods. The Germans crossed the Dvina south of Riga, near Uxkul, and advancing from this point on Riga forced the evacuation of the city. The Russians have lost some heights east of Cernowitz; and on account of the growing demoralization of their army, accentuated perhaps by the great monarchical plot, they have been forced to fall back in Rumania near Ocna, Soveia and Foscani.

Bulletin, Aug. 27, p.m.-Sept. 3, a.m.

The progress of the Italians north of Goritz has been very marked and ranks with the great victories of the war. Advancing on Monte Santo from three sides they fought their way to the summit and took possession of the entire mountain. Further south they have secured a footing on both the northern and western slopes of Monte Gabriele. At the same time they scaled the precipitous western slopes of the Bainsizza Plateau, and drove the Austrians back towards the Chiapavone Valley, seven miles on a front of eleven miles. East of Goritz and in the Vippaco Valley the Italians have made some progress, but apparently have been waiting for the completion of the movement further north. In the Brestovizza Valley, the Italians have been forcing their way against very stubborn opposition, and have got a footing on the slopes of the rocky group of hills known as the Hermada, which are the main obstacle barring their advance on Triest. The battle has developed on a front of more than sixty miles but the Austrian resistance is stiffening.

Italian Victories

On August 28 the President's reply to the Pope's peace proposal was cabled to the British Foreign Office and by Foreign Minister Balfour was forwarded to Rome. It was framed apparently after consultation with the nations at war with Germany and although not intended to serve as the identic answer of all, is generally believed to express their common views. Each nation is expected to make its own individual answer, but such answers in all probability will reflect the communication of the President and conform generally to the position taken by the United States.

The President's Reply to the Pope

The salient characteristics of the President's note are (1) sincere appreciation of the dignity and force of the motives which prompted the Pontiff's plea for peace; (2) absolute distrust of the present German Government, together with a fixed determination not to enter into negotiations with it, no matter what may be its promises; (3) and an inflexible resolution to prosecute the war until it is made impossible for the German autocracy ever again to sweep "a whole continent within the tide of blood." The clear implication of the entire document is that the German people must shake off the domination of their present rulers before the notion of peace can be entertained, or else, as a people, give substantial guarantees such as "other peoples of the world would be justified in accepting."

The President says that he is in accord with the Pope in desiring not merely a cessation of hostilities but "a stable and enduring peace"; with the broad lines also of the settlement proposed by the Supreme Pontiff he is fully in sympathy; but he declares that the process by which Benedict XV hopes to effect that settlement, namely, by a "return to the status quo ante-bellum," is in his opinion inadequate to produce the desired result.

> The object of this war is to deliver the free peoples of the world from the menace and the actual power of a vast military establishment, controlled by an irresponsible Government, which, having secretly planned to dominate the world, proceeded to carry the plan out without regard either to the sacred obligations of treaty or the long-established practices and long-cherished principles of international action and honor; which chose its own time for the war; delivered its blow fiercely and suddenly; stopped at no barrier, either of law or of mercy; swept a whole continent within the tide of blood—not the blood of soldiers only, but the blood of innocent women and children also and of the helpless poor; and now stands balked, but not defeated, the enemy of four-fifths of the world.

The President states explicitly that the power which has resorted to such measures is not the German people but "the ruthless master of the German people," that is, the Imperial German Government. On the word of such a Government, he declares, no reliance can be placed.

We cannot take the word of the present rulers of Germany as a guarantee of anything that is to endure unless explicitly supported by such conclusive evidence of the will and purpose of the German people themselves as the other peoples of the world would be justified in accepting. Without such guarantees treaties of settlement, agreements for disarmament, covenants to set up arbitration in the place of force, territorial adjustments, reconstitutions of small nations, if made with the German Government, no man, no nation, could now depend on.

The only basis on which peace can be concluded, according to the President, is the mutual trust of all the peoples involved; no stable agreement can be arrived at between a group of free peoples on one side and on the other "an ambitious and intriguing Government." And yet this, the President says, is the agreement suggested by the Pope. His Holiness's plan contemplates the present German autocracy as one of the parties to the agreement, but such a step invites many disasters.

To deal with such a power by way of peace upon the plan proposed by his Holiness the Pope would, so far as we can see, involve a recuperation of its strength and a renewal of its policy; would make it necessary to create a permanent hostile combination of nations against the German people, who are its instruments; and would result in abandoning the new-born Russia to the intrigue, the manifold subtle interference, and the certain counter-revolution which would be attempted by all the malign influences to which the German Government has of late accustomed the world.

The President declares that peace should rest on the rights of peoples, not on the rights of Governments. He disavows any sympathy with a peace based on political or economic restrictions meant to benefit some nations or embarrass others, upon vindictive action of any sort, or any kind of revenge or deliberate injury. And although he insists that the citizens of the United States have "suffered intolerable wrongs at the hands of the German Government" they have no desire to make the German people suffer in turn, because that people, as a people, did not choose the war. Neither does he believe that those wrongs should be repaired at the expense of the sovereignty of any people. Punitive damages, the dismemberment of empires, the establishment of selfish and exclusive economic leagues, he deems inexpedient, and in the end worse than futile, having no basis for a peace of any kind, least of all for an enduring peace. That must be based upon justice and fairness and the common rights of mankind.

The note ends with the expressed desire that God may grant that before long the great peoples of the Central Powers may give new evidence of their purposes, and in a way to restore the confidence of all peoples everywhere in the faith of nations and the possibility of a covenanted peace.

On August 30 the President fixed the price of the 1917 wheat crop of No. 1 grade at $2.20 a bushel, with inferior grades correspondingly lower. The Chicago market was taken as the basis, with the price varying in different cities; it is five cents less than the basic price in Omaha and ten cents more than the basic price in New York. The action of the President was taken at the unanimous recommendation of the Wheat Price Committee, of which Mr. H. L. Garfield is chairman, and was based on an estimate of the cost production for the whole country, plus a reasonable profit. The committee reached its decision after considering the statistics furnished by the United States Department of Agriculture with regard to the wheat crop for 1917, and checking these statistics by personal investigation and the reports submitted by producers and their representatives.

The Price of Wheat

The purpose of the President's action is to husband the wheat supply, which though less than normal is together with the supply of other countries, not counting Russia, quite sufficient in the opinion of the committee to meet the needs of the world, to standardize wheat transactions, to eliminate speculation, and to stabilize the cost of flour and bread. The prices so fixed will continue until July 1, 1918, when the minimum price of $2 a bushel for wheat, recently fixed by Congress for the 1918 wheat crop, will go into effect. The Food Administration, which has been given large powers by the recent food laws, assumed control of the wheat situation on September 1.

Exercising the power recently conferred on him by Congress, the President issued a proclamation, on August 27, which places under the control of the Export Council, whose chairman is Mr. Vance McCormick, practically all the articles of commerce grown or manufactured in the United States. None of the articles contained in the two lists included in the document may be shipped from the United States without a license. In the words of a supplementary statement, made by the President,

The Embargo Proclamation

The two lists have been prepared in the interests of facility and expediency. The first list, applicable to the enemy and his allies, and to the neutral countries of Europe, brings under control practically all articles of commerce, while the second list, applicable to all the other countries of the world, makes only a few additions to the list of commodities controlled by the proclamation of July 9, 1917. It is obvious that a closer supervision and control of exports is necessary with respect to those European neutrals within the sphere of hostilities than is required for those countries further removed. The establishment of these distinctions will simplify the administrative processes and enable us to continue our policy of minimizing the interruption of trade.

The purpose of the measure is to safeguard domestic needs and to meet the necessities of the nations at war with Germany. After these ends have been attained, it is the President's intention to minister "to the needs of neutral nations as far as our resources permit." Shipping of supplies, however, to neutral nations is to be controlled in such a way as to prevent any benefit accruing to the enemy either directly or indirectly. The proclamation went into effect on August 30.

The Japanese Mission visited the Senate on August 30 and was welcomed by Senator Saulsbury, who presided in the absence of Vice-President Marshall. Viscount Ishii in his response spoke of the moral victory implied in the entrance of America into the war, denounced in scathing language the acts of the German Government, paid a most graceful compliment to the democratic ideals of the United States, called attention to the similarity between the spirit of the two countries, which he summarized as being in both cases "a passion for liberty and loyalty to their flag," and declared that Japan had been moved by the same purposes in entering the war as ourselves. Referring to the friendship between Japan and the United States, he said:

The Japanese War Mission

I have an earnest and abiding faith that this association of ours, this proving of ourselves in the highest, most sacred and most trying of human activities, the armed vindication of right and justice must bring us to a still closer concord and a deeper confidence one in the other, sealing for all time the bonds of cordial friendship between our two nations.

His words to the Senate, although they had a more strictly official character, were no more inspiring than the tribute he paid to the memory of Washington a few days before when on laying a wreath on his tomb, he said:

Washington belongs to all mankind. Men come here from the ends of the earth to honor his memory and to reiterate their faith in the principles to which his great life was devoted. Japan claims entrance to this holy circle. She yields to none in reverence and respect.

Passing from Washington to the relations between Japan and the United States, he continued:

It is a fitting place, at this time, when all the world is filled with turmoil and suffering, for comrades in a holy cause to gather and here renew their fealty to a righteous purpose, firm in the determination that the struggle must go on until the world is free from menace and aggression. Japan is proud to place herself beside her noble allies in this high resolve, and here, in the presence of these deathless ashes, she reaffirms her devotion to the cause and the principles for which they wage battle, fully determined to do her whole part in securing for the world the blessings of liberty, justice, and lasting peace.

Of all the tributes paid to Washington and the American people by the War Missions which have visited the United States none is more eloquent or inspiring than that conveyed in these gracious words of the Japanese Viscount.

It transpired on August 27 that the Polish Provisional Council of State, which was summoned to meet at Warsaw by the German Government on December 8, 1916, for the purpose of suggesting and drafting laws for the contemplated Polish kingdom, and which began its deliberations on January 5, 1917, recently retired, either by resignation, or, as stated in the Täg-liche Runds-chau, by dissolution. The occasion of the retirement was a protest made by the Council against the assignment to the Austrian eastern front of the recently organized Polish army, which according to assurances alleged to have been given the Council was to be used for purposes solely of national home defense. The use of the Polish army was required, according to German statements, by military necessities, arising out of the vigorous Italian campaign on the Isonzo. The incident has given rise to a recrudescence of agitation on the part of the Pan-German newspapers for the abandonment of the whole scheme of creating a Polish kingdom.

Retirement of Polish Council

France.—M. Jean Guiraud, of the militant Catholic daily, La Croix, has been one of the stanchest defenders of the rights of the Catholic war orphans, so outrageously violated by the law which practically deprives them of the chances of a Catholic education. Writing to the valiant editor to congratulate him on his noble work, the Bishop of Amiens seizes the opportunity once more to state the principles at stake and to protest against the iniquitous legislation which has been passed. According to the Bishop, every child that has been baptized has the right to receive an education in harmony with the solemn obligations assumed by the parents when they carried him to the baptismal font. Whether we look at the question from the point of view of mere human justice or that of theology and of faith, one conclusion alone, adds the Bishop, can be admitted: the will of the dead imposes an imperative duty on the conscience of every Frenchman and Christian. "The statement," he writes, "of M. Bérard, who brought in the War Orphans Bill, that the baptism received by the wards of the State, now constituted the guardian of these children, does not oblige the State to give them a Catholic education, is an insult to reason and to faith." Continuing, the Bishop writes:

Bishop and Editor

Were France to ignore the free decision by which the heroes of the war who have died for their country have entered the names of their children in the roster of Christian society, it would in doing so betray their trust, because these men have laid down their lives for the freedom of their country, under the firm conviction that they would survive themselves in their offspring, which they hoped would inherit the Catholic traditions of their sires. It matters little whether these men fervently practised their religion or not; they were at least anxious to preserve the spiritual heritage of their race. A sense of natural justice should force us to respect their will which has been so clearly manifested by the baptism of their children.

Under pretext of neutrality, says the prelate, the partisans of the unjust and anti-Catholic law are simply trying to destroy the Faith of the coming generation of France's sons. In concluding he says eloquently:

The doctrine of "neutrality" is a false religion, upheld by a sect as passionately hostile to truth as the heretics of past ages in the history of the Church. The partisans of this so-called religious neutrality say that they are merely "indifferent." This alone would be a great evil. In reality they hate our holy religion and oppose it with all the fury and rage of the Arians and Manicheans of the past. . . . Give to the war orphan who has been baptized a neutral education and you take him away from God and the obligations of his baptism and you insult the memory of our heroic dead.

This eloquent letter is only one of countless protests published by Catholic prelates, writers, senators, and journalists in their splendid campaign against one of the most iniquitous and cruel laws passed by a senseless and heartless Government. Catholics have died by the hundreds of thousands for France; its rulers reward them by robbing their children of the gift of Faith.

Ireland.—The movement for the revival of the national language, music, games and customs is gaining momentum everywhere throughout the country. A signal proof of this awakened interest was afforded at the recent Ard-Fheis, or annual Council of the Gaelic League, which held its deliberations at the Waterford Oireachtas. The deliberations were conducted by Professor Eoin MacNeill, who expressed his satisfaction that the cause of Ireland and the Irish language had made such a steady advance during the past year. According to his statement, the Gaelic League was in a strong position financially; but what was more important than material progress, the national spirit of the people was stronger than it ever was.

The Language Movement

The spirit which animated the members of the League may be understood from the following resolutions which were unanimously adopted: That in the Irish speaking districts every subject should be taught in Irish, and that in other places, Irish should, as far as possible, be used as a means of instruction; that Irish should be taught in every primary school in Ireland; that Irish should be essential in all training colleges under the National Board; that no Inspectors should be henceforth appointed who do not know Irish, nor should a non-Irish-speaking Inspector be sent to schools in the Gaeltacht; that a campaign should be started in the press to secure the reform of Irish education; that all persons seeking election to any public body should be required to pledge themselves to support these demands.

On the occasion of the Waterford meeting, several plays in Irish were staged before a numerous and enthusiastic audience, among them one by Fionan OLoinsigh, one of the prisoners recently released from Lewes; another adapted from Dr. Douglas Hyde's "An Cleamhnas" and Father Kelly's tragedy "An Foghmhar." Commenting on these events the Dublin Leader says: "One sound and certain objective of the national movement should be the Irish language," and quotes with the heartiest approval the words spoken about the time of the Waterford Oireachtas, by Mr. de Valera, at Tullamore, "The Irish Language Movement is the bedrock of Irish nationality."

Russia.—The chief speaker at the session of the National Conference held in the Moscow Opera House, August 27, was Gen. Korniloff, commander-in-chief of the Russian armies. After describing the general disorganization of the troops, giving as an instance of it the fact that soldiers had killed four regimental commanders and other officers, the speaker said: "If Russia wishes to be saved the army must be regenerated at any cost," and then suggested that besides the restoration of the death penalty that discipline be brought back to the army by strengthening officers' authority, by improving officers' financial positions and by restricting the functions of the regimental committees. Gen. Korniloff ended by expressing his confidence that if the army's ancient glory is restored Russia will be saved. He was received with great enthusiasm by the people of Moscow and his speech was applauded by all the members of the Council except the extreme Left. Gen. Kaledines, leader of the Don Cossacks, then made a speech seconding Gen. Korniloff's proposals.

The National Council

At the third session of the National Council on August 29 the railway representatives reported that there is a complete disorganization of the transportation system and that, unless effective measures are taken, the railway service will cease altogether by November. The representatives warned the Council that in such contingency dreadful consequences would follow, both at home and at the front, adding that the army might turn on the civilians. The excessive demands of railway workers had much to do with the collapse of the system, it was reported. Spokesmen for the Jews and other races then pledged their loyalty to the Provisional Government. Gen. Alexeieff, former commander-in-chief, made a long address in which he contrasted the fighting spirit of the old army with the Russian troops of today "poisoned and enfeebled by ill-interpreted and ill-applied doctrines" which have split the army into two irreconcilable camps, one consisting of soldiers and the other of officers. He reported that the soldiers' committees and Government commissaries had been fatal to discipline. When the declaration of the rights of soldiers was published by the Government all respect for officers disappeared and they were sacrificed by their men. On one occasion, for instance, an advancing force was made up of twenty-eight officers, twenty non-commissioned officers and two soldiers, the rest coolly looking on while their leaders were slain.

It is generally admitted that so far as unifying Russia's discordant elements, and stopping the military, social and economic disintegration of the country are concerned, the Extraordinary National Council was practically a failure. Premier Kerensky in closing the Council on August 29 said:

> The Provisional Government will stand on guard over the revolution. It will suffer no counter-revolutionary attempts, whatever be their source, for the Provisional Government is the incarnated will of the whole Russian people. It does not regret having convoked the conference at Moscow, which, although it has not yielded practical results, has allowed all Russian citizens to say frankly what they think necessary for the State. Whoever endeavors to wrest their conquests from the people will never succeed, for they have now become public property.

The powerful Radical Socialists refuse to give up their councils, committees, etc., which have done so much to ruin military discipline.

The Passing of a Theory

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, PH.D.

THE man in the street is a philosopher, although if you should venture to tell him so he will grow indignant and probably wish to fight you. To the street philosopher simplicity is a fetish. What is simple he understands, what he understands he holds as doctrine. Thus he readily understands Darwin's theory of evolution by natural selection and probably considers it one of the cardinal doctrines of biology. Other theories of the process of evolution are not so simple and he prefers to disregard them.

Darwinism as a theory had a long popularity and it still remains the one "popular" theory of evolution. But the popularity of a theory is no gage of its scientific correctness, for scientifically a theory may have lost caste for years and yet its popularity may continue undiminished. Darwinism is an instance in point. It seems almost hopeless to convince the popular mind that Darwinism and evolution are not identical. The scientific concept of Darwinism is the process of evolution by natural selection. The popular concept is indefinite and includes everything from evolution to natural selection and the supposed descent of man from the apes. To no little extent the popular confusion is due to certain dishonest popularizers who have carefully fostered the erroneous conception.

Hardly a decade ago the panegyrists of the Darwin centennial presented the early nineteenth century as an age of monumental ignorance and superstition. And Darwin brought light! Notwithstanding the claims of the panegyrists Darwin had only slight difficulty in gaining adherents and for his hypothesis. His theory had an immediate and astonishing success. In Darwin's favor were his vast knowledge of biological minutiæ, of geographical distribution, of anatomy, of the facts of breeding, all excellently marshaled, and above all, the delightful simplicity of the theory. Darwin himself was extraordinarily careful and moderate in his statements, and his argument nowhere assumes the trenchant dogmatism of so many of his followers.

It would be silly to minimize the influence the theory exerted fifty years ago and exerts to this day. As a historical speculation Darwinism excites our astonishment, not because of its biological value, but because of the startling absurdities to which the enthusiasts were led when they attempted to carry out its logic. In their eagerness they sought to make Darwinism into a philosophical system, to supplant the prevailing Mosaic ethical system with a system of "natural" ethics based on applied biology; they sought to make Darwinism into a religion, to change educational methods accordingly; in fact, to shape our lives on its principles. In his reserved fashion "Father Darwin" no doubt shook his head wonderingly over the antics of his followers, and since he was a serious man he probably worried over the imputation that he had discovered progress, as practically claimed by some of his disciples.

From a sociological standpoint the philosophy of Darwinism still finds its exponents in our present-day Socialists. To them history is a gladiatorial struggle for existence and a survival of the fittest. In their aim to achieve a higher ethical ideal than mere struggle of individuals, they adopt the State as the unit, with a concomitant suppression of individualism, without considering, as Dr. Clarke, the geologist, states "That this ideal is actively exemplified in the ant colony with its deadly communism, its moribund partition of labor, its lethal Socialism. Functional development of structures is the ideal, nothing is left for the spirit or intellect." In pedagogy the so-called biogenetic law, in which the individual in his embryonic stages is supposed to repeat the history of the race, still has its devotees. Thus the history of civilization is supposed to be repeated in the psychological development of the growing child, from its primeval materialism to the later manifestations of ethical principles. The earliest behavior of the child is supposed to repeat that of its ancestors. Yet laughter is one of the first manifestations of a child, and there is no logical evidence to show that animals laugh. Monkeys have articulate sounds, yet despite all their chatter they do not laugh.

But the most fervent exponents, like Haeckel, sought to make Darwinism into a "natural religion" and demanded its adoption by the State. "Aut Darwin, aut Moses" became their slogan. They sought to overthrow all forms of religious belief and to replace it with a sort of natural religion as developed from "applied natural history." Yet Huxley himself, the brilliant exponent and critic of Darwinism, pointed out in an essay on "Evolution and Ethics" that "Duty and ethics are in opposition to animal instincts and that ethics cannot consist of natural history applied." Nor could the principle "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" be father to "Love your enemy." Aside from its superficiality Darwinism experienced the fate of many theories, that is, it suffered most from its most ardent admirers. As a system of philosophy it soon led to absurdities which foreshadowed its early decline. As Radl says:

> Darwinistic philosophy and biology, led by Spencer, practised the strange logic which knows everything beforehand, is astonished over nothing in the world, knows no mysteries. Everything is explained simply and satisfactorily on a mechanical physico-chemical basis. But these explanations were imagined, not deduced from observation and experiments.

No wonder this system was popular, and still continues to be so. For it permitted the sciolist and hobbyist to rank with scientists in finding and formulating satisfying explanations. And the man in the street, mouthing his cant phrases of "struggle" and "survival," felt a spiritual kinship with the more aristocratic trio and demanded for his speculations and peculations the same serious attention which were accorded to his mental superiors. It was indeed a garrulous paradise and it still remains so in popular natural history, as witness the writings of London, Wells, and others less known, in magazines and Sunday supplements. Miracles are taboo, yet to avoid admission of the existence of the eternal personal God, they resort to a thousand miracles to explain Him away.

The climax of Darwinism is thirty years past, and Darwinism has long ago changed its cloak to a Neo-Darwinism which no longer insists on the element of struggle, but still derives new species on the basis of a natural selection of the fittest varieties. Yet even the fundamental assumption of Neo-Darwinism seems fated, and perhaps all that will remain of the theory aside from its historical significance is that "natural selection preserves the best existing varieties, but cannot bring forth new varieties." Older biologists still pretend to adhere to the theory, or at least to a modified version of it, but the younger biologists are frankly indifferent. Removed from its historical background and viewed in the light of present knowledge of the principles of heredity and its mechanics the theory seems weak and ineffectual. They recognize its historical significance, the tremendous impulse it gave to scientific study. But they also recognize the fact that much of its inspiration was derived, as Radl states, and the Monists admit, from its supposedly anti-religious motivation; and they are repelled by the dogmatism, the positivity, and the rabid intolerance of so many of its early exponents.

The Darwinian idea of the method of evolution is based on fortuitous variations which if useful are preserved; cumulative gradations tend insensibly to increase the differences between the offspring and the parent stock, and thus are formed new species. In its essentials this theory is plainly utilitarian. Soon after its formulation it was urged that certain types of variations, instead of fluctuating and being fortuitous, were quite evidently of a "definitely directed" and quite "useless" type. Such are the brilliant color patterns of many groups of insects, insect wing venation, the elaborate complexity of the microscope skeletons of chalk-forming protozoa, of sponge spicules, of the dermal plates of sea squirts, the vertebral processes of fossil reptiles, and others, many of which seem to present the mathematical working out of very intricate relations of structures and patterns. It was also pointed out that the derivation of complex organs such as the hand and eye could not be explained by fortuitous or chance variations. These are the two older objections. The age of experiment has accomplished the proof that if we select experimentally for any character, we can develop only what is inherent in the species, but that we cannot go beyond the limitations of the species. Thus we may select for size or productivity, but beyond the potentiality for size or productivity we cannot go. But evolution means the production of new things. How then do species arise?

A vital assumption in all evolutionary argument has always been that in a gradated series each member is derived from the member nearest to it. Pariter, ergo causaliter has unconsciously been the biological axiom. The evidence obtained by Dr. Thomas Hunt Morgan on this hitherto unquestioned, yet crucial, point is significant. In his recent book, "A Critique of the Theory of Evolution," Dr. Morgan presents a very excellent summary of his experimental work in breeding certain fruit flies and its application to current theories of evolution. Regarding a gradated series he states:

> Mutations have occurred involving the pigmentation of the body and wings. The head and thorax of the wild drosophila ampelophila are grayish yellow, the abdomen is banded with yellow and black, and the wings are gray. There have appeared in our cultures several kinds of darker types, ranging to almost black flies and to lighter types that are quite yellow. If put in a line a series may be made from the darkest flies at one end to the light yellow flies at the other. These types, with the fluctuations that occur within each type, furnish a complete series of gradations; yet historically they have arisen independently of each other.

Dr. Morgan finds a similar gradation in eye-color and other characters; yet each member of the gradated series originated from an independent culture. Our favorite symbol, therefore, the "tree of evolution," should be changed into a bush; instead of branches, we have tufts.

The pertinence of this discovery cannot be undervalued. "Suppose that evolution 'in the open' had taken place in the same way, by means of discontinuous variation, what value then would the evidence from comparative anatomy have in so far as it is based on a continuous series of variations of any organ?"

One of the stumbling blocks in every theory of evolution has been the sexual differences of plants and animals in color and form, known as sexual dimorphism. Here also Dr. Morgan offers significant evidence:

> A mutant appeared in which the eye-color of the female was different from that of the male. The eye-color of the mutant female is a dark eosin color, that of the male yellowish eosin. From the beginning this difference was as marked as it is today. . . . Here at a single step a type appeared that was sexually dimorphic.

There was no act of "sexual selection" as suggested by Darwin to account for the sexual dimorphism. "The single mutation that brought about the change also brought in the dimorphism with it."

"Evolution from this point of view has consisted largely in introducing new factors that influence characters already present in the animal or plant." Organisms "jump" rather than "slide" into new varieties and species. Characters do not struggle into existence; they appear peacefully as the result of some factor present or introduced. Such a view of evolution is less sanguine than the Darwinian idea of natural selection. In that it deals with factors which cause mutations and the mechanics of these mutations and their causative factors, this view is somewhat complex for the street philosopher. It will hardly receive his approval, for it furthermore deprives him of the keen pleasure afforded him by the exercise of his imagination in the lurid and titillative accounts of gladiatorial struggle and survival of organisms.

Anglicanism at the War Front

E. L. MILLARD

ONE of the many good points of the British army is the recognition of the fact that a man's religion is a matter of real importance. When the soldier enlists one of the questions asked him is, "What is your religion?" This is followed by an entry on the paper on which is registered his record in the service. The church parade on Sunday is a military duty, chaplains are provided not only in the garrisons in peace time, but also in generous numbers when the troops go to war. Since the Crimean War Catholic chaplains have been regularly attached to the forces in the field. In earlier days the only provision made consisted of Anglican chaplains for most regiments and Presbyterian chaplains for Scotch regiments. Until very lately it was assumed officially that a soldier must be Anglican, Presbyterian or Catholic. But in the present war chaplains of various other denominations have been appointed. One may say, however, that in the days before the war most soldiers were classed under what I have described as the three officially recognized denominations. I have never heard of a case of a soldier being classed as having no religion. But in one respect the religious statistics of the army have always been misleading. The great majority of the men were classed as belonging to the Church of England. This was the result of the way in which the entries were made when the men were recruited. An immense number of recruits had no definite view, and if they did not state that they were either Catholics or Presbyterians, they were almost invariably entered as Church of England. Catholic recruits, even if they were men who were negligent in the practice of their religion, were usually keen about being entered as Catholics. But the Church of England figures in army statistics included a large number of soldiers who had never thought about religion until they joined the army.

The raising of the new armies first by voluntary enlistment and later by conscription has swept millions into the ranks during the war. There have been some very interesting discussions in the press and the reviews as to the religion of the soldier. These are all the more interesting because under present conditions they throw so much light upon the religion of the English people in general, for the army now includes the manhood of the country from the age of eighteen to forty-one, which can be set free from civil occupations. Much of the evidence is supplied by the letters and reports of Church of England clergymen, who are acting as chaplains, and the net result of them is to show that for immense numbers of the English people religion is something of a very vague and rudimentary character. Disappointing as this is, there is no reason to be surprised at it. The statistics of church attendance in London and the other great centers before the war showed that vast numbers of the people never went to a church of any kind, except perhaps on the occasion of a wedding or a funeral, and in the English primary schools, with the exception of those of the Catholic Church, the Church of England and a small number belonging to the Wesleyan body, there has for more than forty years been no definite religious instruction. It is no wonder then that one finds Anglican chaplains expressing their deep disappointment at finding that tens of thousands of men, nominally belonging to the Church of England, are utterly without instruction and have never been brought into contact with any religious practice beyond taking their place in the ranks at the weekly church parade.

In a thoughtful statement which lately appeared in the Church Times, one of the Anglican chaplains gives an account of the religion of the soldier, which may be thus summarized, in his own words:

> The great bulk of the men appear more or less indifferent to the claims of religion. There is a certain shyness in speaking about it. But below the surface there is a real spiritual movement going on, though it would be a gross over-statement to say that any great revival of religion is in progress.
>
> Nothing is to be gained by withholding facts, just because they become unpleasant reading for the keen Christian; and it must be admitted at once that organized religion makes little appeal to many of the men, and that there is no universal desire to worship God and hold communion and intercourse with Him through the recognized channels, which only shows how sadly the Christian Church has failed in the past.

On the other hand the chaplain notes that there is a marked revival of faith in God's existence, goodness and power. One does not come across atheism, but on the other hand, "This revival of faith in God does not manifest itself in any great renewal of the desire to worship Him." There is some revival of faith in prayer, as the result of men finding themselves under the stress of danger and suffering. There is a revival also of "faith in human immortality," but with this very vague ideas as to what the future life is. Thus, "The connection between the forgiveness of sin and the state of the departed is not universally recognized." There is a very general idea that death in action justifies a man in the sight of God. At the same time there is a more friendly attitude towards organized religion.

This is a fair summary of the chaplain's evidence, and the net result is to show that even such revival as he notes is the acceptance of a kind of natural religion without any really marked Christian character. The plain fact is that vast numbers of the men now in the army have never received any kind of instruction in religion. An Anglican chaplain tells how after he had been giving some soldiers an instruction, one of them said: "You're telling us the things we ought to have learned when we were children." Another chaplain sums up the situation by saying that the majority of the men have no idea of the supernatural, and only an elementary code of ethics. Last autumn the Archbishop of York, summing up the impression he had derived from the chaplains' reports, wrote that:

> One cannot suppose that the multitudes of men at the front have gone through religious awakening. The chaplains' reports show appalling ignorance of the Church's Sacraments and faith on the part of great numbers of men, who describe themselves as members of the Church of England.

One of the chaplains writes:

> It is hopeless to find a Christian theory of life or any theory in the ordinary soldier. Many a time our scantily attended services stir one to indignant speech against the irreverence, spiritual indifference and carelessness out here.

There has been much discussion as to the way in which the soldier should be approached. The High Church chaplains, holding a belief largely based on Catholic teaching, insist on some doctrine of the efficacy of the Sacraments as a necessity. But the Chaplain-General has not appointed many of them. Low churchmen and Broad churchmen abound among the chaplains, and one hears from some of them statements that dogmatic teaching is not necessary, and does not influence the men. The simple fact, however, is that most of the soldiers have not the elementary ideas or the preliminary training that makes the chaplain's appeal to them effective. One of the Anglican chaplains, the Rev. B. H. Berlyn, served first in a large garrison at home, and then at the front. He has given an interesting account of his experiences. Of the 18,000 Church of England men in the garrison he found that only about sixty took any interest in religious matters. At the front, in dealing with the sick and wounded he found them mostly utterly uninstructed, and he was startled at the contrast between his own men and the Catholics. He found these crowding round their priests, eager to receive the Sacraments of the Church, and as he puts it, "knowing exactly what to do, and what they expected their chaplain to do for them." He was struck, too, by seeing "the real Catholic spirit of the Church, the French, the English, Belgians and even German prisoners all receiving the same Sacraments from the same English priests." He realized the living reality of the Catholic system, and its effectiveness. He is now himself a Catholic serving as a combatant officer at the front.

From another Anglican chaplain we have the same evidence. This is his testimony:

> The almost entire ignorance of the average soldier of the elements of religion, the paucity of confirmed men, or regular communicants is simply appalling. A Roman Catholic soldier knows at once what to do. He knows the Gospel of Christ, understands about repentance, about grace. Our poor Tommy, not from any fault of his own, but from our neglect is quite unconscious of most of this as a reality.

Another tells of his difficulties from the ignorance of the men. He talks to a wounded man and finds he knows nothing. He supposes he has been baptized, and has a vague idea that there is a mysterious God somewhere, and that is about all. This unfortunate condition of affairs naturally results from the fact that a whole generation has grown up largely without any definite religious teaching. As to the talk that dogma is not the thing for the soldier there is the striking fact that definite teaching makes religion a reality for the Catholic soldier, both in the British and in the French armies, and it has an attraction for the men. It is something practical which they can understand. There is proof of it in the steady flow of converts into the Catnolic Church amongst both officers and soldiers at the front. Men of all creeds have been impressed by what they have seen of Catholicism as a living force for good in France. Thus, we find a Scotch Presbyterian, a member of the British House of Commons, Mr. Ian Malcolm, giving this account of his experiences on the French front:

> I have seen regiments and battalions bowed in worship, silent congregations at all hours, prostrate in prayer and intercession. They were not moved to such devotion by any indeterminate, undenominational, new-fangled theories of a higher life. No, they were just practising the religion taught them by their mothers, or their village priests in their childhood, a religion based upon the most definite, the most dogmatic principles of the Incarnation and the Atonement. That was what they wanted in time of trouble. No shadowy substitutes, no compromises would give them the courage they needed in the trenches. Under the shadow of the guns, or stunned with grief, they turned again like children to their mother's knee, and clasped in faith the outstretched hands of the Man of Sorrows.

These are all striking testimonies to the need of definite religious teaching, and of such teaching in early life. There is a mass of evidence to show that the Catholic system supplies this effectively. Once a man has had its training, he may go far astray and neglect the religion he has learned, but face to face with death he is eager to return to it, and the way back is a simple, straight path that is well known to him. It is a remarkable fact that among the Church of England chaplains the men who have most influence are precisely those who have adopted a large part of the Catholic system of belief and practice.

Who Are Our Soldiers?

CHARLES PHILLIPS

TODAY is the soldier's day. Today the boy in uniform occupies the center of the stage. Inland, or on the coasts, where there are great military camps, training stations, forts, or in little towns far removed in times of peace from the thought of soldiering or the sight of khaki, from one end of the country to the other, the army man is in evidence. In villages, the boys are home on leave, in cities they throng the street cars, the theaters; they are drilling on college greens and marching on parade. We see them everywhere: they are in our eye and in our thoughts. Prayers follow them—how war does bring a people to its knees! —fond looks attend them, thoughts of the day, soon to be at hand, when the real good-by must be said, and they will go away across the sea to the trenches, perhaps never to return.

Who is he and what is he, after all, this soldier boy who has become the cynosure of all America's eyes? Is he just an impersonal figure to be admired, a machine, a thing in olive drab that comes and goes on order; and, off order, rollicks—till we begin to regard him merely as a strange sort of creature, removed from the every-day walks of life? No; far from it. He is just our boy, this soldier, this man in uniform, the same boy that we have known and loved at home, with the same virtues, the same faults, the same weaknesses and the same strength. It has taken a world war to make us realize this; but now, with 10,000,000 of our country's men enrolled on the nation's fighting lists, and 1,000,000 of them already preparing to don the khaki and march to the field, we do realize it with startling emphasis. And it is a good thing for us to be cured of the idea—a natural outcome, doubtless, of our old system of making the soldier boy a thing separate and apart from our daily life—that our fighting men are inferiors, or at best, creatures of quite another species from the average man.

"Man for man, the soldier is as good as anybody," says Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew, one of England's best known army chaplains, and the ranking Catholic chaplain of the British armies. If we took 1,000 soldiers and 1,000 civilians, this experienced priest declares, we would not find among the soldiers the slightest degree more of sinfulness, unfaithfulness to God, brutality, coarseness or meanness than we would find among the same number of civilians. Speaking of the "boys" with whom he has come in contact in Flanders during the present war, the Monsignor says: "There was no drunkenness, but a most perfect sobriety among them; and it was not only that the men were brave to a degree, bearing their terrible wounds and hurts with most heroic patience and silence," that, after all, is the fashion of their profession, "but their cleanliness, their decency, their irreproachable behavior in the midst of what was supposed to be the license of war" passed his poor words to express. He had heard that in war one would see the soldier not at his best; but he had learned otherwise. "During the war he had found his respect for the soldier immensely deepened."

After all, these soldiers are only our own home boys wearing the uniform of the country's defenders. Who are they but our own brothers, our own sons, warm, human-hearted fellows, "who have only one life to be given and who give it freely for others?" "A soldier comes more nearly than a King to the pattern of Christ," says Cardinal Newman. "He is not only strong, but he is weak. He does and he suffers. He succeeds through a risk. Half his time is on the field of battle, and half of it on a bed of pain. And he does this for the sake of others. He defends us by it. We are indebted to him. We gain by his loss."

Of course, we admire the soldier boy. Perhaps, even, some sense of what Newman says comes vaguely to us as we watch the man in uniform on parade, or read of his exploits on the field. But, nevertheless, there is no profession so little understood by the masses, so unjustly criticised and even reviled by the people, as the soldier's. The soldier is a marked man; and when one soldier falls, the whole rank and file of his fellows suffer. True, this is a good thing in a way for the soldier, a fact that acts as a deterrent on him, a check against carelessness. But it is hardly just on our part; and if there is one thing that this war will bring home very close and personally to us, to 1,000,000 of us at least, it is this fact—that the soldier boy is our boy, just as we sent him out of our homes to take his place in the ranks. He does not change much, on the contrary "the coercion of the service is a powerful influence for good," says Major Paul Malone. "Perpetual drilling develops subconscious obedience; thus the soldier develops the faculty of loyally following his military leaders, and of courageously leading his subordinates; and if he returns to his community with this faculty fully developed, his influence will be a positive factor for good."

As for the Catholic soldier in the field, perhaps there is nothing in Shakespeare more Catholic or better fitted for Catholic soldiers, sailors and chaplains than the golden words of counsel given by Henry V, as he paced in disguise the English lines at Agincourt:

> There is no King, be his cause never so spotless, if it come to the arbitrament of swords, can try it out with all unspotted soldiers. Some, peradventure, have on them the guilt of premeditated and contrived murder; some of beguiling virgins, with the broken seals of perjury; some making the wars their bulwark that have before gored the gentle bosom of peace with pillage and robbery. . . . Every subject's duty is the King's, but every subject's soul is his own. Therefore should every soldier in the wars do as every sick man in his bed, wash every mote out of his conscience; and dying so, death is to him an advantage; or not dying, the time was blessedly lost wherein such preparation was gained.

Fair words and true for the soldier boy, the son of our home, the pride of our nation.

Our Unassimilated Immigrants

J. B. CULEMAN

DR. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS does not believe in the magical efficacy of the melting pot, he looks upon it as the great American delusion. Filled with sinister forebodings anent the future of the Republic, he recently gave vent to them in the following terms surcharged with tragic import: "Dark moments come when one surveys the multitudes [of undesirable immigrants], and their ignorance, squalor, filth, superstition, drunkenness; their contempt for the schoolhouse and the book, the social settlement and the church." If that sweeping indictment be true, Dr. Hillis is justly reechoing Tacitus' pitiful Deum ira in rem Romanam, for the commonwealth which our fathers founded and watched over with the jealous care of Roman consuls is doomed to disintegrate and decay. The prospect is the less gratifying now that we have taken part in the war for the express purpose of extending to the world at large the blessings of democracy we have so long enjoyed.

Our policy of throwing open the gates to all immigrants who wish to share the good things of the land has enabled us to grow from a mere handful to a mighty 100,000,000. But our growth, Dr. Hillis holds, has been akin to that of a fungus or a tumor, and the problem that confronts us now calls for the scalpel and the knife.

According to him there are three reasons why this problem is so acute. "First of all, the mere bulk of the foreign-born population is disturbing. Statisticians tell us that we have more than 50,000,000 of our people who are either foreign born or the children or grandchildren of foreign-born parents. Had the old native stock at the time of the adoption of the Constitution remained, growing by natural increase alone, we would have in the country today 48,000,000 people." In answer be it said that if even the grandchildren of immigrants are to be numbered among our foreign population, it is much to be feared that the white native stock will dwindle to infinitesimal proportions. But that is neither here nor there. The point is that we might have, but have not, 48,000,000 people descended from the "old native stock." The point is further that men of influence like Dr. Hillis have never raised their voice, whether from choice or compulsion, against that perversion of the natural law which has brought about the condition he deplores. While the old native stock reverted to the morality of pagan Rome in the halcyon days of the Empire, its Christian leaders remained mostly dumb. What a splendid opportunity they lost to fulfil a patriotic duty towards the country they love so dearly, when they let slip the chance to assail the hideous vice of race suicide that is gnawing at the vitals of the nation and decimating it before their very eyes.

This leads to Dr. Hillis's second reason why the problem of our unassimilated is supposedly acute: "The birth-rate of certain immigrant races is so far above that of the native stock as to stir alarm lest sheer force of weight of numbers overwhelm and swamp our American ideals." But may it not be contended that an ethnical unit which, in the midst of the most advantageous circumstances, cannot preserve its entity and its ideals by the means nature freely puts at its disposal, amply deserves to be blotted out from among the living and should have no mourners at its bier? True American ideals will find better keepers in the more vigorous races that are supplanting the native stock no longer faithful, by its own damning admission, to its sturdy progenitors.

The third source of danger, as Dr. Hillis sees it, is "the increasing tendency towards aloofness and towards isolation and separation." The parallel he draws is as ingenious as it is insidious: "Just here the crisis that is upon England through the Irish problem holds warning. To this day Great Britain is one thing, and Ireland is another. After a century South Ireland is unassimilated. But we have half a dozen races like Ireland, some of which are not only un-American but are anti-American." That the illustration is beside the point and can be meant only as a cruel joke, anyone with less wit than Dr. Hillis has, can readily see. Ireland, conquered, oppressed, bled to death; persecuted because of its steadfast adherence to the Faith once delivered to the Saints, and ruthlessly crushed and ground down whenever it dared to strive for freedom and self-government, yes, this Ireland is "unassimilated." One fails utterly to see why, or to whom it should become assimilated or even how it could become assimilated, while it was the victim of a policy of barbarism that has few equals in history and is the best possible means to keep national consciousness alive. Poland is another case in point, and who is there today who does not admire it for not having become either Russian, German or Austrian, despite all efforts at assimilation? Is it not on this permanence of its national character that it can now justly base a claim to self-government? Men would reluctantly own themselves citizens of this land of free democracy, if it had ever been guilty of any abuse of autocratic power such as Ireland and Poland have been the victims of. No race, except the Indian, or creed did our Government ever persecute. Representatives of all nations have come here of their own free choice, and all the hue and cry of "grouchy" pessimists notwithstanding, the great majority are being assimilated fast.

"We must all confess," says Dr. Hillis, "that some immigrants hate the Republic with a deadly hatred. Their malignity is almost beyond words. Witness that meeting some months ago when a group of men assembled, put an iron pot on the platform, set fire to the kindling wood and then each man and woman marched by, dropped a little American flag into the flames, and took from the hand of the leader the red flag." Strangely enough, the speaker forgot to say that the leader in this dastardly performance was a Harvard graduate (1896), one Bouck White, a name that sounds strangely Anglo-Saxon and altogether unlike the patronymics of the immigrants from "Austria, Serbia, Bulgaria," whom Dr. Hillis would especially banish from our shore. The vast number of foreigners, even if they read newspapers and listen to sermons in their own tongue, and use their own language in their schools, are quick to accept "the essential ideas of democracy." Their language is no bar to it, since English obviously has no monopoly on these ideas and ideals.

That they should become familiar with the tongue of their adopted land, no one feels inclined to question. But the ordinary immigrant intent with all his might on providing the daily bread for himself and his usually large family, and on giving a fitting education to his children, has little time and opportunity to devote to this study. In his new surroundings and amidst new associates he readily, if unconsciously, imbibes the spirit of our democracy. When the history of this war comes to be written the part played in it by our immigrants and their devotion to the starry banner will stand out as conspicuously as they did in former days of storm and stress. Of the Catholic immigrant in particular will this prove true.

That "some immigrants" hate the Republic is too obvious to question. They hate all law and order and every form of government. They were dyed-in-the-wool Socialists before they landed here, and our large-hearted legislators never denied them the right to American hospitality. Events may soon show whether the course of the latter was right or not. Others have been made into followers of the red banner by what they saw, heard, and lived through in the factories, mines and other industrial enterprises of their adopted land. The heartless exploiter of the laboring man; the sweatshop proprietor who waxed fat on the starvation wages of women and children, represent phases of our American life well within the memory of the present generation. In consequence of strong and persistent protests, of strikes and riots even, legislatures have had to step in so frequently to better conditions, and then their enactments have so often been circumvented by greed that it is an utter perversion of the truth to denounce and condemn the immigrant and to hold up his native employer as an immaculate example of true Americanism. Socialism is fundamentally wrong. But men being what they are, without the religious restraints which the Catholic Church alone provides, Socialism will continue to win converts as long as such conditions are allowed to exist.

If Americanism stands for anything at all, it stands for equal opportunity, fair treatment for everyone, in short, for social justice. From how many Protestant pulpits, before which those "malefactors of great wealth" sit in smug self-satisfaction, has their unholy grasping been denounced? How often have the rights of their employees been set forth in unmistakable terms? The initial impetus towards reform was allowed to come not from those who should have been the leaders, but from the masses who will find a spokesman when their burden is beyond endurance. Meanwhile, the Protestant pulpits keep on fatuously prating about "American ideals and the faiths of our fathers." The descendants of the fathers have become too few and too powerless to preserve the ideals of their forbears, and are loath to hand on the heritage to a new generation which, with supercilious airs, they would brand as "our unassimilated." Unassimilated or unrelated by ties of blood to the native-born, yes. But physically and mentally and morally they are the peers of our colonial pioneers and founders. They are fully fit and willing, especially those of the Catholic communion, to take up the task that is dropping from the impotent hands of a degenerated stock. The Republic is safe in their keeping. "Their ignorance, squalor, filth, superstition and drunkenness, their contempt for the schoolhouse and the book" are but the swan song of a foolish and dying nativism. Rail at them you may. But stop them in their consecrated task of fashioning a greater, a better and a stronger America, you will endeavor in vain to do. By reforming your own morals you may still share that honor with them who do not shirk the burden of life and manhood and nation-building.

The Sisters in the Civil War

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J.

FROM the imperfect records obtainable, dealing with the activities of the different Sisterhoods during the sixties, it would seem that besides the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of St. Joseph, of the Holy Cross, and of Charity did relief work for the wounded, on battlefield and in hospitals. Archbishop Hughes, writing to Archbishop Kenrick in May, 1861, said:

> The Superior of the Jesuits here called upon me to state that their Society would be prepared to furnish for the spiritual necessities of the army, North and South, as many as ten chaplains speaking all the civilized languages of Europe and America. . . . For myself I have sent one chaplain with the Sixty-ninth Regiment. . . . There is another question; about nurses for the sick and wounded. Our Sisters of Mercy have volunteered after the example of their sisters toiling in the Crimean war. . . . I am now informed that the Sisters of Charity in the diocese would be willing to volunteer a force of from fifty to one hundred nurses. . . . It would seem to me natural and proper that the Sisters of Charity in Emmitsburg should occupy the very honorable post of nursing the sick and wounded.

The fact is that the Emmitsburg Sisters very soon occupied the post of honor mentioned by the Archbishop of New York, for we find them in Richmond in the early part of June, 1861, answering the call of Dr. Gibson who was in charge of the Military Hospital in the Confederate capital. This hospital afterwards became known as St. Anne's Military Hospital, and received the first wounded of the early battles or skirmishes, notably the wounded from Phillippi, Big Bethel, Romney, Rich Mountain, Carrick's Ford and Manassas. The last engagement is known as the first battle of Bull Run, and took place on July 21, 1861. The Emmitsburg community besides serving in St. Anne's, gave over their infirmary in Richmond for the use of wounded soldiers. Other hospitals in and around Richmond were made ready and as soon as they were opened the surgeons applied for Sisters to take charge of them. As schools and academies had been closed for some time, hospital work was the general occupation. In the summer of 1861 the community at Emmitsburg was depleted. Its few remaining members received a message from Harper's Ferry, asking them to come through the Union lines and attend the sick and wounded. Above the town of Harper's Ferry is Bolivar Heights. There the military hospital was located where the Sisters were to labor. Troops from the far South had come to concentrate about the place and there were many sick in Bolivar. The morning after their arrival the medical director escorted the Sisters around the hospital, and said to the patients: "Now you will have no cause to complain of not getting nourishment, medicine and attention at the right time, for the Sisters of Charity will see to all these things."

The town by turns had been held by Union and Confederate troops and as a consequence had been stripped of everything that might serve for relieving the sufferings of the sick. While the Sisters were casting about for means of meeting a critical situation, an order came from Winchester that all Confederate troops in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry should repair to the town. No time was lost, as the Confederates feared they would be cut off from their base of supplies. The Sisters awaited word from Winchester. It came in a request from the ladies of Winchester to the medical authorities asking that they might be allowed to serve in Winchester in place of the Sisters of Charity. The Sisters made a characteristic reply to the authorities: "In case you feel any difficulty respecting the ladies of Winchester, the Sisters consider it reasonable that they should wish to serve their own people, and will not feel offended but rather grateful for your friendly candor." The medical authorities informed them that no attention would be paid to the Winchester objection. "The ladies of Winchester could never do for the sick what the Sisters of Charity would do, and therefore unless the Sisters insisted on returning home, the doctors would hold them to their undertaking." To Winchester accordingly they went. In one of the largest hospitals in the town they began their labors, and continued them till the Confederates gradually removed all their sick to Richmond. Among the last to leave the fallen capital of the Confederacy were the Sisters of Charity.

At the Federal hospitals, too, in Washington and St. Louis, the sick and wounded received the ministrations of the Sisters of Charity. Nor were they absent from the battlefields. It was in April, 1862, that Shiloh was fought. The story of relief work there was told very well by Sister Anthony O'Connell, who had gone to the front from Cincinnati with a band of Sisters of Charity:

> At Shiloh we ministered to the men on board the floating hospitals. Often we had to move up-stream to get the wounded away from the terrific stench coming from the dead on the field. This was bad enough, but what we endured on the field of battle while gathering up the wounded is simply beyond description. . . . The soldiers were remarkably kind to one another. They went around the battlefield giving what assistance they could, placing the wounded in comfortable positions until such time as the nurses could reach them. I remember one poor soldier whose nose had been shot off, who had almost bled to death, and would have been missed had we not discovered him in a pen, where some kind comrade had placed him before he left the field, every other place of refuge being occupied. . . . Day often dawned on us, only to renew the work of the preceding day without a moment's rest.

It is in a soldier's diary that we find this tribute to Sister Anthony:

> Amid the sea of blood she performed the most revolting duties for the poor soldiers. She seemed like a ministering angel and many a young soldier owes his life to her care and charity. Happy was the soldier who wounded and bleeding had her near him to whisper words of consolation and courage. She was reverenced by Blue and Gray, Protestant and Catholic alike, and we conferred on her the title of the "Florence Nightingale of America." Her name became a household word in every section of the North and South.

The Confederates retreated from Shiloh to Corinth, followed by the Union army, and with the army went the Sisters to continue their work among the wounded and the sick.

In the summer of this year, 1862, the Surgeon-General at Washington asked for one hundred Sisters to be sent to a station called White House, in Virginia, then held by Northern troops. So many Sisters were with the armies that there was no possibility of finding more than sixty to answer the Government request. These were at White House only a few days when the Confederates appeared within two miles of the station. The wounded and dying were hurriedly placed on transports, and with them went their nurses. One of the Sisters died from her labors on this journey. The remainder of the band returned to Baltimore, where they received orders to proceed to Point Lookout, a peninsula at the end of southern Maryland, sprayed by the waters of the Chesapeake and the Potomac. Soon one of their number succumbed to typhoid. At early dawn they buried her body, with soldiers as her pallbearers. Her grave is there among the many graves of the unknown dead near the shore where the Potomac flows out towards the sea. Beside the Government light-house there is little to be seen today at Point Lookout. But in the summer of 1862 it was crowded with the sick and the wounded. Cottages, tents and wooden shacks dotted the narrow strip of land, containing soldiers suffering from every form of disease and wounds. Removals by death and the arrival of more wounded men often caused the wards to be emptied and refilled again the same day. As soon as a boat came in sight a bugle would blow, a signal to the Sisters to make room in the wards for a new batch of sufferers, many of them Confederate prisoners.

Just about this time an order came from Washington to the medical authorities at Lookout, directing them to remove all women nurses from the Point. The Sisters prepared to leave, although they realized that their work was only well started. During their preparations for departure the chief medical officer telegraphed to the capital for instructions. He received the following reply: "The Sisters of Charity are not included in our orders. They may serve all alike at the Point, prisoners and others, but all other ladies are to leave the place." So the Sisters stayed on as the official nurses of this hospital until the end of the war. A year before they withdrew at the call of peace, Point Lookout was visited by a fearful tornado that carried destruction in its path from the river to the bay. Cottages and shacks were overturned, doors and windows smashed or carried off by the violence of the wind, and the sick and wounded were exposed to a merciless pelting rain. The official nurses measured up to the situation, going about among the sufferers, quieting and consoling them. Years afterwards an old Confederate veteran used to love to rehearse the story of the storm to any chance visitor who came to the Confederate Home at Pikesville, Maryland. The humor of the situation had not escaped him. It was no unusual sight, he claimed, to see the Sisters standing by a stove, with saucepans of broth for the sick, no other roof over their heads but an umbrella held by a hungry soldier. The stoves alone remained in their original positions. The tornado had completely changed the location of the Point Lookout Hospital. The Sisters remained at the Point until the late summer of 1865, when the last of the wounded left for their homes.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

What Ireland Wants.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Since Cæsar had his Brutus and Charles I his Cromwell, it would be rather surprising, if Ireland did not have her share of like folk. It was this thought which the letter of Mr. J. P. Keating, in your edition of August 25, inspired. With it was mingled a keen sense of regret that the gentleman has neglected to acquaint himself with the present-day history of the Emerald Isle. Surely, he could not have been serious when he launched his Jove-like thunderbolt against the struggle of the Irish people to win freedom from foreign domination. It was not exactly edifying to see an Irish-American cast such slurs upon the cause of Sinn Fein, which is the cause of the entire Irish race, as the recent elections have so eloquently shown. One is inclined to wonder whether the Sinn Fein leaders would not change their ideas and policies, if they could be blessed with the boon of perusing Mr. Keating's little effusion. While I, myself, would be delighted to point out the flaws and misrepresentations of the letter, yet I feel that Mr. Keating may himself have quite as excellent opportunities of learning the truth as the rest of mankind has.

It would seem that the trouble with many Irish-Americans in these days of reciprocal hate, is that they go astray in an effort to be consistent. Many of them imagine that just because their ancestors neglected to support the Irish cause in '98, they, too, should fail to be loyal in 1917. This, of course, is ridiculous. Even consistency, if carried to such a foolish extent, may cease to be a virtue.

I sincerely hope that Mr. Keating is not about to formulate another "Creed," of the Senator Williams' variety, similar to his "I-believe-in-the-almighty-Kaiser" affair which appeared recently in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin and called forth many a protest from readers whose reverence had been severely shocked. Possibly, Mr. Keating may once have heard the legal maxim: Sic utere tuo, ut non alienum laedas, which might be rather freely translated into the admonition that one should so express his opinions as not to wound the intelligence or religious convictions of his hearers or readers.

It was with a feeling of pain, I must confess, that I read Mr. Keating's "Creed." Now the gentleman adds to our sorrow by forsaking the very cause for which our own great land is struggling, the freedom of small nations. Those of us whose fathers remained loyal in '98 and "lost everything but honor in defense of Irish rights, now bow our heads in deep shame to see some of Ireland's own sons casting honor itself to the winds in seeking alliance with the common enemy of all free peoples."

Camden, N. J. PHILIP MCFARLAND.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The difficulty of the Irish problem will never be understood until people grasp an important truth, often unknown or not sufficiently realized, owing to the fact that we Irish now speak English. Yet about eighty years ago most of our people talked not English, but Irish, an altogether different language not belonging to the Teutonic family. Irishmen are distinct from the English not merely ideally and religiously, but above all, racially. We are not Anglo-Saxon colonials like the Australians, Canadians, or old Americans, but a distinct conquered race. We resemble the Poles and Armenians today, or the Greeks, Serbs, and Bulgarians of the early nineteenth century under the Turks. While always eager to accept any amelioration of our lot, such as the Wyndham Land law or a Home Rule act, we never gave up our hope and claim of final full independence. If, after our centuries of longing and struggling, which have excited the astonishment and admiration of the world, outside of England—a struggle which this great republic of liberty will not, we hope, overlook, even if at this hour it stands with England, rescuing her from certain annihilation by our common foe, and so earning the right to speak plainly to her—the nations, now professedly fighting for the heretofore despised Catholic principles of morality and justice, humanity and the liberation of subjected small nationalities, leave us to our fate, well may this mighty conflict be termed the war of the hypocrites; for England's control of Ireland is founded solely on brute force directed by her commercial interests, and her Teutonic-blooded writers deify might, in our case, just as much as do their cousins in Prussia.

As to Ireland's future. The so-called Home Rule act, of which Mr. Leslie writes, was an ante-bellum measure; but things have changed within three years. The entire Irish race desires the fullest obtainable liberty, the only difference being in estimating how much we can get. Why should England not free us, as she freed Greece from the Turks, and hopes to free Poland from Germany and Russia, just as the United States freed Cuba? We are tired of talk about practical politics; our demand for freedom is based on natural justice and right, not on politics. Does England possess only politicians and no honest clear-sighted statesmen? After all, she could have nothing serious to fear from doing justice to Ireland, for a free Ireland would prove her best friend and her first and most faithful ally; we should have to stand or fall together. We should, of course, from our ideas of morality, continue to despise her past heroes and history, but as free allies we could be proud of the future work she can do.

Regarding the scope of the Home Rule act, Mr. Leslie omitted to point out its several grave defects, even as a partial remedy, irrespective of its contempt of our national claims. Under it the London parliament may: (1) Abolish the Irish parliament at any time, without its consent; (2) overrule all Irish legislation; (3) prevent the free selection of all Irish cabinet ministers; (4) control the appointment of all Irish judges; (5) crush us by taxation and again ruin our industries and trade. As to the financial arrangements of the act, they are it is true only tentative, yet very bad. Mr. Asquith completely ignored the recommendations of the Royal Commission of British financial experts, including Dr. Kelléy of Ross, cited by Mr. Leslie, who at his request had reported an equitable scheme for regulating the financial relations of the two parliaments.

New York. A. A. E.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been much interested in the letters you have published under the heading, "What Ireland Wants." One cannot be mistaken in saying that the country wants a safe, happy, peaceful and reasonably prosperous future. What would be her chances of such a future as an independent nation? Assuming the possibility of entire independence, would such independence, under present-day conditions, be durable, certain, safe? If we could move her over to this side of the Atlantic, perhaps so; though even your own mighty nation has not escaped the touch of the long arm of European ambition.

But as she must remain where she is, and in truth her geographical situation is not a promising one for the enduring independence of "a little people," the gravest doubts arise, if Irishmen want to take practical views. Dreams may be very pleasant, very beautiful, but they are a poor basis on which to found a nation, or from which to reckon future events. Ireland would, it seems to me, be very helpless as an independent nation. She would be helpless in a military, naval, commercial or diplomatic sense. How is it that the enthusiastic champions of complete independence never condescend to sketch for us the details of the actual operation of the independence they dream of? How would such independence be guaranteed, and by whom? Supposing an international guarantee, what, in the light of recent events, can we imagine it would be worth? What could Ireland herself do to maintain her independence? How long would it take a hundred submarines to ruin her and force her into submission? By what means could she protect herself against those peaceful wars of commercial discrimination which are so common and so destructive? Where are her raw materials for manufactures? Where is her capital? Where are her internal resources which could form the basis for self-expansion in the face of unfriendly commercial neighbors and competitors? Where is her wealth, or the self-contained makings of wealth which could render her really, as well as nominally, an independent country?

How can 5,000,000 people, on an island, on the edge of Europe, within a few hours' sail from the ports of the greatest nations in the world, become really independent, and cherish a well-founded hope of remaining so? Even if she could start out with the good-will and friendliness of all the rest of Europe, how would her future be safer than that of other little nations which have seen their dreams shattered in a day?

I am an Irishman, and a home-ruler; but the dream of Irish independence does not appeal to me. I can see no security in it; and surely we have had enough of insecurity. It is time we Irishmen gave up dreams and divisions. Our greatest weaknesses are precisely these: we dream and we disagree. We are born factionists. I do not now refer to the northeast Ulster faction. That is not the same thing. I refer to factions amongst the real patriots. Home-ruler all my life, the shadow of a doubt sometimes comes to me: Will there not be as many parties in the new Parliament of Ireland as there were in the Duma? Well, Home Rule might be made to work successfully, even with ten or a dozen political parties; but, when one tries to imagine Ireland an independent nation, with this natural weakness for faction added to all the other weaknesses of the scheme, an independent Ireland becomes, not a beautiful dream, but a nightmare.

North Sydney, N. S. R. F. PHALEN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If our good friend Mr. Woodlock will scan carefully the results of recent elections in parts of Ireland, I think he will be willing to admit that there are strongly convincing proofs of the numerical and political strength of the Sinn Fein party, which is sweeping its way with constantly increasing political, as well as moral, victories. Could he but scrutinize the minds and wishes of the Americans born of Irish parentage, I do not doubt for one instant that he would find in every man so descended a desire for Irish liberty. Our truest American ideals demand that such conditions as may be found in Ireland be considered in these days of loud promises. The one great difficulty is, as I have said before, our American papers have not done justice to Ireland's needs, owing, I believe, to the fact that they are controlled by the strongest English interests in the person of Lord Northcliffe.

If Mr. Keating is so certain of his position, I would ask why it is treasonable to demand long delayed justice and freedom for Ireland, if it is right to demand the same for Serbia and Belgium, both actual belligerents, who are suffering for their espousal of foreigners' contentions? We may be fighting the same enemy as England, but our motives cannot be the same, since England is not and never was a democracy, and there lies an abysmal difference. If Sinn Feinism is laudable in times of peace, it should be far more laudable in times of the "gag-rule," "false pretentions and martial law," so common these days.

New York. JOHN H. DOOLEY.

[The correspondence on "What Ireland Wants" may now cease.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Work of Knights of Columbus

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have noticed in the columns of your paper the report of the $1,000,000 drive of the Knights of Columbus. My conclusion is that Catholics have contributed generously to the cause taken up by the Knights. May I ask you what has been done for the soldiers now in camp? At Mineola, where the Catholic Sixty-Ninth is encamped, I saw a Y. M. C. A. tent crowded with boys in khaki, but I could not find the tent of the Knights of Columbus. At Van Cortland Park and at Pelham I found the same conditions. Will you let me know of any encampment in the vicinity of New York where there is a tent of the Knights of Columbus?

In your pages a few weeks ago I read an editorial on the Chaplains' Aid Association. At 580 Fifth Avenue I found their headquarters. The ladies in charge there told me their association was formed to aid the chaplains. They did not undertake to provide recreation centers, as that was the work of the Knights of Columbus. They were to look after the spiritual needs of our troops. And they are doing it. They have twenty chaplains' kits ready for service; two they have sent to Europe and about seven to different camps throughout the United States. The day I made my visit to 580 Fifth Avenue they were sending 3,000 prayer books, and 2,500 rosaries and scapular medals to Mineola for the Sixty-Ninth. They are really doing things.

You will do a great favor to me and hundreds of your readers if you will publish in an early issue of your paper an account of the camp-activities of the Knights of Columbus, the officially approved relief organization for the soldiers and sailors of the Catholic Faith now in service.

New York. JOHN MUNRO.

Literature for Soldiers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a Trustee of the Brooklyn Public Library I attended a meeting, on August 28, in the New York Library, of those specially interested in the proposal of the National War Council, to use a $1,000,000 fund to provide library facilities for the soldiers and sailors during the war. Two of the three Catholic trustees of the Brooklyn Public Library were present; there was nobody representing the thousands of Catholics in the four other Boroughs of New York, although camp libraries were among the things discussed at the recent Washington conference on war problems for Catholics. A specific paragraph concerning war literature and libraries was included in the official statement sent to the press from the conference.

In the address which he made to the meeting, A. F. Hoffsommer, Field Director for New York City, assured his auditors that

> The thirst for reading on the part of the men in the various camps is very great and the task of satisfying that thirst is one that we have to meet. Contrary to the belief of many persons, the men, we have learned by experience, do not turn to lighter works of fiction, but rather to books of learning, scientific books, religious books, and books that deal with important subjects, such as political economy or the law. The work of meeting all these demands is going to be carried out.

Frank A. Vanderlip, chairman of the National Library War Council, who presided, said that the library work proposed "would coordinate with the Y. M. C. A."; and J. L. Clarkson, who represented the Y. M. C. A., gave an outline of what that organization was doing. They had their outfits already in 186 camps and 265 other outfits were under way; 987 secretaries had been appointed and, within two weeks, 1,081 others would be added to that number.

It is proposed to have the Carnegie Foundation construct base libraries at the thirty-two principal cantonments at a cost of $320,000, and the upkeep of these and the purchase of books will cost $150,000 a year. New York is expected to supply $250,000 of the total sum desired.

If Catholic interests are to be served in the important matter of the selection and distribution of literature under this elaborate scheme, an early and practical participation in the details of its working out would seem to be very desirable.

Brooklyn. THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

An Ardent Catholic and Garyism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In view of the present controversy in regard to the Duplicate or Gary Plan schools, which is being waged in some quarters with such malice and misrepresentation, I feel it my duty to ask your consideration of the following, because I am in a position to know a great deal about the public school system in general and duplicate schools in particular, and because I do not speak from hearsay.

I received the greater part of my education in what was conceded to be, when I was growing up, one of the best convent schools in America. It was conducted purely and simply on the Gary Plan, although that wonderful educator, Mother Hardy, never heard of the Gary system which did not exist in her day. My mother saved of her slender means to afford me its advantages, and I am glad that she did; that I did not complete my education there was due to lack of means on her part to meet the expense. The Visitation Sisters, the Religious of the Sacred Heart, the Sisters of Charity at that time conducted schools on the Gary Plan, and let it be said to their credit that they were following the best traditions of all good private schools, secular and religious. In the Sacred Heart academies, Mme. X. taught us mathematics, Mme. A. taught us French, Mme. B., English, Mme. C. taught both indoor and outdoor games, and what is to-day called "Recreational Activity." We had dancing, auditorium work, music, sewing, drawing and construction, and other vocational work including what is today called "novelty." The Visitation schools included cooking and elementary domestic science. Religious instruction was added, and also daily attendance at Mass, and the school day was much longer and much more strenuous than that of any duplicate school of today. We "studied, played, and worked by turns." The only difference was that it was very expensive.

I recently asked a certain priest of my acquaintance if he knew anything about the Gary schools, and might I send him some literature on the subject and his response was that he "had no time to look into the subject." I am not acquainted with the writer of the articles in AMERICA of July 26, and another of recent date, which misrepresent the Gary schools by indefinite insinuations, and which show plainly that this gentleman too has probably had no time to make adequate investigation. I can read the advertisements of St. Francis Xavier's School and College in any Catholic magazine, and their very language in bidding for favor pronounces these institutions to those initiated as schools conducted on the Gary Plan, but it is expensive and I do not know whether parochial schools furnish these advantages.

I am an ardent and earnest Catholic and accept the doctrines of the Church with entire faith, but I must confess to a shock when I find a leading Catholic paper guilty of misrepresentation, I do not say intentionally, but without adequate knowledge or investigation. I would like to ask the author of the articles to answer the following questions: (1) How many duplicate schools has he visited in New York or elsewhere? (2) What literature has he read on the subject? (3) Has he ever seen the Plan in operation in Gary? (4) Will he give me three, only three valid pedagogical reasons against the Gary Plan, which are based on his personal knowledge?

If your paper is sincere, as I believe it is, you will publish this and the author of the objectionable articles will either modify his views or intelligently defend his position.

New York. A. C. B.

Just Taxation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A recent issue of AMERICA contained an interesting letter on the subject of principles of taxation. At one point in the letter the writer said that, although private rights should be respected, corporate rights should also be observed.

Under this latter heading might be placed the right of any community to possess the effects of their associated labor. This right is flagrantly violated when individual owners of land are permitted to take the land-value created by the presence and activities of the whole people. A little reflection ought to persuade any reasonable man that the value of the land itself, without improvements of any sort, is the result of the labor of the community and not of the landowner as such. I think the result of men's industry should be theirs. As this value of unimproved land belongs to the people it should be collected for them through taxation, and not be collected by the person who happens to possess the deed to the ground.

If the annual rental value, or such portion as is necessary of unimproved land were taken every year by the State, the taxation of improvements, of the effects of individual labor, could be dispensed with, and industry would thrive freed from the burden of an annual fine.

The cost of government could easily be obtained from the general land-value fund created by the people. This would be the natural way. It is not difficult to realize that the value of land is a social product and that it could hardly be justly divided in any other way than through the State obtaining it by taxation and using it for the common good of the whole people.

I do not think it would be necessary for the State to take the entire annual ground rent—even though it has the right to do so. The ordinary expenses of government could probably be met by collecting only a large portion of it.

Such has been the practice in many places where this system is in force at the present time, and success seems to attend it. Several taxing districts in Western Canada, as well as in Australia and New Zealand, have adopted the plan of gradually exempting improvements and shifting the tax to the value of the land. In all these places it meets with approval and no desire is exhibited to change back to the old unjust, immoral system of taxing everything that the tax officials can lay eyes or hands on. Lest anyone raise the cry that this would be doing injustice by shifting the burden of taxation to the farmer, "who owns most of the land," let me ask the reader to note my use of the term land-value as opposed to land. Of course the farmer possesses more land than ordinary city residents, but his land's value is not so high. Who would think of asserting that the farmer's acre of land in some rural district is worth as much as an acre of land in the heart of Boston or New York City?

Now, especially, since we are becoming subject to war-taxes, the people ought to demand the natural, logical, just plan of shifting taxes from improvements to the value of land. Are the people to suffer added burdens while millions of dollars created by associated effort are being every year confiscated by individuals who have done practically nothing to earn them? It is time for men and women to wake up and look out for their interests.

Burlington, Ia. CHARLES MILLER.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.

President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00

Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

The President's Reply

WHEN from the hills of Christian Rome, as of old from the midnight hills of Judea, a message of peace was sent forth to all the world, the hopes of many beat high. Conceived by the fatherly heart of Benedict XV, the message awakened a responsive chord in the hearts of all who looked with saddened eyes upon a wasted and comfortless world. To the invitation of the Vicar of the Prince of Peace, they thought, all parties might hearken. Throughout the nations and people at war, save in a few isolated and inconsiderable quarters, the moving appeal made by Benedict in the name of his Master, was received with the respect due both to its exalted origin and to the charity of Christ which dictated it. It did not seek to force a program upon the chancelleries of the world, for it was the pleading of a father, not the citation of a judge. Its high purpose was to inspire a weary world with the hope that relief from the bitter burdens of conflict, peace with honor, was not only possible, but soon to be realized.

Now that the President of the United States has spoken, it would be idle to deny that these hopes, so ardently cherished, of peace with honor throughout the world, must for the present be relinquished. It is not for us to know the time which the Father has set, when this terrible scourge will be removed from our shoulders. Yet the appeal of Benedict has not been made in vain. "Every heart that has not been blinded and hardened by this terrible war," are the solemn words of the President, "must be touched by this moving appeal of his Holiness, the Pope, must feel the dignity and force of the humane and generous motives which prompted it, and must fervently wish that we might take the path of peace he so persuasively points out." Even though its purpose may not be attained at once, a force emanating upon the world from so exalted a quarter, cannot be wholly lost. Careful perusal of the President's reply indicates that in certain fundamentals these exalted authorities are in complete harmony. In both is discerned the same sincere desire for peace; both see clearly that "no peace can rest securely upon political or economic restrictions meant to benefit some nations, and cripple or embarrass others"; both disclaim "vindictive action of any sort, or any kind of revenge or deliberate injury"; they are at one in holding that these things can afford "no proper basis for a peace of any kind, least of all for an enduring peace."

Much, then, has been gained. Although our hopes for peace in the immediate future seem doomed to unfulfilment, the words of the Holy Father will not be fruitless. Good seed, they have fallen upon a fertile ground, deep ploughed by war, and will bring forth good fruit in due season. It now remains for us to pray without ceasing that the day of God's harvesting with consequent peace, rest, and plenty, may soon be vouchsafed by the Father of all to whose will, disposing all things sweetly, despite man's malice, we bow in completest resignation.

The Parochial School

WE Catholics have no apologies whatever to offer for the parochial school. We are proud of it, if for no other reason, because no people in the history of the Church have ever built so beautiful a monument to the glory of God. But there are other reasons. In theory and in practical results our schools are the best. Free from the fads and fancies which often harass the souls and hamper the work of our best public educators, they are built on the sane psychology that not one or other only, but all the faculties of the child must be developed. In the fullest sense of the phrase, they "prepare the child for life." They will make him a good citizen of this world by teaching him thrift, ingenuity, sacrifice and obedience; they will prepare him for citizenship in the world to come by educating him to refer all things to God, his Creator and last end.

To such schools alone may the Catholic father safely entrust his child. The times are perilous. Now, as perhaps never before, is the Catholic called upon to confess the Faith in the face of a scoffing world. Can this confession be expected from the Catholic whose childhood was warped by the school that knew not Christ? If today the majority of Americans have no religious affiliation whatever, where does the blame lie? More than one Plenary Council has traced the spread of this indifferentism and infidelity to the effect of these early influences. True today, as when first uttered years ago by Webster, is the philosophy:

> It is idle, it is a mockery and an insult to common-sense to maintain that a school for the instruction of youth from which Christian instruction by Christian teachers is sedulously and rigorously shut out, is not deistical and infidel both in its purposes and its tendencies. This scheme of education is derogatory to Christianity because it proceeds upon the presumption that the Christian religion is not the only true foundation, or any necessary foundation, of morals.

Once more are our schools, dedicated to love of country, of our fellow-men and of God above all things, to open their doors for the children of our land. For the first time since the dark days of 1861 do they open in the shadow of a great war. May God grant that in this year of peril the schools which can do so much to help our beloved country may be filled to overflowing and that we may travel far towards the realization of our ideal, "Every Catholic child in a Catholic school."

A Native Clergy

THE practical need of the hour for the promotion of the Faith in the various mission countries is the development of a native clergy. Such is the fact recently brought to the notice of Catholics of the United States by Mgr. Joseph Freri, the National Director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. At the beginning of the war three-fourths of the missionaries were of French nationality. Many of these have been called to the colors and but few will return to their fields of labor. Other missions, too, have been depleted of their workers. Aside from the instant necessities of our day, the education of a native clergy is always of the greatest importance that the Faith may be more deeply rooted and made lasting in its results. While we are still far removed from the possibility of training a native clergy in entirely barbarous regions, there are other countries, like China, Japan, Corea, Indo-China, India, and Ceylon, where native priests are even at present a great factor in the conversion of their own countries. In all these instances the native clergy compares favorably with our own American and European priests. But if their number were multiplied a hundredfold there would still be a dearth of laborers, for the harvest indeed is great and the ears of the grain are white for the reapers. What then is wanting to develop to the utmost that native clergy on whom the success of the missions so largely depends? Vocations? These, we are told, are plentiful. One thing alone is wanted, and that we can supply: sufficient funds for the education of the young men who are found capable and willing to carry on this great apostolate. Coming down to actual figures, it is estimated that $60 a year is sufficient to support a native student in the departments of theology and philosophy. The sum of $360 will carry him through his entire seminary course of six years. A burse of $1,000 will provide in perpetuity for the training of such a student in any of the ecclesiastical seminaries in Japan, Corea, China, Indo-China and India. Other figures might be mentioned for the support of mission priests and similar purposes, but they can readily be obtained from the National Director. Parishes, societies and sodalities can do no better than to establish such burses. What nobler memorial indeed can we wish for ourselves than to be perpetually represented by an apostle who offers up the Divine Victim and ceaselessly labors for the extension of God's Kingdom upon earth?

The Heart of an Apostate

AMERICAN Catholics, and perhaps some Americans not Catholics, had a nauseous dose to swallow when in the train of the recent French Embassy to this country trailed the unspeakable René Viviani. No hatred is so mean, so low, so utterly lost to elemental decency and honor as the hatred of an apostate. And René Viviani, a man who has bitten the hand that caressed and fed him, is above all else an apostate.

It was this Viviani who, in impotent hatred of all religion, boasted that he had extinguished the lights of Heaven. It was this man who threw all the weight of his influence, obtained as he alone knows best, into legislation which today makes religious men and women in France outlaws. It is this Viviani who at a time when the priests and nuns of France are giving their lives for their country, at a time, too, when the Government of the United States by official act testifies its respect for the ministers of religion, plots with diabolic ingenuity the further distress of the Church. By the terms of the recent "Law of the Orphans," engineered by this apostate, the soldier who dies that "liberty" may live in France may also be forced to relinquish his right and liberty to preserve his dependent children in the Faith of their ancestors. In the committee of ninety-nine appointed to administer the law, religion alone, despite the protests of the Catholic deputies, is without a representative. For official France does not recognize the existence of the Church or of her ministers, except to fight for her, to bind up her wounds, to alleviate her sorrows.

Nor is there hope in the "pledges" offered by the authors of this law. What reliance can be placed on the word of an apostate who declares, not personally but through a subordinate, that "the religious faith of the dependent child will be respected"? By whom? By godless official France of today? By that official France which stole the bread of orphans and the aged, sent men and women into exile for the high crime of wearing the livery of Jesus Christ, and today glories in the iniquity?

The lesson comes home, sharply, insistently. We, too, have our "committees," born of hatred for the Church, protesting while their unhallowed deeds give the lie to their words that they will "respect the faith of the dependent child." There is another lesson. Let not one penny of Catholic money be contributed to any fund for relief in France, unless an absolute guarantee be given that the fund will not be pillaged and defiled by the harpies now afflicting that country.

Why?

THE story runs that in New York a young man mounted a soap-box and began his favorite sport of baiting the Jews. He made sundry and uncomplimentary reflections upon the length of their noses, the color and trim of their hair, the set of their eyes, their personal habits and their patriotism. This young man, if reports can be credited, had more vocabulary than good sense. Presently the crowd pulled him from his pedestal, thereby requesting him to call it a day's work, and go home; but as vivid parts of speech still surged and fought within his bosom, he refused. In the ensuing debate, winged words flew hither and yon, while here and there a horny fist impinged upon the guileless countenance of some innocent bystander. At length the noise of battle grew so painful to the ears of a highly socialized policeman, then engaged in pricing eggs at a corner grocery, that he abandoned economics for business, and haled the unhappy orator to a Fifty-seventh Street dungeon.

Thus is it clear that if New Yorkers would only walk in the ways of peace and gentleness, the real work of our police would not be so frequently interrupted; but so obvious a conclusion is not the text of the present sermon. That discourse may move from point to point until the sum is four. First, a young man attacks the Jews, not any Jew in particular, but Jews in general. Second, for this silly proceeding he is arrested. Third, the newspapers, notably the Globe, editorialize most solemnly the crime and folly of attacking the children of Israel. Fourth, the Mayor of this great city is about to "investigate what parties, if any, are back" of this felonious attack.

All this is very well; but with the above points in mind for "Jews" substitute "Catholics." Has any soap-box orator been arrested of late for attacking Catholics, not any Catholic in particular, but Catholics in general? Following any such attack has any New York newspaper editorialized, solemnly or otherwise, the crime and folly of attacking the Catholics? Or, to conclude with a wild burst of fancy, has the Mayor appointed any committee "to investigate what parties, if any, are back" of the almost daily attacks upon Catholics in New York?

The answer is easy. But why is it lawful to attack Catholics, and shocking in the extreme to attack the Jews? Why is it lawful to blaspheme God in the streets of New York, and why does it mean ten days on the Island to hint dishonesty in, let us say, the life and works of the Inspector of Restaurants and Featherdusters? Is it because Jews have votes and employ them, as they should, for their protection, while Catholics use their franchise to put in office men who in private scorn morality, and in public assume the cloak of religion when the assumption seems "good politics"?

Masonic Truth and Catholic Mummery

A RECENT issue of the American Freemason contains this courteous and illuminating account of Buffalo Bill's conversion to the Church:

> The truth of the matter is that a priest was called in, at the request of the wife, and while Brother Cody was in extremis. Some mummery or other was gone through at that time. But we have the word of the attending physician that his patient was then unconscious, and passed to his death without knowledge of what had been done. Had there been the least excuse to hang a story upon, to the effect that Cody was reconciled to the church in his last hours, we would have heard about it from those who are so anxious for death-bed conversions of prominent persons. And had there been the ghost of a chance for interference, the priests would never have submitted to Masonic burial for one whom they might have claimed as of their fold, however late his entrance.

The editor of the Denver Catholic Register and the Rev. Christopher Walsh who baptized the Scout, counter these remarks in the following quiet and convincing fashion:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

> The true story of the conversion is this: Mrs. W. F. Cody, after consulting with her dying husband, sent for the Rev. Christopher V. Walsh, of the Immaculate Conception Cathedral, an old friend of the family. Father Walsh found that Buffalo Bill wished to be baptized. Members of the family said that the Scout had never received the Sacrament. When Father Walsh returned to administer baptism, he learned that the doctors had just given Buffalo Bill a sleeping draught. Wishing to have Colonel Cody fully conscious when the Sacrament was administered, Father Walsh returned to the rectory, and was informed every half hour by some member of the Cody family about Buffalo Bill's condition. When the Scout had recovered consciousness, Father Walsh returned to the home of Mrs. May Cody Decker, where Buffalo Bill was, and administered baptism. Colonel Cody was fully conscious at the time. He was baptized because he personally wished it.
>
> That Buffalo Bill thought long before death of turning to Catholicism was proved by a statement he made to Stanley McGinnis, several years ago, when Mr. McGinnis, formerly State immigration commissioner of Colorado, had gone to make some color photographs of the Scout. Two Catholic Sisters called on Buffalo Bill at the same time, and Colonel Cody, after passing a complimentary remark about the Sisters, said: "I'm not so far away from them as you might think."
>
> There were a number of witnesses to the actual baptism of Buffalo Bill. Others who were not present at the baptism are in a position to testify that Colonel Cody wished it. Among these is Major M. C. Harrington, of Fort Logan, U. S. A., Colorado.
>
> Sincerely yours,
>
> MATTHEW J. W. SMITH,
>
> Editor, Denver Catholic Register.
>
> I have read the above. It tells the true story of the baptism of Buffalo Bill.
>
> (Rev.) CHRIS. V. WALSH,
>
> Cathedral,
>
> Denver, Colo.

Little remains to be said. To be sure the words of the Editor of the American Freemason betray a profound knowledge of Catholic theology, and his use of the expression, mummery, will fetch a smile from those who know anything about the Masonic ritual. For the rest, the priests no doubt realized that Masonic funeral service could do Buffalo Bill no harm. He had been dead two or three days.

Literature

SWINBURNE: DECADENT

MR. EDMUND GOSSE'S official biography of "Algernon Charles Swinburne" (Macmillan) floats down the roaring stream of war like some languid oversight from the Victorian era. It does not paint the full Swinburne in his fierce and flagrant totality. Great and vivid flourishes are sacrificed to minor touches. The result is a truthful etching. There is a mosaic of personal observations and of jotted sayings. Punctiliousness in the collection of the minutiae of biography has been Mr. Gosse's forte. These are served with many a well-turned phrase and some suspicion of dry humor. He is excellent when he speaks of Swinburne's "radiant and mocking head" or describes him involved in the labyrinthine sibilants of his verse as "slave of his own splendors." But large appraisement and final stricture are left to the reader.

Swinburne was hyper-esthetic. Psychologically he was a freak. Although he came of sturdy old English stock, which had three times married "wives of royal descent," he was bubbling with republican wilfulness. Pathos of thought, hero-worship, imaginary hatred or word-beauty could play havoc with his nerves at a touch or a glimpse. Reading the finish of Morris's "Haystack in the Floods" caused him anguish that was unbearable. The mention of the amiable Napoleon the Third threw him into abusive convulsions. At the view of Mazzini's picture he "pirouetted in ecstasies of enthusiasm," though his acquaintance with Italy was that of a casual tourist. We are allowed to know that he suffered from a malady that was "epileptiform." Under emotional excitement he was liable to sway with distracted voice and disarticulate limb. Both Taine and Guy de Maupassant came to the conclusion on separate occasions that he was a sick visionary. The amusing part of the book lies in his conflicts with the sedate and respectable in life. A story is related of his being allowed to read "Les Noyades" in the presence of the Archbishop of York, whose growing indignation was only relieved by the interruption of "an avenging angel" in the person of the family butler announcing prayers!

Of Swinburne as a stylist the last word was said fifty years ago after the publication of his masterpiece, "Atalanta in Calydon." It was unique and of a virginal paganism. It was impossible not to dally with the bafflingly beautiful choruses without feeling that Hellas had in some way been reborn.

The dawn and promise of the young Swinburne was immeasurable. Something new had swum into the delighted view of men. But this promise was never fulfilled. The poet proceeded to shock rather than to charm and to affect revelry rather than serenity. Songs and ballads continued to flow from his pen like one long libidinous litany. Then came variants into European political verse, tedious hymning of Italian Republicanism, declining into corybantics over the grave of Napoleon the Third. The flaming Apollo sank into a cranky old gentleman in the suburbs of London, who died without song or hope.

Swinburne became a victim to his own ecstatic fluency. He became a trick writer. He must needs write as good Greek verses as the Greeks, and imitate the French writers of the Pleiade in his "Chastelard," so that only an expert could tell the difference. The Victorians were easy prey to his quintessential powers of parody. But older folk like Landor and Victor Hugo he approached with an adulation that must have been a little nauseating to his hero-victims. He reversed judgment later on one object of his admiration, Matthew Arnold to wit, on finding himself described in his Diary as "a sort of pseudo-Shelley." He was sensitive to a shaft but enjoyed nothing more than sticking poisoned arrows into others. His maladive mind also leaped into some odd clashes with Emerson and Walt Whitman. His criticism of the latter was typical of his ill-balanced vituperation, calling his Muse "a drunken apple-woman indecently sprawling in the slush and garbage of the gutter."

These were playful eccentricities enough, but when he took to delivering puppy-blasphemies against Christ and God, a good many people had done with him. But his vogue grew among the daring and youthful. Perhaps no single writer did so much to instil an easy-going agnosticism in the name of beauty or a subversion of moral sense in the very name of love. How catching to the mind that prefers jingles to truth were lines like: "Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilean, the world has grown gray from thy breath."

How comforting and alluring it was to the callow to be told in lyrics of matchless music all the moods and tenses of the one "sin worth the sinning." If Oscar Wilde slew his hundreds, Swinburne slew his thousands. One cannot but regret that all that passionate flood of words was devoted to the two themes, that there was no God and that the body was wholly worshipful and adorable. From these negative and in the end rather monotonous premises he proceeded to sing and finally to scream until he rather resembled some sick and disappointed schoolgirl, who, unable to be vicious, can at least be hysterically rude. When he had exhausted paganism he had also exhausted himself. A medievalist would be amused to note how his literary luck or talent dwindled after his fine cursings of holy things. His muse ran fossil and his mighty crescendo was turned to stone. Mr. Gosse notes the "ossification of Swinburne's genius."

To all who loved literature it was a loss and a grief that so much promise should come to such prosy and abusive end. Even when he roused himself to write in commemoration of the Armada, he made the grotesque mistake of putting God on the side of the enemy and leaving England only a kind of patriotic worship of the sea, which is very excellent for shore hotel men but does not suffice to feed the soul of a nation. Gladstone's Home Rule bill and the Boer War gave him opportunities to vent poor stuff indeed for the one-time generous pleader on behalf of Fenian prisoners and the lover of republics. The exquisite singer of Atalanta driveled into the cock-shyster who gnashed rotten teeth at Kruger. Whatever gods might be seemed to have laughed at him with his own mockery, so that he became a tinkling though still melodious cymbal. His tragedy was that he had no sublime theme. When he believed he had found one in the Celtic story of Tristram he made an immense failure. It was to be his masterpiece, but it was like a goldsmith trying to build a cathedral and the failure was total. No one can touch the great Celtic epopees without reverence. He travailed at an epic and only a flow of amorous mouth-music was the result. By this time he was fit to contest the Poet Laureateship with Alfred Austin, the late Lord Salisbury being the qualified referee. It turned out to be a contest in bad political verse and the better man won.

These are days of literary as well as of military reprisals. Too long we have seen the poetry of Francis Thompson rejected and condemned by the older generation, who could not cease to heap Swinburne with their senile coronals. A striking instance occurs in the "Cambridge History of English Literature" where every effort is made to shuffle Francis Thompson off the boards. When Tennyson was dead, Swinburne in his dotage and Austin vainly endeavoring to intoxicate himself on the canary-sack which was the perquisite of his office, Francis Thompson came to lighten the end of the murky era with a great flash of meteoric song. Sir Edward Burne-Jones above the considerations of clique turned away from Swinburne's guttering candle to enjoy the new light. What was it that failed to win Swinburne the enthusiasm of the generation which hailed the glow of Thompson in preference to his icy libidinousness? Amazing as it may seem, it was because one, though metre's lord and master, was of the earth earthy and because the other had taken the Kingdom of Heaven by a violence that had well-nigh shattered his bodily frame. By a superb tour de force Swinburne had tried to build up beauty and patriotism without God and though he had achieved marvels, his beauty was sterile and his very message of patriotism fell wingless, nor was it given to him to bequeath any message to his time. He had deliberately excised the theme of God from his material, which is a safe course for a lawyer or a trader or a politician, but is fatal to the poetic profession. The great atheist-singers were all splendid failures.

The war has been no respecter of persons or reputations. It would have been an agony to Swinburne to know how little comfort or inspiration all his leagues of line and volumes of verse have conveyed to his fellow-countrymen in their agony. We hear of Francis Thompson in the trenches with his message of the bays interwoven with thorns, with the splendid vision of the Crucified, with his pitying summons to Calvary. And an England which is rebuilding the Holy Rood in the street and at the cross-road has heard and cherished his song. But who has any use for Swinburne's "lilies and languors" in the hour of war and death? Who would commemorate the suffering of this present time by carving a lewd satyr in the street or a nymph in every parish of the land? Which is the fairest now, "Atalanta in Calydon" or "Our Lady of Sorrow"?

Swinburne sang the flesh and made his glory and fame thereof and now a day has come when flesh is at a discount and men refuse to live and think in terms of flesh any more, and the message can only repeat the poet's own lines,

> The dead man answered thus,
> What good gift shall God give us;
> The boards answered him anon,
> Flesh to feed Hell's worm upon.

SHANE LESLIE.

REVIEWS

Solution of the Great Problem. Translated by E. LEAHY, from the French of ABBÉ DELLOUE. From Second Revised French Edition. New York: Frederick Pustet Co. $1.50.

The plan followed by the Abbé Delloue in this manual of Christian Apologetics, though not unique, departs sufficiently from the beaten track to compel the attention of the reader and to warrant the publication of a new work on a world-old question. The problem to be solved is succinctly proposed by the author in the following words: "Is it true, as Christians claim, that life has been given to us only that we may merit God; that death is the way to meet Him, and that eternity is ours in which to possess Him?" The fact of death and the supremely important questions that this daily phenomenon thrusts upon the consideration of every thinking mind are developed at length in the initial chapters. The practical indifference manifested by the mass of mankind is seen to be traceable to the fascination of things seen; a kind of intoxication seizes upon the mind and the heart, and causes men to forget that the happiness of the present is but short-lived, and no guaranty that the future will read like the past. The solutions offered by materialism and pantheism are then examined and found unsatisfactory: they leave the question practically untouched. The root-error of these systems is discerned in their denial of man's distinct personality, of free-will, of responsibility and, of course, of a life to come where our consciousness will remain intact.

The existence of a personal and infinite God, and the immortality of the soul are truths of such fundamental importance, nowadays especially when so many scientists—or should we say pseudo-scientists?—are loudly protesting against their acceptance, that the author has done well in devoting over a third of his work to their consideration and proof. It is this section that we recommend heartily to the close study of the reader. Modern philosophy is responsible for much of the darkness that in the past century has settled on the evidence which invests these two truths. Philosophy, no doubt, ensures a clear-visioned intellect, but it is the philosophy of Aristotle and Aquinas, not of Kant and his followers. J. A. C.

The Middle Group of American Historians. By JOHN SPENCER BASSETT, PH.D., LL.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

The author of this excellent volume, who is Professor of History at Smith College, considers the writers of the "middle group" those who did their best work between the years 1826, say, and 1865, Sparks, Bancroft, Prescott, Motley and Force being the men of prominence whose career he sketches and whose histories he appraises. After a scholarly opening chapter on the "Early Progress of History in the United States" at the end of which Professor Bassett pays a well-merited tribute to Charles Etienne Arthur Gayarré, the Catholic historian of Louisiana, he devotes the next chapter to an interesting review of Jared Sparks' activities. To keep his readers from lowering their respect for great men, Sparks, it seems, occasionally "embellished" Washington's letters as he edited them. When the Father of his Country wrote "Old Put," for instance, Sparks changed it to "General Putnam"; when Washington called a small sum of money "a flea-bite at present," his careful editor wrote "totally inadequate to our demands at this time," and altogether omitted from his edition of the letters one in which Washington comments on the difficulty he had in getting certain stupid and lazy New England officers "to exert themselves in carrying orders into execution." Sparks doubtless decided that that cruel aspersion on his fellow-New Englanders' capacity should not be given publicity.

In Dr. Bassett's account of George Bancroft's career there are some amusing pages describing the effect that young man's German-university manners had on the prim Harvard professors. For instance, he is said to have saluted "Norton—of all men!—in the European fashion, with a kiss on each cheek." So perhaps it is not so surprising that Bancroft remained for only a year one of Harvard's instructors.

The author brings out well the remarkable force of character Prescott evinced in carrying to completion his histories in spite of being nearly blind, and passes this just verdict on Motley's value as a historian: "He frankly took sides. He hated the absolute government of the Spanish monarchy, he disliked the dogmas of the Roman Church, and he could not abide the repressive spirit of the Roman hierarchy. His histories were Protestant through and through. The author's sketch of "Peter Force the Compiler," which forms the last chapter but one of the volume, shows that that tireless collector of documents brought, as a rule, more enthusiasm than judgment to his work. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"The Red Planet," "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," "His Family," "The Definite Object," "The Light in the Clearing" and "Summer" were July's six best sellers. All have been noticed in AMERICA except the last, Mrs. Wharton's recent novel. Like her "Ethan Frome," "Summer" is a work of pitiless New England realism. It is the story of a discontented country girl's affair with a visiting architect, her social superior, and its sordid, tragic ending.——Even to the wise and learned an occasional moment of mental relaxation is profitable, and in his recent book, "Those Times and These" (Doran, $1.35), Irvin Cobb proves himself admirably fitted to supply that relaxation. Perhaps the best of the ten stories in the collection is "And There Was Light," as excellent a sermon on contentment as was ever preached.—— The latest of Henry A. Shute's books is called "The Youth Plupy, or the Lad with a Downy Chin" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.35). As an account of a fifteen-year-old boy's amorous, pugilistic and oratorial adventures, it is here and there flat and overdone, and suffers by comparison with Booth Tarkington's "Seventeen."

As no English translation of the Holy Father's recent Encyclical "De Praedicatione Divini Verbi," as far as we know, has hitherto appeared, readers of the Catholic Mind will doubtless be interested to learn that the September 8 issue of that fortnightly opens with an English version of "The Pope's Letter on Preaching." His Holiness reminds the Bishops of the Universal Church how important is the ministry of the Word, describes what the spiritual and intellectual equipment of the apostolic preacher should be, lays down rules for making preaching more effective and fruitful, and ends by holding up St. Paul as the model all preachers should imitate. Everybody who either gives sermons or hears them should find the letter stimulating. The second article in the number is a good translation of the Holy Father's recent plea for peace which was so sadly garbled by the daily press. The third Papal document in this issue of the Catholic Mind is the Encyclical promulgating the new code of canon law which goes into effect next Pentecost Sunday.

"Martie the Unconquered" (Doubleday, Page, $1.35), the latest novel of Kathleen Norris, is the story of a girl who is dissatisfied with the conditions of her rather cramped life in a growing town, and especially with the sordid surroundings of her own home. She makes an ill-considered marriage, which in the end turns out very unhappily, and for a time seems destined to crush her. She refuses to acquiesce tamely in the dependence which ensues on her husband's death, and returns to New York to live her own life and make her own way. The book is rather clever in its delineation of the narrowness of provincial life, expresses with a good deal of emphasis the blessedness of maternal love and its ennobling influences, is Catholic in its setting, though the atmosphere of Faith is implied rather than stressed. Martie is not one of the author's most successful characters, nor is the book equal to her best work.—— "Mistress Anne" (The Penn Publishing Co., $1.35), by Temple Bailey, is a very good story, with a charming girl for its heroine. It does not set out to teach a lesson; it merely tells a tale, which is in itself worth the telling. With marked skill, however, the author drives home a moral much needed today. The inevitable conviction of any one who reads the book through, and no one is likely to leave it unfinished, is that the tinsel and show and unreality of fashionable life are poor things indeed when compared with the simplicity of real nobility. It would be well if our high-school and college girls would read and ponder on the ways of Mistress Anne.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Brothers, New York:
The Life of Mother Pauline von Mallinckrodt. Foundress of the Sisters of Christian Charity. $1.50.
The Century Co., New York:
Slippy McGee. By Marie Conway Oemler. $1.35.
B. Herder, St. Louis:
A Manual of the History of Dogmas. Vol. I. The Development of Dogmas during the Patristic Age, 100-869. By Rev. Bernard J. Otten, S.J. $2.00; Is There Salvation Outside the Catholic Church? An Authorized Translation from the French of Rev. J. Bainvel, S.J. By Rev. J. L. Weidenhan, S.T.L. $0.50.
Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Mexican Problem. By Clarence W. Barron. With Introduction by Talcott Williams, LL.D. $1.00. Faith, War, and Policy. Addresses and Essays on the European War. By Gilbert Murray, $1.25; Hymns and Prayers for the Use of the Army and Navy. $0.10; Enchanted Cigarettes. By Stephen Chalmers. $0.50.
Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
What Germany is Fighting For. By Sir Charles Waldstein. $0.60; The False Decretals. By E. H. Davenport, B.A. $1.50.

SOCIOLOGY

The Circle and the Triangle.

THERE is nothing mathematical about me, but I can express satisfaction and pleasure at the beauties and special features of those figures and drawings so necessary to the explicit demonstration of a mathematical or geometrical problem. My mathematical "bent" is a straight-forward aversion! But I can admire the drawings. For instance, the circle has always appealed to me as a peculiarly symmetrical figure. It satisfies; it strikes one as dependable; it is all there; it is complete within itself; it begins and ends at any point you choose to select, and yet that point must ever be in the same place. There is freedom and yet fixity about the circle. There is no wandering or stray ends into the disconcerting mazes of infinity.

The triangle has always struck me as most unsatisfying. It moves in many directions and accomplishes nothing. Its unused ends stretch out starkly into the great beyond, where they form the foundation for other triangles. Angles inside and out, much cross-play of dreary straight lines which, though keeping tenaciously to their path, cause the eye and the attention abruptly to veer from their course. These characteristics have always seemed to me an ensemble typical of futility and change and insecurity.

All this, of course, is by way of being a labored allegory.

What the Expert Says

MANKIND must have been impressed with the realization of these significances when it coined the self-explanatory phrases "the family circle" and "the marital triangle." Their expressiveness is of world-wide acceptance. There has been and is a general feeling that the family is a complete ideal worthy of being cherished above all else which bears resemblance to it or promises larger happiness. In estimates of this nature, men have never been wrong. The feelings and facts on which they base their judgments are the prime sentiments of the human heart, the expression of all that is good, noble, praiseworthy, and worth living to attain.

But now and then the world witnesses a reversal of form on such expressions when an expert talks. That this should be so is extremely odd; for an expert, if I do not mistake, is one who knows and can express what he knows better than the ordinary run of mortals. An instance of this form-reversal on matters of human belief was chronicled in the daily press a few days ago as a sort of serio-comic anti-climax to a murder. Those involved in the deed of blood had been standing precariously for some time, in doubtful equilibrium on the corners of a "marital triangle." One swift, breath-smothering deed, and the triangle was no more.

Psychology Run Mad

A NEWSPAPERMAN in need of "copy" approached an expert, a psychologist in one of our American universities, and as experts will, this psychologist was moved to talk. This is what he said:

> The love instinct in man and woman cannot be controlled by the will. No man or woman should be condemned as "immoral" because he or she falls in love or out of love with any other person. But unkindness is immoral. He who commits an unkind act, therefore, commits an immoral act. The point is not whether you fall in love with somebody else, but whether you exhibit a little human kindness. In this love triangle, the man just had to go his way. But he could have been candid and kind to his wife. He should have told her the truth at once.
>
> What most men want is really a mother, and when the wife declines to mother them, wanting to be merely a sweetheart, the man is likely to go somewhere else. I don't > think we should condemn people much for following where love leads. What we want is to get people to show a little kindness, to be candid and honest, and when they find the old relationship of husband and wife is no longer possible, to consider what is possible to make the other person as happy as may be in the circumstances.

This interview was featured in a great chain of canting papers where thousands who knew better would read, and think, and mayhap find an excuse for their own laxities. The professor's boudoir-logic bespeaks the disordered mind of a psychoanalyst. To the psychoanalyst things that are, or will be, or may be dreamed about, are related to sex, and sex alone. This expert's lucubrations will not bear even cursory inspection, because the meaning of his terms varies from sentence to sentence. Parodying the situation about which he speaks, he plays fast and loose with love and kindness. Love now means one thing, now another; and kindness, presuming such a virtue could be exercised by a seeker of self and sensualism, is rated above love! "Falling in and out of love" is, from the context which I quoted, but a professorial tag for those experiences which are dubbed "sowing one's wild oats," the recountings of which bring smirks to the auditors' faces at the club. So much for the expert.

"Man-Madl" Morals

BY happy chance, Corra Harris' "Making Her His Wife," the second installment of which appears in a September magazine, came to my desk with the paper which I quoted. The antidote followed the poison; though, unhappily, many victims of the poison never received the antidote. John Arms, the hero of Corra Harris' story, is presented with a marital crux which calls loudly for solution. He and his wife become so coolly settled in their anger that they can abstractly discuss matrimony and its difficulties. Thus John:

> Morals are. We don't make them. We never have. We only damage them with our conditions. They were written into us with our flesh and blood, into the earth, into every flower that blooms, every tree that spreads its branches, into the very grass that covers the bare places, when we and they were created in the beginning. Conformity to order, that order, means health, virtue, honor and all the rest of 'em . . . Whoever believes in marriage cannot believe in divorce. And whoever believes in divorce cannot absolutely believe in marriage. . . . Today people are accepting marriage incidentally, and pinning their faith to the ultimate divorce!

The novelist and the professor; the circle and the triangle; marriage and divorce; the "home circle" and the "marital triangle." The expert and his espousal of divorce and the triangle seem to stand convicted of the one crime which so often marks and mars the work of the special pleader—insincerity. The novelist and her defense of the home circle and marriage, without seeming or make-believe, stand with mankind, solidly and sanely. Edward F. Mohler, M.A.

EDUCATION

Jacopo Sadoleto

IN the introduction of his little masterpiece entitled "De Pueris Recte Instituendis," lately done into good plain English ("Sadoleto on Education." With Notes and Introduction by E. T. Campagnac, Professor of Education, University of Liverpool, and K. Forbes, Lecturer on Education, University of Liverpool, Oxford University Press), Cardinal Jacopo Sadoleto reminds his nephew Paul that it is of the utmost importance to realize "that our true self is not this body which we perceive with our eyes, this frame compact of bone and sinew with covering of flesh and vesture of skin, nor this countenance . . . whereon we are wont to trace the marks of our inner feelings and almost recognize in it the mind itself." It is something better, he tells him. It is our inward perception and power of thought, our faculty of reasoning and resolve, that makes us really men. But in itself this is dim and feeble unless it be kindled with the flame of knowledge and of letters.

It is evident that this Renaissance humanist had sound views on education. It was to be expected of him, for few men blended so well together in their person the true ideals of culture and piety or so skilfully harmonized the claims of literature and faith as this gentle priest. He was one of the glories of the court of Leo X. His Latin verses on the Laocoon had been rewarded by another Pope with a manuscript of Plato. He counted Pole, Erasmus and Bembo among his friends and when Bishop of Carpentras, the little town near the Papal city of Avignon, he knew how to doff the academic graces of the scholar and the humanist and become all things to all men, gaining the affection of rich and poor by his piety, his zeal and charity.

Sadoleto's Well-Balanced Plan

THE progress which our age has made in the field of education can scarcely be overstated. Education is more widespread, more practical, more personal; it comes into closer contact with the needs of the pupil; it fits him better for certain things in life; more thought and efficiency are put into its outward manifestations, more care is spent on standardizing its methods, than at any other period perhaps in history. But it lacks balance, it is one-sided, incoherent and inconclusive. While its separate elements may be in themselves commendable and useful, the general result has not corresponded to the vast stores of energy and labor expended in its behalf. It has often made the mistake of looking more to the sphere in which the pupil was to work, than to the pupil himself. Conscious that there were many things for the pupil to do, it has neglected to teach him what to be. The environment in which the pupil is to fulfil his destiny seems in its view to have overlapped and eclipsed his nature and character, his wants and aspirations. Jacopo Sadoleto felt that it had a far nobler task.

His system of education, as he tells his nephew, falls into two divisions; the first deals with moral, the second with literary training. Moral training

> Sets out with the object of ensuring that all our words and actions may be marked by moderation, and may keep a fit and proper rule of conduct, the correct beauty of which may delight not only the mind of the learned but even the eyes of the ignorant and constrain them to admiring imitation.

On the other hand the power and the efficacy of literature and of what we call humane studies is this:

> We receive from nature what is central in ourselves, what indeed makes us truly and individually what we are, but in a rough and unfinished form; it is the function of letters to bring this to its highest perfection and to work out in it a beauty comparable to its Divine original.

Paul Sadoleto, to whom these words are addressed, feels the grandeur of these two aims, for the one enables us to become like to God and the other helps us to appear such.

A Progressive Plan

SADOLETO begins the education of the future citizen in the mother's or the nurse's arms and leads him to the shrine of true philosophy with his moral nature ennobled and his literary talents developed to maturity. For him philosophy, which is nothing more than the science of life viewed from the angle of reason and of faith is the art of living happily and well, and teaches not only how to think but how to act and to do. That noble art brings steadfastness and strength, "Establishes man in the soundest counsels and desires, will ever keep him in the path of faith, duty and integrity." If in these words we have the Christian humanist clearly delivering his message, the message of the age at its best, we have another and more intimate glimpse of the great Cardinal in the homely precepts he lays down for the care of children. He must have known and loved the dark-eyed bambini of his sunny Italy, for he speaks most affectionately of them. He would have the mother herself nurse her children, and she must not be too severe in her dealings with them nor, on the other hand, unduly lenient. He notices that it is not only evil habit and association that insensibly work upon a child's nature, but that a single moment may leave its mark. He reminds us that while the spirit of children is frequently broken by the shock of harsh treatment, and thus becomes weak and timorous, a will spoiled by over-indulgence becomes incapable of any fixed and lasting purpose.

Brief as the words are which Sadoleto consecrates to the training of childhood, they favorably compare with more elaborate treatises. He knew not of the kindergarten, the Gary or the Montessori system, had not heard of the Children's Welfare League, had studied no elaborate treatises on the psychology of the child. But he had grasped the substantials of true education. In the child he saw something more than a social being or an economic unit. The child's soul was his first thought. He looked to its dignity and its worth, and inculcated the lesson that that was the thing above all others to be cultivated and developed.

A Simple Plan

OUR children today are taught too much and not enough. Too much, for they are burdened with programs unsuited to their needs, their years and their capabilities. Accidentals have encroached upon those essential and substantial studies which are the very backbone and marrow of education. They are not taught enough, for that moral training of which Sadoleto is speaking in this part of the treatise cannot be given to the vast majority of the children in our schools at the very time when pupils most need its restraining influence. Sadoleto believes that the moral training, which for him consists in the filial fear and love of God, should be early given to the child "while the ground is so to say untenanted, and the mind, thanks to its very newness and nature, is not yet seized by alien and even conflicting ideas." With that experience, which marks his pages, he realizes that "All that is human must go astray and fall," but if love and worship of God have once grown like some fair plant in the heart, then "just as weeds may spring up and flourish for a while in sunless places, but assuredly cannot come to maturity nor bear fruit, so the deadly sins will be destroyed by the shadow of religion." And he adds that the child should be made to understand that this great law of the fear and love of God concerns every aspect of his life, for his happiness, his honor and his peace may be found nowhere else.

A Comprehensive Plan

BUT the child is not working alone. Sadoleto agrees with Locke who says that children and men "do most by example." The English philosopher and educator holds that we are all like chameleons that still take a tincture from things near us and that children "better understand what they see than what they hear." Hence according to the Bishop of Carpentras, the father who desires to bring up his son a good and noble man, should himself "afford a pattern to be copied." For the child turns his eyes upon the father as soon as he has any power of thought and observes with a special attention all that he says and does. He adds a piece of advice which all teachers may well take to heart. We must watch "lest we carry from ourselves any infection of evil or dishonor into the life of him whom we ourselves long to mold and shape to the fair form of a rounded and complete virtue." Of the mother, Sadoleto says but little. But he has one phrase which embodies the whole philosophy of her duties and her privileges. She above all must give to her children the model and pattern of every virtue, "since it is in her lap the little one sits, in her face that he most often looks."

It would be interesting and stimulating to follow the Cardinal throughout the whole course of the moral training which he maps out for childhood. According to our modern ideas, it might be considered old-fashioned, limited and jejune: There is nothing very startling or original about it. But it is dictated by faith, experience, common-sense, knowledge of childhood and of its inherent dignity. The principles he enunciates need to be reaffirmed today. The Renaissance, in its best representatives felt the need of reemphasizing these principles, for they were being overlooked in the pursuit of higher and more fascinating but less useful and noble studies. Four classic treatises on the education of children have come down to us from that age. Vergerio wrote his "De Ingenuis Moribus ac Liberalibus Studiis" in 1472, a treatise on character which passed through forty editions before 1600. Mafeo Vegio's work, "De Educatione Liberorum et Eorum Claris Moribus," was not the least literary accomplishment of one who could, not without success, add a thirteenth book to the Aeneid. In 1477 Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini, who later became Pope Pius II dedicated a tractate on education to Ladislas, King of Hungary, the little work known as "De Liberorum Educatione." Sadoleto's work came later. In some things it is surpassed by the treatise of Vergerio but in straightforward statement of the essentials of education, in a thorough understanding of what it really means, in the harmonious blending of humanistic feeling, classical scholarship and genuine Christian principles, it merits the palm. The name of its author deserves to be revived. His treatise, redolent of an already remote age, but rich in old and familiar truths, can be read with profit today and compares favorably with more elaborate treatises. Few surpass it in sincerity, simplicity and sanity.

J. C. Reville, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Child Labor Law

THE new Federal child labor law went into effect September 1. The following are the conditions to be complied with for the interstate shipment of goods manufactured by children. (1) Children under sixteen years of age are prohibited from working in mines or quarries. (2) Children under fourteen years of age are prohibited from working in mills, canneries, factories, etc. (3) Children between sixteen and seventeen years of age, employed in mines or quarries, must present Federal or State certificates. (4) Children between fourteen and sixteen years of age, employed in mills, canneries, factories, etc., likewise must present Federal or State certificates. (5) Children engaged under permit are not allowed to work more than eight hours in one day, or six days in any week, or after seven in the evening, or before six in the morning. (6) Federal inspectors must be granted admission to mines, workshops, etc., for inspection of plants and records. The penalty for violation of the law is a fine not exceeding $200 for each offense prior to the first conviction and a fine of not more than $1,000, nor less than $100, or imprisonment for not more than three months, for each offense subsequent to first conviction. Appeal will be made by the United States Government against a decision declaring the law invalid.

Woman's Place in the Machine Shop

THE officials of the General Electric Company of Philadelphia are quoted in a local newspaper as saying that women are to be employed exclusively in their machine shops, "except for such machine work that is too heavy for any except a man." It is hoped that the public will graciously accept the new conditions, because the women are described as "perfectly delighted" with their men's apparel. "Full gathered trousers," we are assured, maintain woman's femininity in the greasy, deafening shops, while Dutch caps "keep back flying hair from the whirring wheels." The influence of the press is used to win favor for the new venture with the public. "Already pretty girls and capable matrons are at work," we are told, "on the spacious floors of the General Electric Company, operating lathes, running the drill punches with a will, all of them neat and trim in the new masculine uniforms." It is clear that every attempt will be made to exploit the nation amid the present confusion. Capital and labor are both intent upon their opportunity, as recent events have shown in not a few instances. It is high time that the Pope's message of peace be heeded in the name of every interest that is sacred to mankind.

Preach the Gospel

THE custom of inviting lay speakers to occupy the Protestant pulpits for the discussion of economics, politics, literature, or the latest sensation of the day recently received a public rebuke from ex-Senator George T. Oliver. Royal Meeker, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, appeared on invitation in the pulpit of the East End Christian Church, of Pittsburgh, Pa., of which Mr. Oliver is a member. At the conclusion of the address, which dwelt upon the United States as an ally, and upon labor in general, Mr. Oliver stood up and declared his emphatic objection. He stated that he did not criticize the sentiments of the speaker, but that he had come to church for the purpose of worship. On which the Labor World of Pittsburgh makes the following apt remarks:

> Far better would it be for the Church and for Christianity if Mr. Oliver's plan were followed strictly. The Labor World has long been advocating what Mr. Oliver suggests. If pastors were to confine themselves to the preaching of the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ, depend upon it, there would be thousands of better Christians than there are today. It is a lamentable truth that the vast majority of pastors aim at sensationalism rather than telling the people of the Gospel of the meek and lowly Christ. Every conceivable kind of subject, that bears on the sensational, is laid hold of by those pastors seeking notoriety to attract the curious, and often the prurient and morbid. Surely a sense of common decency should lead every honest pastor of a church to know that such talk is not fit to take the place of a Gospel sermon. There are pastors in Pittsburgh, who not only indulge in such methods of attracting attention, but they advertise in the daily newspapers what they are going to talk about on the following Sunday. There are six days in the week in addition to Sunday. Surely general lecturers, political advocates, anti-saloon paid agents and all such like, could be engaged to put forth their views on this or that subject, on any of the six evenings, and thus let the pastor of the church have the Sunday to tell his congregation about the eternal blessings that are promised all those human beings who walk and commune with the Great Teacher on earth and abide by his admonitions.
>
> The advice was given to a preacher who was to come to a fashionable New York church, that if he wished to create a sensation he should preach the Gospel. God's Word had been so completely ignored that it would prove a real novelty.

The "Church of Rome" and Munition Plants

IN one of its recent issues the Christian Science Monitor "features" on its front page an article contributed by its special Washington Bureau. It quite innocently offers, in passing, the amazing information that the funds of the "Church of Rome" were invested in one of the German munition plants. Further details are evidently considered unnecessary by the Christian Science Bureau. It writes:

> The simple truth is that the supply of munitions to belligerents has been one of the main sources of the vast wealth accumulated by the Krupps, in whose works the Kaiser is a large shareholder, and by the other German munition plants, in one of which the funds of the Church of Rome were invested during the attempt of Bismarck, now completely reversed, to drive the Jesuits out of the country.

Unfortunately for the accuracy of the writer, the "Church of Rome" is not a corporation investing funds in German munition plants or elsewhere. It is true that money must necessarily be possessed by the local churches and church officials, as Our Lord Himself deigned to make use of it for His Divine purposes. It is likewise true that a modest amount is naturally at the disposal of the Pope to meet his current expenses and bestow alms according to his very limited means. This is vastly different from saying that the "Church of Rome" has been investing in a German munition plant. But it is particularly difficult to catch the connection in the writer's mind between the supposed German munition investment of the "Church of Rome" and the Bismarckian persecution of the Jesuits, since it was not the Jesuit Order only but the entire "Church of Rome" that Bismarck sought to drive out of the country. His theory of State absolutism in matters of religion was the perfect expression of Luther's conception of the ideal Lutheran State church. He could not, therefore, tolerate any independent church in the monarchy of his creation. This theory the Catholics of Germany combated, heroically and successfully, and in spite of suffering and persecution regained their religious liberty. Why, we wonder, was this utterly irrelevant and equally confused reference to the "Church of Rome" dragged into this odious article by the Washington Bureau?

Poverty of Two Great Catholic Prelates

IN connection with the filing of the last will and testament of Archbishop Blenk it was revealed that the entire worldly fortune of the great prelate, at the time of his death, consisted of barely $500. All else had been devoted to charity and the service of God. Even a life insurance policy of $5,000, which he carried, had previously been sold by him to defray the expenses of a campaign for the restoration of the historic St. Louis cathedral. Every cent collected was to be devoted to the House of God. The campaign failed, but more than poetic justice was done when an anonymous donor recently gave the needed sum. Of the Archbishop's small estate nothing whatsoever will be left when the various expenses have been paid. "It was well known," writes the New Orleans Morning Star, "how his great and tender heart responded to every appeal of the poor and suffering, how he gave generously wherever it was needed, reserving from his personal revenues the necessities of life only. He gave his all for his people." The estate of the late Bishop Matz of Denver, we are at the same time informed, consisted of no more than a life insurance and a few dollars. The noble spirit of humility and poverty that animated him is clearly expressed in the fifth article of his will, read at the funeral Mass:

> Regarding the disposition of my remains, I demand a plain wooden coffin, a plain, simple funeral (no funeral sermon shall be preached), a small stone or marble slab, standing on a marble or granite base just large enough for the slab to stand on, bearing the inscription: "Here repose the remains of N. C. Matz, Bishop of Denver. Pray for him." I hereby enjoin upon my executors the duty of seeing that the above injunctions are observed and complied with.

Thus, in death as in life, these two devoted servants of Christ followed close to their Divine Master, sharing nobly with Him love and practice of poverty.

magazine place a one-cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No wrapping; no address.—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

SEPTEMBER 15, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

A Successful Experiment in Lay Apostleship
Paul Hanly Furfey

State Control and Socialism
Joseph Husslein

A Chaplains' Reserve Corps
George J. Waring

Animal Pets and Human Needs
James J. Walsh

The Grave of Lafayette
Comtesse de Courson

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
September 15, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 23

PAGE

CHRONICLE 561–564

TOPICS OF INTEREST

A Successful Experiment in Lay Apostleship—State Control and Socialism—A Chaplains' Reserve Corps—Animal Pets and Human Needs—The Grave of Lafayette 565–572

COMMUNICATIONS 572–575

EDITORIALS

A Nationwide Novena for Peace—Are They Catholics? "God Keep and Guide You"—Again Why?—A Guiding Sign—A Splendid Failure 576–578

LITERATURE — Unlocking the Medieval Mind—Distraction—Reviews—Books and Authors.....579–581

EDUCATION — The Rural Apostolate: Rural Schools 582

SOCIOLOGY — "Where a Feller Needs a Friend"..582–583

NOTE AND COMMENT..... 584

SEVEN DOLORS ROSARIES

ROSARIES COMPLETE

Cocoa Wood Beads, Sterling Silver Medals and Chain.... $3.00

Cocoa Wood Beads, Aluminum Medals and Steel Chain..... $1.00

MEDALS ALONE

Medals in Sterling Silver..... $1.50

" " Brass ..... .50

" " Aluminum ..... .25

No. 23

MIRACULOUS MEDALS

No. 43

No. 48

No. 47

No. 42

No. 0

No. 346

Factory Providence, R. I. Established 1870

The W. J. FEELEY CO.

Opposite St. Patrick's Cathedral

10 East 50th Street New York City

Who's Who

GEORGE J. WARING, born in 1872, at Blackburn, England, attended parochial and high schools and afterwards made classical studies in Glastonbury, Somersetshire, came to the United States in 1895 and entered St. Francis Xavier's College, New York City, 1896; in 1898 entered St. Paul's College, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.; ordained at Dunwoodie in 1903; appointed to Marshalltown, Iowa, as assistant to the Rt. Rev. Matthias Lenihan, the present Bishop of Great Falls, Montana; selected by the former Archbishop of Dubuque, the Most Rev. John J. Keane, to take a post-graduate course at the Catholic University in 1904; designated by the Archbishops to become a chaplain of the U. S. Army in November, 1904; appointed Chaplain by President Roosevelt, January, 1905, and assigned to the 11th Cavalry, at Fort Des Moines, Iowa; served in Fort Des Moines, Iowa, March, 1905, to August, 1906; Fort Riley, Kansas, August, 1906, to October, 1906; Camp Columbia, Cuba, October, 1906, to February, 1909; Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, March, 1909, to 1911 and 1912 to 1914; Fort Sam Houston, Texas, 1911; Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, 1914-1915; Governors Island, N. Y., 1915 to present date. In 1910, gave an address at the National Convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence of America, which was held in Boston, as the representative of the Secretary of War; represented the Secretary of War and Chief of Staff at the Missionary Congress at Boston in 1913; selected by the Secretary of War to bring the chaplain's department of our military prisons up to the most modern standards; wrote a pamphlet, "The Chaplain's Duties" in 1912 which is the only official publication on chaplains issued by the War Department; contributed articles on "Chaplains and Prison Reform" to AMERICA, Ecclesiastical Review, Army & Navy Journal; publishes little weekly newspaper, the Castle, at Governors Island for the benefit of the prisoners and to collate practical ideas of prison reform for the benefit of other prisons. Among his offices at this prison are: Mail censor, librarian, director of schools, head of employment bureau, director of entertainments, parole officer, etc.

Keep every number of AMERICA in a handsome

ADJUSTABLE BINDER

$1.00 postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS, 55 E. 83d St., N. Y.

The Education of Boys

By CONDÉ B. PALLEN, LL.D

One of the most useful books on modern education published for a decade.

CONTENTS

I. The Flowing Tide.
II. Our Responsibilities as Parents.
III. The Vital Principle in Education.
IV. Not a Loss.
V. On the Source of Resignation.
VI. On Disciplining Young Children.
VII. A Sweeping Charge and Rebuttal.
VIII. Truth versus Knowledge and the End of Education.
IX. Specialism in Education.
X. Electivism in Education.
XI. Utilitarianism in Education and a Classical Flourish.
XII. The Objects of the Classics in Education.
XIII. Education and Taste.
XIV. The World versus God in Education.

Cloth, 100 Pages, Price, 60 cents

Postage Extra

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

The latest and best pamphlet on the subject

What Luther Taught

THE country is now flooded with literature commemorating the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's rebellion. So every Catholic ought to have at hand a brief and trustworthy guide. Fathers Husslein and Reville, of the AMERICA staff, have prepared from the very words of Luther himself just the pamphlet you need.

Price 15 cents

$10.00 a hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83RD STREET

NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 23
WHOLE No. 439

SEPTEMBER 15, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The British have lost a little ground near Ypres, and the French have made a slight advance in the Verdun sector, but in neither case has any marked military advantage been gained. The Italian campaign has been held up by the struggle for the important mountain called Monte Gabriele. The Italians did succeed in taking the summit, but they were unable to hold it against the fierce Austrian counterattack. The Austrians claim to have retaken all the ground recently lost by them north of the Hermada, but they have been forced to retire further towards the eastern boundary of the Bainsizza Plateau.

Bulletin, Sept. 3, p.m.-Sept. 10, a.m.

The victory of the Germans at Uxkoll, where they made their way across the Dvina in the face of extremely strong Russian positions, but, owing to the complete state of demoralization prevailing among the Russians, practically without opposition, was followed, after the fall of Riga, by the occupation of Dünamünde. The Russians have abandoned the Dvina from Kokenhusen to the mouth of the estuary. The Germans pursued the retreating Russians along the coast and across the Aa Plateau. The line of battle now stretches from the Dvina to the Gulf of Riga on a line west of Venden, Bending, Nicau and Neuheidenhof.

The German press has been practically unanimous in its voluminous discussion and its violent abuse of Mr. Wilson's message to the Pope, although in later articles there has been a noticeable softening of the tone which greeted its first appearance. The newspapers, and especially the Lokal-Anzeiger, are scornful of the mere notion of any interference in the internal affairs of Germany, which they take for granted is the deliberate policy of the President. The Socialist organ Vorwärts is a marked exception. Directing its attention to the substance rather than the form of the communication, it finds much in the President's note that is reasonable, thinks that the United States is within its rights in demanding guarantees from the German people, protests against sacrifices being made for the defense of a particular family, and sees no reason why Germany should not enjoy a democratic form of government. In spite of many attacks, it has maintained its position, and asserts boldly that the German people are ready to give the guarantees demanded, and that they will be in a position to do so at no distant date.

Germany and the President's Note

Statesmen also have been deeply impressed, and there is talk of peace negotiations being started by Christmas. A Reuter dispatch declares that the next session of the Reichstag will be devoted almost exclusively to peace discussions, and that demands will be made in the near future for "legislation for the immediate introduction of a Government responsible to the Reichstag."

The only official comment on the note has been an attempt on the part of Dr. Michaelis to prove that Germany was not to blame for the beginning of the war. The Centrist party has issued a statement which takes exception to the general tone and to many assertions in the President's message but by no means rejects the possibility of peace negotiations.

The events which led up to the break in diplomatic relations between the United States and Germany, followed by the declaration of war, have not become sufficiently clarified to permit a final verdict. In any case, it remains for us to devise ways and means to arrive at an understanding with Mr. Wilson.

We consider most stupid the threat of the Pan-German press that peace discussion with such a fellow is wholly out of the question, especially in view of the fact that Mr. Wilson will continue to be President of the United States for several years more. Most of us are hardly inclined to carry on the war under all circumstances to 1921.

Much has been made of what is termed the insolence of the President, and of the occupation of Riga, with the purpose of offsetting the effect of the note on the people and of convincing them that Germany is both invincible and victorious. Nevertheless the thought of peace to be obtained through the means suggested by the President is taking hold of the people, and so far as can be gleaned from reports, has not been uprooted by Pan-German activities.

Germany's reply to the Pope has not yet been made, but the Committee of seven members of the Reichstag and seven members of the Bundesrat are to meet in the near future and formulate it.

Dr. Michaelis, the German Chancellor, is said to have stated that Germany would soon be able to publish her peace terms. It is believed that the following outline, which has been circulated unofficially in Washington, forecasts their general character:

Germany's Peace Terms

(1) Restoration of Belgium and northern France, to be paid for out of the sale of Germany's colonies to Great Britain. (2) Alsace and Lorraine to be independent states. (High French officials recently have stated anew the determination of France to be satisfied with nothing less than the recovery of her lost provinces.) (3) Trieste to be a "free port." (4) Serbia and Rumania to be restored, and Serbia to have a port on the Adriatic. (5) The Balkan question and the status of Turkey to be subjects for negotiation. (6) Disarmament and international police. (7) Freedom of the seas, with Great Britain in control of the English Channel until the projected tunnel is built between Dover and Calais.

The solution of Poland has not yet been announced.

The State Department at Washington published, on September 8, a statement to the effect that the Swedish Embassy at Buenos Aires has been dispatching to Stockholm communications from the German Chargé d'Affaires at Buenos Aires to be transmitted to the German Foreign Office at Berlin. The statement follows:

Sweden as an Intermediary

The Department of State has secured certain telegrams from Count Luxburg, German Chargé d'Affaires at Buenos Aires, to the Foreign Office at Berlin, which, I regret to say, were dispatched from Buenos Aires by the Swedish Legation as their own official messages, addressed to the Stockholm Foreign Office.

In evidence of his contention Mr. Lansing also published translations in English of three such messages dated May 19, July 3, and July 9, of the present year, signed by Count Luxburg, the German Chargé d'Affaires. These communications not only contained information of the movements of the ships of Argentine, but also advised that they be sunk in such a way as to leave no trace of the deed.

The Associated Press further declares that for the past three years cipher messages have been sent by Berlin through the Swedish Foreign Minister to the Swedish legations in foreign countries and by the latter handed to the German legations in the same countries. These messages are said to have been in the German code and to have contained instructions from Berlin. Return messages, it is said, have been sent to Berlin by the German legations in various countries; and although ostensibly official communications from the Swedish legations to their home government, on being received at Stockholm, were forwarded to the German Imperial Government.

The British Government was aware that Sweden was putting her telegraphic facilities at the disposal of the German Government as early as the spring of 1915. Assurances, however, were given Great Britain by Sweden shortly after May 11, 1915, that no further telegrams would be sent or received on behalf of Germany.

The action of the Swedish legation at Buenos Aires is a breach of trust to the Government of Argentina, and a violation of neutrality toward the enemies of Germany. Mr. Lansing's statement, which was published without comment, was sent by him to the Swedish Government.

Baron Lowen, the Swedish Minister to Argentina, has denied sending the messages:

I have not sent, nor caused to be sent, by the Legation under my charge, any telegram from the German Legation. The news is a great and disagreeable surprise. I have cabled to my Government to clear up matters. In the United States they are very excitable.

In Washington it was stated that Baron Lowen has been ill for many months. Mr. W. A. F. Ekengren, Swedish Minister to the United States, has disclaimed any knowledge of the dispatch of the German telegrams.

Ireland.—The Irish papers furnish evidence that conditions in Ireland are far from peaceful. The greater part of the news columns is taken up with accounts of the growth and achievements of Sinn Fein and of arrests of the members of this society. A recent Irish Weekly Independent contains a most interesting account of the Kilkenny elections and the celebrations attendant thereon. The Sinn Fein candidate won the Seat by a majority of two to one. This is the fourth constituency taken from the Nationalists, and the first urban Seat wrested from the party. W. T. Cosgrave, Sinn Fein, polled 772 votes, J. Magennis, U. I. L., 392. The Independent gives many indirect quotations from the speeches delivered on this occasion. It records De Valera's attitude in these words:

Present Conditions

Mr. de Valera, amid cheers, spoke first in Irish and then in English. Their watchword now he said was "Up Kilkenny, Kilkenny Aboo!" If the people of Ireland stood with them as Longford, Roscommon, East Clare, and Kilkenny they would achieve a final victory for Ireland. John Bull was already feeling like the lark when the farmer came to cut the corn. They were now going to reap the corn themselves, and not depend on Asquith, Lloyd George, or any one else. Nothing great was won without sacrifice, and their victory showed that the country was ready to make sacrifices for Irish freedom.

Kilkenny's victory was not a victory for anarchy, but for sensible solid government of Irishmen by Irishmen. They had been classed as revoluntionaries. If that meant that they were in rebellion against unjust laws they were rebels. Kilkenny, he added, amid great cheering, would receive from every part of the world where honest hearts beat, greetings and messages of gratitude. . . .

According to the same account Professor MacNeill declared "the big offensive was over":

It was in one sense nothing but offensive. Their opponents had called them madmen and fools. A speaker in the East Clare election had stated he was a Sinn Feiner because his father and grandfather were Sinn Feiners; and a brilliant member of Mr. Redmond's Party retorted: "And if your father and grandfather were fools what would you be?" "I suppose," replied the Sinn Feiner, "I would be a member of the Irish Party." Amid loud laughter Professor MacNeill paid a warm tribute to the people on the way they had conducted the election, and said they had already provided a model of independence and self-reliance.

The Kilkenny victory was enthusiastically celebrated in many parts of Ireland and even conservative journals admit that the elections prove the unpopularity of the Nationalists. The Belfast Evening Telegraph says that "the result is another indication of the complete wash-out" of the Redmonites. The Dublin correspondent of the Weekly Dispatch wired his paper as follows:

Sinn Feiners have taken the trouble to deny anything suggestive of a split on the Convention question, but there will be a wholesale tug-of-war unless the moderates can have their way. . . . Nothing will stem the tide of Sinn Feinism. Mr. Redmond will look round at his dwindling supporters, and Ireland is asking, "What next?" There is a search for a grievance, such is the unrest, and this has been found in an outcry against the meat prices, which will penalize Ireland. Nothing less than the fullest Colonial Home Rule will satisfy Ireland. Even the most loyal supporters of the Union will now clamor for self-government in its fullest significance.

The Independent has this to say about a speech Cosgrave delivered in Dublin:

Mr. Cosgrave said Kilkenny had struck a resounding blow for Irish freedom. The man who opposed him at the election was a man who had three times, successively, been accorded the highest honor in the gift of the citizens. He had the support of many prominent public men, but the people of Kilkenny had decided on which side the best interests of Ireland were ranged. In this struggle of theirs in Ireland they had no quarrel with the English people; they had a quarrel with the British Government, and they would deal with that Government with their own methods, and in their own time. In Kilkenny he had demanded from his opponents what their policy was, but he could never get an answer. The Freeman's Journal had been telling the electors of what the Irish Party had done for them.

Under their policy pauperism and emigration had increased, that in the city of Dublin there were 80,000 people living in hovels, which were a disgrace to civilization. They had the largest workhouses not only in this country, but in the British Empire. He appealed to them to continue to preserve the order which had been so creditable a feature of the Kilkenny election, and which had met with episcopal approbation that day in one of the churches of Kilkenny.

Meantime the Government has apparently become alarmed, arrests are numerous and arms and ammunition are being seized. The Press Censor's Office, Dublin, has issued this official appeal:

In view of recent events the Competent Military Authority has decided that for the purpose of securing the public safety it has become necessary to take possession, under the Defense of the Realm Regulations 2 (E), of the rifles, revolvers and ammunition now stored in certain places and insufficiently protected against falling into undesirable hands. These arms will be retained in military custody on behalf of the owners.

Following this, raids took place in Dublin, Newry, Warrenpoint, Rostrevor, Ballymartin, Annalong, Armagh, Nenagh, Belfast and in many other places.

While all this was in progress Mr. John Dillon was addressing an audience in Armagh. The Independent, which appears to be both fair and courageous, reports the proceedings in unmistakably clear language:

Other Views

Speaking at Armagh today, Mr. John Dillon said at the outset he would like to give serious warning to the Government in dealing with the Irish question. For the last four years the British Government had shown neither statesmanship nor courage. The foundations of the Sinn Fein movement as they now saw it was securely laid in May, 1915, when Sir Edward Carson was made a Cabinet Minister. Up to that day the Sinn Fein movement had not the support of one in thirty of the Irish people. The Irish Party had suffered, and would suffer, for the sins of British Ministers; but he was still convinced that time would justify them in their policy.

The Convention was, he maintained, the device of a hard-pressed Minister to escape from a desperately difficult position in which he found himself, to gain time, and as far as possible to throw on the Irish people the responsibility of settling the question, which the British Government had neither the statesmanship nor the courage to settle themselves. The holding of the Convention was not proposed or suggested by the Irish Party, but we never had the slightest doubt that the Irish Party were bound to accept it and give the experiment the fullest and fairest trial. Mr. de Valera, who might be accepted as the leader of the Sinn Fein Party, had been fairly consistent in the advocacy of his policy, although he had noticed a tendency on his part—he supposed under pressure from others—to hedge slightly from time to time by declaring that the Sinn Fein movement was in no sense revolutionary, but strictly constitutional. They could not have an Irish republic and total separation from Great Britain, and it was not honest to tell the people that such a settlement could be won without a fight, which could not be otherwise than a most desperate and bloody business, and, so far as its prospects of success were concerned, absolutely hopeless.

To work the salvation of Ireland by Sinn Fein methods and in accordance with their ideal it would be necessary to conquer and break up the British Empire and crush the Unionists of Ulster. Mr. de Valera, with all his admitted gallantry and military skill, would find his work more than cut out for him against such a programme. Unionist Ulster would fight to the last man living, and to all the horrors of the situation would be added a civil war in Ireland as bitter and relentless as that which reduced the country to a desert in the seventeenth century.

He was perfectly well aware that beneath the surface there was an active propaganda going on of an entirely different character, and people had been going about in private assuring the people that De Valera's speeches meant nothing, but were only bluff to frighten the Government and to down the Irish Party, that no one seriously thought of establishing an Irish Republic. Some, he heard, had gone further still and stated that abstention from Parliament was all humbug, and that as soon as they had succeeded in the clearing out of the present gang the Sinn Feiners would go over and take their seats. He supposed De Valera to be a brave and honorable man, judging from what he had read and heard of him, who would scorn to be a party to such a policy as these whispers imputed to him. He took it that De Valera believed in the policy he preached, and while he profoundly differed from him he could not help having great admiration for a man who, having risked his life and suffered imprisonment for the cause of liberty, was now prepared to throw the desperate die once more. But he was convinced that there were thousands now waving flags, shouting loudly, and denouncing the Irish party as traitors, whom it would be very difficult to find when the hour of trial sounded. The catch-cry now among Sinn Fein leaders was that Ireland's cause must go to the Peace Conference, and that they had made it international. That was a grotesque statement. The Irish Party by its work in Parliament had made the Irish question an international one, but he considered it would be infinitely better for England and for Ireland if the question could be settled with good-will by both sides as a domestic question. He had always been in favor of availing themselves to the utmost of the sympathy of foreign nations, and of the Peace Conference when they came together if the Irish question had not before been satisfactorily settled and if they were admitted a hearing on the question. But he maintained that the proceedings of the Sinn Feiners during the last six months had greatly lessened their chance of getting a hearing at the Peace Conference, and if they succeeded in getting a hearing had placed them in an almost hopeless position.

Mr. de Valera might dismiss from his mind the idea that he could go with his friends to the Peace Conference and claim that the demand of Nationalist Ireland had been changed and that it was now unanimous in demanding separation from England and the establishment of an Irish Republic. The utmost Sinn Feiners could hope to do was to make the fact manifest to the world that Ireland was hopelessly divided at a moment when a united Nationalist Ireland would have had the ball at her feet.. . . .

A recent letter written by a prominent Irishman resident in Ireland thus appraises the present situation:

> You ask me in the belated letter about conditions in Ireland. They were clear enough on December last: now they are like the sun in the heavens. Sinn Fein has swept the country. . . . So far as I know the movement is not pro-German, not even republican or anti-constitutional, but it is intensely democratic and anti-governmental in the sense of opposing the government of Ireland, by Englishmen in the interests of England, as has been the case since Mr. Redmond came into power.

These words are doubly significant, in view of the fact that the writer of them is not a politician.

Russia.—Probably as a result of the monarchist conspiracy, the ex-Czar's brother, Grand Duke Michael Alexandrovitch and his wife were arrested on or about September 3; others taken into custody were Margaret and Liubev Hitrovo, members of well-known aristocratic families. According to the report a number of other Grand Dukes have also been put in prison. Meantime disorder obtains everywhere. Large numbers of people are leaving Petrograd, and a new Cabinet crisis has occurred as a consequence of the opposition of the Constitutional Democrats in the Ministry to the plans of M. Pieschehonoff, Minister of Supplies, whom they forced to resign, and also to the land policy of M. Tchernoff, Minister of Agriculture. The attitude of the majority of the Cabinet, in sanctioning Vinnichenko, the Ukrane secessionist leader, as chief of the Ukranian Cabinet likewise angered the Constitutional Democrats. Soldiers' committees at the front have protested to the Central Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Deputies against the press reports of the cowardice of the Twelfth Army at Riga, saying: "Officers confirm the courage of our soldiers, and falsehoods about the demoralization of the army are refuted by the fact that our troops made several counter attacks." The Novoe Vremya cites General Klenbovski as authority for the statement that very many of the infantry threw away their rifles and fled. Moreover, three regiments of Germans crossed the Dvina at midday on pontoons, without the loss of a man, the Russian infantry refusing to offer resistance. The Petrograd Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies has organized a special department to check revolutions, impelled thereto by the threats of the soldiers at Kronstadt to march on Petrograd for "bread and peace."

Arrests and Disorder

The Maximalists have been active in agitation against the Provisional Government. To offset them the Soldiers' and Workmen's Council held forty meetings, on September 9, throughout different parts of Russia and made public an appeal in which it was stated that "those who invite workmen and soldiers to go into the streets armed are agents, provocateurs and enemies of the revolution, which they wish to drown in blood."

On September 10 the situation was further complicated by the revolt of General Korniloff, who demanded supreme power. Kerensky immediately ordered the General to resign and declared that a state of war existed in the city and district of Petrograd. Eleven Ministers met to discuss the formation of a directory of five men vested with full power to govern.

Spain.—After a Cabinet meeting held not long since and presided over by King Alfonso, Premier Dato announced that a comprehensive program of reforms was in preparation and would soon be announced, after which general elections would be held. It is evidently in the hope of quieting the unrest which has been gradually spreading throughout the country that the Government has taken this course. The Basque provinces, hitherto but little affected by the movement for reforms, which has its center in Barcelona, are now agitated. In imitation of Catalonia these provinces are looking for a larger degree of autonomy and a return of their old privileges or fueros. In order to formulate a program a general call for a meeting of all the representatives of all the local Councils of the four provinces was issued recently. The Navarre Council, however, refused to send official delegates, regarding the projected meeting as subversive of order and of the unity of the Spanish nation. But it declared its resolution to prosecute by all lawful means the restoration of its rights and placed no obstacle to the attendance of its members, each on his own responsibility. Three Navarrese councilors attended the meeting, which was held at Vittoria. While declaring their entire adhesion to and their union with the rest of the Spanish nation, the delegates resolved: (1) To demand, both for the Provincial and Municipal Councils complete autonomy; (2) To call a meeting, at an early date, of the parliamentary representatives of the Provinces, in order to communicate to them the wishes and demands of the Basque people in this regard. A petition on the matter will be presented to the Government.

The Basque Provinces and Autonomy

A Successful Experiment in Lay Apostleship

PAUL HANLY FURFEY, A.B.

THE Catholic Church in the United States has always given a great deal of systematic attention to the foreign missions. More recently a home missionary movement has been spreading the Faith in the more sparsely-settled districts of our own country. Yet, strangely enough, there remains at our very doors an enormous non-Catholic public to which no direct appeal has been made. We have not evangelized the "man in the street." He has listened in the public squares to every radical doctrinaire from the unkempt anarchist to the scented and scientific Rationalist, but never to the exponent of Catholic truth. Perhaps this silence on our part has been due to a lack of intelligent grasp of the situation, perhaps to an unconscious disciplina arcani which makes us hesitate to speak of our religion in the crowd, or perhaps it is because a movement to bring the Catholic position before the public is essentially a laymen's movement and the laymen have lacked initiative. Be that as it may, the fact remains that we have never systematically propagated Catholic truth among those American people who shun our churches.

With this condition in mind, two Boston Catholics have long been planning a movement which has finally materialized as the Catholic Truth Gild. Quite appropriately, the two persons who were the first to lead a systematic campaign against Socialism are also the initiators of this new phase of missionary activity, Mrs. Martha Moore Avery and Mr. David Goldstein, both distinguished converts from the Socialist party and eminently well qualified for the work. In this new movement the aim is to be constructive rather than destructive and instead of opposing Socialism the Catholic position is insisted on. As Mr. Goldstein phrased it, "the aims of the Gild are religious and not political, Catholic and not "anti-anything."

For convenience in speaking, a specially designed auto-van was constructed. The driver's seat in this van folds up and the roof lifts back to serve as a sounding board; thus a very satisfactory speaking platform is provided. The very appearance of the car is an advertisement for the Faith. It is painted in the Papal colors with appropriate inscriptions on either side, the one from Cardinal O'Connell, the other from George Washington, thus symbolizing the two motifs of the Gild's work, loyalty to the State and love of the Church, an idea which is emphasized by the two American flags surmounted by crosses which are displayed on the van.

His Eminence, Cardinal O'Connell blessed the car on Sunday, July 1, and expressed his cordial sympathy with the aims and methods of the Gild. Three days later, on Independence Day, the public work of the Gild commenced with a meeting on Boston Common. It was an inspiration to see the representatives of Catholic Truth make their appearance on a spot which had long been a favorite resort for the defenders of all sorts of queer fads, and where, twenty years previously, Mrs. Avery herself had been the principal speaker at the first meeting of the Socialist party on that historic spot. The Gild proved a success from the start. The crowd was both large and enthusiastic and listened with the closest attention to Mgr. Splaine, who came to represent the ecclesiastical authorities and officially inaugurate the work, to Mrs. Avery and Mr. Goldstein, to Mr. Corbett, who acts as chairman at the Gild meetings, to Mr. MacKinnon of Boston College, and to the writer, who completed the speaking staff at the first meeting. Now, as the first season is drawing to a close, it is pleasant to realize that the first meeting was typical of the subsequent ones and that the enthusiasm shown that day in July has accompanied the Gild throughout the entire summer.

An important feature of the work is the distribution of literature. It has been the experience of Mrs. Avery and Mr. Goldstein in many years of similar work, that literature is not read as carefully when distributed free as when the reader has been made interested enough to pay for it. Working upon this principle, the Gild has decided to charge a nominal price for Father Martin's "Catholic Religion," the book which it distributes and to give away with every copy sold, a copy of "Socialism: The Nation of Fatherless Children," by Mrs. Avery and Mr. Goldstein. The popularity of these books has exceeded all expectations. In the first seven weeks of the Gild's work 5,000 copies of each were distributed. This may serve as a sign of the deep impression which the work is making. It is gratifying to realize that so many people are going home from the meetings carrying books with them, because the written word has a permanency which serves to supplement the work of the speakers.

There is an impression in the minds of many men that the American public is inclined to be callous in matters of religion. A little experience with the Truth Gild removes a great deal of this idea. Night after night the crowds run into the thousands and stand listening as attentively as if they were in a hall. There is even a touch of the pathetic in their eagerness to hear the speakers and to buy literature. Ours is an age in which the old sects are disintegrating; their creeds are falling into decay; for that very reason men are all the more anxious to find something firm upon which to pin their faith in the modern chaos of fads and theories; and, so far from being callous, the public is perhaps more receptive today than it has ever been in the history of our country. Particularly in these days of sacrifice the need of a definite creed is very acute. If we ever hope for the conversion of America, now is the acceptable time. If we wish the non-Catholic public to realize our position, we ourselves must place it before them instead of waiting for them to come to us. So the work and methods embodied in the Catholic Truth Gild are most opportune at the present day. While at first it might have seemed only a bold experiment, the test of practice has proved it a most practical and efficient vehicle of missionary work. For this reason the promoters and friends of the movement hope to see it grow, as it deserves to grow, to national proportions and to become self-supporting. Already a group of enthusiastic Ohio Catholics are discussing the foundation of a branch in that State. Let us hope that their plans may materialize and that others will join in furthering the purpose expressed in the Gild motto, "To make the Catholic Church better known and loved."

State Control and Socialism

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

FEW words are used so frequently, and at the same time with so ill-defined a meaning, as the term "Socialism." State control, government or municipal ownership, and all similar measures are indiscriminately spoken of as "Socialistic." Slight attention is paid to the startling difference which may exist in the nature or ultimate tendencies of such movements. There is question of no mere academic precision in the use of words, but of a confusion of ideas that may lead to the gravest civic and moral disorders when these ideas are translated into action. Men fail to perceive the important distinction between practices entirely Christian, in the national developments of the day, and purposes purely radical and subversive of the social order. To all alike, therefore, the same epithet is applied, whether in approval or deprecation: "Socialistic."

Now the fact is that the very men who have most persistently fought Socialism in the past, and who will continue to combat it until the mere name alone remains, have always advocated a reasonable State control, so far as might be necessary, and freely admit of a restricted government or municipal ownership, within certain well-defined limits. What these are may be gathered from the object itself for which alone the civil laws and institutions of a country and its governmental administration exist, namely, in the words of Pope Leo XIII: "to realize public well-being and private prosperity," particular regard being always had for the interests of the poor.

There is a point, however, at which State control degenerates into State paternalism, and where, like an excessive government ownership, it may rightly be called Socialistic. In such a case it no longer contributes to the common good, which must ever be the one object of government activity. Yet it is then to be regarded as Socialistic, not because it has in any way become identified with Socialism, but solely because it expresses a tendency in that direction and is helping to prepare the way for Socialist ideals. By accustoming the minds of men to radicalism and its unchristian principles, it may moreover help to popularize the delusive economics of real Socialism, and likewise lead to an acceptance of its philosophy. Yet even then State control and State ownership, no matter how excessive or absolute, can never in themselves constitute Socialism. They still differ essentially from it. The very idea of the State itself, as now understood, must first be abolished before Socialism, in the proper sense of the word, can make its beginning. Hence, the need of accuracy in our language when dealing with these important and highly actual topics of the day.

From the Catholic point of view, private ownership, whether in the means of consumption or production, is to be fostered and protected, though no quarter should be given to the abuses that may spring from it. This principle does not prevent the introduction of government ownership, where the common good may actually require it, as in the case of certain public service utilities, according to particular circumstances of time and place. Such ownership would obviously be limited to definite utilities and could be established upon the supposition only that due compensation was made to private owners. The State, we must always remember, does not exist for the purpose of undertaking by itself what can be accomplished equally well, or far better, by private enterprise when duly regulated. Nor is government ownership the first step in the economic process. If intended to remedy abuses, it should follow only where State control is incapable of attaining this end.

We thus approach the vital and practical question of State control. It is the remedy to which the economic writers of our day are inclining, and which is everywhere finding favor in the legislatures of the world. Yet State control is not the immediate measure to which recourse should be had in every difficulty. Its application is appropriate only where self-help proves unavailing to meet the economic evils of the day. Such is the case when the rapaciousness of private capitalists cannot otherwise be curbed; when just prices, fair wages and similar conditions, essential to the public welfare, can be brought about by government intervention alone.

State control, so conditioned and so limited, is in no sense Socialistic, but entirely Catholic, and has for its support the best traditions of Catholic times. For this was the State instituted, that it might provide adequately for the common good, without interfering unduly with individual enterprise. To confuse such measures with Socialism is to dress the latter out in borrowed plumage.

Social reforms may indeed be included in the Socialist platform, but this does not make them Socialistic. On the contrary, they are clearly recognized as not Socialistic in so far as they are advisedly included as a bait to lure men on to Socialism itself, which is entirely different in nature. To confuse them therefore with Socialism is to play directly into the hands of political Socialist agitators. It was due to a similar confusion that Socialism gained its foothold in the past. Though it might always be detected by its exaggerations and its infusion of passion and hatred, yet Socialism won its following by assuming the strictly Catholic rôle of opposition to capitalistic greed, to the exploitation of women, children and the unprotected laborer. The next step was to lead men into the errors and delusions, economic, moral and religious, which constitute the system of Socialism itself.

Sterling Socialists, no doubt, from their own point of view, look with apprehension at the confusion existing at the present moment regarding the true meaning of Socialism. While it may serve to plunge the masses into a movement of whose real nature and purpose they are ignorant, it at the same time threatens to carry away with it many of the landmarks of Socialism itself. Catholics have nothing to gain by this, but rather will find morality and religion imperiled the more, in so far as the spirit of Socialism will remain to infect the masses through its radicalism and its anti-Christian literature which will be more widely popularized. The actual harm done by Socialism does not consist so much in the number of converts it makes, as in the radicalism, immorality and irreligion it propagates. Even the laborer who strongly opposes it may often be found infected with at least some of its poisonous principles.

Yet the dangers of State control itself are no less real when it is heedlessly employed, without prudence and restraint. History teaches the lesson that only at their peril can citizens permit such control to degenerate into State paternalism. The latter, as past experience shows, may readily become little less tyrannical than Socialism itself would prove to be.

It is the greed of a certain class of unconscionable capitalists that necessitates such measures. It was the same class which, by grinding down the laborer, gave birth to Socialism: "greedy speculators," Pope Leo XIII stigmatized them, men "who use human beings as mere instruments for money-making." Their immoral attempt to absorb excessive profits from the public and thus wring the blood from the poor has led to the present crisis. Care must be taken that the reaction is not excessive, but that in every way the common good be really promoted by the State. The change of mind brought about, particularly during the course of the war, when this criminal abuse of extortionate prices reached its height, was strikingly described on the floor of the Senate by Mr. Francis G. Newlands. As Chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, he had thoroughly familiarized himself with existing conditions. The Senator thus related his own personal experience:

> I will state, Mr. President, that I have been drifting in my views for some time. I started as a thoroughgoing individualist. I yielded to the necessity of public regulation. I should deplore government ownership of anything, and yet I may drift toward that. I do not think the exigency has arisen yet. I do not think we have sufficiently tried out public regulation of railroads to say that the regulation of railroads is not satisfactory. On the contrary, I think we have accomplished great results. I think it may be necessary to enlarge the area of public utilities in interstate commerce by declaring some things to be affected with a public use that hitherto have not been affected with a public use, but I should move along very cautiously in that direction. We have moved along in that direction with reference to coal and with reference to wheat, but we have limited the duration of that legislation to the war; but it may be so successful that, perhaps in some modified form, it may find a permanent place on the statute books. I am unable to predict as to that. I simply wish to call attention to the tendency of the times and to the fact that almost all of us have been wrenched from our old moorings by the extraordinary exigencies of this war and that our reasoning has been driven into unaccustomed channels. (Congressional Record, August 25, 1917.)

It was not the exigency of the war which created the abuses in question, but it intensified them by offering unwonted opportunities for greed and extortion, and so precipitated the tendency towards a larger State control. Caution and circumspection must be the watchwords of this movement, that it may keep clear of the excesses of radicalism and limit itself to the real needs of the common good. So the world will be saved from drifting into the economic errors of Socialism and from the acceptance, it might be, of its pagan philosophy.

A Chaplains' Reserve Corps

GEORGE J. WARING, U.S.A.

THE demand for priests to act as chaplains for our soldiers, both at home and across the sea, during this war, is very great. The young men, who by the hundreds of thousands are going to defend our country and our flag, are coming from every parish and every diocese of America. They are members of our best Catholic families, men who have been attending our churches and belong to our church societies. In time of peace, they have been strong supporters of the Church and have regularly attended to their religious duties. It must not be said that these stalwart Catholic citizens were neglected, when they most needed the services of their priests. A deep interest is being taken in this matter by all the Bishops, priests and laity, but the problem of providing suitable priests in a suitable way is very great indeed.

If the parents of our soldiers were asked their opinion, they would gladly vote to have fewer Masses in their parish churches, so that more priests would be made available to accompany and protect their sons on the firing line. There are hundreds of parishes in the United States, where one Mass could be eliminated and one priest could be relieved to become an army chaplain. In fact, the congregations of those large churches will be so reduced by their large contributions of soldiers to the war, that there will be no difficulty in providing a sufficient accommodation for their people with one Mass less.

But there remains the difficulty of making proper provision for the priests who enter the service. To my mind, any plan which does not provide regularly commissioned chaplains is unsatisfactory. Only chaplains who have been commissioned by the Government and who possess rank and authority can do effective work in wartime. Clergymen who have no rank will undoubtedly receive every courtesy while performing their duties, but courtesy is not sufficient when life and death are involved.

An unofficial chaplain will always be required to get proper permission even from sub-officers before he can carry out his duties. A military chaplain who is an officer has rights which entitle him at all times to enter hospitals and to demand cooperation in giving the Sacraments and spiritual comfort to the sick and dying. Furthermore, it is not practical from a business point of view to undertake, from private funds, the support and care of priests, especially during these times when they will be exposed to serious injury or death on the battlefield. Even if priests in sufficient numbers can be supported by private organizations, it will also be necessary to create pension funds, so that they and their dependents will get the same protection in case of death or serious injury, which the Government provides for its regularly commissioned officers.

Today, the United States Government is spending billions of dollars to prosecute this great war. While there is evidence of tremendous activity and preparation, there is no sign of impecuniousness in any direction which will help to bring the war to a successful end. A board of the most representative physicians of the United States was called in consultation by the Government to suggest ways and means of protecting the morality of the young soldiers who are being gathered together from every home, in every city and State of the Union. It was the unanimous verdict of these doctors that the only sure protection against immorality is continency. As a further evidence of the Government's determination to protect the morals of soldiers, the Secretary of War, Mr. Newton D. Baker, has appointed a Commission under the presidency of Mr. Raymond B. Fosdick, whose duties are to make such regulations as will create and preserve a wholesome environment in and about all the military camps. In a letter which the Secretary of War wrote to the mayors of all the different towns in the neighborhood of the National Army cantonments and the National Guard camps, and to the sheriffs of every county in which these cantonments and camps are situated, he said:

> In the second place, while we have fixed a five-mile radius around the camps, in which prostitution is strictly to be put down, the War Department will not tolerate evil resorts of any kind within easy reach of the camp, even though such resorts lie without the five-mile point. Any places of bad repute springing up outside the five-mile limit, but fairly accessible to the camp, I shall not hesitate to insist upon eliminating. . . . Finally, let me say that the War Department will not tolerate the existence of any restricted district within an effective radius of the camp. Experience has proved that such districts in the vicinity of army camps, no matter how conducted, are inevitably attended by unhappy consequences. The only practical policy which presents itself in relation to this problem is the policy of absolute repression, and I am confident that in taking this course, the War Department has placed itself in line with the best thought and practice which modern police experience has developed. This policy involves, of course, constant vigilance on the part of the police, not only in eliminating regular houses of prostitution, but in checking the more or less clandestine class that walks the street and is apt to frequent lodging houses and hotels. Meanwhile, I am sure the country is looking to us to cooperate effectively in this matter and to make the surroundings of our camps worthy of the fine spirit of the nation which entrusts these young men to us to be trained for service in the great cause.

Is it to be supposed that the military authorities who are not sparing time, labor or expense, and are determined to protect the morals of our soldiers, will refuse to supply a sufficient number of clergymen of all denominations to assist in this high and praiseworthy object? Mr. Charles P. Neil, former Commissioner of Labor of the United States, now a member of the above-mentioned Commission, told me that he felt certain that the Government would acquiesce in a request for chaplains to any number necessary, so that this great work of protecting the morals of soldiers might be secured. It goes without saying that chaplains, who, by their very lives, training and experience, are the best qualified to develop, protect and sustain morality, will be of invaluable use to the Government in its campaign against all forms of evil. It will not be difficult to prove to such high-minded men as Mr. Baker and those who are cooperating with him in this admirable pursuit, that morality without religion is very difficult, if not entirely impossible. Therefore, the few million dollars, which it will cost the Government to supply, support and pension a sufficient number of chaplains to care for the entire new army will be ungrudgingly appropriated.

The Medical Corps has an unlimited reserve corps of officers to meet the demands which will necessarily be made upon it, both at home and abroad during this great conflict. The Quartermaster Corps, the Signal Corps and almost every other corps of the army, except the Chaplain Corps, have been provided with a reserve corps of officers to supply their needs for the period of the war. The Chaplain Corps will not be neglected if proper representation is made. For the first time in history, a great country, the United States, has acknowledged the value of religion and morality as indispensable for victory in war. Our Government has announced a laudable ambition and is determined to spare no effort to keep our soldiers morally and physically clean. It has realized that if everything possible is not done for the welfare of the soldiers, large numbers will be rendered incapable of fighting and will be sent back home to spread evil, while the good and pure will be mowed down in battle.

It is not merely an ideal the Government is striving for, it is making an earnest effort to get from all citizens the best that is in them, so as to preserve our well-earned liberties and to bequeath to America a stock of virile men and women, who will be morally, mentally and physically, capable of enjoying and transmitting the noble ideals of freedom and democracy, for which we are fighting. It was with this idea in mind that I proposed a resolution to the recent convention of the National War Council, which was held in Washington, asking the convention to petition the War Department to seek legislation to provide a Chaplains' Reserve Corps of sufficient number of all denominations to supply the needs of all our soldiers in all camps and cantonments in America and abroad during the war.

These chaplains will have the same rank, pay and protection in life and limb, while they are in the Government's service, as all other chaplains who are appointed permanently. There can be no doubt about the Government's willingness to supply these chaplains. It is merely a question of bringing forcibly to the attention of the War Department the need and value of chaplains to supply the spiritual needs of soldiers and to assist the military authorities in accomplishing their great and noble object of maintaining a high moral and physical efficiency.

The Knights of Columbus are doing a very noble and praiseworthy work. After thirteen years' experience as an army chaplain, I welcome with open arms their practical work in helping chaplains to provide the many things, which we, unaided, were unable to give to our soldiers. I only hope that the Knights of Columbus will make permanent this work which the exigencies of war have caused them to undertake. Every dollar contributed to them is a dollar well invested. They will need all the funds they can possibly obtain, and my one fear is that they will not get sufficient to supply all the demands that will be made on them before peace is concluded.

There is one expense, however, that they should not be expected to incur, and that is the support of priests in the army. This is the Government's duty. It is the right of Catholics in America to have a sufficient number of clergymen to protect the spiritual interests of those men who have been drafted into the military service, to fight and even die for their country. Priests on the battlefield will be exposed to injury, and unless they are protected by military commissions, the Government assumes no responsibility for their medical care or for their future well-being, or that of their dependents, in case of death. It is not to be expected that the Knights of Columbus can form a pension fund for priests, nor is it advisable or practical that they should do so when money is so badly needed for other more pressing needs.

If we Catholics, in conjunction with non-Catholics, who are as deeply interested in this matter as ourselves, ask the Government to pass the necessary legislation to provide a Chaplains' Reserve Corps, the problem of priestly protection for our soldiers will be permanently and satisfactorily solved. Should the Government provide an insufficient number of reserve chaplains, the Knights of Columbus could supply the remainder, thus reducing the number of those who will be exposed to injury or death without pension. Even should the Government refuse to establish a Chaplains' Reserve Corps, an unlikely contingency, we shall be no worse off then than we are at present. It is clearly our duty to bring to the attention of the Government the great need of priests for our soldiers in the camps and on the battlefields, and by united effort, urge the formation of a Chaplains' Reserve Corps, the only practical method of accomplishing what we Catholics consider to be a most pressing and vital need during this great international conflict.

Animal Pets and Human Needs

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

ONE of our New York newspapers announced the other day that since the war began more pets have been buried in New York's canine cemetery than during the previous eighteen years. It is not that the war has brought about a greater mortality among animals, but more people than ever are so much interested in their pets that they are willing to spend considerable sums of money in caring for their dead bodies. And though the war is increasing human needs as time goes on, this year the number of requests for plots in which to bury dogs' bodies has been twice that of a year ago. This despite the fact that there probably never was a time when so many poor human beings suffered so severely for the lack of the absolute necessaries of life. Above all there never was a time when so many children have been starving to death because of the economic conditions brought about in certain European countries by the war.

This wonderful canine cemetery has a large number of magnificent monuments in it. The story is told with a good deal of gusto that "There has been no saving of expense in the monuments placed over some of the graves. Some have cost $2,500 and, including the price paid for the plot and other expenses, the total individual outlay is frequently as much as $3,000 and $4,000." Here as elsewhere competition in the vulgar display of wealth is causing the cost of the monuments to increase all the time. Arrangements were recently made for the erection of a mausoleum ten feet square, at a cost of $10,000. Adding to this the cost of the ground the total expense for the burial of a dead dog will be $13,000. The end is not yet and as money means nothing to some of these people, it is only a question of time when we shall have a $25,000 mausoleum and a monument for a dog quite equal to any erected over men.

The details of the arrangement are interesting. The average lot in the cemetery is six feet by six feet and the price is ninety dollars, somewhat less than three dollars a square foot. It is quite needless to say that any such lot will not suffice for very wealthy owners, they must have a plot, not a lot. According to reports, one of the plots owned by the president of an insurance company measures twenty-four by thirty-six feet and cost over $2,000. Some of the plots are "family burying-grounds for animal pets" and are used for successive generations of beasts. The cheapest coffin for a dog is ten dollars, the highest $250. The cheaper coffins are of wood and the more expensive coffins, or rather caskets, are of metal; the inner casket is of steel with hermetically sealed top. In the cemetery there is a receiving vault for holding the coffins until the grave is prepared for burial.

Every detail of the modern cemetery, as it has developed under the fostering influence of wealth, is imitated in this cemetery for dogs. As the needs of poor human beings grow greater in this time of stress more and more attention is paid to the bodies of animals, and more and more of the devotion that should be shown men and women is lavished on quadrupeds.

Strange, too, that as the number of children in families has decreased the number of pet animals has increased. Not only that but the amount of attention given to them has also increased. The fact of the matter is that the most satisfying thing in life is affection and for women particularly the exercise of their affections is almost a necessity. Childless, they proceed to devote themselves to animals, thus giving new evidence of a serious perversion of God-given gifts.

True, animals may be kept for some definite purpose and then reasonable care should be given them, but to keep them merely for the sake of their companionship is a misuse of some of the most precious qualities of humanity. Of course pet animals keep solitary people from loneliness, but then loneliness is a feeling definitely intended to discourage people from retiring too much within themselves and forgetting how much men and women about them need their service. A dog will occupy attention and keep people from thinking too much about themselves, and when they are old and it is almost hopeless to expect them to form habits of giving attention to other people, perhaps the companionship of an animal is not improper. I have occasionally prescribed a dog for an elderly maiden lady too deeply intent on herself for her own good, and so lonely that she gave herself too much to introspection. Besides, the necessity of seeing that the dog got exercise put exercise into her own life and, above all, required hours outdoors that otherwise would have been hard to secure. For all sorts of excuses keep people indoors unless there is some very definite reason for going out, and the necesity for a daily outing for the dog will take them out even on rainy days when the rain is not too severe, and on snowy days when they would not otherwise think of venturing forth.

That young vigorous women should overcome their loneliness, providentially designed, as it seems to me, to make them think of other people, by devoting themselves to the care of an animal, is one of the inhumanities that always creep in whenever "wealth accumulates and men decay." Going to the dogs is a very definite state superinduced by the proper lack of interest in life, whether that lack be due to vagrancy or to the absence of serious occupation. The tramp and the wealthy person with nothing to do have much more in common than is usually supposed, though their likeness is well illustrated by the old joke in which the American, asked in Europe if we had no leisure class, said: "Oh, yes, we call them tramps."

It is curiously interesting to watch a "dowager duchess" and her over-fat poodle out for a constitutional. There is a symbolism in it worthy of note. The stroll is not very long and they both go through it with a solemnity which shows very clearly that it is a duty and not a recreation. They are both suffering from conditions not unlike those which are deliberately planned in order to secure fat goose livers for the market. When the epicure's palate is to be tickled by specially fattened goose livers the geese are tempted to feed over-abundantly on food that they like very much, indeed it is sometimes actually forced down their throats, and they themselves are kept in a temperature as absolutely equable as possible, in a dim light, and in conditions that enforce absolute immobility. At Strasburg, in the old days when Strasburg pâtés de foie gras were the most eagerly sought and commanded the highest price, the geese were imprisoned in cellars with their feet buried in cement which hardened and prevented all movement. Then they were stuffed with nutritious food. No wonder they developed that precious fatty degeneration of the liver which tickled the gourmand's, but never the gourmet's palate.

Most pet animals get into a condition of fatty degeneration more or less resembling this after a time. Their fond mistresses then—and it should not be forgotten that the word fond had originally more than a tinge of the meaning of foolishness in it—instead of bringing happiness or pleasure in any true sense of these words into the lives of their pets, actually predispose them to suffering.

In the meantime the opportunity to exercise petty tyranny over their pets often has a very unfortunate effect on the characters and dispositions of their mistresses. Those who grow used to controlling animals by fear alone often lose the proper disposition to enable them to get on with human beings. They forget how much sympathy is needed in dealing with fellow-mortals, how much self-control is demanded, how often compromise is absolutely indispensable in order to have various relationships continue successfully.

Thus the keeping of animal pets often becomes an unfortunate practice for which there is little or no justification. Now that the greatest of world wars is making demands on human charity and affection that can hardly be satisfied, there is surely no adequate reason for keeping pets merely for the satisfaction of affections and the sense of companionship.

Moreover surely the food wasted on pet animals would save the lives of many starving children. Recently a young woman was heard to remark: "I must have a young chicken sent home; my Pekinese will eat nothing else. Poor thing, he is not himself these days."

The time and affection wasted on dogs would, if properly spent on human beings, do a great deal to solve some of our most clamorous social problems. Surely no one with any serious purpose in life can justify this waste of time, of money, of human energy and above all, of God-given human affection. It is thoroughly pagan in itself and is too injurious to character.

The Grave of Lafayette

COMTESSE DE COURSON.

THE cemetery visited in July of this year by General Pershing and a delegation of American troops, lies, at the east of Paris, in an unfashionable quarter, close to a broad square, once called Place du Trone and now known as Place de la Nation. It is enclosed within monastic ground and except on rare occasions, of which July 4 is one, is a curiously silent spot, hallowed by tragic memories.

The Sisters who live in the convent were half startled, but still more thrilled by the influx of distinguished visitors, who this year filled their enclosure. The war brings many surprises, none greater, we imagine, than a military invasion of the Picpus cemetery by an American general and his soldiers.

Not indeed that at any moment, the grave of Lafayette was forgotten by his admirers from the United States. I well remember how, during the years before the war, the Stars and Stripes floated above the slab, upon which lay visiting cards and floral offerings brought by American hands. But these annual celebrations were nothing compared to this year's display, when, underlying the show that made the good Sisters marvel, we realized the solemn significance of an historical event: the entrance of the United States into the great war.

At first sight, there seems a curious contrast between the political and historical importance of this fact, and the tranquil, old-world atmosphere suggestive of prayer, retirement and unworldliness. But the silence that reigns at Picpus is peopled with stirring memories and fraught with tragedies that are perhaps more harrowing than those our soldiers have to face. If the ghosts of the past should come to rise from their graves, what a varied, tumultuous and dramatic crowd would fill this quiet cemetery! The fact of Lafayette being buried in this remote spot, out of reach of the roar of the great city, is a direct consequence of these tragedies, in which the women, who touched him most closely, were involved.

The French Revolution of 1789, which at the outset many leading Frenchmen, Lafayette among them, hailed as marking the advent of a golden age, promptly degenerated into the Reign of Terror. Even the men who, with more enthusiasm than far-sightedness, believed that the revolution spelt reform were then counted as "enemies of the nation," because they made a stand against the violence of tyrants like Robespierre and his party. They were outlawed, imprisoned and many of them perished on the scaffold. Lafayette saved his head by leaving the country, but some of his nearest relatives were executed.

It was a time of madness when the guillotine was at work in many large towns and blood was poured out like water. Thirteen hundred people were beheaded between June 14 and July 27, 1794, on the Place da la Nation, close to the Picpus cemetery.

They were hastily buried at night-fall in a disused sand pit, near the ruins of an Augustinian priory, a few steps only from the place of execution, but the faithful hearts of many mourners had taken note of their unhonored graves.

Toward 1802, a subscription was started among these bereaved people; the sand pit was walled in; the adjoining field became a cemetery where the descendants of the victims of the Reign of Terror chose to rest, near their martyred kindred; a church was built where Mass is said for the repose of departed souls and a community of Sisters in the restored priory daily pray for the same intention.

Among the founders of the church was Lafayette's wife, Adrienne de Noailles, whose grandmother, mother and sister perished on the adjoining Place on July 22. The grave of Lafayette who, by reason of his connection with the victims of the Reign of Terror, acquired the right of being interred at Picpus, is close to the bit of rough ground where lie these 1,300 people; his devoted wife sleeps by his side. She was a woman of rare intelligence, courage and unselfishness, whose checkered life was governed in every detail by her strong religious principles.

Over these joint graves, General Pershing delivered his spirited speech on July 4, 1917, in presence of a delegation of American troops and of many notable Frenchmen, among whom was Marshal Joffre. Never had the quiet cemetery witnessed so numerous and brilliant a gathering!

Patriotic Americans, who may at some time visit Lafayette's grave, will be interested to hear that other associations scarcely less captivating are connected with the Picpus burial ground, especially with the walled enclosure, where rest the guillotinés whose sacrifice was offered on the neighboring Place.

These form a varied company: among them were court ladies, Sisters, nuns, priests, a bishop, poets and scientists. Their names are inscribed on two large slabs in the church and, from these authentic records, we gather that the majority were workmen, peasants, laborers, poor and obscure people, who, in the misused name of liberty, were condemned to a cruel death, without being given an opportunity of defending themselves.

Against the stone wall that encloses the common grave where these people were hastily buried in the course of six tragic weeks, is a large white marble slab, that appeals in a special manner to Catholics. It reminds them that among the victims were sixteen Carmelite nuns, who were executed on July 17, 1794, and beatified by Pope Pius X. ten years ago. The story of their martyrdom has often been told: they belonged to the Carmelite Convent of Compiegne; they were beheaded merely because they continued to follow their religious rule and, guarded and encouraged by their prioress they went to their death singing. At the foot of the guillotine, sixteen voices started the "Laudate"; a few minutes later one voice, that of the prioress, who asked to die last, finished the Psalm.

Another tablet reminds the pilgrim that on July 19, a young Breton nun, Victoire de St. Luc, was executed with her father and mother. Like the Carmelites, she was guilty of the offense of painting and distributing pictures of the Sacred Heart and, like them, she went to her death smiling.

The women of the house of Noailles, to which, by birth, Madame de Lafayette belonged, have a distinguished place in this motley company. These court ladies were as devout and resigned as the nuns and their heroic death fitly crowned lives of absolute devotion to duty. With Madame de Lafayette's grandmother, the aged Duchess de Noailles, perished her mother the Duchess d'Ayen, whose somewhat austere piety and utter unworldliness contrasted with the wealth and brilliancy of her surroundings. She brought up her five daughters with grave tenderness and they did credit to her training. The eldest of the five, Madame de Lafayette's favorite sister, the Vicomtesse de Noailles, was executed with her mother and grandmother; she had the face of an angel and the soul of a saint and, to the last, we are told, encouraged her companions to be strong and to pray. A supreme consolation was given to these three noble women. An old Oratorian, whom they had known in happier days, took up his station in the street when the carts with the victims passed by; undiscovered by his neighbors, but recognized by the Duchess and her daughter, he gave them absolution; he never forgot the radiant smile that rewarded his act of courage.

It would carry us beyond the limits of this paper to enlarge further on the memories that are connected with this tragic spot: André Chenier, the poet, Lavoisier, the scientist, the Bishop of Agde, the Maréchal de Mouchy, a veteran, whose last words were: "At the age of seventeen, I went to battle for my king; at eighty years of age, I ascend the scaffold for my God." All these and many others were done to death on the neighboring Place and have slept for 121 years in the silent enclosure, close to Lafayette's grave.

To American visitors who find their way to Picpus, these memories cannot fail to prove interesting: courage, patience, religious faith, appeal to us all, especially at moments of tension, in face of a tremendous effort and of a possible sacrifice.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Starving Belgian Babies

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you be so good as to allow me to make an appeal to your readers for assistance for the Belgian babies. Their condition is very pitiful and should bespeak the sympathy of all who have any knowledge of their sufferings. They are without food and are literally starving. Many of them are sent with the permission of the German authorities to Switzerland and about 500 each month to Holland, where they are fed and nursed back to health. At Scheveningue, near La Haye, in Holland, there is a community of nuns called the "Sisters of the Little Ones," in charge of a hospital in which they receive sick and debilitated children. They are all trained children's nurses and by their expert and charitable care great numbers of frail and failing children are saved from death and restored to health. The community was obliged to flee from Antwerp when the city was being bombarded, and for a time took refuge in one of our convents in England, but they have returned to their work and are endeavoring to carry it on in spite of the immense difficulties arising from shortage of food and lack of funds. They need money to buy medicine and food and especially milk. Cardinal Mercier has requested me to make this appeal to the good, charitable people of America in behalf of the babies under the care of this particular community and for all the suffering children of Belgium. The appeal has the approval of Cardinal Gibbons and Cardinal Farley, and of many other prelates and persons of note.

Our own Congregation of the Sisters of Charity of Ghent has thirty convents in Belgium where blind, deaf, dumb and mentally deficient orphans and abandoned children are cared for. All of these are in urgent need of assistance. England is almost exhausted with the many demands made on her charity and cannot adequately meet the situation. But America, pledged as it is to restore Belgium, cannot be indifferent to the cries of these little waifs and sufferers, who will die unless help is forthcoming. If the rich will give of their wealth and the poor of their poverty, countless numbers of these helpless little ones may be saved from untimely ends. Contributions may be sent to Messrs. Alexander Brown & Sons, Baltimore, Md.

Bury, Lancashire, England. MOTHER MARY DUGGAN.

Unlisted Enlistments

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There are hidden saints and unlisted enlisters. They are the heroic mothers, fathers, and sisters of the courageous boys who in the spirit of sacrifice and loyalty have offered their lives to defend the honor of their national mother, America. A bullet or shell may still their lives and bring a reward to their sacrifice, but on many a household-altar sorrowing hearts will be offered long after their boys' hearts are stilled in death.

The following letter shows a mother's pierced heart wherein God has poured the oil and wine of His consoling grace. The daughter is a Sister in a certain convent where I recently gave a retreat. The letter seemed so pathetically loyal and motherly resigned that I thought it might bring consolation to mothers' hearts, for mothers only can speak to mothers' hearts:

My dear Daughter:

Your sweet letter reached us yesterday and brought much consolation and comfort to myself and father, as well as to your brothers and sisters. It would be hard for me to tell you in a letter the many events that took place in our home, the last week that Albert spent with us. We were all so glad to have him come home; only to have our joys shattered and be left in sorrow and lonesomeness.

My daughter, my sorrows are yours also; and you ask me to tell you just what took place here. I shall give you the opening and the closing scenes only. You will judge for yourself how hard it has been for us all.

He came home from Detroit, Sunday morning, just in time for ten-thirty Mass. When he came in, I suppose, he thought I had been feeling badly, so he sat down in the kitchen where I was preparing dinner; and he said in a most sad way; "Mother, how do you feel about my going to war? I hope you do not take it too hard. You must have the proper spirit." Looking at me, with his eyes full of tears, he began to sing softly "America, Here is Thy Boy." I begged him to leave the room for I was then prostrated, but he put his arms around me, and asked me to be brave, because "Duty called him and he must go."

By that time, the family had all gone out of the kitchen and I saw, with the grace of God, that I was called upon to make a sacrifice, a sacrifice, by offering my son, who is as tender and dear to me now, as when he was laid in my arms at his birth. But, since he is willing to leave the world and all its pleasures, it must be for his good and surely our prayers will follow him.

Now, I will tell you, oh, how hard, it was, to part. Ruth and Gertrude were the only two that could be home for dinner. Father, also George and Marguerite could not come, however, we ate our dinner and he left soon after. He took off his ring, his watch and cuff-links and said: "Here, Mother, these are yours. Take care of them until I come back." He gave everything he owned away and went with what he had on and his beads.

My child, it was a cruel parting. As I tell them, to enlist in time of peace is bad enough, but we are in war, and God alone knows what it is coming to. Albert, surely will be in great danger and when I saw him for the last time, I thought, "Will you ever see us again, will you ever come back"? It surely was hard for him to leave us. His white face showed the awful strain he was undergoing.

And now that it is all over with, you wonder how I am. Well, I am trying to live through it, for the sake of those who call me mother and for poor father. It is always hard for him you know. He took it very hard when you left and of course this parting was a hard blow to him.

Only for our holy religion that gives us comfort in time of sorrow, we should never be able to stand it. I feel that many prayers have been offered for us, since we are all back to our work again without any serious breakdown.

I will not forget all you tell me, dear child, to put my trust in the Blessed Mother and to place your brother within the Sacred Heart, where I know, he will be safe. Do not forget us, we need your prayers. With fond remembrances from the family, I am,

Your loving mother.

Here indeed is a mother after God's Heart.

Baltimore. W. J. ENNIS, S. J.

St. Patrick's Purgatory

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is pleasing to learn that the litigation concerning St. Patrick's Purgatory has ended satisfactorily, but is not Mr. Leslie in error when he writes that it was settled without recourse to British law? According to the Liverpool Catholic Times the action has just been tried at the Donegal Quarter Sessions, and has resulted in a rejection of Sir John Leslie's claim. In giving judgment, Judge Cooke, a non-Catholic, reviewed the history of Lough Derg. All the estate surrounding the island once belonged to the Catholic Church. At the Reformation a certain Bishop Leslie, who had transferred his affections from Scotland to Donegal, secured the estate, and an Act of Parliament was sought to put a stop to the pilgrimages. But the pilgrimages continued. The Catholics never gave up posession of the island. Authority over it was exercised by the prior who received the rent of the cottages in earlier times a penny a year, and later a shilling. "I am convinced," said Judge Cooke, "that the original Church which owned the island never laid aside its claim, and never acknowledged that anyone else had dominion over this ancient and holy ground." A decision was therefore rendered in favor of the Bishop of Clogher.

New York. ANDREW A. MACERLEAN.

The Pope's Proposal and the President's Reply

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The fundamental idea as expressed in the Vatican's proposal is that right be established in the place of might, that armaments be diminished, and that arbitration be substituted for armies.

The President states his conception of the foundation of the Pope's plan as follows: "His Holiness in substance proposes that we return to the status quo ante-bellum." This is not the basis of the Pope's proposal which, instead of advocating a return to anything, urges the substitution throughout the world of the moral force of right for the material force of might. This, instead of a return on its path, would be a great advance for civilization.

The most serious objection urged by the President to the acceptance of the Pope's proposal is contained in the expressed fear that the establishment of peace upon the basis of the proposal would permit a recovery by Germany of its full strength and place it in a position to renew its present policy. In the first place, this takes into consideration only the danger to world-peace from those at present in control of the German Empire, whereas the Pope's plan obviates such an assault on the part of any nation by establishing right as the universal guide of national conduct, and enforcing such conduct on the part of any recalcitrant nation through coercion by all the other nations. If the proposal were followed out, there would be a mutual diminution of armaments to an arbitrary minimum to be determined upon. Therefore, Germany's armament would be reduced to this arbitrary size. It is difficult to see how there could be any recuperation of strength with this diminished armament kept at a fixed minimum. If Germany attempted to use this minimum armament for purposes of aggression, or sought to increase it, the plan provides for the prevention of such violation of her word of honor by the united opposition of all the other nations.

Nor would the proposed plan result, as President Wilson says, "in abandoning the new-born Russia to the intrigue . . . attempted by all the malign influences to which the German Government has of late accustomed the world." On the contrary, the plan provides against this by its fundamental establishment of right, and the enforcement of such conduct on the part of all nations.

The President asks: "Can peace be based upon a restitution of its (Germany's) power or upon any word of honor it could pledge?" No, but such is not the basis for peace that the Pope proposes. President Wilson further writes: "No peace can rest securely upon political or economic restrictions meant to benefit some nations and cripple or embarrass others, upon vindictive action of any sort, or any kind of revenge or deliberate injury." This is true, and it is one of the reasons why the Pope's plan rests upon such a secure foundation, for in its essence as well as in its explicit suggestions, it provides against political and economic restrictions, against the crippling and embarrassment of any nation, against vindictive action of any sort, against any kind of revenge, against any deliberate injury.

The President says: "The test . . . of every plan of peace is this: Is it based upon the faith of all the peoples involved?" . . The foundation of the Pope's plan embraces this very thing, the faith of all the peoples involved. If Germany accepted his plan it would be one of the clearest evidences of good faith and its freedom from the military autocracy which has so long dominated it.

President Wilson declares: "An enduring peace . . . must be based upon justice and fairness and the common rights of mankind." This is the very foundation of the Pope's proposal..

Further, according to the President, "We cannot take the word of the present rulers of Germany as a guarantee of anything that is to endure, unless explicitly supported by . . . conclusive evidence of the will and purpose of the German people themselves . . . " Germany's change from a military nation to a nation listening to the pacific proposals of the Pope, speaking as the Vicar of the Prince of Peace, would be the clearest possible evidence of the exercise by the German people of such will and purpose. Moreover, the Pope's plan provides for their continuance along that path, by the united action of all the other nations.

And not only does it make provision against attack upon the peace of the world by the German people, but by any other people, against whom would be exerted equally the combined power of the rest of the world.

The President concludes: "We must await some new evidence of the purposes of the great peoples of the Central Powers. God grant it may be given soon and in a way to restore the confidence of all peoples everywhere in the faith of nations and the possibility of a covenanted peace."

No evidence of the purposes of the Central Powers could be an assurance of the faith of all nations. Such assurance is to be found, however, in the alliance of all nations, suggested by the Pope, based upon the Divine and eternal truth of the essential superiority of right over might as the guide for national conduct, and made feasible in its operations by the material force of all the nations exerted against any which broke its solemn pledge.

Point-à-Pic, Canada. G. T.

Mail for Soldiers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I note with some satisfaction that AMERICA can now be forwarded to the soldiers at the front by merely placing the one-cent stamp over the notice in the upper right-hand corner. This is certainly an excellent way to provide the boys with reading matter and I sincerely hope that the number of AMERICAS forwarded each week will overburden the mail man. We should all join in this movement. All kinds of magazines, some of them dangerous to the spiritual welfare of a Catholic, are sure to flood the camps, and naturally, if he can't get the right kind, the Catholic soldier will read the wrong kind, not with any malice but for lack of something else. We all know how dangerous such a practice might become to his faith.

I am in a position to send several back issues of AMERICA, Extension and the Catholic World to the front, and I know several others who would willingly do the same but we are somewhat at a loss just how to go about it. Of course, all these lack the notice in the upper corner, hence they can't be forwarded by merely placing a stamp on them. And again, we are at a loss how to address them in using the regular mailing system.

An answer in AMERICA to these small problems, I feel confident, would result in hundreds of Catholic magazines for our fighting brothers, which otherwise they might never receive.

Elizabeth, N. J. J. R.

[Papers and magazines for soldiers may be sent to the Chaplains' Aid Society, 580 Fifth Avenue, New York. Those who wish to send mail direct to soldiers in camp within the borders of the United States should use this form of address:

GEORGE JONES,
Company X, —— Regiment,
Camp Wadsworth,
Spartanburg, S. C.

The form of address for soldiers abroad is

FRANK SMITH,
Company X, —— Regiment,
American Expeditionary Force.

The address should be written legibly on the upper left-hand corner of the envelope.—Ed. AMERICA.]

"God the Invisible King"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I fear that the communication of Mr. Millar in AMERICA for August 25, may confuse an issue which seemed sufficiently clear. There are two aspects under which we may view H. W. Wells' "God the Invisible King." The first is to look upon the book as an explanation of the present religious opinions of its author. The other is to regard it as a sort of text-book of "modern" theology, giving expression to the spirit and trend of non-Catholic religious thought throughout the world. Mr. Wells insists that his work is of value and deserving of special attention, only when considered under this second aspect. Mr. Woodlock quite agrees with him. Hence, when the latter asserts that the "spirit of the book is a portent of the times and may perhaps be welcomed as the beginning of a movement towards the truth," he is evidently referring to the text-boox of modern theology and not merely to the religious vagaries of the English novelist.

In my former letter it was to this statement of Mr. Woodlock that I wished to take decided exception. For I am unable to persuade myself that the abandonment of Protestantism, for instance, in favor of this new religion marks any advance in the direction of truth. I fail to perceive any spiritual gain for those who cut loose from a perverted Christianity because of its inconsistencies, in order to plunge into an anti-Christianity teeming with greater and far more dangerous inconsistencies. Yet this is precisely what is happening if we may credit Mr. Wells. For he assures us that the new teaching is traceable in many professedly Christian books, and it is to be heard from Christian pulpits.

On the other and relatively unimportant question, whether or not the personal views of Mr. Wells in matters of religion have undergone a change for the better, whether the metamorphosis of the Huxleyan Rationalist into the ardent disciple of this newly found deity is really a step towards the light, I shall not quarrel with Mr. Millar. I have already expressed my view on that point and I see no reason for changing it.

However, I do think that Mr. Millar is a trifle inaccurate when he says that Mr. Wells is "undoubtedly thoroughly acquainted with Protestantism, but quite ignorant of the Catholic religion." When did the Nicene Creed become a peculiarly Protestant formula? The author of "God the Invisible King" seems remarkably conversant with it. Are the Unity and Trinity of God, the Virgin-Birth of Jesus Christ, his Divinity, the sacrificial nature of His death upon the Cross, doctrines peculiar to Protestantism? Yet Mr. Wells appears to have given considerable time and attention to their study.

Let me add in conclusion that it was far from my mind to say anything that could prove offensive to non-Catholic inquirers after the truth. Rather would I put them on their guard against this new theology, as a collection of errors most pernicious in their nature and destructive of all true religion.

Los Angeles, Calif. JOSEPH R. STACK, S. J.

Too Much Social Work

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Social workers are persons of high ideals, of feminine instincts, dreamers of utopian schemes for the betterment of humanity. They are largely recruited from the class of idle, well-to-do people. They have a great sympathy for those not so fortunate as themselves, and are, doubtless, sincere in their desire to do good. Let us pause for a moment and consider the causes that have produced such numbers of these busy people. For many years the wealthy people of our prosperous country have been donating funds to help the poor and distressed. These funds have been exempt from taxation and have increased immensely. The administration of this great trust necessitates the employment of many workers and has brought into public notice thousands of people all anxious to serve. So many have believed themselves called to this work that it is difficult to find paying places for them in private societies, hence the legislature is called upon each year to consider a constantly increasing number of measures which propose new departments in social work with their consequent addition of social workers. The Massachusetts legislature itself, recognizing the demands of the social-workers, so-called, three years ago appointed a "Social Welfare Committee" to hear these petitioners, and to this committee can be traced much of the "high-brow" legislation which has so greatly added to our State tax.

Now the questions in the mind of the every-day, common-sense tax-payer are: Where will this agitation lead and when is it going to reach a climax? The State is burdened almost to the limit of endurance in its efforts to care for its pauper and criminal element. To add to this burden the support of hundreds of social workers who never produced anything but dreams and high-flown speeches is unpardonable.

Massachusetts has reached its high place in statehood by adhering to good old common-sense methods of conducting its business. Of late years its tendency has been to stray very far away from the business methods that alone can lead to prosperity. We are drifting towards a condition where too many people are dependent upon the State. Individual effort and independence are passing away. This, if continued, means loss of business and disintegration of the commonwealth of which we have all been proud. It is time we faced facts. There has been no diminution of paupers and dependents in our State, notwithstanding the frantic efforts of these well-intentioned people. On the contrary, there are more today than ever before, thus proving the uselessness of our expenditures in this direction. Boston has become the "Mecca" to which the spineless wend their weary way from other parts of the country, sure of a welcome in its many homes and harbors for the idle. Can we afford to expand our hospitality further, or would it not be wiser to close the open door to much of this useless work, and let the mendicants move on to other fields, and perchance to some work for their necessities?

Boston. JOSEPH MATTHEW SULLIVAN.

The Sisters in the Civil War

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Having read, with a great deal of pleasure, AMERICA's recent account of the activities of the Sisters of Mercy during the Civil War, it has occurred to us to send you a little more detailed recital of their labors in Mississippi during the same period.

The Rt. Rev. William Henry Elder of Natchez, Miss., having made application to the mother house of the Sisters of Mercy in Baltimore, Md., a foundation was finally agreed upon, April 30, 1860, at the solicitation of the Very Rev. M. Grignon, V.G., who had stopped in Baltimore on his way to Europe.

On October 9 of the same year, a little band of four Sisters and two postulants, Sister M. de Sales Browne being superior, left Baltimore, and, traveling by rail, reached Vicksburg three days later. On October 22 they opened a school, which they continued to teach successfully until the siege of Vicksburg, during which the school was broken up. The convent was turned into a hospital, though it was too small to afford anything like adequate shelter for the sick and wounded soldiers. As soon as possible, the Confederate Government opened a hospital at Mississippi Springs, inviting the Sisters to take charge. There were 730 sick in this improvised hospital, which was unsanitary, neglected, and even destitute of the necessary cooking utensils, so that the Sisters were much distressed at their inability to relieve in the way they desired the suffering of the soldiers.

In the latter part of July, when the serious shelling of Vicksburg began, the Government moved the hospital from Mississippi Springs to the Deaf and Dumb Institute in Jackson. Here all were finally settled by All Saints' Day, but as they found the surgeon who had requested their services there fully equal to the task of caring for his hundred or so wounded soldiers, they proceeded to Oxford, accompanied by their pastor, Rev. F. X. Leray, afterwards Archbishop of New Orleans, to take charge of the hospital there. The Mississippi University, consisting of twelve large buildings, and destined finally to accommodate one thousand wounded soldiers, now became their home.

One little incident related by Mother Ignatius Sumner, herself a member of that devoted band, may bear repetition here. A grim November day was closing slowly when news came that the flat car, bringing in the wounded soldiers from Corinth, had been derailed. The surgeon, his limited staff, and the chaplain, went with all possible haste to the scene of the disaster, Mother de Sales awaiting the arrival of each new group of wounded soldiers. On account of the scarcity of mules and ambulances, the transfer took hours and continued into the night. After providing for the comfort of those who had arrived and stretching her scanty supply of bed clothing and medicine to their utmost limits, the good Mother realized that the fires were dying down, the night growing colder and the fuel very scarce. The little band of Sisters had been scattered through the different buildings, but wood must be had to keep her dear wounded charges from dying of cold. Seizing an axe, she slipped silently out into the night, and walked quickly to an adjoining woodland, where in the flickering light of the brushwood fire she had kindled to frighten away possible wild cats, her frail body bent to the unaccustomed task of cutting wood. Her dreary labor brought comfort to many wounded soldiers, the Blue as well as the Gray.

At Oxford the field of labor was wide, but conditions had improved very much when, at the expiration of a month, the Sisters were rushed off before the advance of the Federals; all the sick who could leave had been previously disposed of. After many hardships, they took charge of the first real "Mississippi Hospital," which had been purchased in Jackson by Dr. Brickett of New Orleans. In the May following, the Federals, after a slight skirmish, took possession of Jackson, burnt the church and the priest's house, but respected the hospital.

Little more was done by the soldiers of the North until after the surrender of Vicksburg, when the victors laid siege to Jackson in earnest. The position of the hospital became very dangerous, and as a consequence the Sisters were conducted to the State House by Father Leray, while the surgeon in charge removed the wounded across Pearl River, where the Sisters joined them, and they began their flight in an open car, over which a tent had been stretched as a protection from the sun. They did not travel by night, spending their nights as best they might, in towns, in deserted houses, and wherever they could find shelter. During the night spent in Selma, Alabama, Mother de Sales, after attending to the comfort of the wounded, spent the time gathering wood and replenishing the fires, in order that those lodged in the deserted hotel of the place should not suffer from cold.

They finally reached Shelby, Alabama, where they continued their labors in behalf of wounded and suffering soldiers until the surrender of Lee rendered their services no longer necessary. On their return to Vicksburg, they found that the Northern officers had taken full possession of their convent, and it was eight months before these gentlemen departed therefrom, but, as all things earthly pass, so has vanished all but the memory of the horrors that once threatened to disrupt our mighty nation.

Vicksburg, Miss. SISTERS OF MERCY.

The Library Lions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A wide entrance flanked by two recumbent lions of enormous size, whose demeanor is that of a placid and supercilious aloofness to the bustle and hum round about them, marks one of the busiest meetingplaces of men, the public library in New York. They, too, have the inscrutable air of cognizance. Cognizance of what? Baffling to man is the secret lore of the Sphinx, and the knowing smile of Mona Lisa, mixing benediction with disdain, puzzles and eludes, while it yet arouses speculation. These are among the supreme triumphs of the artist, symbols of wisdom and knowledge and truth, before which men will stand ever a questioner. Theirs is the knowledge that embraces all the past, all the future: peaceful seed-fields and battle carnages, States foundering and creeds dissolving, man living out his allotted period in courage, or in doubt, or in fear. What then? The question of questions; the question that has been asked insistently through the ages of the Sphinx, and of the woman, and now, henceforward, to be asked of the lions. For the lions in their detachment, strength, vision and immobility are, in their way, the symbols of wisdom and knowledge and truth, couching high above the heads of the throng, remote and yet near, inviting and disdaining, benignant and indifferent, somnolent and alert, prescient and dumb, the paradoxical guardians of a treasure to which man must come, if he come at all, as an humble seeker.

Brooklyn. STEPHEN I. HANNIGAN.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.
Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.
Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

A Nationwide Novena for Peace

THE American people are beginning to realize the magnitude of the task to which we are committed. With the departure of the first contingents of the conscript army to the cantonments, and the special war-session of Congress swiftly drawing to its close, the period of preparation is nearing completion, the day of actual fighting is looming larger and nearer, and apathy is giving place to deep concern. The khaki in our streets is losing its glow of romance and taking on a more sinister significance, and the exultation experienced throughout the country at the thought of the most distinguished men of Europe seeking help at the shrine of liberty is being succeeded by a sense of the gravest responsibility. The poetry of it all has had its little day, war-clouds are rapidly gathering, and things are settling down to grim reality.

The Red Cross is making colossal preparations to tend the wounded; by day and by night munition factories are pouring out their messengers of death; soldiers are being taught the surest ways of shedding human blood; doctors are being mustered into service by thousands; priests are donning military uniforms and packing the holy oils to anoint the dying; there are empty chairs in every household and women's cheeks are wet with tears of sad foreboding. Our hearts are steeled for war, we are prepared to go to the end, the bitter end whose coming no one can see; but in spite of all this, more fervently than ever before, our lips are constant in prayers for peace.

The pleading of the Holy Father with all who have been redeemed by Christ to lay aside their strife, though it has fixed the eyes of the whole world on peace and undoubtedly hastened its advent, has not been altogether successful. The Pope is not of course surprised. In fact, what has actually happened seems to have been anticipated by him some months ago when he bade all his children turn in their agony of pain to the gentle, the gracious Queen of Peace. Have we obeyed his bidding? Certainly in private. But have we made a united effort to win through her powerful intercession the priceless boon for which every heart is longing but which still seems so far away? We should do so at once.

An easy, practical way of doing this would be a novena to the Queen of Peace, made simultaneously in every Catholic church and chapel in the land. Much might be expected from the mystical nine days of concerted prayer, if all the members of every parish and all the soldiers in every military camp would first purify their hearts from sin, and then, gathering each evening before Our Lady's statue, would humbly supplicate her assistance, uniting their voices in a common formula, voices lisping with childhood, trembling with age, and strong with the years of maturity. If our prayer for peace expressed in the words written by the Vicar of the Prince of Peace and directed to her whom he has called the Queen of Peace were to rise as a single petition from millions of pure hearts, it would have so mighty a volume that it would thunder at the gates of Heaven, and Our Lady could not but hearken. The feast of the Immaculate Conception would be a good day for the novena to end, a feast that inspires confidence. For what is Lourdes but the gift of a compassionate mother to her suffering children? Perhaps the Queen of Peace will grant us no less a boon.

Are They Catholics?

THIS very morning about 1,800,000 Catholic children welcomed Jesus Christ in the schools where alone He is not shown the door. These children are sharing in the heritage of Christ. No narrow bigotry cramps the field of their education. Nothing that can make them good citizens, faithful servants of their fellows and of God, will be left undone. Today they began their work in the name of the triune God, and from their childish hearts went up the prayers that are as incense before the throne of the Most High. The thought fills every Catholic with joy, with humble gratitude to Almighty God.

But how many millions of Catholic children began the work of the day in schools which count it at least a breach of propriety, or a mark of childish fanaticism, to utter the sacred Name of Jesus Christ in adoration? Across the exultation with which we regard our parochial schools, strikes the sobering thought that today the majority of our Catholic children are in non-Catholic and anti-Catholic schools. What is to become of these little ones? There are exceptions, but parents who so disregard the rights of their children as to send them to non-Catholic schools, are not likely to display the zeal of a Xavier in instructing them in the duties of religion. Infinitely worse is the case, if these blind parents are cursed with wealth. From families of this kind arise the scandals that in certain communities have made the name of Catholic almost a reproach, as well as generations utterly lost to the Church. We have too many "prominent Catholics" who arrogantly assume that the law was not made for them. But > Let no one talk to me about zeal for the Church, and last of all, one bearing the proud name of Christian knight, if he has not zeal for the Christian education of little children, whether they be his own or not. . . . I cannot conceive that any knight would fail to send his children to the Catholic school; and if he should, he is unworthy the name he bears. No, that should be a test of his Catholicism. . . .

These splendid words were spoken some years ago, to the Knights of Columbus by the Bishop of Nashville. Time has not blunted their point. Whatever his title or degree, the man who exposes his children to the blighting influence of the school in which Christ has no part, defends his right to the name "Catholic" with extreme difficulty.

"God Keep and Guide You!"

"BE a good man, my dear," were Scott's last words to his faithful Lockhart. In the darkness of the shadow of death, life's true values are revealed. So, too, there are times of stress and crisis in the life of every man, in which he realizes that the glories of spiritual conquest are worthier than all the victories of military genius, and the beauty of the unseen world, more desirable than the fairness of this earth and sky, upon which we look with eyes of flesh.

It was in this realization, perhaps, that the President of the United States wrote his splendid greeting of September 4, "To the Soldiers of the National Army." Called from every rank of civil life, and hating "militarism," the triumph of force over right, as all honest men must hate it, these young Americans have left their all, even to the severance of the dearest earthly ties, to defend their country. They are no ordinary men. Whatever their previous position, their sacrifice has exalted them. Their uniform is their patent of nobility; for, in the President's words, they have become "the soldiers of freedom," upon whom "the eyes of the world are fixed."

> Let it be your pride, therefore, to show all men everywhere not only what good soldiers you are, but also what good men you are, keeping yourselves fit and straight in everything, and pure and clean through and through. Let us set for ourselves a standard so high that it will be a glory to live up to it, and then let us live up to it, and add a new laurel to the crown of America. My affectionate confidence goes with you in every battle and in every test. God keep and guide you!

These young Americans, soldiers of the highest type, have answered their country's call that for us, for our children and our children's children, there may be secured a world at rest in the blessings of peace. Most of them will come back to us; but some must die that freedom may not perish. Today as the camps fill and the battalions depart, from the heart of every American goes forth the prayer of our President for these young men, the chosen of the nation, "God keep and guide you!"

Again, Why?

"AT some of these street-corner meetings," charged the learned jurist, "people are abused because they cherish certain religious convictions." True are these words, quoted from a recent charge to a New York Grand Jury, and true they have been these many moons. But one wonders, and the wonder grows, why no one in authority ever uttered them before. They remained unspoken until, a few weeks since, a young man undertook to abuse a certain group of citizens called, sometimes in derision and sometimes in honor, "Jews." Whereupon the mills of the law began to grind, and for the next thirty days will they grind away at the iniquity of this young man who dared attack the religious convictions of the Jews.

It is well. Jew-baiters, and all other "baiters" and "phobes," form a low class; almost as low as those whose main purpose in life is to make money by baiting Section 1,142 of New York's Penal Code. That section purposes, among other things, to protect the peace, dignity and decency of the people against the inroads of the birth-controllers. Fitly, then, did the young man who, according to reports, began his civic life with the meager equipment of a soap-box and a vigorous hatred of Jews, receive the penalty sometimes, but not always, dealt out to those who violate the law of nature and the law of the sovereign State of New York, to wit: thirty days on Blackwell's Island.

Again, it is well that the law has finally seen fit to investigate the motives and the careers of those public brawlers, whose exclusive theme is abuse of religion. One may attack the religious convictions of the Hard-shell Baptists or of the Cumberland Presbyterians, and walk forth from Union Square unscathed. No person owing allegiance to these confessions live in that ward, and, no doubt, very few are registered voters in this city of sublimated bluff and blare. Similarly, one may announce to the populace that Catholic priests drive a thriving trade in the sale of absolutions, and depart as sound in limb, if a trifle more unsound in brain, as he came. But if he wishes to continue in the unfettered pursuit of what he deems peace, freedom and prosperity, he will expunge from the soiled tablets of his memory, every trace of the word and the idea, roughly corresponding to "Jew."

As is but common justice, the religious convictions of our Jewish brethren are now amply protected. The law has made a good beginning. May it proceed prosperously, and even go so far as to deem public attacks on the Catholic Church, her ministers and her people, at least a minor breach of decorum, to be frowned upon for the duration of the war. It would seem graceful, if nothing else, to wait until our young men have returned from the task, which they deem a privilege, of fighting for our common country, before violent and obscene abuse of all that they hold dearest is again considered permissible in the streets of New York. In the meantime, the repeated assaults, led by the Bishop of Rome, on our cherished American institutions, will be completely met, after certain things have been explained to the satisfaction of the post office authorities and of the Attorney-General, by that noble patriot, Mr. Thomas Watson, of Georgia.

A Guiding Sign

"A TALL ship and a star to steer by" was all that a high-hearted sailor lad said he desired.

"His eyes forever on a sign
To make him plow a perfect line" is a couplet describing an aspiring young farmer's life. Both mottoes are excellent and might well be used by men and women of other callings too. For from high ideals are born the most serviceable realities. In religion, art or trade little that is worth while was ever produced by those who were not idealists. Some spur, exemplar, torch or touchstone outside of himself is necessary to call forth what is best in a man. That bright guiding star will bring the sailor's tall ship safely home at last, and by keeping his eye on the landmark at the end of the field the farmer's boy will always plow a straight furrow.

Now that vacations are over and the year's work has begun once more, the world's toilers in home, school, field, mart or shop would do well to find a guiding sign that will help them work with energy and cheerfulness. But what would better meet this need than keeping before the mind a picture of Our Saviour's home at Nazareth. For there St. Joseph patiently worked at his carpenter's bench day in and day out. Our Lady spun and swept, and God's own Son did not disdain to toil with His hands in the weary years of His earthly life. The contemplation of that humble and contented little household, and of the perfection with which everything was done there will give the world's toilers, whether they have to steer a course or plow a furrow, the brightest, surest guide, they can desire.

A Splendid Failure

JOHN HART, of North Carolina, possibly of sound mind, but very probably weak of body, enjoys the guaranteed right of working in a cotton-mill. Not only may he work in a cotton-mill, but he may toil there for more than eight hours a day; for eleven, to be precise, and who is the wiser when the clock is set back? But John Hart may not vote, or sue, or be sued, and someone else has the first right to his wages. It would seem that John's sole and exclusive right is to work. There is nothing startling in all this. To work is about the only right that many Americans enjoy, and a fair percentage of them fail in their endeavors to collect a living wage in return for their labor. What may be startling in the present case, is the solicitude of the great State of North Carolina to safeguard the right of John to work in a cotton-mill, for John Hart is only thirteen years old. Happy John, to be the ward of so provident a State!

But John's importance does not stop here. The Federal Court for the western district of North Carolina has agreed that John's right to labor in a cotton-mill is not to be hampered by the Federal law which went into effect on September 1. Very probably the Court is right. The law in question embodies the contention of Congress that its power to regulate interstate commerce may also be used to regulate conditions of labor within the several States. This means the adoption of the principle that Congress may rightly do by indirection, what the Constitution forbids it to do directly, a principle fraught with much danger to the undoubted right of every State to regulate, within constitutional limits, its internal affairs.

The North Carolina decision is in no sense a disaster. If the law is a failure, it is a splendid failure. Ultimately the decision will do more to check the physical and moral murder of children in mines and factories, than could have ever been accomplished by a law which applies only to those establishments engaged in interstate commerce, and affects almost a negligible percentage of children employed in "gainful pursuits." The earnest work which culminated in the Federal law, did much to focus the attention of the country upon the evil, and in this lay its chief value. But reform must begin at home, if the evil is to be eradicated. Even if sustained by the Supreme Court, the Federal law is but a weak instrument. The only effective way to put a stop to the exploitation of children in trade, is by wisely conceived and vigorously enforced local regulaticns.

The Bright Angel

A NEW YORK newspaper recently suggested that in the phrase, "Death's bright angel," the adjective was badly chosen. The conclusion reached, or rather suggested, was that persons accustomed to revel in sentimentality and bathos might be allowed to consider the angel "bright," while hard-headed folk must necessarily adopt an opposite view.

The conclusion mirrors fairly a world which, since it has forgotten God and Christ who, in St. Paul's incisive words is "our life," must choose between misleading sentimentality and despair. In the remembrance of his sins, every Christian must fear death and the reckoning, but to fear death, says St. Gregory, is to conquer death. With him that feareth the Lord, is God's word to His people, it shall go well in the latter end, and in the day of his death he shall be blessed. For since Christ died for us, they who have fallen asleep in Him, shall surely rise with Him. Death is terrible only to the man whose heart is in his possessions; God's servants know that for all their unworthiness, there remaineth a rest for the people of God. Bright indeed is the face of the angel who at close of day leads us home to God our Father, tired children, bearing the few poor sheaves that only His love for us can make acceptable.

Literature

UNLOCKING THE MEDIEVAL MIND

ARTISTICALLY considered, the "medieval mind" is identical with the Catholic mind of today. In the domain of thought and emotion and their innumerable forms of manifestation, no undertone of apology need temper our claim to kinship with our forefathers in the Faith. We are the "children of the saints"; to us has been transmitted the authentic voice of God; religiously and esthetically we are in the direct line of noble descent; and our Catholic inheritance still perpetuates the same principles of belief and aspiration that of old, in art and literature, filled the world with its most enduring monuments of the beautiful and the sublime. Listen to the "Dies Irae," gaze on the Gothic glories of Chartres, follow Dante through the "Inferno," or repress, if you can, your rapture before the Madonna of Cimabue, and say whether any but the Catholic soul today finds there its native ideal of self-expression.

And far back into that medieval mind, all the greatest masterpieces of modern literature strike their richest and most nutrient roots. It is a commonplace that at the foot of the altar the modern drama was born. The whole field of romance takes its very name and nature from peoples whose life and ideals sprang from the deeps of the unseen. Out of our liturgy came the first pulsings of Anglo-Saxon song. Round a great act of national devotion, a pilgrimage of penance and prayer and praise, Chaucer grouped his most compelling stories; and from a current treatise on moral theology, he constructed one of his most characteristic creations, "The Parson's Tale." Even satire and the less reverent forms of popular wit and fancy disclose how intimately religion was intertwined with daily life.

Now, in modern university instruction, all scientific work in literature has, rightly or wrongly, centered almost exclusively in "research." It proceeds on the principle that literature is a mirror of life, and dominated by ideas of mental evolution, it studies literary forms and movements in their heredity and environment, in pedigree and development, but with an emphatic fascination for all manner of sources, origins and beginnings.

In the interests of the advancement of knowledge, it is to be regretted that non-Catholic scholars have been left almost alone to exploit this field of literary origins in medieval life. With us, the cry should be Noblesse oblige. Still, the Catholic student seems but dimly conscious that he possesses, in the principles and practices of his faith, in the staples of Catholic education, in the normal workings of the contemporary Catholic mind, a truly magic and apocalyptic key to the interpretation of medieval literature as the embodiment of the medieval mind and heart. The Catholic youth is "heir of all the ages;" he has but to look into his own heart to read the noblest records of the race.

Nor is there, in such an attitude, much peril of anachronism, of reading back into one period the ideas and sentiments of a later, more complex age. In essentials, the Church is semper eadem, yesterday, today and forever. In matters that naturally admit of progressive development and expansion, in the inevitable readjustments occasioned by the life of changeless dogma in the mind of changeful man, even the mutable elements of Catholic ritual and observance date from an antiquity far more remote than the dawn of modern history; and when Leo XIII recalled the Catholic schools to the teachings of Aquinas as to the world's best presentment of Catholic thought in this or any other age, that truly majestic act of magisterium, far from the spirit of the obscurantist or the reactionary, was really a recovery of our brightest Catholic tradition, a reillumination of the heights whereon the Catholic mind is most congenially at home, an intrepid step forward in emancipation from temporary entanglements with pseudo-science, with the illusory promises of "modern thought" and other fallacious phases of contemporary intellectual degeneration.

With the writers then of the Middle Age, the Catholic is among brethren who think his own thoughts and speak his own tongue. Doctrinally and devotionally, their literature reflects, as in a mirror, his own mental and emotional life. As modern pedagogues would express it, the Catholic student receives, in his baptismal legacy, an "apperceptive background" of great depth and amplitude; for the sympathetic reception and assimilation of impressions, even from those distant days, the soil of his mind is fully prepared; his soul-life is similar, his outlook on life much the same; for that period, he has an "illative sense" of truly Horatian dimensions, totus, teres atque rotundus. In the dim-lit caverns of the subconscious, whence issue the forces of our instinctive life,—our sympathies, our unbidden emotions, our temperament and disposition, our gleams of intuition, our impulses to aspire, our taste and tact, our uncanny second-sights,— the educated Catholic of today has accumulated ample store of memories, associations, principles, enlightened fantasies, deductions of reason, whisperings of conscience, graces, inspirations, footprints of angels, that all admit to intimate fellowship with the ages of chivalry and of faith. On the supreme questions of his origin, of the fact of sin, of his redemption as a child of God, of the Cathedra Petri and the Living Voice, of the means of grace, of a judgment to come, his mind cherishes no other convictions than a Knight of the Round Table, a Canterbury Pilgrim, a Meistersinger, a gild-apprentice or a Doctor of the Sorbonne would recognize as his own. "Otherworldliness" has been styled the keynote of medievalism; it is still our most potent Catholic idea. It is a long cry from the "Coelestis Urbs Jerusalem" to the "Hound of Heaven;" but from generation to generation, the esprit de famille endures, with "Jesus as its food and Mary as its nursing Mother."

Presumably, too, the Catholic student of today familiarizes himself early with the Vulgate, the official Latin version of Holy Writ. Out of the Vulgate have come our common books of devotion, it is the back-bone of our religious writings, we hear it every day in the offices of the Church. To the men of the Middle Ages, it was the great literary thesaurus. Not that they neglected the classics, but the Scripture was closer to their hearts. Its diction, its idiom, its molds of thought and phrase became the current speech of enlightened Christendom. Round the Vulgate flourished that most resplendent product of uninspired human genius, the theology of the schools, and philosophy knew no prouder boast than to serve as its humble ancilla. To be homo unius libri was no disparagement with that book; it contained the tree of knowledge; it unsealed the Lips of Truth; to know its language released not only tongues of angels but uncreated Wisdom, Love and Life everlasting; its inspired heart-searchings formed the psychology of the Saints.

In the endless tomes of the "Patrologia Latina," we have a sort of vast prose sympathy or fugue on the Vulgate, wrought out through an infinitude of variations. In the lingua franca of the sacred page, the great scholastics were steeped and saturated to the very marrow of their minds; and in a sense, Aristotle first spoke to the western world through St. Jerome's copia verborum. As Blackstone's phraseology echoes today in every court decision, and classic English prose and the sturdiest fabric of our speech leaped almost bodily out of the King James translation and the Book of Common Prayer, so the Vulgate reverberates through the Middle Ages, from far beyond the Civitas Dei to long after the "Summa" of Aquinas.

Into the rising vernaculars, too, the Vulgate poured its irresistible flood, inundating each nascent national mind, leaving copious deposits, in content and inspiration, form, language and style. With the fire of the Prophets, St. Bernard preached the crusade; the popular sermons of the day were a tissue of texts; poets paraphrased its histories and dramatic episodes; cycles of legend and folk-tales, streaming down from the infancy of the world, were refounded in Biblical molds. It has even been said that were the Good Book to perish out of the world altogether, it could still be reconstructed in extenso from the "Divina Commedia" alone.

And Dante, the residuary legatee of the medieval mind, who can taste and enjoy his raptures or soar with him to the Paradiso without that "otherworldliness" of the medievals? Think of understanding him, much less of sifting his immortal cantos to their sources, without a first-hand knowledge of the philosophy of the schools, and of its primal fount, il maestro, the Stagyrite! Second only to the inspiring writings, that colossal system, now our exclusive birthright, has profoundly affected the thought and speech of modern life. Once literature rises above the crudest facts of the physical world, from the first semblance of sensation up through all our intellectual, volitional and emotional experience, on to the very salvation of our immortal souls, the man of letters speaks perforce the language of the scholastics.

Of course, we know the transient attempts of philosophy in our day to speak German with Kant and Hegel, Hartmann and Haeckel, or the crass tongue of materialism with Huxley, Spencer and Stuart Mill; of all persons in the world, the modern psychologist seems least concerned about the soul; we hear only of brain and nerve and cell; in certain quarters, it is no longer fashionable to speak even of ideas: "motor forces" is the word. But not so of the literature that will live. The poet's eye, in fine frenzy rolling, still looks from earth to heaven, and the worth-while thinkers in every age fulfil, with true "homing" instinct, Cicero's memorable definition: "Tota philosophorum vita est commentatio mortis:" that otherworldliness, again, of the medieval, as it is of the modern Catholic mind.

GEORGE H. DERRY, Ph.D.

DISTRACTION

When swarms of small distractions harry
  Devotion like the gnats that fly
Till prayers are cold and customary
  Not such as please Thee, Heaven-high:

When I forget for all my striving
  Thy presence holy and august,
Be Thou not angry, but forgiving
  To her Thou madest from the dust.

Say to Thyself: This mortal being,
  So deaf, so blind, so prone to sin,
Hath glimpses of Me without seeing
  The places where the nails went in.

Say: Through the crusts of earth, My creature
  Perceives Me, hails Me Lord above.
Rumors of the lost innocence reach her
  With full assurance of My love.

Say: Of all marvels I have fashioned
  Is none more wonderful and new
Than that this soul should go impassioned
  For heights beyond her mortal view.

What though her weary mind should ponder
  On small things meet for such as she,
O love! O loyalty! O wonder!
  That in the darkness gropes for Me.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

REVIEWS

T. Lucretius Carus. Of the Nature of Things. A Metrical Translation by WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.75.

This translator of Lucretius's great work follows the Latin text of Carlo Guissani (Turin, 1896-1898), and has also availed himself freely of the latter's Italian commentary. Though no pretense is made to literalness, the translation was evidently collated with the literal prose versions of Munro and Bailey. In some instances the exact word or phrase has been incorporated. The style of Lucretius is plain and direct, yet the "De Rerum Natura" offers special difficulties of translation. He did not look to beauty of expression for its own sake, but sought for a form of language that would best convey vividness of conception. Hence, he coined new words, made frequent use of poetic pleonasms and drew on a large range of epithets. The use of the same word in different senses and peculiarities of construction oftentimes renders his meaning obscure. Not infrequently passages are found which are a curious mixture of archaic and colloquial expressions with recurring rhymes and persistent alliteration, a form of composition which post-Lucretian writers either wholly avoided or moderated to an unobtrusive allusiveness. Moreover, any system of philosophy is difficult to treat in verse, since it necessarily calls for the use of many prosaic forms of expression. However, in using verse as his medium, Professor Leonard considered that he could more faithfully render the Lucretian emphasis of style and its copiousness, the "abbondanza Lucretiana" noted by Guissani.

The version lays no claim to grammatical and syntactical accuracy. The author would have its merit rest chiefly in what he styles a higher accuracy, the accuracy of the imagination, which he understands to be at once interpretative and creative. However, when the translator permits himself to depart from the literal sense of the original whenever his imagination prompts him to insert a word or phrase which is not in the Latin, he exposes himself to the danger of not translating the thought of the author at all. He may indeed "do the work for the imagination of the English reader," but the student perusing such a version cannot but harbor the suspicion that instead of reading Lucretius he is only reading an interpretation. The Latin text, though possibly complete, is of unequal spirit and finish. In some places lines seem to have been hastily composed and put down for the time-being until something better could be written. Some of the passages too show a lack of clearness in analysis. In translating these Professor Leonard will not be called to task for striving "to render it fairly easy for one to gather what he thinks Lucretius meant." J. S. D.

The Upbringing of Daughters. By CATHERINE DURNING WHETHAM. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.75.

The first words of this finely conceived and well-written book tell us that: "To Cecil, and Margaret, Catherine, Diana, Lawrence, Elizabeth, Edith, Who have taught me so much, This book is inscribed, By their obliged and affectionate wife and mother." The whole work has been inspired by the love of the home, and evidently written under the inspiration of its holiest spells. This constitutes its peculiar charm. Every word breathes the love of home and has been penned with the sole purpose of instilling into the reader respect and love for that fast-disappearing institution. The author is at the same time high-minded in her views of life and practical in her advice regarding the methods and the means she deems necessary for the welfare of that miniature society, the family. Those to whom the author so lovingly dedicates her work have evidently taught her many an invaluable lesson and she has been an apt pupil. It is quite evident also that she has been a very efficient teacher. She speaks with conviction and authority of the "Creation of the Home," which to her mind is not only a sanctuary but a training-ground, a battlefield, a camping-ground, "whence we issue forth into the world to do battle and return at eve to bivouac, faint and weary it may be, but secure, nevertheless, of shelter and welcome." In the author's mind, there is no golden rule for making a home. But, if no hard and fast law may be set down in so many words, it must nevertheless "be founded on affection and duty and built up in hope and faith," "maintained by countless little daily services of no individual importance," and "by endless adjustments of conveniences and sacrifices."

We miss here, however, and still more in the chapter on "Religion," those higher motives and incentives which come from a positive form of religion. Religion is not absent from the writer's scheme, but it is of a vague and indefinite nature, and lacks that supernatural element which above everything else gives it power and efficacy. Creeds and dogmas with Mrs. Whetham seem to come and go, to be matter of evolution and change which one may put off or wear as occasion and environment may warrant. Here is the weakness in her otherwise sound and noble conception of the home, of education and the duty of bringing up children in a pure, simple and invigorating atmosphere. Everywhere else, as in the chapters on "Professions for Daughters," "Dress," "Books to Read," "Outdoor Life and Games," "Household Duties," "Conduct," her words are dictated by sound sense and experience. J. C. R.

The Life of Mother Pauline von Mallinckrodt, Foundress of the Sisters of Christian Charity, Daughters of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Immaculate Conception. With an Introduction by the Most Rev. GEORGE W. MUNDELEIN, D.D., Archbishop of Chicago. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.50.

"On the twenty-first of August (1849), the feast of St. Frances de Chantal in the octave of the Assumption, the first four Sisters of the Congregation of the Sisters of Christian Charity—Sister Pauline von Mallinckrodt, Sister Maria Rath, Sister Elizabeth Schlueter, and Sister Mathilde Kothe, received the religious habit from the hands of the Bishop of Paderborn, Right Reverend Francis Drepper, in the parish church of St. Andrew, at Bussdorf." In the foregoing words the subject of this biography chronicled the humble beginning of a Congregation which now has twenty-nine foundations in Europe, thirty-one in South America, and in the United States, fifty-five houses situated in seventeen dioceses. Prior to Mother Pauline's entrance into religion, she had devoted herself to the care and instruction of blind children and that was the first work the infant Congregation undertook. But the scope of the Sisters' activities gradually widened and by 1872 they were teaching in a number of schools. Then came the Kulturkampf, making it impossible for most of Mother Pauline's little flock to continue this work in Germany and threatening the very existence of the Congregation. But from North and South America had come many a call for these excellent religious, and now Mother Pauline was in a position to send colonies abroad. The first foundation in the United States was made at New Orleans in 1873, and in South America, in Chile, a year later, and since then the Sisters of Christian Charity have toiled unweariedly in both countries to promote the cause of Catholic education.

The life of Mother Pauline is necessarily, of course, the history of the Congregation she founded, but her biographer has also collected a profusion of edifying anecdotes and incidents which illustrate how well she practised all the religious virtues. This biography and others like it would make excellent reading for girls in our high schools and colleges. The book contains instances of heroism which cannot but exert an influence for good on American girls who are so much given to ease and frivolity, thus impelling them, if not to acts of like heroism, at least to greater faithfulness in the duties imposed upon them by their state of life. In this connection it might be well to remark that directors of sodalities and confessors will likewise find the volume useful for those girls who are anxious about their vocation to a religious life. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The September number of the Catholic Convert opens with a good paper on "The Non-Catholic Attitude of Mind," by Father Martin J. Scott, S.J., whose apologetic work, "God and Myself: An Inquiry Into the True Religion," will be published by Kenedy this fall. Father Henry E. O'Keeffe, C.S.P., contributes an article on "Catholicism and the Brook Farm Experiment," which is full of interesting anecdotes about the Transcendentalists' attitude toward the Church. Mr. Locke continues his "Stories of Conversions," and several other writers tell how they found the true Faith. Apropos of the recent reception of "Jeff" Tesreau and "Pol" Perret, "both pitchers of great repute," the Catholic Convert tells how Mr. Tesreau asked to be instructed by "one of the older Fathers of the Paulist rectory," giving the priest's name. The Father in question "wished to know why Mr. Tesreau had particularly asked for him instead of going to some of the younger Fathers who knew something about baseball. 'I don't know anything about ball-games,' said Father ——. 'That is just the reason why I came to you,' the pitcher replied."

Though it would seem that the reading public should now be thoroughly tired of war books and be longing for peace books instead, the former keep pouring from the press. Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Towards the Goal" (Scribner's, $1.25), and Sir Gilbert Murray's "Faith, War and Policy" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25), two of the latest to appear, are written with the literary finish that was to be expected from their authors. In ten letters addressed to Colonel Roosevelt, who writes the preface, Mrs. Ward tells what England was doing last spring to win the war, recounts her own experiences in battle-torn France, and expresses her confidence that with the aid of America's men and resources the Kaiser will be conquered. In the other volume Sir Gilbert Murray has collected thirteen papers and addresses published or delivered from the beginning of the war until last March, and bearing such titles as "First Thoughts on the War," "The Evil and the Good of the War," "The Sea Policy of Great Britain," etc. Writing on "The Dublin Insurrection" "as an English Liberal whose father was an Irish Catholic and a friend of Daniel O'Connell," the author would have favored pardoning Casement, and he considers "the state of Ireland utterly disastrous, a disgrace to British statesmanship, a mockery to our high professions, and an extreme peril to the Empire."

"Slippy McGee" (Century, $1.35), the central figure of a novel by Marie Conway Oemler, is a master safe-cracker who makes a disastrous slip from a freight-train in his "get-away" and is removed to Father DeRansé's home. Then begins the story of Slippy's reformation. The character-drawing, the humor and the pathos of the book are unusual, while Lawrence and Mary Virginia, the Major, the Doctor and Miss Sally Ruth are all really alive. Slippy himself is well worth knowing and so is the quiet little priest who tells the story; though he has some queer ideas about prayer, and the "conversion" of Slippy seems to follow the Protestant formula.——"Bromley Neighborhood" (Macmillan, $1.50), by Alice Brown, is a subdued story of backward New England life. The interest centers around Ellen Brock, a complex creature, who reads life, not as it presents itself, but through the medium of self-analysis, evolving tragedies from her own heart, and striving against the mysteries that she has woven around herself. There is an interesting collection of characters, all well portrayed, supporting the plot, and developing phases of the heroine's growth by experience. The interplay of the war as it affects New England, does not vitally affect the story.

EDUCATION

The Rural Apostolate: Rural Schools

VARIOUS ways by which considerable help can be given to our Catholics in the rural districts, have been outlined in preceding papers. All phases, however, of the rural apostolate are centered in the rural school.

The rural parish school, in many parts of this country, has not received the attention of educators, and the systematic support and encouragement that it deserves. The country school is not to be regarded as a mere makeshift for the city school, a sort of poor wooden imitation of urban perfection in stone, plate-glass and efficiency. The idolizing of the "Little Red Schoolhouse" is, of course, quite mistaken from a moral and religious point of view, since it exalts unchristian above Catholic education. Nevertheless the "Little Red Schoolhouse," merely as a secular school, does represent a certain social force which is not wholly shared by its magnificent descendants among the city public schools. The affection which it evoked in past generations, though afterwards misused as an anti-Catholic slogan, had its origin in a real remembrance of the vital social power of the small country school, of the teacher who fulfilled an office not unlike that of the famous "hedge schoolmasters" of earlier times. Not infrequently our attitude seems to be: "Let the country Catholic child get its education by hook or crook, as best it can. He will be really educated only when landed safely in an up-to-date city parish school."

The Mission of the School

YET the rural school has a distinct mission. The Church has no sturdier support than truly Catholic rural homes. Nothing, however, in the educational line reaches the country home more efficiently than the small rural school. Not even the consolidated country school, about which there is nowadays such enthusiasm, can do quite the unique home-helping work of the smaller schools. In leaving our country children to the haphazard of district schools, we Catholics are neglecting the most vital way of Catholicizing home life, and of preserving the Catholic home against the numerous inroads that are being made upon it. It seems to be a mistake to measure the parochial school activity of any part of our country merely by brick and mortar, by furnishings and expenditure. Forty plain little $1,000 country schools will not be as impressive as one $40,000 building; yet they will accomplish that which even several $40,000 buildings cannot effect.

The expense of educating a country child is usually less than that of a city child. The same outlay or equipment, building materials, recreational facilities, etc., is not required by the nature of the case, or by the authorities. When so much can be accomplished, and so cheaply, provided a modicum of assistance be offered, it is deplorable that so little urban help is given to Catholic rural schools. The cost of half-a-dozen theater parties would support a teaching Sister for a year.

What Can be Done

TWO of the wealthiest Catholic communities in the United States, and there are others like them, have for a century or more let their surrounding country sections go absolutely begging for Catholic rural schools. They then gravely wonder at the lack of general enlightenment and practical Catholicism in these, their unvisited back-yards.

Let a single instance suffice as to what can easily be done in a thousand other cases.

The Children of Mary were forming in a fashionable eastern academy. The Reverened Director, who himself had no axe to grind, pointed out to them that Our Lady's Sodality considered charitable and social work as one of its essential activities. They organized a mission section, and decided to "adopt" a mission, that is, to work for a mission church or school. A country school soon presented itself as a foundling at their gates, and was adopted in the name of the Child Jesus. They agreed to raise enough every year by an annual entertainment, or by obtaining subscriptions among friends, to defray a good part of the cost of one teacher. The school was started in a frame building, used also as a chapel. The children came from miles around, braving mud and forest roads. The wonderful example and incentive of these girls served also to incite others toward similar generosity, and hopes are now entertained of establishing several Sisters, attending this and other small schools, in a district where, despite the great need, such a project was long regarded as impracticable.

"Adopt a School"

ALMOST any group of practical young men or young women could adopt such a school, and reap an endless reward from Him who is zealous for the least of His little ones. Your own sodality, a Holy Name Society or Council, your academy or high school could easily adopt a country cousin. The Church Extension Society, the Negro and Indian Mission Fund, the Propagation of the Faith, or any one of the Religious Orders can put you in touch immediately with such a school, if your own diocesan authorities have none to suggest. This is an apostolate in spirit and truth, and by exercising it you will plant a garden in which will grow immortal flowers, to gladden your heart forever in heaven.

JOHN LA FARGE, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

"Where a Feller Needs a Friend"

YES, I am ready to admit, in a mixed figure filled with unalloyed truth, that the first grass nibbled by many a black sheep was that which grew sparsely in a Christian household. And I also know, I who have heard it, that when the time comes for his shearing at the hands of the law, he will tell you with plaintive bleats, well calculated ad misericordiam, that his lamb-days were pastured near a lowly but honest fireside. He will speak the truth, too. I cannot explain him in scientific terms; it is easier to admit than to chart him. Some may say, as Mark Twain's old Mrs. Hotchkiss said of Jim: "S'I, he's crazy, s'I—them's the very words I said. You all hearn me: he's crazy, s'I; he's plumb crazy, s'I; it's what I says in the fust place, it's what I says in the middle, 'n' it's what I says last 'n' all the time—crazy 's Nebokoodneezer, s'I." But these are the prim folk, now not quite so voluble as formerly, who regard all departure from decorum as proof final of a defective mentality.

What Makes Him "Bad"?

OTHERS may adduce him as a horrible example of atavism; a reincarnation after generations of honest folk, of some pirate or sandbagger now forgotten, but once the brightest bud on the family tree. It is not difficult to draw a brief for "heredity," that much abused word; especially when one works for a Sunday Supplement, or adopts the spirit of the philologist, if that is what you call him, who said that, according to Grimm's law, all vowels are interchangeable, and the consonants don't count. The "heredity" theory, applied to moral traits, reads well, and satisfies all who draw no fine-spun scholastic distinctions between matter and spirit, possibility and fact. The neighbors will probably sum up the case of the black sheep by remarking in ready language that the boy "was always bad, naturally bad," an explanation which gets nearer to the doctrine of total depravity than to the truth.

In common with a few old-fashioned people, "religious stand-patters," or "boneheads," as a modern sociologist dubs us, I think there is something to be said for another view. It is that some boys and girls, women and men, are "bad," not because they were made "bad," nor because of some malign ancestor—now long a lonely skeleton grinning in his tomb, and at some twentieth-century scientists,—but because they clearly see and freely choose the evil that can be found in life. As this discourse, however, does not seem to be leading anywhere in particular, we may as well drop the sad and usually heart-breaking case of the black sheep, and devote this valuable sheet of paper to a few reflections on a theme adapted from Clare Briggs, "Where a Feller Needs a Friend," and where he needs him most. On second thought I had better add the "feller's" sister, for if she starts on the downward path, her momentum is usually greater.

The Guilty Party

AS far as my poor vision goes, it seems that where he most needs a friend is in his own home. Perhaps I missed the many exceptions, but I have never listened to the stories told in a juvenile court without feeling that somehow the zealous officers had failed to find the guilty party. The culprit did not seem to be the boy or girl cringing or sullen, tear-stained or defiant, who faced the judge. The guilty party was the frowsy, voluble mother or the dilapidated father in the train of the court officer, or the drunken and immoral "parents"—may the Lord forgive us for defiling so sacred a name—who either could not be found or were yet in jail.

Full admission has been made that, even in an environment which seems almost perfect, the boy or girl may "go wrong"; but the very admission justifies the direst prophecy for the child who lacks that for which nothing created can supply: a mother's love and a father's protection. Juvenile courts, the probation system, parental schools, are good under proper administration; but they cut a poor figure in the fight for the child, waged against a drunken father, an immoral mother, or, as often happens, a "home" in which both parents are reprobates. At best, these agencies are an admission that the harm has been done, and a laudable attempt to remedy what may now be irremediable. As Mangold well says in his recent book, "The Challenge of St. Louis": "We do not solve the problem by court action . . . and by ministering to the needs of unhappy children. It is only as we ennoble and perfect the home that a permanent solution will be reached."

The "Broken" Home

"OFTEN," writes Judge Hoyt of New York, "the delinquency is not in the children at all. It is in the parents." As befits a judge, the presiding justice of an admirable institution, the Children's Court of New York, speaks with studied restraint. How often may juvenile delinquency be traced to negligent parents? It is difficult to quote figures in this matter, and statistics often hide the factor of greatest importance. Perhaps the truest answer lies somewhere between the belief that parents are always the cause or occasion of youthful delinquency, a judgment sometimes expressed by harassed and over-strained social workers, and the counter-statement which enters a denial in every case. Judge Olsen of Chicago is credited with the remark that in girls, delinquency "usually" begins between the thirteenth and the sixteenth year, the very time when the girl most needs the careful guardianship of her mother. As a rule, the corner policeman, especially if of a reflective turn of mind, will philosophize on juvenile delinquency, and trace it in practically all instances to "foolish parents." Statistics prepared some ten years ago for the Government's "Woman and Child Wage Earners in the United States," show that about sixty-five per cent of all delinquent girls, and forty-two per cent of the boys, came from homes that were not "normal." Ellwood, in his "Sociology and Modern Social Problems," calls attention to the evil influence of homes "broken" by divorce or separation, and finds them responsible for about thirty per cent of 7,575 children in American reformatory institutions. Similar figures have been tabulated for several cities.

A Tale of Two Cities

AN Indianapolis study of youthful delinquency assigns "lack of parental care" as the cause of forty-two per cent of the cases in that city. Mangold, in the work quoted above, speaking of St. Louis, says that "it has been the practice to remove about sixty per cent" of the children arraigned in the Juvenile Court "from their homes," and adds significantly, "Since only the more serious cases are brought into court, because of the disinclination of judges to interfere with parental functions, the number of socially neglected children [3,900 in a six-year period] far exceeds the figures given." A detailed study of 1,000 cases of neglected children in the St. Louis Juvenile Court, made by the Missouri School of Social Economy, reported that homes "broken" through destitution and separation of parents were responsible for forty-two per cent of the cases, intemperate parents for twenty-three per cent, immoral mothers for fifteen per cent, and "parents generally incompetent," for twenty per cent. Even more striking is Mangold's showing, that in the period from 1909-15, one out of every fourteen children, and about one out of every ten boys, was "brought to court," in St. Louis, a city which certainly does not show a criminal record above the average. Worse, these court charges come only from certain congested districts, so that we have a condition "in which one member of every other family" must be investigated "for the improvement of morals, and training by father or mother superseded, or publicly supplemented." In the study of the 3,900 St. Louis cases, "drink was the principal direct cause of the neglect," since "practically one-half of both the fathers and the mothers were intemperate." Furthermore, "nearly one-half of these unhappy households suffered from divorce or desertion."

In the Metropolis

FIGURES taken from the Report of the Children's Court in New York for 1916, show some improvement over these conditions. Of girls arraigned in that year, 51.6 per cent, and of boys, 31.8 per cent, were from homes "broken" by death, divorce or separation. The causes leading to divorce or separation are not stated; presumably they embrace the usual forms of immorality. Of the 12,954 cases in the court, 6,079 were for juvenile delinquency, and 6,875 were classified under "Special Proceedings," a term which in about eight cases out of ten connotes "improper guardianship." No figures are given to show what percentage of children brought before the court under this title were also delinquent, nor do the delinquency statistics indicate how many cases were due directly or indirectly to negligent parents. Judge Hoyt calls attention, however, to the need of "more intense activity on the part of parents," and, moreover, the connection between bad parents and delinquent children is fairly clear. The child may escape, but the chances are against him. Improper guardianship proceedings afford him one chance, and often a chance that is sufficient.

Salvage and Prevention

I THINK it was Holmes—not the detective, but Oliver Wendell—who said that to educate a child properly, one had to begin with his grandparents. To reconstruct a broken home, and give the child the complete environment needed for normal development, is often next to impossible, and very frequently unsatisfactory in the extreme. Salvage work is the best that can be hoped for after the wreck. For the sake of the community, and to gather up the fragments lest even the smallest be lost, such work is needed, but it should not be allowed to hamper, nor need it do so, a task of even greater importance. If we are to save the boys and girls of the future, we must begin by leaving nothing undone which may serve to secure a proper physical, mental and moral training and environment for the boys and girls of the present.

Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"Lest We Forget!"

IN his panegyric of St. Louis, on the feast day of the soldier saint, celebrated in the old St. Louis Cathedral, the Rev. M. J. O'Connor, S.J., drew a picture of the crusader knight, and then asked what we, as a nation, are doing to invoke the Divine mercy upon us:

> Just today our country is in a tumult of preparation. Who may tell what is to come? The clouds are gathering, the horizon is dark. We look forward, trusting, of course, hoping, of course, but what will we do? You tell me to look out into the land and see what is being done. Money is being gathered by millions and billions; men and women are devoting themselves to all manner of preparation; there is eagerness and earnestness. Last night in our city there was a tumult of joy and gladness. Lights flamed and trumpets blared; men with light hearts went forth, God knows to what.
>
> You turn to us, and ask what are we doing? Remember, we claim to be a Christian nation. In all preparations we are making for that which is to come, how many of us have thought of the need to get on our knees and pray to God? What public exhibition of veneration to God and desire for His glory has appeared?

Well might the preacher exclaim in answering this question: "Oh, that we had a little of the old-time supernatural qualities of faith and love!" There is the same frivolity, the same mad quest of pleasure, and God is but lightly taken into account in our public preparations. May we beware of likewise rejecting, at our own hazard, the appeal made to us in the name of the Prince of Peace.

A Patriotic Duty

SCHOOL attendance is again urged in the strongest terms by the United States Commissioner of Education, Dr. Claxton. Parents are exhorted to consider the sending of their children to the classrooms as a patriotic duty of the highest importance "both for the present defense and for the future welfare of the country." Catholics in particular should not be remiss in this matter. There is supreme need of the religious influence of the Catholic school in the present crisis, as the Commissioner's words clearly imply. After urgently insisting that there must be no lowering of standards or falling off in attendance, he continues:

> This is necessary both for the protection of our boys and girls against many temptations to delinquencies of various kinds, and that they may have full opportunity to prepare for the work of life and for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship; all of which will require a higher degree of preparation because of the war. For many reasons there will be need in this country for higher standards in average of ability, knowledge and virtue when boys and girls, now in our schools, have reached manhood and womanhood.

He, therefore, appeals to the clergy, and to all who have influence over parents and the young, to secure a full efficiency for our schools, in attendance as well as in studies.

Resolutions on the Social Question

AMID the multiplicity of problems to which the war has given birth, American Catholics have fortunately not lost sight of the social questions of the day. In the recent conventions both of the Central Verein and the American Federation of Catholic Societies special stress was laid upon them. The former organization thus urges the subject in its resolutions:

> It is therefore incumbent upon all who have at heart the genuine welfare of the people, and who believe in the possibility of healing the wounds of society, to continue in consistent and systematic labor, and, undismayed by the turbulence of the times, to keep their vision focused on the final goal of social reform, which is to be attained by the realization of the ideals of Christian Solidarism.

The report presented by Bishop Schrembs, as chairman of the Committee on Resolutions of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, is filled with allusions to economic, social and industrial problems. The following suggestion is given:

> We recommend, in conclusion, that all Federation units make, in the course of the coming season, a complete and systematic survey of their districts, for the purpose of diagnosing, upon the basis of actual facts, the social problems that properly come within the scope of Federation, and we call attention to the fact that the Social Service Committee is prepared to give all the necessary direction for the successful operation of such surveys.

The resolutions, furthermore, encourage the formation of Catholic social agencies, which through study circles, conferences and lecture courses shall give their attention not merely to questions concerning employer and employee, but likewise to promoting the welfare of the farmer, merchant, immigrant and colonist. "The unskilled, unorganized workers and immigrants are specially deserving of our best sympathy and endeavor." The raising of a fund of at least $100,000 is proposed for the purpose of organization and for social and moral propaganda work.

Admiral Benson and Laymen's Retreats

"IT was the privilege of a member of the writer's family," says E. S. Chester, in a communication to AMERICA, "to make the annual week-end retreat for laymen at Overbrook in the spiritual companionship of Rear-Admiral Benson, U.S.N." In the absence of the President of the Laymen's League for Retreats, Admiral Benson, as Vice-president, performed the functions of honor. In his address to the retreatants he requested their prayers, at the closing Mass, that he might faithfully perform the high obligations resting upon him in this great hour of trial:

> Entrusted with what is undoubtedly the greatest responsibility ever imposed upon one American, Admiral Benson, by retiring from Washington for the three days of meditation and prayer, alone with Eternal Wisdom, unquestionably put on the breastplate of righteousness and the sword of truth in the preparation for the work before him. In fraternal charity and with touching modesty the great convert became as a little child. Asked by a companion if he took his care with him, he answered simply: "I have the entire American fleet in my head, but I'm not worrying."
>
> Keenly alive to the confidence imposed in him, and to the fatal consequences of any grave mistake in the present crux of nations, he declared that he felt all his "responsibility as a Catholic." Leader of men, and color-bearer of the seas, it is as a faithful and representative Catholic that he would have the world know and judge the character of his deeds.

Catholic laymen who consider their business interests too absorbing to enable them to give even one week's end to the important task of fitting themselves for their supreme responsibilities in life, may well be filled with a salutary confusion at the example given here by one of the busiest men of the nation in the nation's greatest crisis. The country, as well as Admiral Benson, will be the gainer by these few days spent with God in meditation and in prayer. Attracted by curiosity a non-Catholic sailor boy had likewise come to Overbrook. The truth of the Church's teaching so impressed him that he exclaimed: "I never knew what the Catholic Church was like. I want to be a Catholic, and I want it right away!" Admiral and sailor thus met on common ground, as high and lowly have ever met on equal terms within the Church of Christ.

NOTICE TO READERS: When you finish reading this magazine place a one-cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No wrapping; no address.—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

SEPTEMBER 22, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Catholic Students and State Scholarships
Joseph V. McKee

The New Wise Man
George Nauman Shuster

The Countess of Warwick and the New Religion
J. D. Tibbits

Evolution and the Pro-Proselyte
J. A. M. Richey

Relief Work in the Civil War
Gerald C. Treacy

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
September 22, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 24

PAGE

CHRONICLE 585–588

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Catholic Students and State Scholarship—The New Wise Man—The Countess of Warwick and the New Religion—Evolution and the Pro-Proselyte—Relief Work in the Civil War.....589–596

COMMUNICATIONS 596–597

EDITORIALS
Our First Line of Defense—A False Economy—Harried Mexico—A Soldier's Kit—Portugal and Nearer Home—Cheer Up.....598–600

LITERATURE
The Grail Legend and the Medieval Mind — Reviews—Books and Authors—Books Received.....601–604

SOCIOLOGY—Roosevelt and Race Suicide.....605–606

EDUCATION — Is Latin Dead? 606–607

NOTE AND COMMENT....607–608

Ostensorium
No. 7003

Price, $40.00

FOR ECCLESIASTICAL NECESSITIES in ORIGINAL DESIGNS and BEAUTIFULLY FINISHED

We again call you attention to this space and recommend for your approval this week an

OSTENSORIUM,
OUR NO. 7003

DESCRIPTION

Only an artist could have so symmetrically incorporated so many striking points into 18 inches, which is the height of this Ostensorium. The base has a diameter of 6½ inches and is richly decorated in high relief.

Mail orders solicited

The W. J. FEELEY CO.
10 East 50th Street
New York City
opposite St. Patrick's Cathedral
Factory, Providence, R. I. Established 1870

Helps for Teachers and Students

THE EDUCATION OF BOYS, by Dr. Pallen
Price 60 cents. Postage extra
SHOULD BE IN THE HANDS OF EVERY EDUCATOR

WHAT THE CHURCH HAS DONE FOR EDUCATION
THE RELIGIOUS TEACHER
CATHOLIC SCHOOLS FOR CATHOLIC YOUTH
THE CATHOLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM
HOW CATHOLIC COLLEGES EXIST
THE DANGERS OF SECULAR UNIVERSITIES
POPULAR ERRORS ABOUT CLASSICAL STUDIES
THE ULTIMATE AIM OF EDUCATION
READING AND CHARACTER
AMERICAN CATHOLIC HISTORY AND RELIGION
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

Price 5 cents each. $4.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83D STREET NEW YORK

The latest and best pamphlet on the subject

What Luther Taught

THE country is now flooded with literature commemorating the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's rebellion. So every Catholic ought to have at hand a brief and trustworthy guide. Fathers Husslein and Reville, of the AMERICA staff, have prepared from the very words of Luther himself just the pamphlet you need.

Price 15 cents
$10.00 a hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83RD STREET
NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 24
WHOLE No. 440

SEPTEMBER 22, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The British have made some progress east of Hargicourt, near Villaret and north of St. Quentin. The French have gained a notable local success in the region of St. Souplet. The Germans advanced a short distance north of the Caurières Wood, northeast of Verdun, but the French regained almost all the territory. The German offensive east of Riga has been halted by the Russian counter-offensive. In Rumania the Russians, south of Radautz, and the Rumanians, west of Ocana, have gained small local successes.

Bulletin, Sept. 10, p.m.-Sept. 17, a.m.

The Italians have taken the summit of Monte San Gabriele as the result of uninterrupted fighting for the space of three weeks, during which this important position has changed hands repeatedly. It would appear that it is now securely held by Italy, as its main supporting points have been taken from the Austrians. The victory was assured as soon as the Italians had secured the Dol Hill and the Gargaro Basin. It has been very costly to both sides, but its importance can scarcely be overestimated. The way is now open to Laibach, and one of the principal obstacles to the advance on Trieste has been removed.

Italians Capture San Gabriele

The War Revenue Bill, which provides for taxes aggregating, according to the estimates of the Senate Financial Committee, a total sum of $2,416,670,000 was finally passed by the Senate on September 10, the vote being 69 to 4. Senator La Follette attempted to substitute an entire bill calling for a levy of $3,500,000,000, but the amendment was defeated by a vote of 65 to 15. Nearly four months had elapsed since the bill was introduced.

The War Revenue Bill

The bill came before the House two days later, and was sent to conference, from which it will emerge, according to expectations, in about ten days, practically in the form given it by the Senate. One of the principal points of dispute is the increase on first and second class mail rates; another matter of disagreement is the tax on war profits; income and inheritance taxes will also be subjected to considerable discussion; but no serious difficulty is anticipated, although the Senate has added $547,750,000 to the House draft of the bill. The three principal items of taxation, as passed by the Senate, are incomes, war excess profits and distilled spirits, which will yield, if agreed to by Congress, respectively, $842,200,000, $1,060,000,000 and $135,000,000.

According to press dispatches, the Imperial German and Austro-Hungarian letters patent decreeing a new Polish State were communicated to the people of Poland, on September 16, by Governor-General von Beseler. The form of government contemplated is a constitutional monarchy based on direct universal suffrage. During the period of the war the Central Powers will occupy Poland for defensive purposes. For the present a triumvirate of regents will represent the Crown; this triumvirate will appoint a Prime Minister who has power to summon a Cabinet. These agencies will in turn select a temporary Council of State, which will be the forerunner of a Parliament to be elected later by popular vote. This temporary body will be a legislative organization, but no laws can be passed that will interfere with the military operation of this war. Moreover, the new State will have no authority to make treaties with foreign nations, during the war. The Prime Minister will be a responsible factor in the proposed organization and will sign all decrees with the regents.

New Polish State

Argentina has given prompt official expression to her resentment against Count von Luxburg, Envoy Extraordinary to Argentina and Minister Plenipotentiary of the German Empire. On September 12 he was dismissed by President Irigoyen, without having been given an opportunity to present his case. His dismissal, together with passports, was communicated to the German legation in the following note of the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Worship:

Sweden as an Intermediary

Mr. Minister:

You having ceased to be persona grata to the Argentine Government that Government has decided to deliver to you your passports, which I transmit herewith by order of his Excellency, the President of the nation.

The introducer of embassies has instructions to assist you in your immediate departure from the territory of the republic. God keep you.

H. PUEYRREDON.

At the same time the Argentine Minister at Berlin was instructed to inform the German Foreign Office that Count von Luxburg has been given his passports and to ask for an explanation of the telegrams. Popular feeling ran high in Buenos Ayres, and forcible measures had to be employed to prevent the destruction of German property. No action was taken against Sweden, and the Foreign Office at Stockholm stated that Baron Loewen, the Swedish Minister to Argentina, would not be recalled, as the Swedish Legation had acted in good faith and was ignorant of the contents of the telegrams.

The Swedish Foreign office, while not communicating officially with other nations, issued a statement in which attention is called to the fact that the United States communicated through Sweden with Constantinople; but it has been pointed out at Washington that the parallel fails because Sweden was not asked to forward any telegrams to Turkey before April 10, and also because Sweden had insisted that the telegrams be submitted in French to the Swedish Foreign Office.

Sweden also stated that in the opinion of the Swedish Minister the agreement made with Great Britain in the summer of 1915, to the effect that the transmission of messages from Germany should cease, applied only to messages to North America and not to other neutral States. Great Britain did not understand the agreement in this restricted sense and has asked Sweden for an explanation. Count Wrangel, Swedish Minister to Great Britain, has left London for the Continent on leave of absence. France has demanded explanations.

The principal point in Sweden's explanation is contained in the following paragraph:

> The telegram mentioned in the American statement was written in code, and in transmitting it the Swedish Minister was by that reason unable to decipher it. Whether its contents were as reported is a point which the first duty of the Swedish Government must be to confirm, and its next action must be to get an explanation from Germany if it be found that any misuse has taken place. Sweden will also, without regard to any reference made to her, take measures to prevent any repetition of the incident. No application as to the cessation of the transmission of telegrams from Germany to the Argentine Republic has yet been made either by the British or American Governments, even now or at any earlier period.

Admiral Lindman, in an informal talk with representatives of the Associated Press, declared that Sweden realized the seriousness of the situation, and intended to do everything to settle it satisfactorily; that the transmission of messages from Germany had been stopped absolutely and would not be resumed; that the Swedish Government had not the slightest idea of the contents of the messages and would not have transmitted them, had they been known, and that strong representations had been made to Germany and explanations demanded.

Secretary Lansing has contradicted the reports circulated by the Press, that the United States intended to punish Sweden by a stricter embargo. His statement follows:

> I observe that some of the papers continue to publish the view that we are going possibly to punish Sweden for some of the acts of her officials. There is absolutely nothing in that. We have the friendliest feeling toward the Swedish people.

This statement was only one evidence of a wide-spread disposition to think kindly of Sweden, although there has been expressed general surprise, tinged with popular indignation in Sweden, and with deep resentment in Argentina, that the Legation should have forwarded telegrams in German code, without knowledge of their contents, thus exposing Sweden to her present embarrassing situation. The general impression seems to be that the Swedish Government has not been party to the transmission of the message, but a victim of corrupt officials. This impression has gained weight from the fact that the United States has not made a diplomatic incident of the disclosures, and also because Sweden has instructed the Minister of Justice to inaugurate investigations. Already the Secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has received leave of absence, and other changes in the Swedish Foreign Office are predicted, among them the retirement of Admiral Lindman, whose good faith is not questioned, but whose hold on popular confidence has been considerably weakened.

The further disclosures of German activity in Mexico in inducing Swedish officials to violate neutrality have been made, it is said, not with the purpose of discrediting Sweden, but in order to expose German duplicity. The letter of Herr von Eckhardt, the German Minister to Mexico, contains conclusive evidence that Folke Cronholm, Chargé d'Affaires of the Swedish Legation in Mexico made illegitimate use of the privilege of transmitting messages over the British cables. The character of the messages so sent is sufficiently surmised from the fact that Cronholm found it necessary to deliver them in person under cover of night to the telegraph office, that he did not "disguise his sympathy for Germany," "entered into close relations" with the German Legation, was "the only diplomat through whom information from a hostile camp could be obtained," and that the decoration which Herr von Eckhardt asked for him was to be kept a deep secret until after the war so as "not to excite the enemy's suspicion." It is taken for granted that Cronholm forwarded information concerning the sailings of ships from American ports in order to facilitate the work of German submarines. He was removed from the Swedish Legation on February 24. Mexico, according to Luis Cabrero, a leader in the Mexican Congress, does not think it necessary to take official cognizance of the matter by action or declaration. Von Eckhardt has denied that he ever sent any communication through Cronholm or ever wrote a communication recommending him for a decoration.

German comment has been restricted to the unofficial and semi-official newspapers. For the most part they restrict their words to an attack on American morality, ridiculing the fondness of the United States "for dealing with stolen documents." While they find fault with Count von Luxburg for carelessness, they maintain that Sweden's action was not an offense against neutrality, but that the publication of the letters by the United States was a diplomatic offense against Sweden's neutrality.

France.—After considerable wrangling the new French Ministry was formed by Paul Painlevé, on Friday, September 14. Painlevè is Premier and will continue to act as Minister of War. The other members are Ribot, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Peret, Minister of Justice; Steeg, Minister of the Interior; Chaumet, Minister of Marine; Loucheur, Minister of Munitions; Klotz, Minister of Finance; Besnard, Minister of Colonies; Claveille, Minister of Transports; Vincent, Minister of Education; Renard, Minister of Labor; Clementel, Minister of Commerce; David, Minister of Agriculture; Long, Minister of Provisions; Franklin-Pouillon, Minister of Missions abroad. The Under Secretaries are as follows: Goddart, Medical Services; Dumesnreil, Aviation; Mourier, General Administration; Masse, Military Justice and Pension; Breton, Munitions; Peytral, Interior; Bouerley, Finance; Morel, Commerce; Demonzie, Merchant Marine and Transports; Metin, Blockade; Dalimier, Fine Arts. Among the new Ministers are five Senators, eleven Deputies and two, Loucheur and Claveille, who do not belong to Parliament. The Under Secretaries are all members of the Chamber of Deputies. Sixteen of the Cabinet have previously been Ministers or Under Secretaries, three have been Premiers. Painlevè represents the Socialist Republican group, the Socialist Radicals have three members, the Socialist Left three, the Republican Union of the Senate two, the Republicans of the Left one and the Radical Republican Union seven members. Seven members of the Ribot Ministry have places in the new Cabinet. The Unified Socialists are unrepresented and as a consequence constitute an element of danger to the Ministry. Through their leader, M. Thomas, they express dissatisfaction with the Cabinet and deplore the lack of a program for reorganization. The action of the United Socialists is vigorously condemned by the press which likens their opposition to the work of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates in Russia. That the new Cabinet will endeavor to prosecute the war with vigor seems certain. A writer in Gaulois speaks the mind of the people when he says:

The Ministry

> I permit myself to place under the eyes of Painlevè the program that Ribot set forth: "Apply as quickly as possible judicial sanction to all criminal faults that are at present under trial. Neglect nothing to discover the authors of the attempt against the national defense. Let no personal consideration of any individual interfere with carrying on the war with all energy. Interfere with no rights of the people, providing their exercise does not encourage propagandas that would serve to demoralize the country."

The action of the Unified Socialists is being watched with interest.

The Pope's plea for peace has been received in France with respect, if not with any degree of enthusiasm. The more influential papers speak of it frankly but not bitterly. The Figaro comes nearest to an unfair criticism in these words:

The Pope's Plea

> Who would have the right to feel astonishment if, for instance, Benedict XV., who still regards Austria as a great Catholic Power, should take particular interest in her fate? Should we reject a priori the hypothesis of an intervention of the Pope, provoked, perhaps unknown to the Holy Father, in a more or less direct manner by Austria herself, and responding more or less to the manifest desires and interests of Austria? On the contrary, it is very probable, and it is not making a reproach to the Pope to say so. But we cannot forget the part played by Austria in this war. It was not that of the principal author. No, but it was that of the necessary accomplice. And we have no proof of her repentance.

The Libre Parole asks when and how the Holy Father's appeal will bear fruit and answers by declaring:

> The first condition would evidently be the acceptance of the general ideas of the Pontifical document as the base of discussion by the Central Empires; the evacuation of the invaded territories; the recognition of the rights of peoples; reparation for damages; guarantees for future peace. We must admit that the Central Empires, or, at least, Germany, are in no way disposed to do so yet, and that it will be necessary to constrain them by force of arms to accept the first condition. Our soldiers and those of our Allies are equal to that task. Benedict XV. will have opened the eyes of everyone to the fact that Germany is responsible for the continuation of hostilities, and that Germany's insane hope to be able to satisfy at least a part of her ambition is to-day the obstacle to the conclusion of peace.

La Croix, commenting on the absence of immediate results from the appeal, says:

> A fruit should not be gathered till it is ripe. Doubtlessly this fruit is not yet ripe. We are none the less grateful to the Holy Father for his noble action. He will not yet obtain success, but his initiative, by its concrete character, will nevertheless cause the question of peace to take a step forward. That is in itself a great blessing. . . . The conflagration is spreading over the whole world. The Pope's voice will soon be the only one to make itself heard with impartiality above the din of arms. Let us respect that voice. Let us be grateful to the Head of the Church for his charitable and pacific efforts. Let all, even his adversaries, treat him as Napoleon I. said he ought to be treated, that is to say, as if he had a powerful army behind him.

These comments are hopeful at least.

Ireland.—A recent issue of the Leader prints a highly interesting article on Sinn Fein, outlining in a trenchant style the aims of this group of patriots:

Sinn Fein and Freedom

> The wave of national enthusiasm that is now sweeping over the country is not due, as apologists for the Irish Party would have us believe, to a mental aberration or fit of midsummer madness, but is rather the expression of the innate political good sense of the Irish people. Sinn Fein is not so much a policy as a principle. No people would be worthy of freedom, and no people could ever hope to win their freedom, unless they had at least the will to be free. And so the first task of the Sinn Fein leaders must be to educate the people of Ireland, who have been degraded by centuries of slavery and debased by years of political meanness and corruption up to the idea of freedom. . . . We are really better Redmondites than the Redmondites themselves. John Bull is naturally a higgler, and will always try to get you to compromise by taking less than you ask. If we had never abated the O'Connellite demand for Repeal, England would probably have tried to stop our mouths long since by giving us Home Rule. But the Irish Party having accepted with such gratitude the bill introduced in 1912, it was whittled down in its passage through Parliament. Again, the Irish Party were content and grateful, and the Cabinet, finding them so backboneless, offered them county option, and when that had been accepted it was explained that all that could then be given was the "clean cut" of the six counties. The Irish Party gratefully accepted that also, and God knows to what lengths they would not then have gone had not the country risen in its wrath and repudiated them.

On the other hand, the policy of defiance and self-reliance pursued by the Sinn Feiners during the last few months has so impressed England that there is a very strong probability of her offering us not merely Gladstonian Home Rule, but actually Colonial Home Rule, though in 1912 the latter seemed almost as unattainable as a Republic. Indeed, the best tactics to pursue, even if we only wanted Home Rule, would be to make a furious demand for a Republic. The Irish Party's policy of lowering the flag and professing themselves ultra loyal and grateful was insane even from their own standpoint, because England never believed in their professions and was determined never to concede anything that she could help. If you wish to understand the measure of her distrust even of those who were always so anxious to proclaim themselves her dutiful subjects you have only to read Section 2 of the Government of Ireland Act. If England could be induced to do justice to Ireland by Irish loyalty and dutiful service to her, then Mr. Redmond should have succeeded as no Irish leader has ever done. No man could have tried to do more for her than he did. Yet she betrayed him at every hand's turn, and kicked him about like a pair of old boots.

In the altered circumstances that now prevail, however, Ireland would not be satisfied with mere Home Rule, and there seems every possibility that by pursuing Sinn Fein methods we can achieve a great deal more. The policy of appealing to the Peace Conference was regarded by many people as chimerical when it was first mooted, but its practicability is now impressing itself on everybody. Even John Dillon and, I think, the Freeman are toying with the idea. No matter how the war ends, England is not going to have it all her own way at the settlement. Her allies certainly, and her enemies probably, will all have a big say in the matter, and none of the nations represented at the Conference will have any interest in seeing Ireland kept in bondage except herself. Indeed, their interests will be all the other way, and we all like to see justice done to our fellow-man when it either suits us or does not cost us anything. Some people seek to waive aside the Peace Conference idea by saying that the Irish representatives will not be admitted to the gathering. It does not seem to me to matter very much whether we are directly represented or not. We can wield enough political influence in America to see that the United States representatives raise the Irish question, and it will be very much in the interests of Russia and certain other great Powers to see that the matter is properly considered. And, having regard to all England's professions of love for the small nations and President Wilson's various statements of the aims for which America is fighting, it will not be easy to make a case against Ireland's demand.

Indeed, the only case that England could make in the matter would be to point to Redmond. For if Redmond correctly interpreted the feelings of the Irish people when he offered our blood and treasure to England at the beginning of the war, then we would have had no right to appeal to a Peace Conference. For men do not usually go forth to die willingly for a Power that oppresses them. But if Ireland continues to repudiate Redmond and his party, and makes it clear to the world that she is dissatisfied and demands her full rights as a Sovereign State, then England's only argument against us will be taken out of her mouth. Wherefore, must the Irish Party be swept out of existence. They have shown themselves men of no real national instincts, and at every critical moment they have endeavored to save England's face, and it is only by making it clear that they are not authorized to speak for us that we can hope to establish our claims before the nations of the world.

The strongest proof of the fact that the Peace Conference is going to afford us a unique opportunity of winning our rights is to be found in the British Government's anxiety to keep us away from it. It was not for nothing that Arthur Balfour and Bonar Law and Walter Long were transformed into Home Rulers, and the Convention that is now sitting under the protection of the Defense of the Realm Act is striking evidence of the strength of our position. How acute the international situation must be is shown by the fact that, even in the middle of the war, England found it necessary to take the humiliating step of releasing the men who had aimed at her heart the deadly blow known as Easter Week. We have all the cards in our hands if we know how to play them.

From this it would appear that contrary to popular opinion some of the leaders of Sinn Fein would be content with Colonial Home Rule.

Russia.—Apparently the revolt of Korniloff came to a sudden end in the arrest of the leader on September 14. On that day General Alexieff, Chief of Staff, sent this wire to Kerensky.

The Revolt

At ten o'clock last night General Korniloff and Generals Lukomsky and Romanovsky and Colonel Pleustobevsky-Pliushkhen were arrested. The members of the commission of inquiry are due at Mohilev at midnight, and the arrested persons will be given into their hands. Such other officers as the commission selects also will be arrested. All the troops at Mohilev are true to the Provisional Government and recognize my authority.

Just at present it is impossible to say how wide-spread the revolt was. It is certain, however, that Korniloff was within thirty miles of Petrograd, for on September 12 he marched into Gatchina, after it had been evacuated by loyal troops. The situation is not yet clear, for the different groups of politicians are fighting each other vigorously, and the Boishevikis, who have grown very powerful, have declared for extreme radicalism. They demand that not only Social Democrats but all representatives of landed proprietors be excluded from power. Their program also calls for the abolition of private property, working class control over production, confiscation of war profits, heavy taxation of capital and an immediate invitation to the countries at war to conclude peace. In the midst of all this turmoil Kerensky announced a temporary Cabinet and proclaimed Russia a republic.

Catholic Students and State Scholarships

JOSEPH V. MCKEE, M.A.

EACH year the State of New York, under the Act signed by Governor Sulzer in 1913, awards 3,000 scholarships to the graduates of high schools throughout the State, on their records made in the Regents' Examinations. These scholarships have a monetary value of $100 a year for four years, or $400 in all. They carry no restrictions with them as to the course or college.

Upon the students' entrance into the institution of his choice, his account is credited with the payment of $100 a year, the money itself being turned over to the college, on warrant to the State treasurer. Thus where the tuition fee of a college is $150 a year, the State pays the $100 and the lesser amount is left for the student to meet. The most important feature of the law is that the student has the fullest freedom to enter any college whose courses appeal to him. In this way the boy or girl is assisted financially and the college enrolls another student, both benefiting under the generosity of the State in its liberal educational grant of $300,000 annually.

A day or so ago the names of the winners of this year's awards were published in the daily papers. The boy who headed the list had been a student at De Witt Clinton High School. The second, a girl, I believe, had attended Hunter College; the third had studied at another city high school. A perusal of the list shows that outside of one or two instances, an almost absolute minimum, our Catholic institutions of learning are not represented. Of this fund of $300,000 of public money only a little over two or three per cent goes to Catholic children, or to Catholic colleges.

Why should this condition exist? What are the reasons why this substantial aid should not go to our Catholic boys and girls, to our Catholic institutions? Is it because our children do not need this help? Is it because they can not compete successfully with the students of the public schools? Is there anything in their training at Catholic institutions that disqualifies them from entering this healthful competition? No one conversant with Catholic education or Catholic students will admit that the education given in our secondary schools is in any way inferior to that of the public schools, or that the Catholic pupils are less ambitious or more stupid than those in attendance at other places.

For three years I had the great pleasure of teaching in a Catholic high school; later I spent three years in one of the largest of the city high schools. From my experience in both places I can say truthfully that the curriculum at the former institution compared most favorably with that in the latter, exceeding it in simplicity, thoroughness, and sound common sense. The subject matter, it is true, was less extensive; but this was not a fault, it was the result of the institution's desire to do little but to do it well. Hence informative and unnecessary courses were not in the curriculum; the courses that were given, however, could be justified by time and experience. But what was most important, the pupil went forth drilled in the essentials, with a propensity for logical thought and a developed ability to do sustained thinking.

In the city schools the type of boy differed greatly from those I had learned to know and love. In most cases the pupil in the public school was the son of poor, illiterate parents, struggling against tremendous odds to advance himself in life. Studious, ambitious, determined, he let nothing stand in the way of his goal, an education. The results that he attained, in the light of his handicaps, were nothing less than remarkable. Great credit is due him for his unflagging zeal, his tireless application, his dogged determination to succeed.

But as far as intellectual capacity is concerned, or the ability to do concentrated, original thinking, the boy in the Catholic school is his equal and, in a great number of instances, his superior. Boy for boy, I have found that in the matter of native endowments the advantage lies with the Catholic student. It would be idle to judge otherwise in the face of the records of so many of our Catholic college graduates who have entered public life and are doing such praiseworthy work in so many various fields. If any fault is to be found, it lies in the tendency, so common at times, among our Catholic boys, not to take advantage of all the opportunities offered them, or not to create opportunities where none exist.

If then in the present instance the trouble lies not with the training offered in our schools nor with the students who attend them, wherein is the reason why so few benefit by the offering of the State? It is no defense to say that our children do not need this assistance. That would not be true. They do. There are altogether too few scholarships offered by Catholic colleges and there are far too many boys who would attend advanced classes eagerly if their circumstances permitted. Then why is this help withheld from them? The underlying cause can be found in the present arrangement under which our Catholic secondary schools work. In the elementary, or parochial, schools, to qualify for graduation, every student must pass the Regents' examination in the required subjects. The records show that the boys and girls attain high averages in spelling, arithmetic, history, geography, and the other elementary subjects. However, this condition which prevails in the parochial schools does not exist in the secondary institutions. Here, in most cases, there are no Regents' examinations to pass. The syllabus of each school is approved by the University of the State of New York, and upon attending classes for the required number of hours and passing the local examinations the student is qualified to enter college. Consequently, he does not compete with the student in the city high schools, because he does not need to take the Regents' examinations. Thus it follows that he has no record in common with the pupils of other schools, upon which the authorities can base or estimate his right to a scholarship.

Why this condition exists is a question that cannot be answered offhand. Many think that the Regents' examinations are a hardship. But after a number of years' experiences in preparing students to pass these tests I must say that they are fair in the highest degree and comparatively easy. They are good tests of the student's knowledge of the particular subject he has been studying.

What objections can there be to permitting these tests to be held in our secondary schools? They are held in the parochial schools. The pupils must pass the local examinations, which do not differ greatly from those given by the Regents. It would be a mere matter of substitution, with the expenditure of a little more effort. Surely the good that would result would richly compensate for all the trouble. Surely we should not allow any slight obstacle to stand in the way of help to our children.

If, however, the authorities feel that it would be unwise to allow these examinations to be their standards of the student's knowledge, there can be no reason for refusing to allow the brighter boys to take the Regents' test and thus qualify for the scholarships. This would entail no hardships upon those in charge and would accrue to the benefit of the student.

We should be most eager to help boys obtain an education. Never before has there been so great a demand for trained thinkers, for men of disciplined minds. Soon we shall be face to face with serious social and economic problems and if we wish to have them met by means consistent with sane principles of philosophy and morality, we must hasten to equip our young men properly and adequately. Theirs will be the task to bear these burdens, and in the light of the forces that are now gathering strength for the attack, God help our ideals if our young men, the men of tomorrow, are not able to defend them. And no weapon is truer or more serviceable than a Catholic education.

The problem of State scholarships resolves itself into elements that are easy of solution. To qualify for participation in this annual educational bonus of $300,000 the high school graduate must present his record attained in the Regents' examination during his high school course. At present 3,000 boys and girls are being aided to the almost absolute exclusion of the Catholic student. This is the problem. Its solution is as easily stated. Institute Regents' examinations in all our secondary schools, not by compulsion, if that would prove irksome, but at least by election, so that our boys and girls may not be shut out from the possibility of receiving State aid, simply because of the fact that they are attending Catholic institutions.

Surely our Catholic students will welcome the opportunity to help themselves in the struggle for betterment. Surely the Catholic colleges should be glad to keep one more student with them who, without this aid, would be forced to see his hopes thwarted and his ambition crushed, ambition oftentimes crushed with passionate love.

The New Wise Man

GEORGE NAUMAN SHUSTER

A GREAT many of us have read Rabindranath Tagore, and now that his quiet Oriental feet have passed over America, some of us have seen him. I fancy that the impressions of the audiences he addressed must have been incredibly varied. To the newspaper man he was something of a new circus come to town, that would do perhaps for a column. To the inured lecture-goer he may have presented the aspect of an intellectual novelty. But many of the sincerest people about us seemed to think him a saint. The idea of sanctity has in some way become bound up with seclusion. When the American thinks of holiness, his mind reverts to the desert and St. Jerome. It should have been rather trying, therefore, for Tagore's admirers to find him blazoned out in duotone and headline, acclaimed with all the fabulous modern acoustics of appreciation. He came like a wise man from the East, but rather to be adored than to adore. Yet the disciples of the Indian were very proud of his success.

Latterly there has been a definite trend among thinking Protestants to Buddhism. This was naturally stronger before the war, but it still lives on and will no doubt blossom out again when the tumult is over. Though the omniscience of modern geography has outlined India quite thoroughly, the Hindoo philosophy still owns the attractive flavor of mystery. Protestantism has gravitated towards it because it had to gravitate towards something: thought is too heavy for vacuity. Now the evolution principle has impressed itself so firmly upon us that men cannot go back to something "commonplace and outgrown" like Catholicism. They will go forward to the unexplored, the new and the exciting. Our philosophy with its theory that thought also evolves has come to believe that because the Hindoo religion has enjoyed so many years of unhampered life, it is probably far advanced. We have been too busy cutting each other's throats; perhaps the fakir on the dreamy banks of the Ganges has something to tell us. Undoubtedly he has, and some of his thought has eddied among us. Christian Science is only a plebeian concept of a spiritual Hindoo hypnotism. We have heard Maeterlinck and in a different vein Rhys-Davids.

Like the heart of a great ancient, Orientalism has waited by its rivers and the sword of the West has slowly pierced it through. First there came Kipling, young and sensitive to externals, who said frankly that "East is East" and told his story. Then arrived the archeologists with their inevitable histories and statistics. Latterly a number of mystics, like the great French Catholic Paul Claudel, have sought the East for the word it has to say. Finally, after long ages of silence, the old man has parted his lips and here are the strange poems of the mysterious Tagore.

Every philosophy has its "Summa" and "Gitanjali" is Tagore's. All that he has said or conceivably will say can only be ramifications of this book, it is so plump, varied and pregnant with Buddhism. Undoubtedly the poems are beautiful, mystic, even religious in a certain sense. One says that the Orient breathes in them if anywhere. Yet how like the songs of Christian Saints they are! Some pages remind us of Assisi, others of St. Francis de Sales, and still others of St. Louis. Take for instance the verses in which he presents the terrible problem of evil:

> I thought I should ask of thee, but I dared not, the rose-wreath thou hadst on thy neck. Thus I waited for the morning, when thou did'st depart to find a few fragments on the bed. And like a beggar I searched in the dawn for a stray petal or two.
>
> Ah me, what is it I find? What token left of thy love? It is no flower, no spices, no vase of perfumed water. It is thy mighty sword, flashing as a flame, heavy as a bolt of thunder. The young light of morning comes through the window and spreads itself upon thy bed. The morning bird twitters and asks, Woman, what hast thou got? No, it is no flower, nor spices, nor vase of perfumed water—it is thy dreadful sword.
>
> I sit and muse in wonder, what gift is this of thine. I can find no place to hide it. I am ashamed to wear it, frail as I am, and it hurts me when I press it to my bosom. Yet shall I bear in my heart this honor of the burden of pain, this gift of thine.
>
> From now on there shall be no fear left for me in this world, and thou shalt be victorious in all my strife. Thou hast left death for my companion and I shall crown him with my life.

Thus we fancy St. Dominic may have prayed in the hills of Spain. One can take almost any poem from this book and unfold some fragrant Christian virtue or belief. "And because I have loved this life, I know that I shall love death as well"—that is almost as challenging as Gilbert Chesterton.

Is there, then, any difference between Buddhism and Christianity? Is the prayer of St. Francis a replica of Tagore's? Many, indeed, find nothing dissimilar, reminding us of several coincidences in the Gospel of Jesus Christ and the teachings of Buddha. We are told that religion is after all based on God and the soul; that our faith is but the outgrowth of the old Eastern dream of heavenly calm. If, says the professor, Christ and Buddha both tell us to turn the other cheek, what priority has Christ? This is a question for Catholics to answer. Surely the difference is quite obvious, much plainer than the gulf between Plato and St. Augustine. We do not deny that the Hindoos have dwelt with God, and we are perfectly ready to admit that the Greek philosophers and dramatists, the Roman Stoics and the Celtic Druids entertained visions of Him. But Christianity is more than a territory; it is the Kingdom.

When we compare Tagore with St. Francis, we find a primal incompatibility. Tagore is dreaming with God and Assisi is shouting with Him. On the one glow the hues of dreamy placid recognition; on the other the five wounds. The Christian Saint exulted so much in the power of his Master, that he cried out to the fishes which miraculously heard him. He called the trees his brethren, not because he really believed they were kinsfolk but because it was a satisfying way of expressing a confident delight in having a brother. Tagore is well content to muse of his ancestor in the rose or of God in the moon. For him there is no sharp, thrilling separation from God and the universe, no violent recognition of his own soul. He is all, and all are of him. One cannot imagine St. Francis falling down to adore a sunset. He loved it, but he worshiped God who was far above the raiment of the evening. Yet Tagore, in worshiping beauty, actually makes it the object of religion, so that there is no distinction, no struggle or service, but a peaceful immersion into the whole. It would not be surprising if the fishes talked to him, for the Hindoo tongue is silence.

The Indian mystic in one of his poems tells us that he has no work to do, and we remember startled that the first recorded utterances of the Saviour is that He must go about His Father's business. That activity did not cease till Resurrection Day, and then was carried on by His disciples. That they might not grow weary or faint under the terrible burdens of their day, He gave them food. He promised them no Keats-like death in the flower-gardens, but instead the scourge and the cross. And so we may say that the mission of Christianity is this: to die that faith may live. It is a warlike and sacred consecration, embodying nothing so placid as the Hindoo Nirvana, but rising on the glorious and deathless vitality of the struggling human soul. If Tagore is a saint, then he is preeminently not a Christian Saint, but a deadly foe to Christianity, for he aims at its purpose, its exultant energy and the ceaseless battle it is pledged to give. And, after all, I think, we prefer to fight.

The Countess of Warwick and the New Religion

J. D. Tibbits

WE have abundant illustrations of the extent to which the widespread materialism of our day affects almost every field of thought. In the current issue of the Hibbert Journal, the Countess of Warwick contributes an ably written and highly suggestive article which is chiefly valuable as showing the manner in which that same materialism is able to project itself into the field of religion. That it should thus attempt the seemingly impossible, is not, in any sense, surprising, for a system of thought which fails to compass and explain all the facts of life is admittedly partial and incomplete; and that there are facts of life which are spiritual and immaterial in their essence, is the unanimous and unquestionable testimony of universal experience. In dealing with these, materialism is under a serious disadvantage. It must either ignore them absolutely or it must, in some way, derive them from material and physical sources. Lady Warwick has chosen the latter course, and in doing so has fallen into errors far from uncommon to writers of her school. To expose all her blunders would far exceed my limits both of space and time, and my only reason for directing attention to those which are most flagrant is the fact that they are being urged in our day with increasing insistence, and because they are meeting with a certain measure of acceptance from those who are more given to superficial thought than to analysis.

Lady Warwick begins her article by a brief discussion of the relations between religion and the present war, and proceeds to a sharp and somewhat scathing criticism of the Church of England, not only because that Church has failed to rise to what she considers a golden opportunity, but also because of its general ineptitude. By this general ineptitude is meant the apathy which official Anglicanism habitually displays in regard to the shocking social conditions which obtain in the England of today; and the proneness to meet them, not with remedies in any way practical or efficient, but simply by preaching what she is pleased to term "platitudes."

Lady Warwick then assumes the role of prophet and discusses the religion of the future, predicting, as is both natural and logical from her premises, that it will concern itself largely, if not wholly, with material things. It is true that she speaks of spirituality and that she has not entirely lost sight of the spiritual nature of man; but it is also true that she appears to regard the spiritual as a mere appendage of the material, and this is made abundantly clear in the carefully expressed conviction that it is on purely material conditions that the spiritual part of man depends. To have the masses well clothed and fed; to house them amid the most sanitary conditions; and to pay them a just and living wage is to lay the foundations for spiritual progress. The dogmas of religion, therefore, which have no immediate or direct relation with these things, will become obsolete merely because of their uselessness.

Now, with Lady Warwick's criticism of the Church of England I have no concern. It may or may not be true. The interest which her article evokes lies in the fact that to her established religion is the local representative of Christianity, and it is to Christianity at large that her criticism really applies. But if the history of Christianity proves anything at all, it proves that, whatever the foundations of spiritual progress may be, they are wholly and absolutely divorced from all that is material. I am quite as ready as Lady Warwick to admit the value of every social improvement for which she so eloquently contends, but as regards their relations with the spiritual life, I am unable to see that history records a verdict of anything other than indifference, in proof of which are the countless illustrations which may be brought to show that both poverty and riches have always stood on a plane of equality as contributing factors thereto. Thus, in the conversion of the Roman Empire, it was the poor and the afflicted to whom religion made its most effectual appeal, and that appeal was none the less effective in that it was unaccompanied by any direct attempt to mitigate the many social and material evils of the day. Were Lady Warwick's theory true, it would have been the wealthy and luxurious classes who responded to the Church's call, for with them the foundations which she considers so essential were present in abundance. But her theory finds still fuller refutation in the almost innumerable instances of men and women who have been born in the possession of all these things and who have voluntarily abandoned them for no other reason than that they have conflicted with that very spiritual nature which, in Lady Warwick's view, demands them. These experts in the religious life have been drawn from all ages and from all nations; and there is surely some reason for giving preference to their consentient testimony rather than to the theories of those who, however sincere, are little more or less than amateurs.

Lady Warwick's view of the social function of religion seems to have been similarly misconstrued. There can certainly be no question as to the stand taken by the Catholic Church as regards social justice. If she has a distinct and frequently expressed conception of the rights and duties of workmen, her conception of the obligations and responsibilities of employers is no less clear. But it is one thing to preach moral truth, and quite another to make individuals moral, and the fact which Lady Warwick appears wholly to forget is that religion can affect no individual unless that individual surrenders himself to the influence of religion. It was this very self-surrender which made the Saints what they were, and it is hardly too much to say that their sanctity was directly proportioned to the completeness of it. Lady Warwick is quite disregardful of all this.

She appears to think that the success of religion is to be measured only by the social reforms which it may accomplish; and that it has only to preach the truth with sincerity and fearlessness in order to subjugate a nation in some such way as the English subjugated the Boer Republic, or the Germans Belgium.

So let us suppose a community, composed of, say, 1,000,000 workmen, and 1,000 employers. Let us suppose, too, that these million workmen surrender themselves absolutely to the teaching and influence of the Church; but that the thousand employers do not. Let us further suppose that these employers, being devoid of religious motives and consequently of moral restraint, choose to oppress and ill treat the workmen. There will undoubtedly ensue much social injustice, similar to that which so strikingly disfigures modern England. Wages will be too low, food poor and insufficient, houses unsanitary, disease rampant. Lady Warwick would at once pronounce her verdict that religion had failed. The fact that the million workmen were wholly responsive to it, that they bore their suffering with Christian fortitude, their oppression with Christian humility, their poverty with Christian patience, and that they were sustained by Christian hope and consoled by the happiness which only Christianity can impart—all this would, with Lady Warwick, count for nothing; and it would count for nothing because her very system of thought forces upon her a false perspective, and precludes her from facing those facts, which, uncongenial to it as they may be, are none the less significant and profound. Sincere and earnest as she doubtless is, she could hardly have achieved a more perfect success had she deliberately set out to compose a study of misunderstanding and misconstruction.

And the general superficiality of her attitude is made even more evident by the charge, which she contemptuously makes against religion, that amid conditions which perhaps it is quite important to change, it contents itself with preaching "platitudes." Platitudes, I am free to admit, have but little attraction to most men. The word has a bad sound. But Lady Warwick seems to be quite oblivious, not only of the truth that the term is purely relative, but of the equally certain truth that it is always the less important term in the relation. As an illustration of my meaning, let us take as an example the injunction of Christ to "Seek first the Kingdom of God." Now, it is quite conceivable that this may appear to Lady Warwick a platitude; but it is no less true that to the Saints it was a principle of life. Its value, therefore, lies not in its being read or repeated, but in its being lived; and so one would not be entirely untruthful in characterizing the whole calendar of Saints as a body of men and women who succeeded in infusing life into platitudes; just as one could similarly characterize that far greater body of those who are not Saints as being the creators of platitudes by the very simple process of subtracting life from Divine counsels and truths.

No one who knows of Lady Warwick and her many activities can have other than the most profound respect both for her person and for her motives; but they may none the less deplore her acceptance of a hypothesis which carried to its logical conclusion can do little else than vitiate the aspirations she has most at heart.

Evolution and the Pro-Proselyte

J. A. M. Richey

WHEN the angel of death had gone forth with his charge, solitude stalked in the vacant places and loneliness kept step with the restless pacings of the pro-proselyte up and down his library floor. Days and moments quickly flying sped onward toward the dead. Upstairs the children slept, but solemn silence took hold of him in seemingly tangible contact. He groaned in spirit: "O God, how shall I mother the motherless? Where is that mother now in Thy gracious keeping, and what is she doing? Reveal to me Thy Truth, O God, and I will follow where it leads."

A measure of calmness succeeded the ternary of petition. He became passive. The vision of aspiration and desire which had pierced walls and delved into space now confined itself and beheld a book-case directly before it. Aiming, yet aimlessly, eye and finger lit upon "Evolution in Relation to Religious Thought," by Le Conte. It was just such a truth that he desired to look into deeper. Spontaneously he lent himself to a sympathetic study of the subject. Evolution had seemed to him plausible, inasmuch as the geologic sequences were fairly well demonstrated and appeared to coincide with the sequences in the Biblical record. But now he must look further and deeper. Was this theory a fact or a delusion?

Almost immediately he became wholly absorbed in the pursuit of his subject, marking passages and making notes. The wee hours beckoned him to bed, but early in the morning the mocking-bird upon the royal palm outside his window roused him into the enthusiasm of his new undertaking. Many books, many articles, many markings and notes filled all the hours of weeks and months which other duties permitted. He was determined to fathom this philosophy of life which had invaded with its terminology the whole world of letters. Already he was convinced that he would end by being a firm believer in evolution or else reject the theory entirely. Early in his investigation he noted the hugeness of the problem and the evasiveness of the theorist.

What was the sum-total of the argument for evolution? It utterly disproved itself. Where he asked it a question it gave him no answer. It leaped chasms, sidestepped issues and assumed all that had to be proved. Science deals with facts; the evolutionist with a hypothesis which in courtesy may be called a theory; but neither the scientist nor the evolutionist, apart from Revelation, can propose the origin, process or purpose of creation. Evolution is a theory of assumptions. In so far as it is exclusively concerned with scientific data it assumes (1) an untraced line of natural descent, (2) from an unfathomed natural origin, (3) by an undemonstrated process, (4) through an undefined energy, (5) for an unknown purpose. The theory of evolution assumes all this. But scientific data give it no assistance in the face of these assumptions; they indicate only an ascending scale of differentiated and fixed phenomena.

Different scientists may estimate the age of the earth as anywhere from a million to a billion years, but they universally acknowledge in geologic history the sequences in animal life as recorded both scientifically and Biblically. Mammals were before man; before these, down the scale, reptiles and birds, fishes, and then invertebrates, shell-fish, siphons, etc. Just to illustrate, lobsters were before frogs and oysters before crustaceans.

Now this evolution, of which there is question, assumes the upbuilding of nature by natural causes wholly materialistic. It supposes that a lobster was evolved from an oyster by various untraced transitions, and a frog from a lobster by a similar series of transitions until the exterior shell was wholly transformed into interior bone, and so on, up the whole ascending scale. No doubt, this theory has many and varied charms. It professes to attack boldly, all the riddles that have vexed and puzzled the minds of investigators since Aristotle's day and before it. No one likes to grope in the dark; its very boldness is, therefore, a bid for popularity.

But where's the proof? There is none. Not a single transition has been demonstrated. The innumerable fossils bridge none of the chasms. More than that, the long line of creatures from oysters up to elephants show that they are essentially the same creatures that they were in their most primitive ancestors. The new creature came on the scenes, but the old creature did not depart. There was no transition. The old creature did not account for the new creature, but only for himself. What does that prove? Not the theory of evolution! Rather, it demonstrates the necessity of some supernatural principle of creation.

In the face of these facts, the question easily presents itself to the thoughtful mind: Has God Himself indicated any principle or process of creation which might in some definite way associate the supernatural with the natural? When infidels scoffed at the Deity and agnostics doubted all truth, the stones cried out in praise to the Rock of Ages. The lithosphere opened up its records and geology became an advanced science. The natural man pounced upon the new knowledge in the hope of proving a materialistic theory. He failed, failed utterly.

There are two sets of three-fold conceptions mutually exclusive, and they may be expressed thus: (1) Evolutionism is to physical nature what Protestantism is to revealed truth and what radical Socialism is to governmental authority. (2) The principle of creation and Divine endowment is to nature what an infallible Church is to Divine Revelation and what Papal authority is to international government. In other words, evolution, Protestantism and Socialism go as naturally together as do Divine endowment, Catholic truth and Papal authority; and these two sets of principles are contrary, the one to the other, so that the mind must choose betwixt the two; it cannot be guided by both.

Weighing these matters together, one sees that the illogical and evasive evolutionists have split up into as many camps as have Protestants with private interpretation as their guide, while the same individualism distinguishes Socialism which would establish free-love and ultimately lead to the doctrine of every man for himself. The very spirit of division, disintegration and destruction constitutes the leaven in that triple concept. So consistent are they in design that one easily attributes all of them in turn to an evil spirit as successive attempts to rob God of His creatures, Revelation of its truth, authority of all power, and, incidentally, to rob the world and society of every constructive force.

For God is constructive in His methods. He is the Great Architect of the Universe, the Master-builder of earth-history stored in the great Book of Stone, of which Moses held in his hands the last two leaves but one, containing the moral code; while the Apostolic See constitutes the last leaf of the book: "Thou art Cephas and on this Rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," the last stratum in the Rock of Ages.

But the last page does not contradict the first page; the breath of life was breathed into the Church of God at Pentecost, but in the beginning, also, when God created the heavens and the earth, the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. At the beginning and at the end we see the same principle at work, though in different ways, it is true. The Eternal Son formed His Church out of material already prepared and the Holy Spirit gave it a new life and quality which made of it a new creature, as different from the law as the butterfly from the caterpillar, though the new contained the old within, and fulfilled it. So, too, God formed the body of man from the slime of the earth, of material already in existence, and then added that which really made man, breathed into the nostrils the breath of life and made a living soul. So too, once again, did God put into the caterpillar the capacity for the higher life of the butterfly.

This is very different from the principle of evolution which would give a clam the potentiality, through fortuitous circumstances and the changes and chances of many generations, to turn its descendants into several different creatures, from a robin to a hippopotamus. It is very different to conceive of creatures themselves, by selection and struggle, and so on, effecting a higher creature, and to conceive God as choosing one creature from among his kind, to endow him with new faculties and powers, on which follows evolution within a definite limited sphere, since it is God's good pleasure to bring forth out of His treasury things old and new, combining, constructing and creating. Geology shows us the chasms God leaped but it does not show us the transitions of a self-making and self-developing nature, nor, indeed, can it ever show them.

But how may it please God to do this thing? It is not given us to make a revelation but only to illustrate a principle long since revealed. Let us suppose ourselves back at that period in creation when a peculiar sort of worm was the highest creature on the new earth, emerging from the waters. Then, let us suppose we hear the Almighty say: Let us choose one of these worms out of which to make a much higher and quite different creature. Consequently, He endows that little creature with new powers and functions capable of changing its whole structure and nature, and thus establishing a new creature. It undergoes a wonderful change, and instead of crawling on the earth flits on beautiful wings through the air. We recognize the butterfly, of course. But there was a time when there was no butterfly. Is the caterpillar-butterfly, then, a persisting illustration of an evolutionary principle, or is it one of those signs God has left amid nature to illustrate the wonder of His works and the hidden method of His holy and mysterious operation?

It would be as much to the point to ask: Has man within him naturally, independent of Divine promise and endowment, the power of resurrection after death and the latent potentiality of a new and higher existence? The evolutionist would be the first to deny such a possibility. The modern Protestant, even, denies very often a physical resurrection. And the Socialist and anarchist contribute only the elements of disorder and revolution. From none of these sources may a satisfactory answer be derived.

But Revelation speaks definitely: The power from on high, the Revelation of God and Divine authority—these are Catholic principles because they are Divine, and they constitute the key which opens the door of the Way, the Truth and the Life. Standing in the ways, the proselyte was beginning to see and to seek the old path where is the good way.

Relief Work in the Civil War

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J.

THERE was no time during the Civil War when there were not some Sisters of Charity in the capital of the Confederacy. Richmond served as their headquarters, and from there they were sent to the Southern battlefields. Their mother house in Emmittsburg was in a section of Maryland held by Union troops for the greater part of the time of conflict, but generals of both armies considered it neutral property, and the establishment was never harmed by any soldier. From Richmond, in August, 1862, five Sisters of Charity went to Manassas to care for the wounded of both armies. Their care was badly needed, for ten patients, on an average, died each day up to the time when the Sisters took charge of the temporary hospital. The condition of this hospital can be imagined from the fact that the first requisition made by the newly arrived nurses was for shovels. In the drive they had to make for cleanliness, brooms were as useless as pop-guns against a trench in modern Flanders. They remained at Manassas until General Johnston ordered a retreat. Hardly had they left the place when the whole camp was a sheet of flame. The bodies of those who had died that day never found a soldier's grave. At sunset smouldering embers marked the hospital site.

Gordonsville was the first halting place. Two hundred patients were under their care here. The mortality list was not as large as at Manassas. A Federal advance compelled the removal of the hospital to Danville, where the casualty list had grown to four hundred. There was no way of heating the Danville hospital, so in November, 1862, the medical officers ordered the removal of the hospital to Lynchburg. It seems that a base hospital had been opened in that place, and by the time the Sisters of Charity arrived with the new contingent of wounded, there were 1,000 patients to be cared for. The first time a Sister passed through the wards accompanied by a doctor, a patient who recognized the white cornette, cried out: "Sister, for God's sake give me a piece of bread." Up to the time when the Sisters took charge, most of the patients had been half-starved. For three years Lynchburg remained in charge of the Sisters. The priest at the Lynchburg hospital was Father Gache, S.J., who held a chaplain's commission in the Confederate army. He was assigned to a Louisiana regiment at the beginning of hostilities, and after two years' service, owing to death and disease, the regiment ceased to exist. In 1863 Father Gache was the only member of the regiment on the active list. The Confederate Government then assigned him as chaplain to military hospitals, a post he held till Richmond fell.

In September, 1862, Antietam took its place in history. The toll in killed and wounded was very heavy. Boonsboro and Sharpsburg were selected as hospital sites. There were really four hospitals in Boonsboro. The morning after their arrival in the town, the Sisters set out for the battlefield. They found the same sad picture of the aftermath of battle: wounded men lying on straw strewn upon the ground, with here and there a blanket stretched above them and fastened to the ground by sticks. This improvised tent served to shield the wounded from the rays of the burning sun. The neighboring houses and barns were filled with sufferers, and the newly arrived nurses did not know where to begin. They would stop with one group of wounded, only to be called away to another. At one time they were performing their merciful ministry in a wagon shed, when an officer rode up and asked one of them to follow him. "The color-bearer of my regiment is dying," he said, "he has been so brave that I want to let his wife have the consolation of knowing that the Sisters of Charity were with him in his last moment." The next day the color-bearer was buried, the Sisters attending the funeral. Just about sun-down, as they were lowering the body into the ground, a group of officers rode up, and waited silently with bared heads, till the last honors were paid to the dead. Then one of the officers spoke: "I am General McClellan, and I am happy and proud to see the Sisters of Charity with these poor men. I would like to see fifty more Sisters ministering to our poor sufferers."

From Boonsboro and Sharpsburg the wounded were taken to Frederick, and Hagerstown, Maryland. Both these towns were strongly Southern in sympathy. Whittier told the story of Southern sympathy in selecting for his lone Union heroine, Barbara Fritchie, when Jackson's troops were marching through Frederick. Up to a few years ago, there was a house in Frederick, supposed to have been the place where the aged patriot waved the Stars and Stripes. Confederate veterans in Frederick always maintained that the flag was flying in the imagination only of the poet. The fact is that feeling ran so high there that wounded Northern soldiers were made to feel that wounds did not make friends. There is an interesting incident in an old war diary of a Union prisoner, who was wounded and convalescing in a Southern homestead, in the Frederick valley. A young lady in the family would never attend to him until the Confederate soldiers in the place were all served. He said to her one day:

> When I was in Portsmouth, the Sisters of Charity were called over from Norfolk to serve their own men, Southerners, in the hospitals there. When, a few weeks later, our men took the place and the same hospital was filled with Northern troops, these good Sisters were called on again, and they resumed their labors as if there had been no sectional change in the men. This was true Christian charity, and I would not fear for any human misery when the Sisters have control. This, my young friend, is what all you young ladies ought to do.

It was in this same year, 1862, that Admiral Farragut cooperating with General Butler took the city of New Orleans, and sent his gunboats up the Mississippi to reduce the towns along its banks. In shelling Donaldsonville, the Northern guns had injured property belonging to the Sisters of Charity. They entered a protest to General Butler, who sent the following reply:

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, La.,
Sept. 2, 1862.

To the Superior of the Sisters of Charity.

Madame:

I had no information until the reception of your note that so sad a result to the Sisters of your community had happened from the bombardment of Donaldsonville. I am very, very sorry that Admiral Farragut was unaware that he was injuring your establishment by his shells. Any injury must have been entirely accidental. The destruction of that town became a necessity. The inhabitants harbored a gang of cowardly guerrillas, who committed every atrocity, among others that of firing upon an unarmed boat, crowded with women and children. . . . It is impossible to allow such acts, and I am only sorry that the righteous punishment meted out to them in this instance, as indeed in all others, fell quite as heavily upon the innocent as upon the guilty.

No one can appreciate more highly than myself, the holy, self-sacrificing labors of the Sisters of Charity. To them, old soldiers are daily indebted for the kindest offices. Sisters to all mankind, they know no nation, no kindred, neither war nor peace. Their all-pervading charity is like the love of "Him who died for all," whose servants they are, and whose pure teaching their love illustrates.

I repeat my grief that any harm should have befallen your society of Sisters, and will cheerfully repair it as far as I may, in the manner you suggest, by filling the order you have sent to the city for provisions and medicines. Your Sisters in the city will also testify that my officers and soldiers have never failed to do all in their power to aid the Sisters in their useful labors.

With sentiments of the highest respect, believe me.

Your Friend,
Benj. F. Butler.

The Charity Hospital and the Marine Hospital in the commercial metropolis of the Southwest were in charge of the Sisters of Charity. They went through their rounds of daily duties, cheerfully and efficiently, splendidly living up to their name. It was quite unintelligible to the sick and wounded soldiers that such skilled nurses could work without pay. One day a soldier in the Marine Hospital put the question to a Sister, who had obtained for him a cot in place of a carpet bag that had served for his bed. When he was thanking his nurse for her kindness he said: "Sister, the soldiers always wonder how the Sisters can work so hard without pay." Very promptly he got an answer: "Our pay is in a coin more precious than gold; it is stored up in a country more desirable than any that exists on earth."

Among the many whose names appear in the list of those who did relief work in Southern hospitals and battlefields, and who lived long after the war to labor on unceasingly for the sick and the poor was Sister Mary Gabriel. In 1840, when little more than a child she entered the Emmittsburg novitiate from Philadelphia. Her first mission was the Charity Hospital in New Orleans. Yellow-fever was rampant in the city, and while nursing the plague-stricken, she was attacked by the disease. As soon as she recovered she went back to duty with the yellow-fever patients. When the war broke out she labored among the sick and wounded soldiers at Mobile, and Holly Springs. For a time only in later life she retired from active duty, at the command of obedience. At St. Joseph's Hospital, in Philadelphia, her native city, she celebrated her golden jubilee. Her jubilee request to the solicitous superiors, was to be sent back to active duty among the sick poor. The Charity Hospital in New Orleans which saw the beginning of her useful life, welcomed her back, a jubilarian, zealous and eager to use up the last years of her life in ministering to the suffering members of the Great Sufferer. In the autumn of 1896 she went to her reward. If the cup of cold water given in the name of Christ merits life eternal, what must be the reward of Sister Mary Gabriel whose life was spent in charity?

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

The K. C. and War Work

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I can answer Mr. John Munro's query regarding the work of the Knights of Columbus, not in an official capacity, but from the information I have obtained through the perusal of Catholic press announcements. The work is well in hand. One chaplain and a special lay agent have already been sent abroad, and other chaplains and secretaries for cantonments and camps have been and are being appointed. Buildings at the different cantonments are being erected as fast as conditions warrant. In short, when it is remembered that the work originated in the nature of an emergency, we must appreciate the promptitude of the Order's Commitee on War Activities. There is a vast amount of detail involved, and I infer that the Government contractors, who have been prevailed upon to erect the recreation centers for the Knights, would finish the Government work proper before they proceeded with extra construction.

Mr. Munro speaks of the Y. M. C. A.'s readiness to accommodate the encamped soldiers, and, unconsciously or otherwise, institutes an invidious comparison. Anybody at all acquainted with the organization and resources of the Y. M. C. A., its apparently primal and substantial privileges, and its long and, be it said, efficient record in relief work for young men, will understand how obviously simple it was for that organization to make first entry into the field. Yet the Knights, with limited but energetic volunteer help, have got their ambitious undertaking under way in a remarkably short time.

Since it has been realized that a sum much greater than $1,000,000 will be necessary to insure the success of this unique

Catholic war relief work, I think it is a reasonable supposition that Catholics with spare time and cash could better devote both to augmenting the urgently needed resources of the enterprise than to anticipatory, if innocent and inferential, criticism.

For the editor of AMERICA I may be permitted to inform Mr. Munro and others that there is a distinction between a review and a newspaper. Full information of the camp-activities of the Knights of Columbus will be found in the Order's official journal, the Columbiad; and practically every Catholic newspaper carries a weekly budget of the late developments of the work, which is rapidly taking form and will, with every available calory of Catholic energy, be of unprecedented effectiveness for the Faith and the nation.

Jersey City. JOHN B. KENNEDY.

Chicago Hits New York

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have just arrived home after a visit to New York and I am in a reflective mood. I met all sorts and classes of people and heard all kinds of topics discussed—political, moral and religious. Many spoke to me of the now famous charities investigation, and I am frank to say that they were unanimous in condemning the methods employed against the institutions, but they always spoke in a whisper. And now you have a new case on hand, the Foundling Hospital. People are agreed that the treatment of the Sisters is outrageous. Good. But here is my point. There are over 1,000,000 Catholics in New York. You boast of your numbers. Why then is the defense of the Sisters left to Mr. Hearst of the New York American? Here's a problem. Have you sacrificed quality to numbers? Are all your Catholics too wealthy or too cultured to take interest in anything save golf and the Red Cross? Or did all their sons and daughters contract mixed marriages, a sign of decadence? There is something wrong. You may have the largest diocese in this world and the next, for all I know. If you have, New York or its vicinity—I did not see the suburbs—must be full of bushes, one for every male Catholic. They all take to cover just at the proper time.

Chicago. W. F.

Mail for Soldiers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In addressing mail to soldiers, is it not necessary to write into the address the place where the expeditionary forces are? What about parcel-post packages? May newspapers be sent in the same way as magazines bearing the Postmaster-General's official note?

Trenton. W. R.

[In answer to the first question, the official notice says: "Under no circumstances should the location or station of the unit, or the country of destination, be included in the address." Follow the form printed in AMERICA for September 15: the address may be written in the usual place on the envelope. (2) Address parcel-post packages the same way, but observe that according to official orders "Every parcel-post package must bear the sender's name and address, which should be placed in the upper left hand corner of the address side, and postage on such parcels must be fully prepaid." (3) In answer to the third question the official notice says: "Special attention is directed to the fact that this arrangement applies only to magazines which bear the printed "Notice to Reader" on the front cover.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Soldiers and Scapulars

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Whatever advantages the scapular medal ordinarily has over scapulars, for soldiers, especially in time of war, the old-fashioned scapular is by far the more desirable. The scapular medal was adopted chiefly for its sanitary and lasting qualities. Besides, the scapular medal, which possesses all the blessings and indulgences, can be kept in the vest pocket or be fastened to the end of a rosary. It is therefore more convenient than the scapular. But the chief disadvantage of the scapular medal is that it is usually carried in the pocket or in some inconspicuous place, and it does not, therefore, act as a prompt notification to the nurse or doctor that the injured soldier is a Catholic.

I have often been called to the operating room or the deathbed of a soldier by non-Catholic attendants who have noticed a scapular hanging around his neck. Yet, on the other hand, I have known soldiers to die without the benefit of the Sacraments, because those who were endeavoring to save their lives did not advert to the fact that they were Catholics, because they saw no visible sign of the Faith. Military doctors have often told me that they always instruct their attendants to call a chaplain when they see those "cloth things" around the neck of a soldier who is in danger of death.

When a soldier who is seriously wounded is brought into the hospital for treatment, his clothes are immediately ripped off, and if he has a scapular medal in his pocket, that, like all other evidences of identification, is usually not found until he is dead. But if, while rapidly disrobing him, someone sees the scapular lying on his breast, a priest will be called at once.

I do not urge the discontinuance of wearing the scapular medal, for I think it is an excellent idea under normal conditions, but for soldiers during war time I claim that the old-fashioned scapular is by far the more practical. Soldiers, if need be, can be supplied with scapular medals as well as with scapulars. If, however, there is to be a choice between the two, I say, give the preference to the scapular. I would, therefore, advise all those who are providing religious articles for our soldiers to supply their distributing stations with as many scapulars as possible.

Governors Island. GEORGE J. WARING,
Chaplain 11th Cavalry.

Catholics and White Slavery

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In view of the recent appalling disclosures concerning the white slave traffic in this "land of the free," the continued apathy of Catholics must be noted with concern and amazement. For Catholics have always been participants in the conspiracy of silence, which has made this diabolical traffic the best organized, the most profitable and the most widespread in the world. A noble body of women have recently banded themselves together for the protection of young girls, but in the list enclosed herewith you will see that the names of Catholics are, as usual, conspicuous by their absence. Collections have been taken up at the church doors for the Red Cross; the Knights of Columbus are collecting $3,000,000 to provide chaplains and amusements for the soldiers, and cardinals and other clergy have urged the public on all occasions to contribute to these funds. But who has spoken one word for the outraged girls of America? Who has gathered one dollar in any church to save a girl's soul from a life too horrible to contemplate? "Conserve our food," cry our clergy, but no mention is made of conserving our women. This is discouraging especially in view of the fact that it was exposure of the traffic in women between England and Belgium that roused public opinion on the other side, and the same means was taken to try to stop the horrible barter in France, Spain and Italy. But we are apathetic. One would think that if only one girl were enslaved the whole of Catholic America would rise up in indignation and demand that the evil be stamped out, but there is no protest. While this state of affairs continues unheeded we Catholics might as well close our churches since they are monuments of our hypocrisy. It will be no excuse for us on the day of Judgment to answer for our silence by paraphrasing the words of Cain: "Am I my sister's keeper?"

New York. C. CONNOLLY.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.

President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $8.00

Canada, $8.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Editors' Residence, Campion House, 39 West 86th Street, New York City.

Our First Line of Defense

EDUCATED men and women of sterling character and high Christian principle constitute the first line of a nation's defense. There is danger that this line may be broken. Many of our Catholic students have left college; few of them may ever again resume their studies. Yet the serious work of the classroom is no less patriotic a task, at the present moment, than that of the conscript in the cantonment or the soldier in active service on the battlefields of France.

In message after message to the people of the United States, the Commissioner of Education has insisted upon the need of trained and educated men. Never will this be more keenly felt than at the close of the war. Should the great struggle continue for a length of years, that need will soon be experienced in the field no less than at home. Students, therefore, who have not been drafted, and who now return to their studies, are not merely providing for their own future, but can perform a high and patriotic duty by applying all their energy to the work of worthily fitting themselves for the great posts of intellectual leadership and scientific service in the years to come.

Mighty transitions, industrial, economic and social, are taking place under our very eyes. The end of the war will find the world involved in tremendous problems. A higher standard must therefore be attained than in previous years, not in studies only, but in wisdom and virtue as well, by the future men and women who are now preparing themselves in the classroom for the burden of the world's work. A supreme sense of responsibility and a fearless application of Christian principles, together with thorough training and education, are an urgent need of the time. No schools are so well qualified as our own to meet this emergency, for no where else are the principles of Christianity so insistently instilled into the hearts of the pupils.

While, therefore, neither negligence nor selfishness should prevent parents from giving their children the most complete Catholic education their means can afford, Catholic students, too, must strive to measure up to the greatness of the expectations entertained of them. Their patriotism will find its loftiest expression, during the months or years to come, in the conscientious fulfilment of their daily duties and in the constant approach to that Catholic ideal of learning and sainthood which constitutes the perfect citizen. Here, then, is true patriotism of the noblest kind, the patriotism most needed in this period of stress and storm.

A False Economy

"THE valiant men ceased, and rested in Israel." Shall this be the pithy summary of the history of American Catholics of today? The answer to the question depends upon the support they are willing to give to an enlightened and energetic Catholic press.

The army of Sisara is gathering its chariots, as in the days of old, against the children of God. The convent inspection bills, the political attempts of Prohibitionists to prevent the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, the cowardly blows aimed in the dark at our Catholic charities, the slow but certain throttling of the Catholic Foundling Hospital in New York and of other similar institutions, and the financial aid to be given in an indirect way to the murderous Carranza Government are but a few of the latest instances. How can Catholics be awakened to the needs of the Church, aroused to vigilance and stirred to activity if the only means of obtaining reliable information on subjects of Catholic interest is rejected by them?

To begin economies at the present critical moment by cutting off subscriptions to Catholic papers that are manfully serving the cause of the Church and continuing their struggle, often heroically, in the face of countless disheartening difficulties, must seem to sturdy Catholics little less than disloyalty. It would be to slay the faithful guardians of the flock that a handful might be saved while the whole flock is needlessly exposed to ruin.

The thought of retrenchments is naturally uppermost in the mind of everyone. But the Catholic paper is neither a luxury nor a superfluity. It is with these latter we are to begin our sacrifices. The Catholic journal is a necessity hardly less urgent, and in some ways even more so, than our daily bread. It may seem trite to refer here to the warning of Pope Pius that churches, missions and schools will be all in vain if we have not at our command an able Catholic press, offensive as well as defensive in the cause of truth. Yet this fact is even now too little understood. Without such a press as he said in his fatherly solicitude: "All your work will be destroyed, all your efforts rendered fruitless."

Catholic journals are therefore to be reckoned neither as a luxury nor as a superfluity. They belong, in our day, to the absolute necessities of Catholic life. Souls might once have been saved without them, as Pope Pius X said, but there was then no evil press to spread the poison against which an antidote is now constantly needed. The Catholic press must not be sacrificed.

Harried Mexico

MEXICO is still breaking the bitter bread of the thraldom imposed upon it by the assistance of the United States. The tyrant, Carranza, is working his arbitrary will in violation of both the natural and Divine law, and the people are in despair over the result. They had looked to us, these downtrodden folk, for sympathy in their struggle against men who outraged their most sacred rights in a manner worthy of Nero. Of sympathy they got none; it and much else went to the bandits to whom law and order and childhood and womanhood have been as the lamb to the ravening wolf. And now comes the climax of their disappointment: on August 31 the United States Government recognized Carranza as the de jure ruler of Mexico. Thus the seal of approval has been set upon a ruthless tyrant by a nation so wed to liberty that it is even now sending the flower of its youth across the sea to vindicate freedom. That approbation is shameful enough, especially in view of the fact that the President of the United States had set in writing a promise that he would recognize no Government in Mexico that did not guarantee religious liberty. But apparently worse is to come, for men who measure their words with care declare that our Government is to give indirect financial aid to Mexico by lending Great Britain $100,000,000, from which the latter country will pay British holders of Mexican bonds the overdue interest. Thus the way will be smoothed for Carranza who has outraged religion and morality in a most offensive way. The Christian people of the United States are to pay for the extension of the kingdom of Satan on earth. But they will not remain inarticulate: men of various origins and creeds are affixing their names to a protest that will voice the sober judgment of citizens anxious that the liberty of no nation, howsoever small and weak, be destroyed.

A Soldier's Kit

WITHIN are none of those things which the soft fingers of some good woman have wrought, binding her love in every stitch. No little memorials of home, dear for their very triviality, are there; he who will bear it, treasure it, has no home except the place of duty, but presses forward to our lasting city, built near still waters in the fields of peace. But a white stone is in this soldier's kit, marked five times with the sign of our redemption, and vestures of silk and linen, a cup, and a disc of gold. Some morning as the sun is darkened with the rising smoke that palls the bodies of stricken men, the Cup shall be ruddy with the Blood of Christ, and on the Disc shall rest the Body of the Prince of Peace, who torn and broken, threw back forever the hosts of hell, on the bitter hill of Calvary. From that rude altar too, shall be gathered the Bread of Life, to strengthen the souls of brave men against the last great journey into the other world, as the soldier of Christ and of his country goes out to give his fellows-in-arms the Viaticum of the Body of Christ.

They build better than they know, those generous souls who give of their worldly goods to send forth God's soldiers, the Chaplains of our forces on land and sea, full-equipped with the arms of the King's service. Because of them, many a Catholic soldier will fight with the valor begotten of confidence, and if he fall, will go to God with a soul at peace.

> There on my tongue my Sacrament lies safe.
> So, God, Thy presence comes; and, though I die,
> I do not die alone. Rushingly comes
> The sound of myriad voices in mine ear
> Like falling water; and my place awaits
> Me there. . . .

Deprived as they may be of many things, the great heart of our Catholic people will not suffer our soldiers to lose the saving ministries of the Church. God be thanked, this Catholic instinct is seconded by a country that has never made war upon God or religion.

Portugal and Nearer Home

A FEW weeks ago a Portuguese Bishop ruled a diocese which is as prosperous and as happy as any diocese, recently devastated by bandits, can reasonably be. A man of peace, the prelate had engineered no plots against the mongrel junta which in Portugal calls itself a government. Against that puissant set which has made such valiant war upon old men, women and children, the Bishop had led no array. His offense was deeper. It so fell out that a young woman had disclosed to him her intention of consecrating her life to Almighty God. In this iniquitous purpose, iniquitous in Portugal, she had been encouraged by the old Bishop; and, although ink should pale to record it, he had actually "given her the veil." It may be readily understood that in any republic, particularly if it is not a republic but a government by rascality, the fact that anyone, especially a young girl, should wish to serve Almighty God in a cloister, must needs rock the State to its foundation.

What further befell the young lady is not told in the dispatches, but what happened to the old Bishop, and properly, is clear. He was sent into exile. Should he return, death awaits him; and at present the Portuguese army, or that portion which is not haggling over the price offered by another mercenary, is massed on the border, ready at a moment's notice to hurl themselves against the advance of the old Bishop. Armies may be powerful, but in the execution of their apostolical duties Bishops have a way of doing what is needed. They learn it from the example of the Apostles who said that they must obey God rather than man. Hence, maugre the army, one may confess to a belief that this venerable prelate will return shortly, perhaps in sheepskins, like others of his apostolical predecessors.

All this is what some Americans have termed "the separation of Church and State in Portugal." Let there be no quarrel over terms, if we can reach agreement on the fact. The fact is that here we have a mild example of the persecution of the Church by a herd of anti-clericals who hate Catholicism, not because they love righteousness, but because they are faithful servants of their master, Beelzebub. It is the same spirit that tears the crucifix from the hands of dying soldiers in France, and makes over their destitute children to masters whose chief qualification is their hatred of Christianity, and of the morality which it exacts; and it is the spirit that dictates the policy of official Mexico today.

Who has forgotten the solemn anathemas hurled against one Huerta, lately reigning in Mexico? He came into court with unclean hands, it was said, his personal character was execrable, and hence no nation, unless lost utterly to decency, could treat with him. But it has never been said that Huerta organized a system of lust and murder, directed against religious men and women, and called it "government." That iniquity was left for the bandits who now scourge Mexico, whose loathsome depravity has brought into that unhappy country a studied reign of misery more sickening than was ever witnessed in the worst days of stricken Belgium.

It is now reported that the Holy Father has asked the Governments of the United States and Great Britain to use their influence to bring this systematized murder and rapine to an end. The news came shortly after final recognition has been accorded to a Government whose constitution, according to an eminent non-Catholic lawyer, speaking at a recent meeting of the American Bar Association, "closes Mexico to the civilizing influence of the Christian religion," and was written "with no other thought than its financial value, and the tribute that could be levied through it." The times are in His hands who rules the nations, before whom none shall escape judgment. But how long, O Lord, how long! Here and there a voice has been lifted in behalf of Catholics in Mexico, but most of us have gone on in our easy ways, with no thought for men, women and children dying at our very doors. May we not be forced to drink the chalice of affliction to the very dregs before we learn the duties of love and mercy to all men, particularly to those helpless members of the household of the Faith.

Cheer Up!

FIFTH AVENUE never cleared for a nobler array than on the bright afternoon when the Sixty-ninth marched down its sunny lane. As the flag went by, you said with a little thrill: "Thank God, a flag that has always meant freedom and fought for freedom, is mine," and awkwardly your hand went to your head, and you stood uncovered. Deep emotion always makes us awkward. We Americans are ashamed of showing what we feel, and we felt deeply, as with a film in our eyes and an ache in our throats, we watched these young men march away to war. "My God," said a bystander, with a solemnity that removed all touch of irreverence from the words, and made them like a prayer, "it's fierce to think of these fine young fellows marching straight to death."

It would be "fierce," if it were true. But it is false. War is not a junket; it is very much what Sherman said it was, and without stain is the courage of the young man who, knowing what war means, marches away to protect you and me who remain behind to pray, perhaps, or to criticize. But to don the uniform is not to sign one's death-warrant. The great majority of these young men will come back to us, finer and braver than ever. Not one but will have learned the value and nobility of sacrifice for an ideal, of unswerving loyalty, of unflinching obedience. In the homes of these men, and at the knees of women worthy of them, will grow up cleanly and bravely, filled with love of their country and their fellows, the boys and girls who will carry on our work, but more perfectly, after we are gathered to our fathers.

These are not mere phrases. They are the truth. Throughout our beloved country, thousands of fathers and mothers, sisters and sweethearts, have sent their "boys" to the camps and the trenches, with a smile that hid tears perilously near the surface. There can be no propaganda more cruel than any which strives to fill these hearts, which have given so generously, with the dread that their dear ones will never return. The war-statistics show that the great majority will return. During the three years of the war the death-rate among those gallant soldiers, the Canadians, has been about six per cent, and as the war continues this figure shows a tendency to decrease. Writing in the Chicago Tribune, a well-known publicist, H. M. Hyde, states that the casualties of France, in the first year of the war, were rated at six per cent; in the second year, they had dropped to two and one-quarter, and in the last six months of 1916 to one and a quarter. Nor were these men slackers; danger was their hourly companion. Our people have made great sacrifices; let us not deepen them by forebodings, thoughtlessly expressed, but immeasurably cruel in their effect, upon tender hearts that watch and pray and hope. Truth and charity here unite to ban pessimism, and to counsel sentiments of confidence both in those who have left us, and in those who, remaining, must often bear the heavier burden.

Literature

THE GRAIL LEGEND AND THE MEDIEVAL MIND

THE Keys of Peter are still the keys to the medieval mind. Pertz's epigram is still true: "Petri Schlüssel sind noch jetzt die Schlüssel des Mittelalters." St. Paul's just man lived by faith; only in the light of that supernatural life can we interpret the literature of that period known preeminently as the Ages of Faith.

Outside the Church, as was remarked in these columns last week, scholars are "discovering" the medieval mind and incidentally sometimes discovering Catholics to themselves. Here and there may be noted an honest and purposeful effort to disengage the heart of that great literature, to realize aright its underlying spirit and life, and unfold in sympathetic fulness the ethos of that olden time. The results are often illuminating, occasionally ridiculous, sometimes pathetic. Among younger investigators, the Catholic student, moderately endowed with the spirit of faith and fairly familiar with medieval Latin literature, with the liturgy of the Church and with that intellectual heritage that was once the common property of Christendom, is again often strangely impressed, even unto edification, by their grave and indefatigable endeavors to prove the obvious, to discover the self-evident and, per longum et latum, to explore rather patent literary affiliations which one to the manner born could have pointed out at first sight. With all the joy of original revelation, or something of that wide-eyed wonder that transported the ecstatic Keats "on first looking into Chapman's Homer," pioneers are repeatedly stumbling on "important contributions to knowledge" that turn out, on examination, to be commonplaces long accepted in the household of the Faith.

The legendary Grail, for instance, has time out of mind been identified by Catholic writers with the Holy Eucharist, not only for their intimate historical connection but for the common properties they possessed. To the Catholic mind, the point is so obvious as to need no proof or elaboration. In a recent work, "The Mystic Vision in the Grail Legend and in the Divine Comedy" (Columbia University Press), by Lizette Andrews Fisher, Ph.D., this affinity is worked out with much ingenuity and erudition.

As is well known, in the integral Grail legend, two stories coalesce: one, probably of Celtic origin, "the story of a quest and a fated question, associated with a magic vessel producing food and a lance dripping blood"; the other, "that of Joseph of Arimathea, his care for Christ's body, his guardianship of the holy vessel containing Christ's blood, and his mission to Britain." On this problem of the fusion of two stories, Dr. Fisher presents her thesis that "Robert de Borron, or a writer in Latin prose, whose work was adapted to romantic purposes by De Borron, desiring to set forth the doctrine of transubstantiation and to establish certain local claims, combined the Celtic story of the quest with that of Joseph of Arimathea, derived from Christian legend."

The author has produced a work of somewhat unequal worth. Her reverence and sincerity are transparent, and where she has erred, it is evidently in good faith. The "Mystic Vision" is, on the one hand, that which beholds the unveiled splendors of the Grail, or, again, the supernatural illumination which, by direct intuition or at any rate with the eyes of faith, discerns beneath the Sacramental Species the presence of the Body and Blood of Christ. Before discussing manifestations of the Holy Eucharist in literature, the author sets herself to "examine the evidence for the conspicuous importance of eucharistic devotion in the religious life" of the later Middle Ages, and devotes the first chapter to "Transubstantiation in History, Theology and Devotion." This is the weakest and least satisfactory portion of the book. It is rather superficial—got up at second hand; to adopt her own words in another connection, she seems almost "to display audacity far removed from angelic hesitation." Totally misled by Harnack, still she strives to strike a balance between him and the "Catholic Encyclopedia." Yet she makes it abundantly clear indeed that the "Eucharist became for the later Middle Ages the focus of all worship as well as the supreme means of grace and of participation in the divine life. Eucharistic devotion colored all ritual and influenced all forms of art. The daily Mass was the daily miracle of the presence of God, and was so accepted, in some sense or other, by every christened man,—peasant, priest, or knight."

Her exposition of the character and influence of Innocent III, his "indomitable will and personality," and his conduct of the Fourth Council of the Lateran in 1215, is designed to enforce Harnack's ipse dixit that the conciliar decree on the Holy Eucharist, containing the word "transubstantiatis," (sic) was "the most distinctive and boldest act of the Middle Ages"—that the "Eucharist dogma" was an "immense innovation."

But one fatal defect vitiates the whole investigation. Though not unaware of the distinction, the author tends throughout the book to confuse the term, Transubstantiation, with the fundamental doctrine of the Real Presence, and to substitute for the primitive and unbroken tradition of the Real Presence as a fact of faith, the scholastic discussions of the manner or process whereby the substance of bread and wine is changed into the Body and Blood of Christ: discussions which, without affecting the essentials of the Apostolic belief, rank indeed with the most worthy monuments of the human mind, and which, for their clarity and precision, finally led the Church at the Fourth Lateran and at Trent, to adopt Transubstantiation as the term most aptly expressing the manner in which the miraculous conversion is effected and the Body and Blood of Christ rendered really and truly and substantially present in the Holy Eucharist.

The whole world of Patristic evidence that from Apostolic times the Real Presence was the inmost soul and center of the Church's teaching and devotion, she ignores. It seems to her of no concern that the doctrine was taught and believed semper, ubique et ab omnibus,—though with varying degrees of open emphasis under the disciplina arcani, or without unseemly obtrusion in public polemics when the belief was everywhere unquestioningly accepted, when securus judicat orbis terrarum, and other fundamentals, like the Trinity and the Incarnation, were the exclusive targets of heretical attack. The "immense innovation" was not the Council's explicit declaration of the primitive belief, but rather the unprecedented denial, by Scotus Erigena, Ratramnus, Berengarius and a few others, of the doctrine of the Real Presence as held by the Faithful since the days of Christ.

Leaving the development of doctrine, Dr. Fisher enters her own proper sphere. With few reservations, the remainder of the book may be commended as a conclusive vindication of the Eucharistic interpretation of the Grail. Tracing incisive parallels between the changing forms of the Grail and the vessels of the Mass; between the "secret" of the Grail and the secretum or ancient name for the Canon; between the Earthly Paradise or Grail Castle and the Church whereof the Holy Eucharist is the corner-stone; between the celibacy of the Grail Keeper and the virgin priests, guardians of Christ's Body and Blood; between the striking miracles ascribed alike to Grail and consecrated Host—such as the bleeding bread, the child or lamb on the altar, the luminosity of the Sacred Species, figures of Christ on the Cross, and the doom of the unworthy who approached either Grail or Host—Dr. Fisher has established, with great detail and learning, her conclusion that the Grail is

> The symbol of transubstantiation, the perpetual miracle of the Church by which man attains to the closest approximation possible to one still on earth to that final union with God which is the ultimate blessedness of man. In accordance with this theory, the quest of the Grail is the aspiration for mystic intuition of the miracle, a direct knowledge which is not faith, though faith is an indispensable condition of its attainment. A chosen few have achieved this sacramental mystic vision; they "know how God comes into the sacrament." Others, even among the faithful, must be content with faith, and believe in the sacramental presence of Christ.

As the Grail romance represents, roughly speaking, the faith and devotion of the people, the author next studies, though briefly and with less cogency, a passage in the Divine Comedy as reflecting the spiritual attitude of the theologians. In the last six cantos of the "Purgatorio," the entrance of Dante into the Earthly Paradise and the resplendent pageant with Beatrice that approaches, heralded by the words that announce Christ's coming in the Mass, "Benedictus qui venit," suggest the processions of Corpus Christi with all its Eucharistic associations. The place of the pageant at the threshold of Paradise assumes structural importance, besides, in the author's view that Beatrice is a symbol of the Blessed Sacrament:

> Then, indeed, is the Earthly Paradise type and pledge of the heavenly. The glory of both is the same; in the one, as runs the language of the Mass, the "Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world"; in the other, as the Apocalypse declares, "the Lamb is the light thereof." The reward of both is the vision of God; here below in the sacramental mirror, in the glass darkly; there, face to face. The eucharistic vision must share the imperfection of all our vision here, but it is still the foretaste and earnest of that visio Dei to be fulfilled in Paradise, the complete illumination of the soul, salvation, beatitude, the goal of man.

With such sympathy and fervor has she wrought, rising at times to an almost poetic glow and rapture, that ex animo one wishes that to the author herself might be vouchsafed the Mystic Vision, and with the eyes of faith, achieving the quest, she might realize the great Reality of which she has written so well.

GEORGE H. DERRY, Ph.D.

BOOK REVIEWS

Epictetus: the Discourses and the Manual. Together with Fragments of His Writings. Translated with Introduction and Notes. By P. E. MATHESON, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of New College. Two vols. New York: The Oxford University Press.

Among the philosophers of the Stoic school, the former Phrygian slave, whose real name we do not know, but who has come down to us as Epictetus, is one of the most sympathetic and, with Marcus Aurelius, one of the most popular. His life, known to us through the data supplied by his disciple Arrian, was pure and in every way superior to that of his age. He taught self-control, and made a generous attempt to put it into practice. "What is knowledge without works," he asks. "We do not ask whether you have read Chrysippus, but whether you are just." His moral code, far ahead of that of his age, may be reduced to a few brief formulas. "Bear and forbear." "Were I a nightingale, I would sing as the nightingales do. But as I am a rational being, I must praise God." Epictetus's belief in God is strongly evidenced in the "Discourses" and the "Manual." The idea of duty, of freedom, of the superiority of the spiritual over the material are expressed vigorously and nobly. At times we find in Epictetus an echo of the higher lessons of the Gospel.

But there are gaps in the teaching of the former Phrygian slave. His heart seems to be closed like that of the best representatives of his school to the noble passions of pity and love. The "Manual," the better known of the two works, has been called worthy of a Christian. It inculcates undoubtedly many a virtue absolutely necessary to the follower of Christ, such as the love of duty, the dignity of chastity, the contempt of death. But it does not inculcate the active virtues of Christianity, and in particular it never rises to the sublime inspirations and ideals of charity, that noble virtue taught us by Christ. Mr. Matheson has given us a fine translation of the works of the Stoic philosopher. The student of Greco-Roman philosophy will be especially grateful for the translation of the "Discourses" as these have hitherto been less available than the better known "Manual." In the introduction the translator has written a brief but interesting sketch of "Epictetus and His Age," "Epictetus and Stoicism," his psychology and his ethical principles.

J. C. R.

Songs on Service. By ELIOT CRAWSHAY-WILLIAMS. $0.90; Aldeberan. By M. ST. CLARE BYRNE. $0.60; At a Venture. Poems by Eight Writers. $0.60; Backgrounds. By GRACE MARY GOLDEN. $0.36. New York: Longmans, Green & co.

In the preface to his volume, Mr. Williams writes: "I submit my first volume of verses to the world in the hope that, being, at least, inspired by actual experience it may interest some who read it." His experience in the service of the British army afforded him much "local color" from Egypt; and since the war began, he has had close views of titanesque battles. His two songs, dated Ypres, 1915, are perhaps the surest pieces for praise in this volume. His Simla verses, which we may call vers de société Egyptienne, are not so healthy as the ballads which he has written during these years of the war. Realities have been lopping off the branches of sentimentality; and poets, even in their first volume, exhibit a steadier vision towards first principles in thought and ethics than are flung into prose by such theologians and moralists as Mr. Wells and Mr. Galsworthy.

The "Adventurers All" series of books which Blackwell is publishing give in "Aldeberan" and "At a Venture," two volumes similar to the twelve which are already listed. M. St. Clare Byrne touches on many topics which are dear to the primal affections of mankind, and takes from old characters of legend a setting for some present-day observations. In the other volume there seems to be a conspiracy among the eight contributors to note the grim shadows of sublunary things. Lucy Hawkins, who begins the volume, finds for subject people

> " . . . on whose brow there meet
> Abel's sharp anguish and the curse of Cain."

Fortunately, the concluding singer of the eight, Beatrice L. Thomas, allows her muse to look up to ultra-lunary realms:

> Man must sing at the feet of God,
> Must, though the earth should rend;
> Man must find him heart to plod,
> Labour and ascend,
> A song to meet
> His dusty feet
> And cheer them to the end.

The little volume by Grace Mary Golden, "Backgrounds," as a contribution of war-songs from England, is the best of this group of books. Pathos, sincere and strong, runs through the sheaf of songs. Her pulse has quiet patience and sweet courage; her words have the temper of high refinement. Her ballads have the art that finds worthy popularity. Not in glib irreverences are her phrases uttered, nor in those reeling uncertainties of versifiers, who live but by the ear and eye. Miss Golden is adept at making photographs of atmospheres such as in "The Village":

> Serious and silent grown,
> Listless-footed and alone,
> Wander all the village maids
> While the crimson sunset fades.
>
> Watchful still, the elder folk
> Find no heart for jest or joke,
> In the flaming, blood-red sky
> More than evening seems to die.

M. E.

A Manual of the History of Dogmas. By Rev. BERNARD J. OTTEN, S.J. Volume I. St. Louis: B. Herder. $2.00.

Father Otten in this, the first volume of what promises to be an interesting series, covers the development of dogmas during the Patristic age. The history of dogmas is a part of ecclesiastical history and as such it is a record of the development of the Church's teaching, taking account of the causes of that development, both external and internal, and presenting the results of this critical inquiry. It presupposes that revealed truths are objectively permanent and immutable. These truths, nevertheless, in the passing of time come to be understood more fully, and presented more clearly. In this sense every revealed truth is a germ, living and growing. Its growth or unfolding is recorded in the history of dogmas. How pronounced is this growth may be seen by comparing, for example, the definitions of later councils with corresponding statements of the same revealed truth, as found in the Patristic writings of the first centuries of the Church's history. To follow up the various lines of thought, and watch the struggle toward a fuller and clearer statement is the objective point of the history of dogmas. It is clear then that the sources of the history of dogma must include all the records of the external and internal life of the Church. In fact, its field covers every phase of thought that may bear witness to the gradual unfolding and ultimate maturing of any dogma, beginning with the days of the Infant Church and ending only with the date when the writer of the history of dogmas places his findings before the world. Father Otten in this volume covers the period beginning with the year 100, and ending with the year 869. His book is well indexed and contains an extensive bibliography. G. C. T.

The Art of Extempore Speaking. By M. BAUTAIN, Vicar-General and Professor at the Sorbonne. New Edition. With Foreword by ANDREW D. WHITE. New York: McDevitt-Wilson's, Inc.

Many a larger and more pretentious book has been written on the interesting topic with which the present volume deals. Very few of them, however, contain more sensible, simple and valuable advice than the short chapters in which this scholarly French priest has so luminously analyzed the various elements required to make an effective speaker. Though his words bear in a more direct manner on the art of extempore speaking, they will be of the greatest help to all those who in any way are engaged in the difficult task of persuading their fellows by the spoken word.

At the outset M. Bautain puts his readers on their guard against a misapprehension. It is evident, he reminds them, that extemporization can act only on the form of words and the general mold of the discourse. In order to speak it is necessary to have something to say, and that must already be existing in the mind or hidden away in the inner feeling and emotion of the orator. Ideas and conditions of the mind cannot be extemporized. The author, however, makes an exception for certain rare cases where a passion suddenly aroused finds vehement expression on the lips of the speaker.

The book is well planned. In the first part the author considers the speaker, in the second the speech. Among the natural qualities required in the speaker he considers of the first importance a lively sensibility, a penetrating intelligence, good sense, a vivid imagination, a firm and decisive will, a natural necessity of expansion, and finally a certain instinct which urges a man to speak as a bird to sing. In his analysis of the speech, its preparation and presentation, M. Bautain insists on a few simple precepts which he considers the very foundations of all good speaking, but which are only too often neglected. He believes the speech should be a living thing and should be treated as such. It should develop from conception to its full and normal growth by progressive steps and be rounded out to just proportion. He insists on a moral and intellectual preparation in the speaker which must precede the actual work of delivery. There may be nothing absolutely new in these hints and precepts, but they are stated by the French abbé with clearness and point. There are no technicalities in the book to disturb the reader. The work is simple and practical. For all those preparing for the pulpit or the bar, it will be of the highest value. J. C. R.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The September Month is as usual varied and interesting enough for the most critical reader. There is an excellent paper by the Editor on "Muzzling the Dogs of War," a remarkably clear and sane discussion of some fundamental problems of the war. There are also some good verses, many excellent critical and historical notes, a story by John Asycough, an article by the Rev. Herbert Thurston on "The Feast of the Assumption," this last brimful of the author's curious learning. Despite the stress of many trying circumstances the Month is maintaining its high standard and should appeal to a wide circle of American readers.

Douglas Fairbanks, the robust and merry "movie-king," has paused in his perilous career long enough to write an "inspirational" book called, "Laugh and Live" (Britton Pub. Co., $1.00). In response to "the hosts of people who have written" to him for his recipe for happiness and success he recommends hearty laughing and vigorous exercise, and in nineteen short chapters cheerfully hammers home his gospel. Platitudes, many of them in italics, abound, and the discerning reader may detect here and there slang "without quotes." But if all Mr. Fairbanks' admirers lay to heart his excellent advice on "Cleanliness of Body and Mind," "Consideration for Others," "Wedlock in Time," etc., his book will do a world of good.——"Enchanted Cigarettes" (Houghton Mifflin, $0.50), is a readable little essay by Stephen Chalmers on the "Stevenson stories that might have been." He names two score works that R. L. S. started but did not finish, and then muses pleasantly on those "half-burned ends which we find in his ash-tray."

"One Young Man" (Doran, $0.75), by J. E. Hodder Williams, is the story of a young clerk, who forsakes mother and home for his country's cause. The book gives an interesting account of a young recruit's life in the trenches and behind the lines. The trials of life in a dug-out, the heroism required of a soldier in holding a forward position and the necessary sacrifice of self are all well depicted. Incidentally the book illustrates the utter unpreparedness of England for the great struggle which confronted her. The book brings out the services rendered by the Y. M. C. A. in the early part of the war, but it leaves the suspicious taste of sectarian propaganda.——"The German Terror in Belgium" (Doran), by Arnold J. Toynbee. The different sectors of Belgium traversed by the different divisions of the German army are treated separately, and the atrocities committed are arranged chronologically according to the progress of each army. Maps of Belgium make it easy for the reader to follow the general tactics employed by the Germans in their march on Paris, and a map of Louvain gives the reader a fair idea of the sections destroyed in that city. There is a tone of fairness and a deliberate avoidance of controversy throughout, which leaves the decision, as far as that is possible at present, to the individual judgment.

"No attempt has been made to produce a complete guide to public speaking" says Mr. Harry B. Bradbury in explaining the purpose of his little book on "The Structure of an Effective Public Speech" (The Sherwood Co., New York, $1.00). He gives the dry bones of an oration and builds up a skeleton with Cicero, Quintilian and Demosthenes as models. Sound logic is assigned its true value and the syllogism is correctly explained. The absence of an analytical scheme of a good "narration" will be noted, and perhaps more should have been said about the fonts from which the various parts of the speech should be drawn.——"English for Beginners" (Ginn, $0.60) is the title of Annie Fisher and Arthur Deerin Call's useful little "conversation reader and language book for foreigners and other beginners." Starting with the sentence "I sit" with its accompanying illustration and ending with exercises in the use of prepositions, the text-book should enable our immigrants, old and young, to acquire English rapidly. Directions are also given for teaching the lessons.

"Government Telephones" (Moffat, Yard), by James Mavor, professor of political economy in the University of Toronto, is a valuable addition to the literature dealing with the vexed problem of the ownership of public utilities. It is the result of an evidently fair-minded and soundly critical inquiry into the acquisition of the Bell Telephone System by the Provincial Government of Manitoba in 1908 and the State operation of the same until 1914. With regard to this experiment in Government control of a public utility the author's conclusions constitute an indictment so serious and apparently so just as to read like a challenge to the advocates of its underlying theory. Professor Mavor's findings are of special value just now when the tendency towards State-control is growing more and more popular. ——"Training for a Life Insurance Agent" (Lippincott, $1.25) is written by Mr. Warren M. Horner, who on his own confession believes in life insurance as a vocation, not passively, but with a burning intensity that is almost an obsession, and who feels strongly that "It is not any job for a lightweight or a shirk." His convictions undoubtedly led the publishers to choose him as the author of this addition to their training series "for those who want to find themselves." It is a readable handbook both of instruction and inspiration for those who live or would live in the world of life insurance.

An exquisite Madonna, discovered in 1912, in a Boston attic, interested Rev. John J. Goldt so much that he immediately began a thorough investigation as to its authorship. In "Raphael's Madonna Gonzaga" (Boston, John J. Goldt), he proves conclusively that it is a genuine Raphael, probably the last Madonna painted by the artist. The technical proofs of its authenticity, derived from internal evidence of its richness of composition, characteristic marks of Raphael's technique, and from the signatures concealed in the painting itself, cannot be disputed. The romantic wanderings of the painting, shown by documentary evidence, form a fascinating story. Originally intended for the Gonzaga family, it passed from Rome to Mantua, thence to the gallery of Charles I, of England, to Philip IV, of Spain, where it was attributed to Murillo. Carried from the Escurial by Joseph Bonaparte, it was finally transported to the United States, only to be lost sight of and accidentally discovered almost seventy-five years later.

Among the "Tributes to Mothers" the excellent "Anthology of Mother Verse" the Houghton Mifflin Co. have published are Father Tabb's "At Bethlehem" and Mrs. Meynell's "The Shepherdess," which run as follows:

Long, long before the Babe could speak,
When He would kiss His mother's cheek
And to her bosom press,
The brightest Angels standing near
Would turn away to hide a tear—
For they are motherless.

Where were ye, Birds, that bless His name,
When wingless to the world He came,
And wordless, though Himself the Word
That made the blossom and the bird?

She walks—the lady of my delight—
A shepherdess of sheep.
Her flocks are thoughts. She keeps them white;
She guards them from the steep.
She feeds them on the fragrant height,
And folds them in for sleep.

She roams maternal hills and bright,
Dark valleys safe and deep.
Into that tender breast at night
The chastest stars may peep.
She walks—the lady of my delight—
A shepherdess of sheep.

She holds her little thoughts in sight,
Though gay they run and leap.
She is so circumspect and right;
She has her soul to keep.
She walks—the lady of my delight—
A shepherdess of sheep.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
Rational Sex Ethics. By W. F. Robie, A.B., M.D. $3.50; Selections Moral and Religious from the Works of John Ruskin. With Notes and Comments by Frederick W. Osborn. $1.00.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Manna of the Soul. A Little Book of Prayer for Men and Women. Compiled by Rev. F. X. Lasance, $0.60.

Boston Music Co., Boston:
The Organ in France. By Wallace Goodrich. $2.50.

Britton Publishing Co., New York:
Laugh and Live. By Douglas Fairbanks. Illustrated. $1.00.

Constable & Co., Ltd., London:
The Character of the British Empire. By Ramsay Muir. 3d.

Diederich-Schaefer Co., Milwaukee:
Straws from the Manger or Thoughts on Christmastide. By Rev. James H. Cotter, LL.D., Litt.D.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
A Naturalist of Souls. Studies in Psychography. By Gamaliel Bradford. $2.50; Green Fancy. By George Barr McCutcheon. With Frontispiece by C. Allan Gilbert. $1.50; The Grim Thirteen. Short Stories by Thirteen Authors of Standing. Edited by Frederick Stuart Greene. With an Introduction by Edward J. O'Brien. $1.50.

George H. Doran & Co., New York:
Sonia. Between Two Worlds. By Stephen McKenna. $1.50; House-Mates. By J. D. Beresford. $1.50; Fishpingle. A Romance of the Countryside. By Horace Annesley Vachell. $1.35.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
My Wife. By Edward Burke. $1.50; The Coming Democracy. By Hermann Fernau. $2.00; Instructions for Gunners' Examination in the Field Artillery. By Captains John S. Hammon and Dawson Olmstead. $0.40; On the Threshold of the Unseen. By Sir William F. Barrett, F.R.S. $2.50.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
How to Debate. By Edwin DuBois Shurter. $1.35.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
Factories. Poems. By Margaret Widdemer. $1.25; Portraits and Protests. By Sarah N. Cleghorn. $1.25

The Home Correspondence School, Springfield:
Children's Stories and How to Tell Them. By J. B. Esenwein, Litt.D. and Marietta Stockard, A.B. $1.50.

Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston:
Long Live the King! By Mary Roberts Rinehart. With Illustrations by Arthur Becher. $1.50.

B. W. Huebsch, New York:
William Dean Howells, A Study of the Achievement of a Literary Artist. By Alexander Harvey. $1.50.

La Salle Extension University, Chicago:
Practical Banking. By O. Howard Wolfe.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Finished. By H. Rider Haggard. $1.40.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
A Son of the Middle Border. By Hamlin Garland. $1.60; A Defence of Idealism. By May Sinclair. $2.00; The Essentials of Philosophy. By R. W. Sellars. $1.60; The City Worker's World in America. By Mary Kingsbury Simkhovitch. $1.25.

Missionary Education Movement of the United States and Canada, New York:
The Challenge of Saint Louis. By George B. Mangold. Illustrated. $0.60.

C. V. Mosby Co., St. Louis:
With the National Guard on the Border. Our National Military Problem. By Captain Irving Goff McCann, A.M., B.D. Illustrated.

Russell Sage Foundation, New York:
Women as Munition Makers. A Study of Conditions in Bridgeport, Connecticut. By Amy Hewes. Munition Workers in England and France. A Summary of Reports Issued by the British Ministry of Munitions. By Henriette R. Walter. $0.75.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
Towards the Goal. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. With a Preface by Theodore Roosevelt. $1.25.

The University Museum, Philadelphia:
The Epic of Gilgamish. By Stephen Langdon.

SOCIOLOGY

Roosevelt and Race-Suicide

IN a contest for the first page between a riot on Broadway, and Colonel Roosevelt quelling a riot at Oyster Bay, I venture to affirm that the Colonel would win out easily. I think he would deserve it too, for, eliminating all other elements, the picturesqueness of Colonel Roosevelt in the role of quelling a mob would easily surpass the picturesqueness of any mob ever dreamed of, even by Belasco. "Well, Teddy is at it again," observes the man in the street, as he picks up the Daily Scream. Whereat he shies at the shadow of the Big Stick, wielded by that aggressive gentleman, who for seven years guided the destinies of the nation, with such satisfaction to himself. It is only fair to add that he also won the applause of many of his fellow-citizens who did not regard him, in O. Henry's expressive phrase, as "The Great Displeasure," prowling about the regions near the eastern terminal of the B. & O.

Were it not for fear of Gelett Burgess, I might advance the timid statement that whether you agree with the Colonel, or profess to regard him as something just above a moron, you will generally end by listening to what he has to say. Perhaps you have heard that statement before; nevertheless, I think it is true. Many a dull old saw is as true as taxes. Some too will say, small envious persons of slight lung power and negligible personalities, that if you are within a league of any place where Colonel Roosevelt is holding forth, you will listen perforce, unless you are deaf. I am not quite ready to accept this. In the course of a long life before the public, Colonel Roosevelt has said and written many things that will not find favor with the discerning, a class to which you and I, of course, belong. But it is also true, that many of his utterances have had the dignity and the worth that must gain him a respectful hearing, and no small amount of that auctoritas, which I take to mean "influence" worthily gained, and powerful because, as a general thing, it has been rightly used.

Stating the Case

IT was St. Thomas who, in the phrase, "prius esse quam tale esse," wrote that a thing couldn't be improved before it existed. Seven centuries later, Colonel Roosevelt opens a vigorous attack on race-suicide, from the same position. "The first necessity in 'bringing up the child right,'" he premises in the current Metropolitan, "is to produce the child." It is admitted that the statement lacks novelty, that it is "bromidic" even, but the insistence is that today many act as if it were untrue as well as old. They are of the half-educated crowd who "treat Bernard Shaw seriously as a social reformer," and indeed hold that they themselves are "social reformers," whereas for the most part, they are either mercenaries whose moral status is little above that of the panderer, or wholly irresponsible persons whose baby brains have been poisoned by vice. For these "blatant sham reformers who in the name of the new morality preach the old, old vice and self-indulgence which rotted first the moral fiber, and then even the external greatness of Greece and Rome," Colonel Roosevelt has the fierce contempt which every decent man must cherish. It is "profound moral delinquency," he rightly believes, which makes certain married couples, otherwise normal, either childless, or the parents of but one or two children.

In trenchant paragraphs, Colonel Roosevelt blazons the menace that threatens our own country, and shows how "France is now fighting in hazard of her national existence," precisely because many of her people adopted violations of the natural law, urged upon us at home as the highest ideals of morality, by cranks, perverts, and plain but dangerous fools.

> . . . The root trouble is probably moral; and in all probability the whole trouble is moral, and is due to a complex tissue of causation in which coldness, love of ease, striving after social position, fear of pain, dislike of hard work, and sheer inability to get life values in their proper perspective, all play a part.

These words are not spoken exclusively of France, but are held to be equally applicable to our own country. If men and women freely entering into the married state, cravenly shirk its obligations, then as far as can be foreseen, the United States is doomed to a low place in the rank of nations. In this fall, the spiritual degradation consequent upon this moral obliquity, will be a factor no less powerful than the actual decline in the numerical force of the country.

A Point of Divergence

UP to this point, Catholics will heartily agree with Colonel Roosevelt. A place of divergence is reached, however, in the paragraph:

> . . . Some worthless or hopelessly poverty-stricken families would benefit themselves and the country by having fewer children. I . . . will support any measures [to limit] the production of the unfit, after we have first taken effective measures to promote the production of the fit.

There is a fallacy in the very first words. No life can be "worthless." Any life, however afflicted, is worth infinitely more than non-existence. But the present point of inquiry is, "What means are to be used 'to limit' the production of the unfit"? It need not be said that the Catholic Church utterly abhors the use of contraceptives. As involving a deliberate perversion of a human faculty, she can never sanction them since they are forbidden by the natural law. The sole effective means of limitation, permitted by the Church, is continence. Furthermore, bodily and social diseases are not the sole disorders in the universe. The far more terrible disorder of the soul, sin, must be reckoned with. Taking men and women as they are, enforced celibacy is full of moral dangers, and Catholic practice therefore, facilitates both marriage and the proper use of marriage.

Prohibition and Counsel

NEVERTHELESS, with a view both to the welfare of the individual and of the community, the Church in certain cases wisely forbids marriage. But "poverty" and "worthlessness," taking the latter term in its ordinary meaning, make marriage neither void nor illicit. True, they may, and frequently do, make it decidedly inadvisable. A man incapable of caring for a family should not marry; but if he does, the contract is valid. In extreme cases, poverty-stricken families may be advised not to increase the number of their children; they cannot, however, be obliged to this, and the only licit means of limitation is continence. Mental deficiency, of course, debars from marriage, not by ecclesiastical, but by the natural law, for marriage is a contract which the mentally deficient are not capable of making. No moralist will deny that the State, deriving its power from Almighty God and supreme in its own sphere, has the right to protect itself, by proper means, against the disorder that would arise from the undue multiplication of individuals "unfit" to live in society. But no violation of the natural law, or of the law of God, can be a "proper means." Furthermore, there is something shockingly repellent, and thoroughly in keeping with the pagan kultur of a godless age, in the proposition to forbid marriage and the propagation of children, simply because the intending parents are "poverty-stricken." "The poor have so many superfluous children," wrote Dr. O'Malley in an article contributed last year to America, "that the little ones are half-starved; therefore do not see to it that they are fed, but make their mothers victims of a base passion, and there will not be any little ones to feed. What a pecuniary saving for the State!" And every Catholic will heartily sympathize with this eminent physician when he says: "The most helpless idiot, if baptized, is as far above a non-existent child as St. Bridget is above a Committee on Birth-Control, but even if it were not, what right would that fact give to any man to prevent life?" To give up sin will do far more for the community than any man-made set of canons, forbidding Bridget and Patrick to marry because their entire worldly possessions consist of a cabin and a pig, or because neither can read, or because their physical constitutions have been weakened by starvation and hard work.

Evil in Every Point

NO good, personal or communal, moral or economic, will bless perversion. It was not a Catholic priest, nor even a professional moralist, but an experienced physician, Dr. Howard Kelly, of Johns Hopkins University, who has written that "all meddling with the sexual relation to secure facultative sterility degrades the wife to the level of a prostitute." In these days when men like Robie, for instance, sometime Fellow at Clark University, can teach that in certain instances, perfectly normal couples are justified in this "meddling," and then proceed to suggest methods which cannot but break down "the moral fiber" of all who use them, it is time for some plain speaking. Whatever economic gain may result, and I cannot see that even in this sphere there is a profit, is more than counterbalanced by the moral degradation of the individuals concerned, and through them, by degrees, of the community. For the shockingly low level thus sought and obtained, will not be confined, generally speaking, to the marital relations. A liar is not necessarily a thief, and a man who betrays his country may be kind to his wife but we trust neither the one nor the other, for we rightly feel that men who have thus broken down the moral barriers, admit no sanction but that dictated by self-interest.

Whosoever offends in one offends in all, is wisdom from on high. The procession through a faithful round of duties is rudely broken, when man falls so low as to tamper with the sacred springs of life. Surely, we are not working for the advancement of our country by promoting, even in isolated instances, practices of perversion which lead by their very nature to the suicide of the race, nor are we providing for an upright, thrifty and honorable generation, when we induce potential parents, rich or poor, to the performance of acts which shame our very nature.

Some Positive Means

CATHOLICS will not be minded to reject any licit means of suppressing this horrible plague, and in its field, no exception can be found to Colonel Roosevelt's indictment of race-suicide. But we must find the basis of our argument in the fact that what Dr. Kelly terms "meddling," is a violation of the law which an all-wise and avenging Creator has written in man's nature.

Yet the Catholic sociologist cannot rest in this conclusion. In the spirit of Jesus Christ who bade us "first seek the Kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added to you," he would strive to spread the Kingdom of God, the reign of Jesus Christ in all hearts, by a vigorous Faith that proves its vitality by its works. Catholics therefore must hold as sacred their obligation of training their children to appreciate the beauty of angelic purity and of continence, impossible to man unaided, but possible through grace. Hence the importance of turning the mind of the child to God, from whom is our strength, at the earliest possible moment. Nor can we neglect the natural virtues, and the aids which the community, as well as the parents, can and should afford. If the "moral fiber" of our children is to sustain them in the fight against evil, they must be taught, as St. Paul says, to deny themselves in many things, to face and conquer, not to shirk, the tasks of their daily lives. Therefore, must Catholics, and all right-thinking men, condemn the educational "softness" of the day, calculated to turn out weak, nerveless, flabby ne'er-do-wells, yielding to every passing whim, passion or emotion, simply because they have never been taught the necessity of self-control, even if that control costs blood.

Furthermore, in a wider sense, we must extend the Kingdom of God upon earth by forcing, through legal enactment if necessary, the general payment of a wage which will enable men not merely to live, but to live, as Leo XIII has written, in a manner that befits the dignity of human nature. Some approach to this condition would do far more to promote early marriage and fruitful marriage, and to check dishonesty, violence, together with prostitution and other forms of sexual disorders, than the most elaborate plans designed by university professors, who have plenty to eat and a secure roof over their heads. No doubt the influence of want in the promotion of immorality has been overrated, but there is a world of wisdom in the words of "Dulcie," O. Henry's poor little shop-girl, a heroine indeed: "I wonder if you'd be so snippy and superior, if you had to live on five dollars a week?"

Justice First

COLONEL ROOSEVELT'S plan of tax-exemption for parents may or may not be feasible, which in ordinary language means that if our legislators so wish they can make it practicable, or if of a contrary opinion, may regard it as unconstitutional class legislation. But justice comes first; that secured, it may be opportune to talk of prizes and exemptions. As far as legislation is concerned, what is most needed is a sincere and persistent effort so to reform economic conditions in this country, that every man of ordinary thrift and energy, may find it possible to marry, to support a family, and to live in comfort, and not, as one laborer has expressed it, "just a little bit better than a country hog and not near so good as a prize hog."

A huge undertaking? Perhaps, but not nearly so huge as many think it. At all events, it is far easier than the task of bringing order out of that chaos to which industrial injustice is bringing this country of opportunities which would be unequalled, were they not reserved for the few. War teaches many things. Perhaps it may teach us the wisdom of seeking in our industrial relations, as in all else, first the Kingdom of God.

Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

EDUCATION

Is Latin Dead?

IT is not always possible to assail an editor in his sanctum sanctorum, and accuse him of a non sequitur; but when the editor of a certain popular monthly in his September issue declares that "the Latin language is as dead as Julius Cæsar," it is evident that he has created a casus belli. If his words are bona fide, then do they reveal a condition of non compos mentis so far as that statement goes, and afford another reason why we might wish things to be in statu quo ante bellum, though dulce et decorum est pro patria mori.

However, notwithstanding the ipse dixit of the editor, one is loath to believe that the Latin language has been numbered among the fallen in the great war, or that it is even in articulo mortis. It seems to have possessed itself of the waters of life for which Ponce de Leon sought, and to have a remarkable faculty for rejuvenation. It tells others, memento mori, but appears to be immune itself, as it bears its message from Calvary down to the dying on the European battle-fields, anno domini 1917, while terra firma trembles as it did on the day that the Cross was set up as a sign unto all nations. Nolens volens, the editor must acknowledge that his ex parte statement lays on him the onus probandi.

Daily, ante meridiem and post meridiem, that magazine, no doubt, receives letters with enclosures representing so much per annum, and it probably reckons on realizing a certain per centum, per capita, from its constituency. Doubtless its editor is a college man and has tender recollections of his alma mater and its custos rotulorum. Frequently each month he places his imprimatur upon accepted manuscripts. One might labor on ad infinitum in an effort to show him how common are latinisms to the daily life of even this commercial age. But one forbears undertaking the magnum opus and would fain adopt instead the multum in parvo method.

One can do this most readily by putting down a line or two of Latin which is two thousand years old, and a line or so of English, which was in common use only eight hundred years ago. The latter shall be first.

> Daoa hig ferdon, oa comon sume oa weardas on oa ceastire, and cyodon oaera sacerda ealdrum ealle oa oing oa oaer gewordene waeron.

That was English much less than a thousand years ago. Evidently English is not a stable quantity. The above lines may not be understood by any reader, however intelligent and well instructed, unless he has enjoyed the unusual advantage of a special study of the English language. They might almost truly be said to be "as dead as Julius Cæsar," but here are those unintelligible lines translated back into the Latin from which they originally borrowed the sentence:

> Quae cum abiissent, ecce, quidam de custodibus venerunt in civitatem, et nuntiaverunt principibus sacerdotum omnia, quae facta fuerant.

Which of the two does the editor find easier to read? Presumably both he and hundreds of his subscribers can read the Latin version with a certain degree of fluency, whereas it is doubtful if one in ten thousand could make head or tail of the "English" version. It lacks universal and durable qualities.

But the editor is arguing that if a universal language is to be agreed upon it would "be wise to choose one which is alive now."

> To-day, it must be conceded, Latin is as dead as Julius Cæsar. Greek has been more fortunate. Greek is the legitimate successor of classic Greek, and though believed to be accented differently, is easily comprehensible to one who has mastered ancient Greek at the university, so as to be able to read it with tolerable fluency.

Most certainly modern Greek may be called the legitimate successor of ancient Greek, if present day English may be called the legitimate successor of the English of eight hundred years ago. But if there has been any tactual succession in the transitional English of the past eight hundred years, why are not the languages of Latin America, France, Belgium and Italy, also the legitimate successors of the Latin? Doubtless because they cannot be the successors of a language which continues to live and move and have its being in daily affairs.

The Influence of Latin

DOES our editor realize the influence of Latin on the English language? In his brief editorial, quoted in part, he apparently could not avoid employing eighty-two words derived directly from the Latin. That editorial gave me the impulse to make a random test with Webster's unabridged dictionary. I chose progressively seven pages at random beginning respectively with the words armadillo (Spanish), "childhood," "epulary," "lappaceous," "port," "quick-scented" and "subtleness." This imperfect test showed that on the seven pages there were altogether 471 words, aside from their definitions, of which 121 were derived from the Latin and only nine from the Greek, while several Spanish and French words had been adopted which were not taken into account.

Dr. Albert S. Cook, who does ample justice to the English in the "English," has written:

"In all copious dictionaries of the English language, the words of other than purely English origin constitute three-fourths of the whole vocabulary," and states further: "Those which belong to literature, science and art, which express abstract ideas, and the subtle variations of thought are, in the main, of foreign and chiefly Romanic origin."

Living Latin

HIS very mention of the word "university" should have caused our editor to reflect, perhaps to ruminate. Universities are by no means scarce in these days, and one may ask: "Who is able to read Greek with 'tolerable fluency' who is not able to read Latin with fluency?"

But Latin is not confined to universities. It is studied and read in most colleges, academies and high schools, Protestant and secular as well as Catholic, while in hundreds of seminaries throughout the world Latin is the language of the daily textbook, recitations and scholastic disputations. Latin not only lives in its children, termed the Latin languages, but lives with them, more universal in its use than any one of them. How then can it be called a dead language? In his argumentum ad hominem the editor creates a crux criticorum which finds a speedy solution in the aphorism, Humanum est errare.

E. L. Wilmot.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Maryknoll's First Mission Band

FROM Maryknoll comes the cheering news that its seminary for foreign missions will soon be able to send forth the first apostolic mission band trained in its halls. "Paving the way for the young missionaries, their Superior, the Very Reverend James Anthony Walsh, has started for an extensive tour of the Far East, to visit friends of many years, to come into personal contact with conditions in the mission field, and to gather data useful in his work of training missionaries." Father Walsh is one of the founders of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America. His purpose is, at the close of his tour, to visit Rome and receive from the Sacred College of Propaganda the definite field for Maryknoll's activities. His return to this country may therefore be followed immediately by the departure of the first mission band for their labors in pagan lands. "Coming, as it does, at the end of Maryknoll's period of preparation, the departure of Father Walsh will stand as an historic event in the chronicle of Catholic America's work for the pagan field afar."

The Chaplains Aid Association

THE Chaplains Aid Bulletin for September gives an outline of the work of the Chaplains Aid Association since the outbreak of war. The demand for its service may be seen from the list of shipments sent from the office of the Chaplains Aid, 580 Fifth Ave., New York, and chronicled in the Bulletin:

> To one navy yard: 100 rosaries; 100 scapular medals; 100 assorted pamphlets; 100 "Army and Navy Prayer Book"; 100 catechisms. To one army post: 100 rosaries; 300 "Army and Navy Prayer Book"; 200 scapular medals; 200 small crucifixes; 20 magazines. To another: 700 "Army and Navy Prayer Book"; 700 scapular medals. To still another: 200 rosaries: 200 scapular medals and 200 "Prayer Book." One of the shipments for the battleships was of 500 "Army and Navy Prayer Book"; 200 scapular medals; 1 small ciborium; 1 box of candles; and another was of 500 "Army and Navy Prayer Book" and 500 scapular medals. Large quantities of religious articles were also given to the chaplains of the New York regiments.
>
> Nor has the Association been forgetful of our Catholic soldiers in France. As soon as General Pershing's troops went to France we sent to Chaplain John J. Brady, Fifth Marines, Somewhere in France, 2,000 of the "Army and Navy Prayer Book"; 2,000 pamphlets and 1,000 rosaries. Later the Association sent with Chaplain Feinler, Twenty-sixth Infantry, U.S.A., a similar number and still later with the Rev. Joseph Pontur, sent under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus, hundreds of rosaries, prayer books, scapular medals and a full chaplain's outfit. The Association keeps in touch with the chaplains in France. To meet the spiritual needs of the soldiers there it must ask the continued support of the Catholics of America.

In addition to this work for the soldiers and sailors, the Association has furnished twenty-two chaplains with chaplains' kits. As the Bulletin pointedly remarks: "Many ask if the soldier has a sweater to warm his body. . . . Many toil for hours on material comforts. Will they fail to do their part in dispensing spiritual comfort? We should work for the Red Cross; we should also work for the Cross of Christ whose Sacrifice has given to the former its message of mercy and help."

Head of Capuchin Order Visits United States

THE Minister General of the Capuchin Order, the Most Rev. Venantius Lisle-en-Rigault, recently made his canonical visitation of the Capuchin monasteries in the United States and Canada. According to the Franciscan Herald, he was a fellow student of Poincaré, President of France, at the college of Bar-le-Duc, studied law at the University of Paris, and later gained renown as a barrister attached to the Court of Appeals at Paris. He entered the Capuchin Order in 1889, and when later he was chosen Provincial of the Province of Paris it was his fortune to defend his monastery of Nantes against a judge who had been one of his comrades at the University of Paris. The Franciscan Herald describes an interesting ceremony as observed in the reception given him at St. Francis' Monastery in Milwaukee:

> The friars met him at the entrance of the church and escorted him to the sanctuary, where the prescribed prayers were said. Thereupon he took his place before the high altar, and each friar, kneeling before him promised him obedience and received the miraculous cross of Brindisi to kiss. This, an heirloom of the Order and always in possession of the Superior General, was borne by St. Lawrence at the head of the Christian armies when he led them to victory in two crusades against the Turks some 300 years ago.

The General addressed the Milwaukee Tertiaries in English. He likewise speaks German, Spanish and Italian, besides his mother tongue. He was born in the now famous diocese of Verdun.

The Leprous Spot

MORMONISM has apparently been stirred into new activity by the war. Reference has already been made to its propaganda in various sections of our land. So far is the country from having remedied the evil that the leprous spot has spread and is sinking deeper. The Salt Lake Telegram, "Utah's independent newspaper," has found the time ripe for publishing a series of articles in open defense and exaltation of polygamy. "The possibility of a return to polygamy," writes Mrs. Susa Young Gates, "after the world war, to replenish the world's manhood and to insure unmarried women against celibacy, is particularly interesting to descendents of the pioneer Mormons." The author is a daughter of the Mormon leader, Brigham Young, and was herself born into a family where there were nineteen wives. With unexampled effrontery she tells us that "Great men have ever been great polygamists, legally or illegally. And inferior men will always shrink from doubling domestic burdens." The fact that some men have brutalized themselves is no reason why this vice should receive general religious sanction under the Christian dispensation. The toleration for a time extended to polygamy has been forever withdrawn by Christ. In roseate language Mrs. Gates describes the "romance" of woman in polygamy:

> Courtship never quite ceases with such. For the pleasing endeavor to charm on the part of the conscientious but natural daughters of Eve is prolonged into the white mist of age for the polygamous wife. And the honest, if sometimes mistaken, effort of the husband to live up to the various ideals of his wives around his uncertain pedestal remains while life endures. Talk of romance in monogamy! When the human equation becomes a polygon imagine the increased opportunity for novelty and emotional display!

Can this degradation of woman, we marvel, be seriously advocated in the public press of America? Yet such "stuff" is printed as "good copy." Men and women, we are told, must first render themselves worthy of the high privilege of polygamy, which can be practised successfully "as a religious sacrament" only. "Polygamy is the privilege of the gods; the scorn of the clod." Thus Mrs. Susa Young Gates surrounds with a halo of romance and righteousness what in Christian times is nothing more or less than the nameless scarlet sin.

Colonel Roosevelt's Letter on Army Chaplains

WRITING to the Knights of Columbus, Colonel Roosevelt cordially agrees with them upon "the urgent need for additional chaplains." He furthermore makes the statement that had his services been accepted he would have chosen a Catholic priest as his chaplain at Headquarters:

> If I had been allowed to raise the division of volunteers which Congress authorized me to raise, and had I been given a brigade as I requested, I should have appointed as Headquarters Chaplain, Monsignor Vattmann, a retired chaplain of the Regular Army, and a member of your Church. He is by birth a German, but he is as straight an American and as good a citizen as is to be found in this country. I know personally of the admirable work done by various Catholic chaplains last year on the Mexican border, including my friend Father Joyce, of the Regular Army. I am absolutely certain that over in Europe the Catholic chaplains will do the same kind of admirable work that they have done in Mexico. One of the two or three greatest and most heroic figures of this war, is that of the great Catholic ecclesiastic, Cardinal Mercier of Belgium.

Mgr. Vattmann, to whom Colonel Roosevelt refers, was the first chaplain of any denomination to be made a major in the United States Army. A special vote of Congress and Senate was at the time required to raise him to this position. Though in his seventy-seventh year he is at present engaged as military chaplain of one of the largest forts in the country. He entered the United States Army forty years ago and has seen service of every kind in our various wars, including our conflicts with the Indian tribes. Colonel Roosevelt had notified him of the intention to chose him as Headquarters Chaplain.

Work by Local Churches for Enlisted Men

A SERIES of recommendations of practical utility for the Catholic clergy and laity is made by the Committee of the Churches on War Work. Each parish is urged to carry out the following suggestions in regard to its enlisted men and their families:

> (1.) That every local church have its honor roll, properly framed and hung in a conspicuous place, with the names of all its soldiers and sailors inscribed thereon. (2.) That everything be done to honor these men when they go, and when they return. (3.) That the churches provide membership cards to be sent to the men, indicating if possible membership in the church, the congregation, or homes of the church. (4.) That regular correspondence be kept up with these men by the pastors or by a Committee on Correspondence, and that these letters be as newsy as possible. (5.) That the women of the church get together to prepare packages for the men, to include knitted goods, clippings, papers, dainties and other articles. These packages should be sent not only at Christmas time but at regular intervals. Women from the households of the soldiers should be invited to assist. (6.) That pastors and Sunday schools give special attention during the war to the families of enlisted men, in order to assist wives and mothers, and to provide against juvenile delinquency. The committee advises frequent visitation in homes, careful shepherding by pastors and teachers, development of club activities during the week to keep children interested and off the streets, and watchfulness against truancy.

The regular correspondence suggested above commends itself likewise for its spiritual value in keeping the men true to their high religious ideals, while nothing could be of greater importance, both materially and spiritually, than the recommendation contained in the last point.

NOTICE TO READERS: When you finish reading this magazine place a one-cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No wrapping; no address.—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

SEPTEMBER 29, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Socialists and the Ant-Heap
Richard A. Muttkowski

Japan: Mission News and Educational Outlook
Mark J. McNeal

Britain Through War Glasses
A. L. Hobbs

Sugar in American Life: A Symbol
James J. Walsh

Candles of the Lord
Arthur Downing

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for
September 29, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 25

PAGE

CHRONICLE 609–10–11–12

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Socialists and the Ant-Heap — Japan: Mission News and Educational Outlook — Britain Through War Glasses—Sugar in American Life: A Symbol —Candles of the Lord....613–620

COMMUNICATIONS 621–623

EDITORIALS

Catholics and the Tax Rate—An "Honor-Farm" Alumnus—Baiting the Law —Two "Credos" — What Is a Baby Worth?—Confession's Social Value.....624–626

LITERATURE

The Drama of the Dramatist—Reviews—Books and Authors 627–632

EDUCATION — The College and Life.....632–633

SOCIOLOGY—The Gold of Loving Kindness.....633–635

NOTE AND COMMENT....635–636

Candlestick No. 7617

16 in. high, $10.00 each
18 in. high, $11.00 each
21 in. high, $12.50 each
24 in. high, $13.50 each

FOR

ECCLESIASTICAL NECESSITIES in ORIGINAL DESIGNS and BEAUTIFULLY FINISHED

At prices which place these articles, heretofore beyond the consideration of poor and rural churches of moderate means, now within their reach; watch this space every week. This is the start of a series; first we recommend a candlestick, our No. 7617.

A fine piece for the fitting of an altar is, as a general rule, very expensive.

After long experiment we have succeeded in getting the manufacturing cost of this really beautiful design of Candlestick down to the quoted figures and within the reach of the church with only moderate means.

DESCRIPTION

The base, knob and bobache are ornamented in high relief, while the shaft is of smooth heavy brass tubing. The finish is optional and can be had in polished lacquered, brush, old brass and verde antique.

Machine work is the only thing that makes the price possible.

Mail orders solicited

The W. J. FEELEY COMPANY

10 E 50th St., opposite St. Patrick's Cathedral New York City

Factory, Providence, R. I. Established 1870

Helps for Teachers and Students

THE EDUCATION OF BOYS, by Dr. Pallen

Price 60 cents. Postage extra

SHOULD BE IN THE HANDS OF EVERY EDUCATOR

WHAT THE CHURCH HAS DONE FOR EDUCATION
THE RELIGIOUS TEACHER
CATHOLIC SCHOOLS FOR CATHOLIC YOUTH
THE CATHOLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM
HOW CATHOLIC COLLEGES EXIST
THE DANGERS OF SECULAR UNIVERSITIES
POPULAR ERRORS ABOUT CLASSICAL STUDIES
THE ULTIMATE AIM OF EDUCATION
READING AND CHARACTER
AMERICAN CATHOLIC HISTORY AND RELIGION
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

Price 5 cents each. $4.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83D STREET NEW YORK

The latest and best pamphlet on the subject

What Luther Taught

THE country is now flooded with literature commemorating the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's rebellion. So every Catholic ought to have at hand a brief and trustworthy guide. Fathers Husslein and Reville, of the AMERICA staff, have prepared from the very words of Luther himself just the pamphlet you need.

Price 15 cents
$10.00 a hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83RD STREET
NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 25
WHOLE No. 441

SEPTEMBER 29, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The week has been marked by comparative inactivity on most of the war fronts. Only in Flanders and along the Dvina have important gains been made. In the Ypres district the British have pushed forward their line on a front of eight miles, winning all of their objectives and advancing at the point of furthest gain a distance of about a mile. The victory is important because it gives the British possession of a long ridge dominating the surrounding country. The Russians have been forced back a distance of six miles on a front of twenty-five miles. They have abandoned Jacobstadt and retired to the east bank of the Dvina.

Bulletin, Sept. 17, p.m.-Sept. 24, a.m.

The War Credits Bill, passed by the House on September 9, and in practically the same form by the Senate on September 15, and referred immediately to conferees of both houses, after having been adjusted to the satisfaction of the Conference, was unanimously approved by the Senate in a viva voce vote on September 20, and by the House on September 21. It has been sent to the President. It provides for the issue of convertible four per cent bonds to the value of $7,538,000,000, for war certificates to the value of $2,000,000,000, and for certificates of indebtedness to the value of $2,000,000,000. Of the total sum which amounts to $11,538,000,000, a new loan is to be extended to the Allies amounting to $4,000,000,000.

The War Credits Bill

The Urgent Deficiency Bill, carrying appropriations to the amount of $7,000,000,000, passed the House unanimously on September 18. It directly appropriates $4,830,000,000 for specified war expenses and authorizes contracts to the amount of $2,314,000,000. The bill has been taken up by the Senate Appropriations Committee.

The Urgent Deficiency Bill

Austria and Germany both published their replies to the Pope's peace proposals on September 22. The former is a letter addressed personally by the Emperor Charles to the Supreme Pontiff, and the latter a communication sent to the Papal Secretary of State by the Imperial Chancellor. Both notes agree in principle to disarmament and arbitration, both express desire for a cessation of hostilities, and both profess to find in the Pope's suggestions the basis for peace deliberations; but both are vague as to details, completely silent as to the fate of Belgium, and both absolutely ignore the position taken by the United States. There is a disposition in the United States and in the countries of the Allies, as represented by the pronouncements of the press, to believe that the Austrian note, though perhaps inspired by Germany, has the ring of sincerity; but there is a marked hesitation both here and abroad to take Germany's document at its face value. Neither note, according to the general opinion, has paved the way for peace discussions, or provided any sound basis for negotiations. The most significant paragraph in Austria's reply is the following:

Austrian and German Notes

> With deep-rooted conviction we agree to the leading idea of your Holiness that the future arrangement of the world must be based on the elimination of armed forces, and on the moral force of right and on the rule of international justice and legality. We, too, are imbued with the hope that a strengthening of the sense of right would morally regenerate humanity.
>
> We support, therefore, your Holiness's view that the negotiations between the belligerents should and could lead to an understanding by which, with the creation of appropriate guarantees, armaments on land and sea and in the air might be reduced simultaneously, reciprocally and gradually to a fixed limit, and whereby the high seas, which rightly belong to all the nations of the earth, may be freed from domination or paramountcy and be opened equally for the use of all.
>
> Fully conscious of the importance of the promotion of peace on the method proposed by your Holiness, namely: To submit international disputes to compulsory arbitration, we are also prepared to enter into negotiations regarding this proposal.

Germany voices the same views:

> We share his Holiness's view that definite rules and a certain safeguard for a simultaneous and reciprocal limitation of armaments on land, on sea and in the air, as well as for the true freedom of the community and high seas, are the things, in the treatment of which the new spirit that in the future should prevail in international relations, should find first hopeful expression. The task would then of itself arise to decide international differences of opinion, not by the use of armed forces, but by peaceful methods, especially by arbitration, whose high peace producing effect we together with his Holiness fully recognize.
>
> The Imperial Government will in this respect support every proposal compatible with the vital interest of the German Empire and people.

Except for the parts quoted above, the two notes, in marked contrast to President Wilson's reply, deal with generalities.

Another letter, which further emphasizes German methods of diplomacy, was published on September 21 by Secretary Lansing. It was sent to Berlin by Count von Bernstorff and bore the date of January 22, 1917. The text follows:

German Diplomacy and Intrigue

I request authority to pay out up to $50,000 in order, as on former occasions, to influence Congress through the organization you know of, which can, perhaps, prevent war. I am beginning in the meantime to act accordingly. In the above circumstances a public official German declaration in favor of Ireland is highly desirable in order to gain support of Irish influence here.

Three days earlier Herr Zimmermann had signed the note to Mexico, urging an alliance of that country with Germany and Japan against the United States. A few days later, on February 1, Germany was to begin her unrestricted submarine warfare, and of this fact Count von Bernstorff was already aware. The letter was dispatched on the very day when President Wilson made his famous plea before Congress for "peace without victory." The former Ambassador did not employ the usual channels of communication with his Government, nor was the letter submitted to the State Department.

Great indignation was felt in Congress at the aspersions on the loyalty of its members contained in the former Ambassador's letter, and proposals were made in both houses to institute investigations with a view to clearing the members of Congress or to discovering the guilty parties. This has been discouraged by Secretary Lansing, because the Government has no information implicating Congressmen:

If there is any misunderstanding I wish to say very emphatically I do not see how the Bernstorff message in any way reflects upon Congress or on any member. Apparently it was the purpose to employ agencies to influence them, of which they have no knowledge, and in case they were influenced would be entirely innocent. I do not know what the organization was. This exposé is apropos of German methods of peace propaganda, and there is no intention of casting suspicion on members of Congress.

The Government, however, has signified that it is by no means averse to an inquiry by Congress into anti-American and pro-German propaganda both before and after the United States entered the war.

Further light was thrown on German intrigue in the United States by the revelations published by the Committee on Public Information and based on official documents in possession of the State Department. They are concerned with the activities of Wolf von Igel, who set up in Wall Street, New York City, what professed to be a private advertising business, but was in reality an official agency of the German Imperial Government. The place was raided by the Department of Justice, in April, 1916, and a number of documents, not hitherto published, were seized, in which are indications That the German Imperial Government through its representatives in a then friendly nation was concerned with violation of the laws of the United States; destruction of lives and property in merchant vessels on the high seas; Irish revolutionary plots against Great Britain; fomenting ill feeling against the United States in Mexico; subornation of American writers and lecturers; financing of propaganda; maintenance of a spy system under the guise of a commercial investigation bureau; subsidizing of a bureau for the purpose of stirring up labor troubles in munition plants, the bomb industry and other related activities.

Side by side with evidence tending to substantiate these charges the Government places the statement authorized by the German Government, in December, 1915:

The German Government has naturally never knowingly accepted the support of any person, group of persons, society or organization seeking to promote the cause of Germany in the United States by illegal acts, by counsel of violence, by contravention of law, or by any means whatever that would offend the American public in the pride of their own authority.

The exposé of the Committee on Public Information also contains von Igel papers, in which entries are made recording offers of assistance to the German Government in the form of inventions of destruction, and a request that aid be solicited from the German Government for the Easter uprising in Ireland. Some of the names mentioned are those of prominent New York citizens, who, however, have already repudiated the statements or the service attributed to them.

France.—The fall of the Ribot Ministry and the succession to power of the Painlevé Administration came as a complete surprise. The explanation of this sudden change can be found in the mysterious "Almeyreda Affair."

The Almeyreda Case

Miguel Almeyreda, whose real name was Eugène Bonaventure Vigo, a native of the Republic of Andorra, had long been known as an anarchist, and a violent anti-militarist. He was the founder and editor of the extremely radical and anti-clerical paper the Bonnet Rouge. The managing editor of the paper was one Duval, who in the interest of his pacifist and internationalist journal made frequent trips to Switzerland. Although the names of Almeyreda and Duval were on the blacklist of the French Secret Service, the managing editor of the Bonnet Rouge found no difficulty in securing passports for his trips. The reason was to be found in the fact that the Minister of the Interior, M. Malvy, was a friend of Almeyreda. Thus the openly anti-nationalist and anti-patriotic sheet the Bonnet Rouge had the support of a member of the Ribot Government.

On July 23, M. Clémenceau charged M. Malvy in the Senate with neglect of duty for not watching more carefully men whose activities were deemed dangerous to the State and whose names were on the blacklist. At the same time he declared that he was placing in the hands of Premier Ribot certain papers extremely compromising both for Almeyreda and his managing editor. Six days after Clemenceau's charges were made, Duval was arrested upon his return from a journey to Switzerland and a check to the amount of $30,000 from a German banker was found in his possession. The banker was Marx, of Mannheim, who, according to the Echo de Paris, is the guiding spirit of the German espionage system. Almeyreda's arrest soon followed that of Duval. Eight days after, the former's death in prison was announced. It was attributed at first to hemorrhage, but medical experts, who on the order of M. Viviani, the Minister of Justice, had examined the body, reported signs of strangulation.

The news caused a sensation. The Conservatives looked upon Malvy, Almeyreda's friend, as his accomplice also, while the Radicals accused the Government of murdering the prisoner. The President and the Cabinet held a special session, after which M. Poincaré announced that the special official who had investigated the whole case of "Duval and others" found that while there had been no actual intercourse with the enemy there had been correspondence with him, and since civil courts were incompetent to deal with such a matter, it had been handed over to the military jurisdiction. Although Almeyreda had been cleared of the crime of dealing openly with the enemy, his friend M. Malvy could not escape suspicion and had to resign. On August 28, he issued a statement declaring that his relations with Almeyreda had been of a purely political and official character, such as he had with other journalists, and that there was absolutely no foundation for the charge of treason brought against him. But the Almeyreda case put the Ribot Ministry in a dilemma. If Almeyreda was a traitor, the Government was guilty of keeping in the Cabinet a Minister of the Interior, in the person of M. Malvy, who was a friend and protector of that traitor. If Almeyreda was not a traitor, argued the Radicals, but only an "internationalist," the Government was responsible for his death in prison. In the confusion that followed, the Ribot Ministry lost the support of both Radicals and Conservatives and had to resign. After some difficulty the Painlevé Ministry was formed.

The first official announcement of the new administration given out a few days ago emphasized the need of a more complete abnegation and a greater spirit of sacrifice on the part of the whole nation, and greater watchfulness against traitors and seditious persons at home. It also declared the determination of France to continue the war until the "disannexation" of Alsace and Lorraine from Germany is assured and the enemy had made adequate reparation for the ruin caused.

Ireland.—Brief reports of the work of the Irish Convention appear in the Dublin papers. According to the Weekly Freeman at the eleventh meeting which took place in the City Hall, Belfast, the members continued the consideration of those draft schemes, based upon the Dominion principle of self-government, which had formed the subject of discussion of the six previous meetings.

The Convention at Belfast

The Convention has been generally welcomed in the northern city and by the people of Belfast. The Lord Mayor of the City addressing the members of the Convention to welcome them in the name of the city expressed the assurance that whatever may be the results of the deliberations of the Conference the very fact of such a large number of Irishmen holding such divergent views would inevitably result in some good and cause Irishmen to know and understand each other better.

Only one prominent Belfast paper, the Northern Whig, spoke in disparagement of the Conference. Among other things it said:

> We are confident that most of the delegates feel rather ashamed of the fact that in the middle of a great war, when our very existence is at stake and when every ounce of energy should be put forth in order to destroy the enemy, they should be called upon to imitate Abbé Sieyès and spend their time in drafting constitutions which can only find a fitting resting-place in the waste-paper basket. . . . It must be clearly understood that the Dominion Home Rule of the Irish party is as objectionable to us as the Republicanism of the Sinn Feiners. We will have nothing to do with either.

Rome.—According to the Rome correspondents of several European journals, the comments of the Roman papers on the Pope's peace note, if not very favorable, were not characterized by bitter hostility. There was one exception. The Masonic Messagero succeeded in misreading and misinterpreting the document whenever this served its purpose. It published besides all the unfavorable comments on the latter, as a sure sign that the appeal was bound to fail, omitting on the other hand to quote anything that appeared to favor it, as for instance the verdict of the Westminster Gazette. The Giornale d'Italia, a non-Catholic paper, declared that the note required careful consideration. It pointed out that the peace-plan laid down by the Holy Father agreed in its general lines with that laid down by the President of the United States. The Pope, however, is accused by the Giornale of using bland and vague terms in reference to the questions between Italy and Austria and between France and Germany. According to it the fundamental problem is to get the Central Powers to agree to proposals which mean for them the loss of the war, and this in all probability, they are not prepared to do. The Tribuna stated that in his letter the Pope appears in the role of a real peacemaker, with a sense of moral authority which recalls the great pontiffs of the Middle Ages. It also pointed out that the charges that the document was suggested and inspired by the Central Powers are not borne out by the text and that its proposals by no means favor a purely German peace. The non-Catholic Idea Nazionale emphasized the momentous character of the Papal document and published interesting correspondence from Berne showing that the note was absolutely uninfluenced by Austrian intrigue.

The Papal Note and the Roman Press

The Catholic view was excellently set forth in the columns of the Osservatore Romano and the Corriere d'Italia. The latter paper sums it up by declaring that Catholics must consider it their duty not only to insist on the fact that the Pope has spoken, but also to explain the true meaning of what he has said. They are convinced that the peace which the Pope desires is a peace founded on justice and consequently durable. It is a peace, adds the Corriere, whose advantages are shown forth by a See, which, even when at present, it speaks with a voice of exhortation and not of command "possesses in its Divine inspirations and in its human gifts so many singular privileges to inspire us with trust that it can see more clearly and further afield than any merely human eye."

Russia.—The Bolshiviki, or the extreme radicals of Russia, who are opposed to war and insist upon the immediate institution of Socialistic ideals, seem to be gaining the supremacy. On September 19 they were reported to be in control of the Petrograd Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates and to have adopted, at a meeting held at the capital, a drastic resolution demanding that the governing power be assumed by the Council, that all representatives of the propertied classes be excluded from the Government, and that private property be abolished. When that resolution was passed the Council's Executive Committee resigned in a body, declaring that they could not be a party to such a subversive program. The Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates apparently aim to withdraw their representatives from any Cabinet in which the Constitutional Democrats are represented. September 25, when the Democratic Congress meets at Petrograd, was expected on Saturday last, to mark a new crisis in the Russian revolution, for the Radicals were reported to be preparing to test their strength against the Conservatives. The Constitutional Democrats announced on September 22 that they would take no part in the Democratic Congress on the ground that it was called by individual organizations and political factions and could not claim, therefore, to represent the will of the nation.

The Bolshiviki Ascendant

The Moscow Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates also passed resolutions calling for the abolition of private property in land without remuneration, workmen's control over production and distribution, nationalization of the chief branches of industry, avoidance of all secret treaties, proposal to all belligerents of a general democratic peace, and the arming of workmen. A similar usurpation of power by the Council in other cities was reported by M. Terestchenko to the new Cabinet. He said that though the Government's victory over General Korniloff had increased Russia's strength at home and abroad, anarchy was growing at Vladivostok, Tsaritsyn and Samara, where the Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates had ousted the Government commissaries. On September 24 the news came that the Bolshiviki group in the bureau of the Central Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates had passed by a large majority a resolution demanding an explanation of certain "revelations concerning the actions of members and agents of the Provisional Government" regarding "a conspiracy against the revolution." The charge was made that Kerensky was behind the Korniloff plot, and that "the plan was to announce an individual or collective dictatorship, at the same time declaring Petrograd under martial law, then mercilessly to break up the Petrograd revolutionary and working class organizations."

Spain.—The Madrid correspondent of the Irish Catholic writes his paper that the conclusions adopted by the parliamentary representatives of Catalonia in the Assembly recently held in Barcelona have reawakened the desire for autonomy in many of the Provinces. He comments on the resolutions in the following words:

The Devolution Problem

> The first resolution stigmatizes the policy of the actual Government as a provocation to Catalonia, an offense to Parliament, and an obstacle to the desires of the country for renovation and regeneration. The second states that as it is the opinion of the Assembly that it is most urgent to come to a decision on the organization of the State, the autonomy of the municipalities, and all the other problems pressing for solution, and as the Government has declared that the present Cortes cannot act as a Constituent Assembly, it is indispensable that a new Cortes be called which, in the capacity of such Constituent Assembly, will take in hand and resolve all these grave problems. The third conclusion is to the effect that this Constituent Assembly called for cannot be convoked by the present nor any other of the different Party Governments which alternate in office, but by a Government which will represent the freely expressed sovereign will of the country. The fourth states that the great act of protest made by the Army on June 1 must be followed by a profound renovation of Spanish public life, realized by political elements, as otherwise that act would lose in the public conscience its character of a patriotic initiative and degenerate into a merely fruitless act of indiscipline. So this is what the actual Government has to face, a call to clear out of office, to give way to a national and really representative Government, which will summon a National Assembly to undertake the great work of recasting and remaking the Spanish nation. As the Regionalist Parliamentary Assembly of Barcelona has no intention of abandoning the work undertaken, it has established for the prosecution of its labors permanent commissions, of which the first will study all the problems relating to constitutional reform and municipal autonomy; the second all problems connected with national defense, education, and the administration of justice; while the third is charged with the study of all problems of an economic and social character.

Just at this crisis the founder of the Catalan Home Rule movement, Prat de la Riba, died. It was he who first spoke of Catalonia as a nation, his ideal being a "free Catalonian nation in a confederate Spanish State." He organized the political party which fights for Catalan devolution, in Madrid, and secured the constitution of a Supreme Joint Council representing the Provincial Councils of all Catalonia, which now meets in Barcelona, a long step towards provincial autonomy.

Socialists and the Ant-Heap

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, Ph.D.

INSECTS and mammals may be said to represent the ends of two divergent lines of evolution of the articulate type, both of which culminate in social life. They have a common ancestry and a common destiny, but there the similarity ends. In the invertebrate line the articulate type ends with the six-legged insects, with both its psychological and morphological climax in the social insects, such as termites, bees, wasps, and ants. The vertebrate line has man as its psychological, if not its morphological, head.

In the ant, as typifying the social insects, functional differentiation is the ideal. The members of the colony are destined by birth and inheritance, by food and training for certain specific duties, which may be war, nursing, food gathering, or otherwise. Beyond these specific duties the ant individual must not and cannot go. The ant-heap is nature's greatest triumph, her highest performance in communistic effort and cooperation.

Geologically, man and ant appear to have started out on their intellectual activity in the quaternary age, practically simultaneously, geologists say. In the ant centralization of purpose and suppression of individual effort went hand in hand, in man division of purpose and individual effort have brought about progress. And what are the results? What can be the outcome? Dr. John M. Clarke, the geologist, offers the following comment: (Science, Feb. 7, 1917, "Philosophy of Geology and the Order of the State")

> The results are wide asunder, one a deadly communism, a moribund partition of labor, a lethal socialism, the other an active, progressive, and fertile individualism. For the former the student of nature's history sees no outcome. They are nature's experiment. . . . Socialism and Communism have been tried out and found wanting, and nature holds conspicuously before the eye of the State the warning that they have nothing either for the growth of the spirit or the intellect.

Order is the climax of Communism. And progress and Communism, or progress and order, are not compatible. As Dr. Clarke says:

> In the history of human life is it aught else than the individual that has stood for the progress of mankind? Was it the barons at Runnymede, was it some bill of rights, some declaration of independence, some joint action of human agencies that have been the crown of our achievements? Or was it the Aristotle, the Plato, the Socrates, the Christ, a solitary Shakespeare, an incomparable Franklin, or the historic twenty individuals who have stood for the progress of the race? . . . History of life has shown the futility of attempts at progress through any other agency than the independent individual.

Now the chief remaining exponents of the Spencerian philosophy of evolution by struggle, the Socialists, have made the ant-heap their psychological ideal. Life is gladiatorial, that is, it is a struggle for existence, and in this struggle the communal effort seems most promising of success. Hence they support the ant-heap ideal, which, as just shown, is a fallacy, leading to perfect order physically, but psychically to stagnation. It is of interest that especialy the German school of Darwinists, under the leadership of Haeckel and his Monists, have demanded the practical application of the Darwinistic principles of struggle and survival in education, in religious, national, and social life. Now, according to "biological sociology," the State is supreme. "Ethically," right and wrong therefore apply only in so far as conditions are advantageous or disadvantageous, and war is but a logical enactment of such principles. There are no "immoral" concepts to war, and the individual does not count at all. Whatever the merit of such statements, writers claim that German warfare and diplomacy prove their assertion that the principles of struggle and survival of the fittest have been actively adopted and are practised by one of our enemies.

Psychologically, I cannot conceive the consistency of Socialistic opposition to warfare, for struggle is both the cardinal tenet of Darwin's theory of natural selection and the central idea of Spencerian philosophy. Furthermore, if ethical principles are "natural history applied," if a moral action is "one discharged in degree duly adjusted to the conditions of existence," then warfare, i.e., struggle, is ethical, is moral. But is ethics "natural history applied"? Huxley, the brilliant exponent and critic of Darwinism, holds otherwise. He finds that:

> Civilization repudiates the gladiatorial theory of existence. The ape and tiger methods of the struggle for existence are not reconcilable with sound ethical principles. . . . Social progress means a checking of the cosmic process at every step, and the substitution for it of another which may be called the ethical process, the end of which is not the survival of the fittest, but of those who are in reality the best. . . . Let us understand, once for all, that the ethical progress of society depends not on imitating the cosmic process, still less on running away from it, but in combating it. ("Collected Essays," vol. IX, "Ethics and Evolution.")

The entry of the United States into the great war has once more shown the weakness and contradiction of theory and practice among the Socialists and their brethren, the I. W. W. In their ant-heap ideal, the State, here the colony, is the unit which permits no individual action contrary to the majority rule, and this unit maintains standing armies for defense and offense, tolerates no slackers, no opposition or impediments within the State, makes slaves, and carries on various communal functions. Why then the opposition on the part of the Socialists and I. W. W. to draft and enlistment, to standing armies, to taxation, to warfare, and even slavery? All of these are found in the ant-heap, their communal ideal. The trouble with Socialists and with the I. W. W.—for they are of the same breed—is that they change their argument and standpoint to suit the occasion and their convenience. The communal spirit of "brotherhood" they prate about is much in evidence for campaign purposes, but in practical life selfishness alone prevails. This is again proved by the war, for to die for the good of the nation, for the benefit of future generations, and for real internationalism does not suit the agitators in the least. The individual who in their scheme of government is of no value and should be thoroughly subordinated to State welfare suddenly becomes of tremendous importance; the ant-heap standpoint is conveniently exchanged for the individualist argument, because it is profitable, for it may help them to stay at home while others, intellectually honest, will fight for their country and for civilization. Present-day Socialism may be likened to an intellectual rag-bag which is filled with an amazing assortment of contradictory philosophies, ethics, and ideals, and a hodge-podge, patented and interchangeable, of economic, sociological, and biological "cure-alls," which are produced as opportunity and profit dictate. Socialism attempts to prove its psychological position by an economic argument, holds out an ideal which is a failure in nature, upholds a "biological" philosophy which is biologically untenable, and preaches an ethical system which must be fought to insure progress.

The psychological situation may be summarized as follows: (1) Socialism promulgates Spencerian philosophy of struggle, which, as research in heredity has shown, is established on partly correct premises, but on false conclusions. (2) Biologically, the communal ideal of Socialism has proved a failure, as witness ant-heap order and stagnation. (3) Their "natural" ethics are based on a gladiatorial principle of existence. But human progress is achieved by fighting such principles, not by applying them. (4) Actually, their communal ideal clashes with progress. Since individual effort means progress, it is opposed to the communal ideal. Hence if Socialists oppose such effort they oppose progress. But if they support this ideal they derogate the ant-heap and are illogical. Correspondingly, if we apply the logic of Socialist principles; first, if Socialists maintain the Spencerian philosophy of evolution by struggle, then their opposition to warfare in general, and to enlistment, draft, and war taxation in particular, is contrary to their philosophy, which considers struggle essential. Secondly, if Communism is the ideal, then again their opposition is contrary to their ideal, as typified by the ant-heap, for the ant colony wages war, and keeps a standing army which is "drafted." Thirdly, if ethics consists merely of "natural history applied" then once more their position is illogical, for their favorite philosopher maintains the idea of struggle and the central element of progress in nature. War is therefore "ethical" and their opposition is "unethical," or "immoral." And lastly, their resort to individualism for anti-draft purposes is contrary to their concept of the State as the unit.

However, as I said before, Socialists and the I. W. W. are opportunists first of all, and do not propose to adhere to the principles they teach unless it be to their profit. What if their opposition to war and draft be at variance with their philosophy? It happens to be profitable to be so! "The State is the unit" is a magic phrase of the propagandist, but in a time of crises, when the existence of the State demands the subordination of the individual for the general good, they decry this temporary, but essential, centralization as "an encroachment upon individual rights." In times of peace the slogan "An individual is of no importance" is alternated with "The individual must be sacrificed for the general good," but now that the individual must not count, the communal ideal is forsaken for a rabid and rampant individualism. They have suddenly discovered the most tremendous value of their hides and they would not think of sacrificing them. They proclaim grandiose principles, borrowed, of course, yet when the opportunity comes to enact these principles, they discover that these are without value. There is the final suggestion made by some writers that Germany has adopted for her national existence the Spencerian basis of ethics, and that accordingly any scheme which results to her advantage is "good," and therefore "moral." Can it be possible that Germany by her intellectual motherhood of Socialism and by her supposed enactment of Socialist ethics and philosophy has won over the Socialists so completely as to secure their approval and sympathy? Such a motive as the basis of their anti-patriotic activities in this country would for once have some logic behind it, the logic of the interested observer who awaits the outcome of an experiment. But since they deny any sympathy, intellectual or otherwise, with our present foe, their position is entirely unaccountable. It remains for the nation to enforce solidarity and to demonstrate ant-heap logic to its loudest exponents. That logic tolerates no dissension, no slackers, no anti-State activities. It is the logic of the majority—forceful persuasion.

This is no time for rampant individualism: the nation is at war and needs the service of men whose lives, if needs be, must be sacrificed on the altar of liberty. These many weary years Socialists have preached the ant-heap philosophy of life, they now have an opportunity to illustrate the value of their doctrine by shouldering a gun in obedience to the command of the State. True they may die, but as in their doctrine the individual counts for little, what matters that? The State will live.

Japan: Mission News and Educational Outlook

MARK J. MCNEAL, S.J.

TO comply with AMERICA'S request for information on the above heads within the limits of an available article is a problem of some difficulty. This is evident from a few geographical considerations. Japan proper occupies an area practically the equivalent of our Pacific Coast States. For missionary purposes, however, it is the equivalent of a much larger space, owing to the difficulty of communication between the islands, large and small, which go to fill up these square miles. Korea, an integral part of the empire and equally in need of missionary zeal, is a little larger than Italy, or the equivalent of Florida and Alabama. Its climate is about that of New England. Formosa, a tropical island lying just 100 miles north of the most northern of our Philippine group, is about as large as Massachusetts, has a population of about 4,000,000, mostly of Chinese extraction, and is unexplored and barbarous except for a fringe around the coast and a portion of the northeast. A chain of minute islands connecting Formosa with southern Japan and another such chain connecting northern Japan with Kamchatka should also be remembered. The population of Japan proper is about 50,000,000, of whom one-fourth live in cities of over 10,000 souls. The rural and village population is very large and involves great missionary labor.

The number of Christians in this vast region is so small that the whole country may be simply regarded as pagan and as offering an unlimited field for missionary zeal of all sorts. Certain vague notions of Christianity are rather widely diffused among the people, but they are so mixed up with contradictions derived from the disagreements of sects, and with older calumnious legends dating from the days of persecution, that they do but little to dispel the darkness of paganism or to prepare minds for the definite and supernatural truths of Catholicism. In view of all these considerations, it is not too much to say that the needs of Japan are enough to occupy the entire missionary forces of the Church for a period of at least twenty-five years, were such a concentration of forces within the range of possibility. Under the circumstances, therefore, the only practical thing to do is to consider what are the most urgent needs and what resources can be most reasonably looked to for supplying them. To my mind the most urgent needs of the Catholic missions of Japan can be reduced to three heads: Needs of churches and mission stations, needs of Christian education, needs of charitable institutions and enterprises.

Under the first head, the most obvious and urgent need is that of more priests. Hitherto priests have been chiefly supplied by the Society of Foreign Missions centered in Paris. The war not only abruptly stopped this source of workers but actually called from the harvest of souls to the field of battle the most able-bodied of the missionaries whom that society had sent hither in recent years. The missions conducted by the Dominicans, the Franciscans and the Trappists were not afflicted in this way, but they occupy a much smaller area than the missions of the Paris society.

Next to the need of foreign missionary priests, the most urgent demand is that for good catechists. The essential importance of the native catechist cannot be exaggerated. On him rests the diffusion and inculcation of Christian truths in the absence of the missionary. On him rests also the only sure hope of a native clergy. In fact, it is reasonable to look upon the catechists as a native clergy in its earliest stage. It is among them or among their children that we may safely look for those youths of unquestioned faith and solid virtue, on whom alone we can rely for a spotless priesthood dwelling amid the seductions and laxity of a pagan world. The funds required for the support of a single catechist are not great, but they are indispensable, and they more than amply repay in results the moderate outlay. To what point of Christendom Japan is to look for the supply and support of her missionaries and for the support of her catechists during the lean years now ahead of her, is the most urgent problem that her devoted hierarchy have to solve at present.

Coming to the second of our headings, Christian education, we say without hesitation that the most urgent needs now in evidence are, the need of Catholic dormitories for students, Catholic and pagan, and the need of normal schools for Catholic teachers. Every one who knows anything about Japan will admit that the former of these factors is a prime one for the making of converts and a necessary means for the preservation of the Faith among students who have already been baptized. The importance of the Catholic normal school is evident when we recall that the Japanese educational code demands that all elementary teaching shall be in Japanese and all elementary schools under the control of a Japanese principal. The work of forming teachers, male and female, has been begun by the Catholic institutions of higher grade, but the provision of suitable dormitories for the male students is still a problem unsolved. The expense, however, in comparison with the resultant good is so slight that hopes of a solution through the aid of those generously disposed toward the missions are still entertained. Some form of endowment for the education of native candidates for the priesthood is becoming daily more needful; especially since the Catholic University of Japan (Jochi Daigaku) has opened courses in literature and philosophy which put its graduates in a position of intellectual superiority to most of the Protestant missionaries annually sent out in such great numbers from America and elsewhere.

In the line of social service or charitable enterprise, two needs especially are worthy of emphasis. Every one knows the sore spot of the Japanese civilization. Every one also knows that anti-vice crusades, Salvation Army homes and the well-meant efforts of the W. C. T. U. are of less value to the victims of the miserable system than one well-equipped Catholic institution under the guidance of the Sisters who consecrate their virgin lives to the rescue of the fallen. There is no such Catholic institution in all Japan.

Catholic hospitals form another urgent need, the supply of which will result, here as elsewhere, in a goodly number of converts, won by the silent eloquence of Christian charity. There are only two Catholic hospitals in Japan, one on the west coast, one in the extreme north. There is none in Tokyo or Yokohama, where the flourishing condition of other hospitals is sufficient index of what might be done. The late Archbishop of Tokyo was cared for in his last illness by pagan nurses, and the conditions which caused that sad necessity have not altered. Meanwhile St. Luke's Protestant Episcopal Hospital in Tokyo has received a personal gift of 50,000 yen from the Emperor, on which The Christian Movement in the Japanese Empire comments as follows: "This beneficent act in the interests of international helpfulness and good-will was so highly appreciated in America, that it elicited a special acknowledgment from President Wilson and Secretary Bryan." Dr. Teusler, the chief of the surgical staff of this hospital, was so successful in the effort to raise in America a supplementary fund, that on his return the plans which had been formed for the augmentation of the institution were found too small to employ adequately the resources which generous America had placed in his hands.

In discussing hospitals, it is well to bear in mind that a well-developed hospital always includes a training school for nurses, the educational value of which, especially in a pagan country, is inestimable. The obvious connection of a hospital with a free dispensary and its possibilities as the nucleus of a Catholic school of pharmacy and ultimately of medicine, should also be borne in mind.

Enough has been said above to outline in the briefest possible way the most urgent needs of the Japanese mission at present. It is my duty to emphasize the fact that this is only an outline and that I have made it as short as possible, referring the reader to those periodicals, Catholic and Protestant, which devote special attention to missions and which should be on file in any well-regulated public library.

In answer to the question proposed to me about the outlook for Catholic education in Japan, I can say, in general, that the outlook is just what Catholics in Christendom choose to make it. There is no persecution now going on in Japan or in immediate prospect. There are, it is true, some minor annoyances, but they are not of a character to impede the work or menace the welfare of our schools. One of these drawbacks, the requirement of native teachers and heads for primary schools, we can remove ourselves at a rate largely determined by the generosity of benefactors in providing for Catholic students to pursue the courses necessary for a teacher's license.

The other annoyance is one which is apt to be diminished by the diffusion of knowledge with regard to it among Western peoples, especially among Americans, for it is one which reflects on the reputation of Japan for enlightenment and liberality. It is this: The heads of the Shinto cult for the worship of the aboriginal gods and the divine ancestors of the Emperor are, through the department of education, bringing continual pressure to bear on the students of all public and authorized private schools to visit the national shrines of this cult and venerate the Imperial ancestors in a manner absolutely inconsistent with any form of Christianity or Judaism. When Christians protest that this is a violation of the religious freedom guaranteed by the Constitution, they are told that the rites are merely civic and the worship nothing but an essential act of patriotism. When they offer to perform such patriotic rites as their conscience permits but in a place not intimately associated with the worship of heathen gods, they are told that disobedience to the orders in question will render their schools objects of suspicion to patriotic Japanese and result in the withdrawal of students and the consequent uselessness of the school. Now this question has been thoroughly thrashed out and every honest Japanese will admit that either these rites are religious, i.e., idolatrous sun-god worship, or else that words have lost their meaning and that there is no religion in Japan. It is vitally important for Americans, who have allowed to Japanese immigrants the utmost religious freedom in school and out, to have the brief and frank statement of these facts at hand as I have put them here.

Barring these two annoyances, the outlook for Catholic education, though not roseate, is hopeful and encouraging. The general desire for all kinds of education, not only commercial, is keen; the students are energetic and of good mentality. Catholic schools have a well-established reputation and enjoy the prestige in the matter of language teaching which naturally accompanies a staff of teachers speaking the language taught. The absorption of the Japanese mind in commerce or other worldly interests is by no means as exclusive as many Americans have been led to think. There are plenty of earnest seekers after truth and plenty of good hearts hungry for something better than pagan husks or latter-day vaporings. But the Bread of Life cannot be broken for them without the aid of the Catholics of other countries. This great harvest-field cannot be reaped without assistance from abroad, especially from America, where the number of Catholics whom God has blessed with a superabundance of wealth, is so great.

Britain Through War Glasses

A. L. Hobbs

THE third year of the war on the Western front came to a close with General Haig's great offensive, and some few days later train loads of wounded began to arrive at Charing Cross, in London. As the great ambulances leave the station yard with their burden of human agony the flower women on the street, their harsh, unlovely faces transformed with the wonder love of pity, cast their stock in trade, their flowers, by which they earn their bread, at the heroes who are being borne to the hospitals. It is almost a daily occurrence, and, too, it is a symbol of Britain, of London, as it enters upon the fourth year of the war.

It is a curious people, this London populace, and perhaps it reflects the temper of the whole people of Britain and of the Dominions overseas. There is no exaltation and, exteriorly at least, there is no show of enthusiasm: there is nothing but a quiet, dogged determination to win the war at all costs. Two weeks previously I was in New York, where Fifth Avenue was alive and gay with flags; not only the Stars and Stripes, but the flags of all the Allies. But in London I saw no sign of a single flag, save the Union Jack flying from the Victoria Tower at the Houses of Parliament. And this is typical of the British people at the present time. Loathing and detesting all war, and this war in particular, as no people has ever done before, yet, say they, we have made too many sacrifices, we have suffered too much to think of letting up until we have brought the war to a victorious close. The British bulldog has set its teeth; a great crime has been committed against humanity, and there is but one thought—to bring the criminal to justice.

It would be a mistake to take the bleatings of the few pacifists to be the expression of public opinion, nor is the so-called Leeds Conference and the miscalled Conference of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates at all representative of the workers. There is no cheap hatred of Germany, there is no frothy talk about annexations and indemnities: but there is a stern and terrible determination that a great wrong must be righted, and that reparation must be made. Britain demands justice; nothing more is required and nothing less.

The Zeppelin menace has been entirely overcome, and the great airships are seen no more. The British and French aviators have the airplane raiders well in hand so far, and it is probable that they are ready to cope with them at any time. The latest form of German piety is for the air raiders to cross over on Sunday morning and kill a few people as they go home from Mass. It is a peculiar form for devotion to take, and, fortunately, it has met with meagre success. The advent of the American aviators will no doubt put the German air service out of commission altogether. The streets of London are still darkened at night, and the lights in houses are shaded. The surface cars and buses creep along in the darkness like glow worms, their feeble lights serving only to intensify the gloom. London is hardly a safe place for the wanderer by night. And through the darkness the air is stabbed by countless swords of blinding light, as the searchlights of London's air defenses explore the sky for hostile aircraft. With the scores of lights focused on one spot it would be impossible for an hostile aircraft to escape observation. It cannot be said that frequent air raids have made London's nerves jumpy. But the vile slaughter of numbers of infants and young children in schools has aroused a resentment that will die down only when the assassins have received a fitting punishment.

If the submarine campaign was begun for the purpose of starving Britain, then this, too, can be fairly said to have failed in its object. Britain is not starving, nor is she in any way approaching that condition. There is a scarcity of some stocks of food, which is inevitable when large numbers of producers are withdrawn from industries. The war bread, which comes unkindly to a people accustomed to the use of white bread, is much like the rye bread made in America, only a little more soggy. It is a somewhat sad sort of bread, but when fresh is not unpalatable. The price of foodstuffs is considerably higher, though prices are on the whole very little, if anything, higher than prices in New York. Fruit and vegetables are plentiful and prices are moderate: new potatoes run from 1½ to 2 cents a pound.

But one of the most interesting features of the fourth year of the war is the liquor question. Before the war the British workman got his beer in unlimited quantities at the humble price of 4 cents a pint. Now he pays anything from 12 to 18 cents, and he gets only a limited quantity. The regulations are interesting, and will perhaps throw some light on liquor problems.

The licensed saloons are allowed to be open only between the hours of twelve and two-thirty, and from six in the evening until half-past nine. On Sundays both these periods are shortened by one hour. The liquor dealers are supplied on certain days with a specified quantity of beers of various kinds, and when this is sold there is no more until the next delivery day. And so, if on a certain day there should be a run of customers and all the beer is sold the saloon keeper has to close until he receives a fresh quantity. It is by no means uncommon for many saloons to be open for only two or three days a week, and for a sign to be hung out saying, "Sold Out. Open on ———." The incident may furnish interesting points for the solution of the liquor problem, as an alternative for prohibition. A new beverage called government beer, sold at ten cents a pint, has made its appearance. Its percentage of alcohol is so low as to reduce its intoxicating qualities to a minimum. It is cheap and it is nasty; but it is wet and it is called beer, so it may find favor somewhere. One effect of the liquor restrictions has been to reduce drunkenness. The whiskey stocks are small; the price is high, and when beer supplies are sold out the British workman has to go without a drink, and in most cases he is none the worse for it. But the compelling feature of this situation is that to a very large extent it certainly does prohibit. There is not the faintest chance of "bootlegging"; and the stocks are so regulated that when a supply runs out it really does run out, and the consumer finds that when he must go without his favorite beverage he must accept the situation, for the speak-easy has vanished altogether from English soil.

The most striking, and perhaps the most pathetic feature of this fourth year of the war is the war shrine. In the mean back streets, on the principal highways there are these memorials of the gallant dead who have laid down their lives for democracy. There is mourning everywhere, and rare is the family of which a member has not died either in action or from some cause consequent to the war. The war shrines vary in magnificence, but they are all fashioned in the same style. It is a diptych with folding leaves, and below runs a shelf on which pots and jars of fresh flowers are placed continuously. On the main leaf of the diptych is written the inscription, "Roll of Honor," and below are the names of those who have fallen. Where the shrine has been erected under Catholic or High Church auspices the list is prefixed with the legend, "Pray for the souls of ———." And always the shrine is surmounted by the Crucifix. The war has brought back at least one Catholic custom to England. One of the most magnificent of these war shrines is erected in a side porch of the Church of St. Bride, in the Strand, a church that was built from the designs of Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of St. Paul's Cathedral. This shrine was provided by the flower women of the Strand, and by them is kept daily supplied with fresh flowers. Two great carved angels of wood kneel before the diptych containing the names of the dead, and at the entrance hangs the British flag; a perpetual sentinel that guards these honored names.

One of the most pathetic shrines to be seen in the whole of London is in a mean street in the mean district of London's East End. The street is off from the principal thoroughfare, in a section where the very poor live. The shrine consists of a simple diptych, in which the names of the dead heroes are written on a sheet of paper. For decorations it has two discarded jam jars holding a few marigolds, and two dingy weather-beaten flags. But in these two faded flags there is more glory than in the most magnificent shrine of gold and marble; for they are the British and the United States flags. It may be that the memorial contains the name of some American who has died for this great cause, or it may be that someone had seen with prophetic eyes that America must soon take up arms for the cause of humanity—for the American flag had guarded this shrine before the United States had declared a state of war with Germany. But in the whole of London, in the whole of England, there is nothing more touching or more eloquent than this poor shrine in that mean street, on which the weatherbeaten flags of Britain and America wave above the Crucifix, beneath which the names of dead soldiers are inscribed. It is the symbol of the fourth year of the war, and perhaps before these words are printed wounded American soldiers will be brought back from the front to the hospitals in London. And as they, too, are carried in the ambulances through the great gates of Charing Cross station the London flower women will cast flowers on their maimed and honored bodies. For in the fourth year of the war the blood of United States soldiers will be poured out on the soil of France.

Sugar in American Life: A Symbol

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

THE United States Department of Commerce reviewing the sugar industry of the world recently announced that every American was using on the average some eighty-one pounds of sugar each year. This is to say every man, woman and child in this country consumes nearly a quarter of a pound of sugar each day. This would be almost incredible if actual figures did not prove it. But after all these figures are not so unlike many other statistics in American life. Our tobacco bill advances literally by leaps and bounds; the number of cigarettes consumed more than doubles every decade. Even our chewing-gum bill for a single year is something like $20,000,000.

By a curious coincidence, just a week before the United States Government report on sugar consumption was made public, the Department of Health of the City of New York in its Weekly Bulletin discussed the problem of the spread of diabetes, an affection in which there is a serious disturbance sometimes amounting to almost complete obliteration of the sugar metabolism of the body. A definite consequence is that all the sugar or sugar-producing materials, such as the starches which the individual consumes, are wasted and do not provide the substantial internal nutrition required. From the statistics submitted it appears that the diseases affecting sugar metabolism or nutritional processes unfavorably, have been coming more and more into prominence in recent years, and during the past decade have become a very significant factor in our mortality-rate. But how few give this a thought.

Dr. Joslin, who has recently written an authoritative book on the subject of these disturbances of sugar nutrition, says: "In the United States there are, I suppose, not far from half a million individuals with diabetes or destined to have diabetes before they die." The New York Department of Health comments on this startling declaration as follows: "That this is based on something more than guesswork is clear from the careful statistical analysis presented by the author." What particularly appeals to the Department of Health is the fact that these diseases are neutralizing to a considerable extent the good effects, such as prolongation of life, which should be consequent upon the development of sanitary science in recent years.

It must not be forgotten that while we are lengthening life by modern sanitation, some features of this problem are rather discouraging. The average length of life is probably ten years greater than a half century ago, perhaps more, but this is largely due to the fact that the death-rate among children under the age of one year has greatly fallen and that of children under five years quite markedly. Weaker children who used to die in early years are now saved, but death-rates at later periods in life are higher than formerly. Besides, our tuberculosis sanatoria are overcrowded, our insane asylums cannot keep up with the clamorous demands upon them. Above all the death-rate in the decade above forty, when men are at their prime capacity for work, is now higher.

The important factors in this heightened mortality of middle life are heart, kidneys and arteries; then certain nutritional diseases like diabetes and obesity. These two diseases are due to over-nutrition. The question of over-nutrition is a very personal matter. Some people can consume much more food material than others without any serious consequences. Some actually need ever so much more than others, for there are serious drains upon their strength due to individual peculiarities. The most serious element in this over-nutrition is that once it starts, a chain of serious pathological consequences is formed. The stout man or woman may limit the food supply, and yet not lose much in weight, because heat is retained by the fatty covering and heat dissipation is prevented. Disturbances of sugar metabolism or nutrition follow, and then even small amounts of sugar produce serious effects.

Sugar is a very precious food material. It is readily soluble and therefore can be carried in the blood stream to the muscles where it is burned, that is, oxydized, and produces muscle energy. Sugar is, however, to a great extent not a natural but an artificial product. Very dilute sugar exists in ripe fruits and even in certain vegetables such as the beet. This can be concentrated and man has learned how to do it so as to produce what we know as sugar in commerce. Ordinarily it is clear that nature intended that man should get the sugar he needs almost entirely from the starchy substances. Anyone who ever slowly chewed a piece of bread and above all a crust of bread, noted that it grew sweet in the mouth. For the saliva contains a ferment which changes starch into sugar and whenever bread or any other starchy substance is exposed to this for a sufficiently long time sugar production ensues. Very seldom is the chewing process continued, however, until this result takes place.

Man learned then how to secure sugar without the slow and somewhat laborious process of chewing and waiting for fermentation to take place. Sugar became one of the delicacies. A little more than 100 years ago a few thousand tons of sugar were sufficient for the world. Now we use many millions of tons. Candy and sweets of all kinds are being manufactured and consumed in ever greater amounts. The result is a breaking down of sugar metabolism in susceptible individuals at least, and an increase of the diseases connected with it. No wonder then that there are half a million of people in this country whose lives will be shortened and whose energies will be hampered by diabetic affections. In one generation the number of such cases has increased one half.

The increase of diabetes is, as it seems to me, a symbol of a good many things that are happening in American life. We are laboring intently to make life easier for ourselves. We save the trouble of starch digestion and consume the sugar "straight." It is pleasant to do so because the sweet taste of sugar was evidently meant to be a reward for the vigorous labor of chewing. We have learned how to get the reward without taking the trouble. We think we are fooling nature, but though you can drive out nature with a pitchfork she will come back. As the result of the ease with which sugar can be taken and of the temptation to take it we readily consume too much and at times sugar metabolism breaks down. Then even though we consume starchy materials, the sugar from them does not prove nutritious. We have overdone the matter and nature will not use sugar as before.

We have done nearly the same thing with regard to our teeth. Mastication required effort, so we have learned to cook things until they need very little chewing. Our vegetables are all made nice and soft, very often mashed to save us trouble. The crust of bread is no longer eaten. We must have fresh bread every day. Our meat is kept in a refrigerator until changes have taken place in the muscular substance that make it easy to chew and swallow without effort. We are paying for this lessened labor of mastication, first by the fact that it is much easier than before to eat too much, but above all we are losing our teeth because there is not enough for them to do. The teeth of men of the stone age were not carious but on the contrary were as clear and well preserved as those of a hound. They did vigorous chewing.

We are making things easier and more comfortable for mankind. And ease is the source of a still greater menace. Our steam-heated houses keep the temperature in the winter at seventy degrees. They are very different from the houses heated by open fireplaces, but then the ventilation is not nearly so good and the dry air of the rooms at seventy degrees plays havoc with the lungs. Hence, pneumonia has now taken the place of tuberculosis as "the captain of the men of death."

These are some of the things symbolized in the physical order by our exaggerated sugar consumption and its resultant serious effect on sugar metabolism. There are other things in the intellectual and moral order of which it is also a symbol. In education the young are not asked to do hard work and the elective system must be preserved to permit them to choose the things they like. They can scarcely be expected to read serious books, and as they have time on their hands which must be occupied some way or another, they read sugary fiction, some of it distinctly evil in its effects; the sugar conceals poisonous materials.

Should we be surprised if there are affections of the will just as disturbing in their way as the break down of sugar metabolism in the body? A vicious circle is formed and after a while people cannot make the effort necessary for right living because the lack of discipline has broken down their power of function in that direction. But alas! it is easier to make Americans heed physical than moral ills. There are few indeed who do not realize our lack of persistent effort in the pursuit of lofty ideals, but men will not make the effort necessary for the acquisition of habits of virtue. But perhaps they are not so much to blame after all: their wills were intrenched in youth and now, in later years, will not respond to stimulus in the right direction. The excessive use of sugar is indeed a symbol of intellectual and moral ills far more dangerous to the country than diabetes.

Candles of the Lord

ARTHUR DOWNING

THE star-strewn sky is the doorway to infinity. There is a kinship between man and the stars. "There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard." They have always spoken to man of love, poetry and noble idealism. The Greeks put their gods and fabled heroes among the stars, and we tore a piece from the sky for our flag, which is the focus of national idealism.

What are the stars? Science conjectures that as time began all matter was thinly distributed throughout space. Centers of attraction formed; matter flowed inward to these centers and produced a whirling motion; heat and light were generated. Planets were thrown off from the central whirling masses or suns, and the stellar energy in the form of light-waves flowed steadily back again into space. The Lord had lit His candles.

The stars are the symbols of destiny. They are commonly supposed to be immutable, but this is true only as compared with the ephemeral life of man. All the stars, including our sun, are moving faster than cannon-balls, but they do not seem to move at all, because they are lost in the inconceivable depths of space "where distance hath not term nor name and time outstrips the mind." They will, indeed, almost unchanged, behold the graves of our descendants 1,000,000 years from now.

Calmly the stars look down upon the fevered pulse of life, the little life in which we prate of ambition, joy, hope, pain, a career; for are not these things important, they will last a few hours? The tiny ephemera live their lives, and complete the cycle of their joys and woes, in one day. As the ephemera are to the earth, so is man to the universe. Like gods of Olympus the stars laugh; love alone defies them. Yet the mighty stars will die as surely as a swarm of gnats. Ever since those suns were formed eons ago, their energy in the form of light-waves has been flowing back into the illimitable realms of space. This august spectacle is but a huge waterfall of natural forces rushing to the sea of death, to a lower level of energy. It no more deserves to be worshiped than a waterfall; each is only a flux or flow from a higher to a lower level of energy.

Vega would make 100 of our suns, Arcturus 1,000 and Deneb 10,000; but in time they will all grow cold and dark. The mightiest stars are as perishable as a bunch of cut flowers. They are daisies blooming for a while in the blue bowl of the sky; little snowflakes melting on the floor of heaven.

Are those distant suns, the stars, similar to our sun? The spectroscope, which analyzes their light, shows that they are composed of the same elements. Have they planets revolving around them? We cannot tell. We could not see them under any circumstances, but it is probable that such planets do exist in myriads.

Man could not live on them. In all the star-strewn universe he could live only on this small earth where conditions are suited to him. Are there rational beings upon those other planets? What instincts has God implanted in their breasts? Have they other forms of love and hate, of strength and weakness? Do they fall in love, make friends, transact business and establish homes? Has Christ saved those worlds too?

These questions suggest the ignorance of man, who digs black stones from the earth and burns them for heat and energy. Every hand that is raised, all the coal that is burned derives its power from the light of our local star, the sun. In a wonderful future, perhaps, man will harvest the sunlight which is the source of terrestrial energy, or utilize the vast and incalculable forces of planetary gravitation. He is still ignorant and insufficient.

Materialists say that the stars, mere fires, gases and blind forces, created mind. Did they create mind or did mind create them? When a complete railroad builds and operates itself, then it may be admitted that the starry firmament, the wonder of all ages, may have done the same. God created the stars, as well as the insignificant earth-worm, man.

Man can never fully comprehend the mind of God. "For who hath known the mind of the Lord." A blue-bottle fly, by any stretch of its natural powers, cannot envelop and understand the mind of man, neither can the mind of man encompass God.

More than 2,200 years ago the astronomer Aratus, looking out upon the vast expanse of the starry sky, said, "From all quarters heaven speaks to man." Nature is the industry of God; much may be learned from her, sound principles, great moral truths.

In making his much-vaunted inventions, man is like a child studying the A B C's; a greater mind, a mind that lived in ancient Phoenicia, preceded the child and formed that alphabet. So man studies the alphabet of nature which God composed.

Oh, stars, your measureless distance, your hoary antiquity cannot frighten us. You are only flickering candles lit by the hand of the Lord. You are as truly evanescent as we are, and as subject to His inexorable laws. In the hand of God we place our destiny, our hope, our faith, our love and our lives.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Garyism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

After reading A. C. B.'s letter in AMERICA for September 8 I looked for my copy for July 26. Soon I recalled that I had sent it to a mother who has children in a school in Providence where the Gary plan is being tried out, in a moderate way, it is true. She is not pleased with the plan. As a teacher in that school and knowing about things from an inside viewpoint I told her I should let her read the next good article appearing in AMERICA. There is so much plain rant in A. C. B.'s letter that I thought it was not worth noticing. But her words, "I do not know whether parochial schools furnish these advantages," irritated me so, that I felt I could say a strong "bit" against Garyism as practised in New York in P. S. 45, the Bronx.

In April, 1916, I visited there. "Pandemonium" repeated over and over again, is all I can say, when I think of that visit.

A. C. B. likens "Garyism" to convent education. Perhaps the genuine "Garyism" is comparable to that education, but not the brand I saw. The firm and even-tempered Sisters never would shout, jostle, and use the sarcastic talk I heard. I have a notebook of sarcastic remarks I heard while in P. S. 45. Moreover, convent schools, parochial schools—would that A. C. B. knew them better!—and Gary, Ind., schools do not register 4,500 children in one building.

After I had shown Mr. Patri, principal of the Bronx school, a letter I received from the superintendent directing me to P. S. 45, I was allowed to visit all classes—cooking, sewing, clay-modeling, woodworking, drawing, and the department for the blind. I shudder at the memory of that visit.

In the modeling room the pupils were having clay-ball fights while the instructor's back was turned. In the auditorium two men and two women were trying to conduct exercises and enjoy themselves. They took turns in shouting: "What room are you in? Lose two points for talking." Wonderful examples they. Do the Visitation Sisters act like this? I know the Sisters of Mercy-hall-periods are not conducted so. In the class rooms the children paid no attention, if they did not wish to do so, and the young man in the drawing room I shall never forget.

From my visit I retain one inspiration, the beautiful, helpful, wonderful work being done for blind children.

I did not go to P. S. 45 to find fault or even to look for defects. I returned to Providence grateful that we had only a modified plan. And when our teachers complain I can truthfully say: "Cheer up, we are happy." I have seen movies of the Gary, Ind., schools. They are splendid. I have read the book, "Gary Schools." Splendid, also. Not so New York's interpretation or experiment, call it what you will.

Providence. M. T.

"Why"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The editorial "Why" in AMERICA for September 8 strikes an interesting note. The answer to that query is simplicity personified. Such agitation against Catholics and Catholicism will go unhindered just as long as the Catholics of America allow it to be more profitable to the politicians to disregard us than to enforce the laws, when such enforcement would bring upon them the wrath of our enemies, without any compensating reward or support from the Catholic body.

"The Heart of an Apostate" in the same issue of AMERICA is a good illustration of the reason why Catholics are disregarded by men who depend for their success upon the public opinion or vote. That editorial is very fine indeed, but like everything we Catholics do, it is too late. The thing is over now; there is no use crying over spilt milk. Let us get to work and act so that such things shall not happen in our country.

Further comment on this is unnecessary as a communication of September 16, 1916, embodying the remarks of the Archbishop of Marseilles is just as applicable now as then.

Brooklyn, N. Y. FRANCIS M. FIELD-MCNALLY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The tales on which you based your editorials "Why?" and "Again Why?" in AMERICA for September 8 and 15, were clearly drawn from yellow journal sources. It is absolutely false that Mr. Russell J. Dunn, the "young man" referred to in your editorials "began his civic life with the meagre equipment of a soap-box," that "he was dragged from his soap-box," and that "he attacked the religious conviction of the Jews." He has never used a soap-box, has never been dragged from one, and has never attacked the religious convictions of the Jews.

The nearly 3,000 practising, not "political," Catholics who recently attended a mass meeting in honor of Mr. Dunn know the facts, know that your editorials, based on ignorance of the facts, have done Mr. Dunn a serious injustice, and ask that you publish this communication as part reparation for the injustice done him. Mr. Dunn is the one Catholic man who has had the courage to vindicate publicly the principles of Christianity and Americanism in the strongholds of that element which publicly attacks both of these, and publicly spits upon the Crucifix, of this you have said nothing, while Catholics passively stand by; the practical kind, because they have no leaders, the political kind because they "need the votes."

Brooklyn, N. Y. JOHN F. MARAN.

[The sources drawn upon were the published accounts of the trial which resulted in Mr. Dunn's conviction, and Judge McIntyre's instructions on "the soap-box orators," delivered at a later date to the Grand Jury of New York County. Furthermore, the editorials pointed out that Mr. Dunn's case seemed to prove that, while it was lawful to blaspheme Almighty God, or attack Catholics in the streets of New York, it was "shocking in the extreme to attack the Jews." It should, therefore, be fairly clear that one of their purposes was to score those "political Catholics" of whom Mr. Maran justly complains. A second purpose was to point out the utter folly of attempting to accomplish any good by attacking a race because of the actions of some of that race. Of late, many New York Jews, but not all Jews, have been most offensive in word and action. These words and actions should be denounced publicly and vigorously, but it is un-Catholic and unwise to attack the Jews themselves. —Ed. AMERICA.]

London Air Raids

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the name of fair play and common-sense I want to know what Mr. Allyn Powell, of Philadelphia, means by his letter published in your issue of August 11. He describes my article in your issue of July 21 as a "rehash of the stock argument that a German airman's frenzied delight is in killing English civilians, preferably women and school children." Only for the fact that later on he actually quotes a sentence from my article I would wonder if he had read it. If he will read it again he will see that from the beginning to the end of it there was not one word about the German's "delight in killing civilians, preferably women and school children."

It has never been my practice to abuse and insult brave enemies. What really appears to annoy Mr. Powell is that I have paid a well-deserved tribute to the chivalry of the British Royal Flying Corps. Let me add one more tribute to those splendid men. That same chivalrous spirit has made them again and again pay military honors at the funeral of German airmen who lost their lives in these very attacks on London. We all recognize that the men who make the attacks are not responsible for the policy that dictates them.

The object of my article was (1) to show how comparatively slight is the effect of an air raid on a great city. I was anxious to make this clear because I know very exaggerated accounts have been published of the results obtained by air raids. Not long ago a friend wrote: "London must be an awful place to live in just now." This shows the impression caused by wild stories of wholesale destruction effected by the raiders. (2) I argued from the trifling results of the raids that they served no military purpose and were therefore among the features of war that ought to be renounced by Christian nations. Incidentally I showed that the Hague Conventions practically do not forbid such operations and I expressed the hope that even if humanitarian considerations did not secure more effective international agreements on the subject, the fact that they are both costly and ineffective might tend to the abolition of raids on great centers of population.

Our Flying Corps has made no such attacks. Its activity has been confined to (1) reconnaissance, (2) raids on military depots, railway junctions, aerodromes, etc., all operations of a distinctly military character, affecting the course of operations and not involving widespread danger to the crowded civilian population of great cities.

Mr. Powell describes me as an Englishman. I happen to be an Irishman, and besides that a Munster man. The latter part of his letter would be insulting if it were not so utterly absurd.

London. A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE.

[This controversy is now closed.—ED. AMERICA.]

A Nationwide Novena

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"A Nationwide Novena for Peace" in the September 15 issue was indeed God inspired. What true son of Holy Mother Church can fail to comprehend its meaning? What true lover of Mary, the Queen of Peace, will deny his aid in beseeching this most gracious Advocate to turn her eyes of mercy on a suffering world and to win from her Divine Son the "priceless boon for which every heart is longing but which still seems so far away?" I dare say, on reading the editorial, millions of pure hearts all over the United States beat faster and yearned with an unquenchable longing to do their little share in this great storming of Heaven.

"We should do so at once." Were these words placed in a corner with a view to drawing out devoted hearts? So it seems. The Feast of our Lady's Immaculate Conception would be a most favorable day; but why wait till then? Is not our dear Mother just as powerful in September or October as in December? Is not October the month of the Rosary? Why not supplicate our Heavenly Advocate during the coming month when thousands of Catholic families will assemble nightly to honor God's Mother with her own sweet prayer? Perhaps this would mean a speedier granting of that boon still so far away? Can we bring it nearer? If so, let us break our bread to the children of Europe as soon as possible; let us hasten to aid those afflicted and to merit the gratitude of the thousands of homes abroad and here at home. Let us beseech with all our hearts this Queen of Peace! And "let us do so at once!"

Baltimore. J. H.

[This is an excellent idea, and it is to be hoped that priests and people will put it into practice. Why could not the Rosary be said, for peace, every night in October, in every church in the United States? This would not interfere with the novena.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Is France Catholic?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As I read the current history of France I wonder how that country can be described as a Catholic land unless the people have abrogated their right, or have been deprived of their right, to govern themselves as their conscience and knowledge of right would suggest. Must they submit unwillingly to the domination of the heathen rabble that governs them or do they do it of their own volition? If the majority of Frenchmen are Catholic do they like rulers that insult them and deny to them their most fundamental rights, or are they saddled with masters who cannot be shaken off?

If they can get rid of the men who rule them and they do not do so, and their Government continues to use every effort to destroy their religion we must assume that they are satisfied with that condition, but if the people are not satisfied and cannot help themselves then the German people are not the only victims of irresponsible masters as our President has stated in his reply to the Holy Father.

To know the precise attitude of a French Catholic mind on this question would enlighten me and perhaps there are others who share my desire to know. Can anyone tell me?

Yonkers. JOSEPH A. MCGRATH.

The Red Cross of St. Camillus

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Red Cross nurses founded by Camillus de Lellis in Rome nearly 350 years ago are doing heroic work in Italy, France, Germany and Austria in the present war. In Germany and Austria they are officially recognized as "The Red Cross of St. Camillus." In Germany several camp hospitals behind the trenches are confided to their care. One hospital train in their charge is presided over by twenty-five of their nurses. In Austria they are also close to the battle line, serving in the sanitary corps and on the hospital trains and in hospitals of the Knights of Malta.

In Italy great numbers have been called to service in the regular sanitary corps of the army and the Red Cross Sisters of St. Camillus are working as an organization under the army medical authorities in the hospitals and camps. Under the present infidel French Government the Red Cross of St. Camillus has no legal existence, still its priests and nurses are welcomed in the sanitary and fighting corps of the French Army.

Catholics should take pride in the fact that the association of Red Cross nurses which the United States Government is endorsing so highly and to which we are all contributing so unsparingly, was anticipated by a Roman soldier 300 years before Jean Henri Dunant, the Swiss humanitarian, succeeded in getting an international conference to adopt the idea in 1864. The United States Government did not come into it until 1882.

Camillus de Lellis, the Roman soldier who organized nurses to take care of the sick in hospitals and the wounded on the battlefield with a red cross as their emblem, was canonized by Pope Benedict XIV, his feast day being July 18. Pope Leo XIII on June 22, 1886, announced that St. Camillus would be the patron of nurses whether they wore a red cross badge or not.

Chiesa della Maddalena in Rome, where St. Camillus labored and died, is still the home of the Father General of the Order, Rev. Father Vido. Over the door floats the banner of the Red Cross. The members of the Order known in Italy as Ministri degli Infermi, Ministers to the Sick, number nearly 800 members and are spread over Italy, France, Spain, Germany, Holland, Ireland, Denmark, Austria and Peru. There are hundreds of Sisters who are in a way under the jurisdiction of Father General Vido and who also care for the sick and wounded. The Camillini Fathers, as they are called, serve, with the Sisters, the hospital of St. John of the Lateran in Rome as well as hospitals in Verona, Mantua, Cremona, Treviso and Naples, all of which are most valuable aids in caring for the wounded of this war.

In Germany they have five hospitals, the most famous one being the great sanatorium for alcoholic patients, which was the first of its kind opened by Catholics anywhere in the world. In Holland they have a large clinic. In Ireland they have a hospital; in Denmark another; in Peru three hospitals, and in Austria ten hospitals overflowing with suffering people. They have served in all the wars since 1601, and several times in their history the wearers of the Red Cross of St. Camillus have been nigh exterminated in the plagues through which they served and which carried off so many of their numbers.

"Precursori delli Croce Rossa" is the title of a book published in Turin, Italy, which gives a brief resumé of the work of St. Camillus and his followers during the past three centuries. It is illustrated with several portraits of St. Camillus and his more notable successors. There is a reproduction of an interesting old copper-plate engraving picturing the dream of Camilla, the mother of Camillus, seeing a vision of her unborn son with a red cross, followed by other children carrying the same emblem. It was this dream that inspired Camillus to adopt the Red Cross as the distinguishing mark for his nurses. A photograph of a group of the Red Cross nurses of St. Camillus is shown in one of their hospital trains in the present war, together with pictures of the mother house in Rome and the substantial hospitals under the care of these Red Cross nurses in other countries.

Orange, N. J. S. H. HORGAN.

"God, the Invisible King"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Perhaps a third person could effectually clear up whatever misunderstanding exists between Father Stack and Mr. Millar.

Leaving to Mr. Woodlock the task of deciding whether he and Father Stack are yet in agreement about the inner significance of Mr. Wells's new position, I should like to clarify what appears to be Mr. Millar's contention. There are three points that might be in question: (1) Has Mr. Wells, in turning his face from negation and scepticism towards the recognition of the necessity of Godhead, turned in the right direction? Mr. Millar answers this in the affirmative. (2) Is the fact that many men are likely to accept the new theology a welcome sign or not? This we must distinguish: (A) Those, who from orthodox Christianity go to this, the manifest reductio ad absurdum of Modernism, are certainly very much to be pitied. Mr. Millar would hardly deny this. And, indeed, that the book's very absurdity will keep this class from harm, events since it appeared tend clearly to show. (B) But in those for whom Protestantism has long since been proved false, as is the case of so many, and who, from the wreck of hope and faith into which it has led them, look upward at Mr. Wells's voice and recognize it as a call to their own hearts, in these—and who can say how many they are?—may we not see something to hope for? They will certainly not find Mr. Wells' illogical God something to hold on to for long, but having once raised their previously barren hearts in prayer to this Unknown God, may we not rejoice, as St. Paul did long ago at Athens?

Again, about Mr. Wells's knowledge of Catholicism. Mr. Wells undoubtedly knows the Nicene Creed, a peculiarly Catholic formula. But does he know it as a Catholic knows it, based on Catholic evidence, buttressed by Catholic tradition, and guarded by an infallible Catholic teaching body? Or rather has he not looked at it through the Protestant's spectacles of private judgment, as it is presented to him by narrow and partial sects? The fundamental dogmas of religion have been rejected by honest men from Carlyle to the present day, precisely because Protestantism, the only system they know, supplied so poor a basis for them.

It seems to me that this is a question that lies far deeper than the mere dispute as to whether or not Mr. Wells is to be received with sympathy. Mr. W. H. Mallock, in "Is Life Worth Living?" clearly pointed out that to modern non-Catholics, Christianity is hardly known at all, except as it is known in the distorted form of Protestantism, with its insecure basis of sentiment and misrepresentation. If this is the case, should we not always bear in mind in dealing with attacks on religion, that they are very frequently not really attacks on religion itself, but on religion precisely as Protestantism has misunderstood and distorted it.

Woodstock, Md. J. WILFRID PARSONS, S.J.

Sociologists

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recent publications on the economic history of this country tell us in warning tones that New England is retrograding; that in the number of students pursuing higher studies in colleges and universities, in the number of students in elementary schools per 1,000 population, in the number of homes owned, in the amount of money per capita in savings banks, and in such other evidences of substantial progress, New England is on the down grade.

Reading the melancholy outbreak of Mr. Joseph Matthew Sullivan in your issue of September 15, makes it easier to believe what the political economists are teaching today. Mr. Sullivan tells us gravely that we have too much social work now. Indeed! Is it not strange that many of the Bishops of the United States think we have too little? Many of the best Catholic colleges and universities of the country are establishing chairs of sociology in order to meet the demand for trained Catholic social workers. He tells us that social workers are largely recruited from the class of "idle, well-to-do people." Does Mr. Sullivan mean to tell us that the members of the St. Vincent de Paul Society are "idle, well-to-do persons of feminine instincts," as he puts it? Does he put the social welfare work of the Knights of Columbus, or the Central Verein in this category? If Mr. Sullivan had attended the recent National Conference on Social Work, at Pittsburgh, last June, when more than 4,000 delegates were present, his ideas would have been subjected to much masculine revision.

Mr. Sullivan informs us that social workers are "dreamers of utopian schemes for the betterment of humanity." Does he thus style the work carried on by St. Mary's Catholic Women's Association, in Cambridge, for instance, whose work is described in a recent Boston Pilot? Mr. Sullivan startles us with the illuminating fact that social workers "have never produced anything but dreams and high-flown speeches." The old medieval maxim "Distingue frequenter" would have served Mr. Sullivan in good stead here, for he certainly is unable to sustain his position when he calls to mind the many conferences of Catholic charities scattered over the broad face of the country, whose social activities extend into almost every conceivable branch of social welfare. Does Mr. Sullivan insinuate that the social work carried on by the Sodality Unions all over the United States only prove what he calls "the uselessness of our expenditures in this direction?"

If Mr. Sullivan's tirade against social workers, whom he inconsistently acknowledges to have "high ideals" is any standard of the "latest New England thought" on the subject of social welfare, we can understand the unenviable position of New England in a comparison with the rest of the country when telltale statistics are invoked. Mr. Sullivan's attitude on the question of social work may be the attitude of all New England; we seriously doubt it; but if it is, and Bostonians prefer what Mr. Sullivan calls their "good, old common-sense methods of conducting business," we have only to remark that progress has moved westward, leaving Boston in the rear.

Pittsburgh, Pa. THOMAS F. COAKLEY, D.D.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.
Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Catholics and the Tax Rate

AT the opening of the present school year, New York again finds herself in the predicament of the old lady who lived in a shoe. Enrolled in the public schools are nearly 850,000 children. "Enrolled" is a word selected with care. It does not imply that every one of these children is enjoying all the rights usually accruing to a pupil in the public school, for New York has not enough buildings to house them. Hence about 40,000 of these children are "on part time." New York schools are few but costly. They may possibly be our pride, but they are certainly our expense. In the year just closed, they cost a little less than $43,000,000; in the year to come, it is fairly certain that the expense account will be $50,000,000; and should the experts once more betake themselves to their tinkering, no one can calculate the price New York will pay. The idea seems to be, that a city with a debt of $1,300,000,000 need not greatly trouble itself about so small an item as $50,000,000, nor even about building more schoolhouses. After us the deluge, is the cry, or the handing over of the City to the plutocratic and oleaginous Foundations which, to a certain extent, have already supplanted popular government in New York.

Yet, after all, the piper must be paid, and despite the kindly interest of the Foundations in the City of New York, taxes continue to rise. There was never a politician in Denmark or in Manhattan who did not promise to reduce the levy, but that was usually just before election time, when they were striving to be as good as they could be. The only organized body that has yet effected that happy consummation is an institution far removed from politics. It is the Catholic Church, and she does it through her parochial schools.

A lineal descendant of Scheherezade, otherwise known as New York's Commissioner of Accounts, has lately issued some Arabian statements on the amount of money which the City could save by refusing to exempt from taxation certain charitable institutions, parochial schools among them, in New York. As exemplifying what a man can do with pencil, paper, and a set of figures, his remarks are interesting. They are not, however, conclusive. They do not square with the facts. One fact is that there are about 140,000 children in New York's parochial schools. If taxed up to their fastigia, these schools would yield but a few hundred thousand dollars. On the other hand, if by some sudden revulsion, these schools were closed, the tuition for these pupils in the public schools, at the average rate of forty dollars per pupil, would cost the city $6,600,000. Nor does the sum stick at this figure. How much would it cost the City to find sites, have them appraised by disinterested experts, retained jointly by the City and the real estate trust, pay the experts, and then erect buildings to provide for these children from the parochial schools? And in the interval of waiting, not 40,000, but 180,000 children would be "on part time."

What is true of New York is true in its measure, of every city in the United States. Yet there are some persons, strabismic individuals, as Dr. Devine would gravely opine, lacking in social vision, who hold that Catholic activity in education and charity is a clog on the State.

An "Honor-Farm" Alumnus

THIRTEEN years ago, Mr. John Smith met and "held up" a peaceful citizen in the midnight streets of Chicago. As the citizen objected to any separation from his property without due process of law, Mr. Smith was forced to argue his case with the aid of a gun, and when the argument was concluded, the citizen was dead. By some miscarriage of justice, since it was clearly proved that the late citizen had threatened violence in defense of his property, Mr. Smith was transferred to the penitentiary. A few years later, the wave of prison reform washed over his home, and in passing lifted him into comparative freedom, as a member of the "honor farm."

In these benign surroundings, Mr. Smith shortly became a splendid example of what can be done by kindness. Intimate association with the humble potato, long hours spent in commune with the tall upstanding corn of the Illinois prairie, so wrought upon his moral nature, that Mr. Smith was soon made a new man. Kindly hands hastened to inscribe letters to the warden, praying an extension of privileges for the neophyte, and to the Governor, suggesting the inclusion of Mr. Smith's name on the next list of pardons. The warden was amenable to reason, but the Governor tarried. Smitten with an overwhelming desire to revisit the loved scenes of his youth, Mr. Smith at last decided to become his own governor, and wasting no valuable time on farewells addressed to the corn and the potatoes, silent agents of his regeneration, or to his companions on "the honor farm," Mr.

Smith quietly and unobtrusively fared forth into the silent night. Finding himself in need of money, he interrupted his travels at a small hotel, and after murdering the proprietor, set out for Chicago with pockets that jingled. A man of his genius could not long remain idle. In company with five other gentlemen of similar tastes and talents, Mr. Smith sought to reduce the surplus of a Chicago bank. A policeman who interrupted the séance was buried a few days later. But, like a bird newly-freed from a gilded cage, Mr. Smith made an awkward "getaway"; and, in fact, now languishes in a Chicago jail.

One swallow does not make a summer, nor does a single lapse from virtue prove that the energies so zealously put forth by prison welfare leagues are foredoomed to failure. No less an authority than St. Paul bids us treat the prisoner as we would wish to be treated were we ourselves in bonds; and anything that reasonably promises to increase the world's replenished store of charity deserves at least the poor boon of a fair trial. What is to be regretted is that prison reform, like many another worthy movement, today seems to be directed not by sober judgment but by sentimentality. And that way lies madness.

Baiting the Law

THE critic who said that the chief duty of every good lawyer was to teach his client how the law might be safely violated, was guilty of an exaggeration. But he had one element of truth on which to base his suggestion. Yet the fault is not all on one side. Popular opinion seems to have reached the stage in which a prohibitory or a mandatory law is accepted as a kind of challenge, for the ambitious individual to match his wits against the State's.

At a "Safety First" convention held in Syracuse last December, Mr. James M. Lynch, of the State Industrial Commission, was moved to observe that many excellent regulations made to protect workers in mines and factories are observed only so long as an authorized official is present to enforce them. As a result, "the real enforcement of the law will depend on the number of our inspectors."

> In Germany and in England . . . there is a general understanding that laws are made to be lived up to. We haven't got to that yet. The general understanding among us is that if you are not caught, then the laws were not made to be observed. If you are caught, then it is "up to you" to get out of the law the best way you can.

What Commissioner Lynch says of these special labor laws, is perhaps even more directly applicable to a large body of legislation affecting local trade and commerce. Our State legislatures may be rightly credited with some share in popularizing the idea, that the law is made to be observed only by those citizens who are too dull to evade it; for in most communities there is more than one statute for which, apart from its origin, it is difficult to feel any great degree of reverence. "When in doubt," was the advice once given to Kansas legislators, "pass a law against cigarettes." The advice has been followed in many localities. Perhaps that is why, in the words of an English philosopher, today we have many laws, "crank laws," but very little law, and less order.

Two "Credos."

A WRITER in one of our popular magazines, assuming for the moment, the character and tone of a lay preacher, formulates a religious creed and advises American fathers to teach it to their children. It is as follows:

> I believe in work and the joy of work. I believe in the service and the joy of service. I believe in the care of the body, abstemiousness, exercise, for without health I can do nothing. I believe in the power of the will and its growth by training, in the power of self-control and its growth by training, in the power of love and its growth by training; not love for personal salvation, but love for humanity that must abolish poverty and war. I believe in universal education and equal opportunity for men and women alike. I believe in the Christ spirit, I bow before the Supreme Creator and draw comfort and strength from the ocean of soul-force that surrounds us.

It cannot be said that this new creed imposes any very heavy dogmatic or moral burdens upon its adherents. Commonplace in its principles and indefinite in expression, it has the power neither to satisfy the mind nor control the heart. It is of the earth, earthy. It explains nothing. It leads nowhere. Materialistic views of life tinge its articles. Earthly horizons bound and narrow its outlook. It satisfies none of the deeper and nobler yearnings and wants of our nature. Natural activities, humanitarian concepts of life are the highest levels to which it ascends. The true concept of God, of immortality, of personal responsibility and of sanction for the deeds done in the flesh is ignored. Belief in the "Christ spirit" has a pietistic ring that may deceive some, but it is vague, meaningless. It might be the creed of a Unitarian or a Buddhist. If the adherent of this new creed bows before the Supreme Creator, he seems to turn to other sources for comfort and strength and expects "the ocean of soul-force" around us to do that which the Creator alone is able to perform. It is the creed of the natural man, without stable foundation, without horizon, without a look to those higher regions and those nobler realms for which man was created. It is an unphilosophical creed, setting love of humanity above the love of personal salvation. It is an unwise and imprudent one, for it neglects the noblest ends and the highest responsibilities.

How different it is from the "Credo" which for so many centuries has been repeated on the lips of believers and acted in their lives. How inferior the commonplaces, the naturalistic dogmas of this modern "Credo," to the solemn, yet simple and illuminating words of the Catholic "Credo," "I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Creator of Heaven and Earth." How superior the profession of Faith of the Catholic father teaching his child the story of the life, the death, the resurrection, and the dogma of the Divinity, of Christ, to that vapid profession of the modern father in "the Christ spirit" he would try to inculcate upon his child. Belief in self-control, in the growth of the will is far easier than belief in the mysteries of the resurrection of the dead, the forgiveness of sins. But it cannot do what belief in these solemn dogmas can accomplish for the soul—tame its lawless passions and desires, and lift the eyes of the child beyond the dark and gloomy horizons to which the modern "Credo" would limit him. This modern "Credo" does not satisfy. It looks down. There is no buoyancy in it. It is dull, flat and unprofitable. It shifts the center of gravity of human life. According to this modern "Credo," man and man's faculties and man's activities are for man himself personally or for men in the aggregate. The old "Credo," which the modern substitute and counterfeit would oust from the heart of the father and the child alike, teaches with Divine authority that man and his faculties and his activities are for God. That creed is the only one worthy of man and humanity, the only one which can make the individual and the race truly great and happy.

What Is a Baby Worth?

A LEARNED professor recently set the worth of a new-born baby at the exact sum total of sixty-nine dollars and forty-three cents: a bargain-counter value, which, as the editor of the Trained Nurse remarks, is an insult to every baby. We have been styled a "dollar nation" and the sordid calculation of the child's value would go far to confirm the impression. Literature, education, and even the personal worth of men and woman are most frequently rated at a mere money value. Why then should we not apply the same standard to babies?

For those who have cast aside revealed truth the value of a child is a matter of sentiment only, with perhaps the expectation of a future financial return. From a national point of view the worth of a child, aside from its possible civic or military value, is rated by the surplus of what it may be able to produce for the country after deducting the cost of its rearing and schooling. Should it die before reaching maturity it would be a mere financial loss. An average value only can therefore be assigned to a baby, and hence the various estimates down to the ridiculous sum here quoted.

Need we marvel, then, that child life is rated so cheap? In the eyes of a pagan society it is the least desirable of all commodities. As supply and demand affect the market, so the pressure of a great war may give it, for the moment, an enhanced value; but experience has shown that even patriotism itself cannot prevent the crying evils of birth-control and race-suicide. Why should woman before all others, the unchristian mother indignantly demands to know, be called upon to bear the burden of the nation?

But turning now to the Gospel teaching, what, in truth, is a baby's worth? What, to be more definite, is the worth of the child laid anew, fresh from the baptismal font, into its happy mother's arms? More, we answer, than all the wealth contained in the treasure stores of the earth. Its value is not to be measured in terms of sentiment or dollars, but by the price of the Blood of the Lamb that was slain, by the greatness of its spiritual sonship as a child of God, by the glory of the imperishable inheritance laid up for it with Christ in the Kingdom of the Father. That is a baby's worth in the eyes of the Catholic mother.

Confession's Social Value.

IF the whole world were suddenly to become Catholic and all men guilty of mortal sin were to go at once to confession, and continued thereafter to do so whenever they were unfortunate enough to offend God seriously, how widespread and permanent would be the moral regeneration of the human race. Evil inclinations would be weakened, bad habits would be broken, and good resolutions would be carried out with singular success. Strengthened in will by the worthy reception of the Sacrament of Penance, and guided by the confessor's prudent counsel, most penitents would shun, as a rule, the occasions of sin and would walk the narrow way with joyful steadfastness. The advantages to the State of the general practice of confession would be quite incalculable. Drunkenness with its train of evils would all but disappear, political corruption and commercial dishonesty would no longer be the dreary commonplaces they are, continency would be the fragrant virtue of young and old, justice and equity would rule the relations of capital and labor, and wars would be of rare occurrence and of short duration.

Those who doubt that such a wonderful moral revolution could take place simply through the universal use of Confession, need only be reminded that Our Divine Lord instituted the Sacrament of Penance on purpose to restore the fallen to His grace. It was the Risen Saviour's Paschal greeting to the world. For, as St. John the Evangelist tells us, when the fear-stricken, wavering Apostles were gathered together the first Easter night, the consoling Christ suddenly stood among them and said: "Peace be to you. As the Father hath sent me, I also send you . . . . Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose sins you shall forgive they are forgiven them, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained." He thus instituted a Sacrament that was meant to be as a "second plank after shipwreck," one of the most civilizing, salutary and uplifting institutions the world contains.

Literature

THE DRAMA OF THE DRAMATIST

THERE is a great and lonely name which, passing from among us, has left a heritage not only of poetry but of paradox. There have been successful collaborations before in almost every field of literature, though in that of metrical drama they have been rare, but no collaborations in which the identity of the artists was so completely and so humbly sunk as in the case of the two ladies who for so many years and with such royal prodigality and courage were hidden under the name of "Michael Field."

Here were souls who by circumstance and choice were decadents of the decadents, and yet who, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge, had never committed in all their lives a really serious sin; dramatists who enacted a drama richer and more powerful than any that they had ever made; poets who, after having been content to write poetry, learned at the last how to live it. And yet they brought with them into the Church not a little of their old pagan loyalties, rounded and purified by their new love, "Something changed . . . . as when the sky first kindled into stars." Beauty was the abiding thing, whether they served it as priestesses, or, knowing their vocation, made it serve their God.

There were many lures and signposts upon the pilgrim way. The death of a brother and uncle, then—a curious token!—a dog who saved their sanity and had his tribute, and at last the discovery in the ecclesiastical liturgy of that thread of sacrifice which binds together paganism and the Faith, and pain which unexplained by Greece was revealed by Calvary, marked their passage.

To "The Lone Shepherd" is given their song, but the verse written upon the road holds only their renunciation:

I love but Love, yet must I change my god . . .
Thus it must be—is it not ever thus?
Where the Madonna spreads her shining Child
We are not blest, there is no joy in us:
But we are broken, but we are renewed
When, lone as that first Shepherd of the wild,
The God spreads out His arms on Holy Rood.

Not easy was the way to such feet, and not attained except by a strange humility and a stranger pride. With their own Lethington of "The Tragic Mary" they could say, though the text takes on a deeper meaning, "I must love my God humanly, not with stiff constancy, but with every mood I have."

During 1912 Edith Cooper learned that she had a cancer in her breast. In order to miss no step of her Via Crucis she refused morphia; love must be heroic. In her illness Katherine Harris Bradley (they were "Henry" and "Michael" to each other) nursed her with a complete devotion. But before death came to Henry, Michael discovered a worse cancer in her own breast. She kept it as a secret and a sanctifier. To her spiritual director she said, "Father, I forbid you to tell any one of it until I am dead. Only you and the doctor must know." And Henry died, actually never having suspected that the nurse had been in even greater agony than her patient. But on that day God revealed Michael's to the world by means of a hemorrhage which could not be hid.

Lonely and crippled by pain as she was, her courage never faltered. She too refused injections, accepting every stroke meekly and gladly. She and her niece had both been members of the Third Order of St. Dominic, and in allusion to the ritual of profession the following poem was written. But how many who read it guessed what constituted "Katherine Bradley's" bundle of myrrh? Reticence made drama more poignant:

It is said of her:
"The Cross shall be on her breast as a bundle of myrrh."
I have loved odors well,
Loved frankincense and hydromel:
The Angels know I have been very far
After where wild roses are;
And celled morsels of ambergris
Have risen up to my heart as peace.

Will the Cross confer
One day with my breast as a bundle of myrrh?
This would be, if I would let,
Rather as an English violet,
That would make all my bosom's room
A very murmur of perfume—
This would be, if I would suffer it.

To the day of her death she would never miss daily Mass and Holy Communion. Living in a cottage in the grounds of Hawksyard, she did not suffer her Lord to visit her but was carried in her bath-chair each morning at seven o'clock to the Priory church. But one morning—it was during September, 1914—she arose before six and asked to be dressed at once that she might be ready for her journey. She was about to be lifted into her chair when she fell upon the floor dead. When the priest came and saw her lying with her head in the lap of the sister, he remembered the great pietà of Francia, reproduced before him in the living and the dead.

She had always dreaded having to die in bed surrounded by a crowd and she died upon the naked floor. In this, and in the facts of her so-long-concealed cancer and her burial upon St. Michael's day, God showed His exquisite courtesy to one who had always given Him a love which knew no limits in its generosity.

"Michael Field" always had a certain and secure literary reputation, but yet the work issued under that name never circulated very widely or gained the reputation it deserved. In part this was due to the way most of the books were issued. As I turn over the superbly printed volumes which lie before me, I can understand that apart from the price, which was prohibitive to most people, the classic dead who lived again in their pages would be only sere leaves stirred by the wind to the average reader even of good verse. The dramas were not written for the stage, and though powerful and shot with beauty, make hard reading. Fine as were many of the Sapphic translations, and the lyrics pagan and Christian, the best things that came from the pen of "Michael Field" were the dramas. The slow movement, the solemn pageantry of the sonnet or the almost rarer dignity of blank verse, was aptest to the genius of these two ladies.

Pagans they had been, knowing, unlike many of their decadent contemporaries, their philosophy well from the beginning to the end:

"Silenus drew me to an oak-tree root
He taught me in a language like a song."

And though later they knew "the right, true way of singing with reserve," they did not altogether scorn the oaten flute or the once-loved reeds. With diffidence were the last three volumes of plays containing "The Accuser," "Tristan de Léonois," "A Messiah," "Borgia," "The Tragedy of Pardon" and "Dian" sent to the press. Not with the old pomp, but in plain paper covers and with no name were these volumes published. A preface is given which while intended as a shield is full of symbol to those who have its clue: "The author of these books of drama is dead. He had been slowly dying for some years: then, of a sudden, he started on a journey of desire to Rome, that he might reach it before he died. Soon after his arrival death came; and he is buried in an uninscribed grave under Roman cypresses."

So the drama ends, with a darkened stage and whispers more tense and terrible than swords. The splendor of their passion was changed into the meekness of their pain, to the contemplation of the Divine face, and the soft rustling of the wings of peace.

THEODORE MAYNARD.

COMPENSATION

A suppliant came to Heaven's portal,
  A stumbling wight in somber gown,
His was no halo'd brow, poor mortal,
  He bore no palm, no laurel crown.

The gate, a single pearl, swung slowly;
  The stranger lifted frighted eyes,
How venture he among the holy,
  Rapt citizens of Paradise?

But who are these that throng for meeting,
  With songs, in dazzling vesture clad?
What deed of his has won such greeting?
  "We are the joys you never had.

"We are the love, the wealth, the pleasure,
  The honors missed, the hopes foregone;
Through us you mount unto your treasure,
  The Face of God, with veils withdrawn."

BLANCHE M. KELLY.

REVIEWS

Old English Scholarship in England from 1566–1800. By ELEANOR N. ADAMS, Ph.D., Professor of English in Oxford College. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.00.

This historical study, prepared as a doctoral dissertation at Yale, discusses chronologically the chief contributions to Old English scholarship from the publication of the first Old English book in 1566 to the establishment of the first professorship of the language at Oxford in 1795. "There is no reliable evidence," the author declares, "of an attempt to study Old English before the middle of the sixteenth century." The first impulse to cultivate that field she traces to the endeavors of Archbishop Parker and other reformers, during the last third of the sixteenth century, to find, in the liturgy and sermons of the "primitive church" and in the laws of their Anglo-Saxon forbears, precedents for their doctrinal innovations. Yet Parker himself asserts that the language had been taught in certain abbeys, especially at Tavistock in Devonshire, and a solid tradition, persisting through the eighteenth century, recalled an Old English grammar printed there before the Reformation. Lacking full proof, the point is now conjectural; but to one familiar with Dom Gasquet's researches on the fury and extent of the vandalism perpetrated on the monastic libraries at the dissolution under Henry VIII, it is not unlikely that abundant evidence had existed and that Parker knew full well whereof he spoke. Even the apostate Carmelite, John Bale, could dolorously lament the devastation of the "Abbeyes and Fryeryes, when the most worthy monumentes of this realme so myserably peryshed in the spoyle."

With keen insight and breadth of view, Dr. Adams points out that the Old English scholarship of the reformers was uncritical, controversial and non-academic. Their spirit of parti pris finds illustration in Parker's unblushing practice of garbling original texts to suit his polemical needs. As Strype put it: "He kept such in his Family, as could imitate any of the old Characters admirably well. One of these was Lyly, that could counterfeit any antique Writing. Him the Archbishop customarily used to make old Books Compleat."

The appeal of Dr. Adams' book is, of course, to a narrow range of specialists; its interest is hardly more than antiquarian, and she frankly confesses that, in linguistic value, the works of the period are practically worthless to the modern student; but of her own industry and careful scholarship, every page yields proof. In an appendix is collected some quaintly diverting correspondence of early English scholars, with their naïve apologiae for their slowly progressing cause. Typical of the scope and minuteness of the study is another appendix on the use of Anglo-Saxon types. The book may claim one distinction, paradoxically rare enough in kindred publications now issuing from the American collegiate press, in that it contains but few typographical errors in its Latin titles and citations.

G. H. D.

Plays of Gods and Men: "The Tents of the Arabs," "The Laughter of the Gods," "The Queen's Enemies," "A Night at an Inn." By LORD DUNSANY. Boston: John W. Luce & Co.

Five Plays: "The Country Dressmaker," "The Moonlighter," "The Pie Dish," "The Magic Glass," "The Dandy Dolls." By GEORGE FITZMAURICE. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.25.

Plays by Jacinto Benevento: "His Widow's Husband," "La Malqueaida," "The Evil Doers of Good," "The Bonds of Interest." Translated by JOHN GARRETT UNDERHILL. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

The four plays by Lord Dunsany have more of gods than of men about them; they are weirdly strange and suggestive of the mystery world. Short crisp sentences lead you into a world of dark and suspicious happenings. The tragic end of "The Queen's Enemies" is portrayed without a flourish and leaves one gasping at the mysterious deed. "A Night at an Inn" is perhaps the best play of this group. Simply, yet splendidly constructed, it leaps to its terrible heights with lightning-like rapidity and the curtain drops swiftly over a stirring but fearful one-act tragedy. The lack of what we may call the human element in most of this group of plays is no doubt a defect. Too much of the gods and the mysterious and too little of the man may be fascinating but do not grip the heart.

Matchmaking, moonlighting and superstition figure largely in the plays of George Fitzmaurice. There is nothing very complimentary to the class of Irish people these sketches are supposed to portray. One Irishman is willing that his soul go down to the depths of hell, if he can only get revenge on his enemy; while a young lad leaving his home in anger, gives a curse as his farewell to his old father. Strange Irishmen these. Despite this, there are wit at times, and quiet, natural humor in the plays and parts of them make enjoyable reading for anyone who understands the Irish character.

The molds into which Jacinto Benevento has cast his plays, could they be considered apart from the matter they contain, would certainly entitle the author to no little praise as a dramatist. Vivid word-paintings on almost every page spring from an imagination more than mediocre. The emotion is at times pitched in a high key and its expressions in places shows unmistakable power. The material, however, of at least three of the plays is not worthy of the form. "His Widow's Husband" hinges about the embarassment which follows the discovery of an unlawful intimacy of a wife with her husband's friend. "The Evil Doers of Good" is an indecent satire on the modern moral-uplift movement, directed against the would-be reforms. "La Malqueaida" is a morbid tragedy, which turns upon the love of a stepfather for his daughter. "The Bonds of Interest" is an exception to the low standard of the other plays. It deals with impossible situations but is ingenious and interesting. Closing, one cannot help asking: Why did Benevento stoop so low with all the wealth of beauty around him?

J. S. H.

Histoire de la Mission du Kiang-Nan (1840-1878). Par J. DE LA SERVIÈRE, S. J. 2 Vols. Imprimerie de L'Orphelinat de Tóu-sè-wè, Zi-ka-wei, près Chang-Hai. 15 fr.

This is the history of a great mission, including two of the eighteen provinces in China, Kiang-nan and Ngan-hoei. After evangelization in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries by Jesuit Fathers of the Vice-Province of China and of the French

Mission of Peking, these provinces were left in a state of abandonment, following the suppression of the Society of Jesus. In 1840, after repeated requests from the native priests and Christians the Propaganda recalled the brethren of Father Ricci, and assigned them as assistants to the governing Bishops of Nan-king. After a lapse of thirty years the bishopric of Nan-king was suppressed and a vicariate apostolic with the Society of Jesus in charge was established in its place. The present work is an account of the labor, sufferings and success of these missionaries. Because of its vast extent and the number of large cities it embraces, such as Chang-hai, Sou-tcheou, Nan-king and Ngan-king, in which European nations have such important interests, and again on account of its geographic situation, at the mouth of the Yang-tse kiang, the mission has always been more or less closely connected with French enterprise in the Far East, and its history has kept apace with French activity in China. The author has thrown considerable light upon hitherto unknown details of such historical questions as the opium war, the insurrection of the T'ai Ping, the Anglo-French expeditions of 1858 and 1860 and the disputes between the United States and European Powers for the control of the valley of the Yang-tse. As the present war has left these Chinese missions in a state of great indigence, they are worthy objects of the American Catholic's generosity. L. J. G.

Vocal Art-Science and Its Application. By FRANK E. MILLER, A.M., M.D. New York: G. Schirmer.

Doctor F. E. Miller's long experience as a throat specialist and trained singer has borne no small fruit in having given to the musical public this latest work of his. The book contains a thorough analysis of the human body as it functions in the production of vocal utterance; and, whether all of the author's theories and discoveries are scientifically correct or not, the substance is so illuminating that physicians, vocal teachers, singers and speakers alike will find it serviceable. Everyone who undertakes the responsibilities of training voices, every singer and speaker should share in Dr. Miller's keen intelligence regarding breath-control, avoidance of muscular interference with the vocal organs, and surgical operations on parts which affect tone-quality. He justly deprecates the dearth of trustworthy vocal teachers, and his publication of "Vocal Art-Science" is a commendable effort to promote efficiency in the profession where failure to produce more than commonplace singers seems to be the rule.

It is a novel idea to illustrate in detail, according to the laws of physics, every action of the organs and every function of the parts of the body which produce and influence voice. Dr. Miller seems to have succeeded admirably, and has established scientific principles upon which he bases a series of exercises. The chapter entitled "The Evolution of Voice" should have been omitted as being unscientific and apparently irrelevant to the subject. Evolution of species from protoplasm to amoeba, salamander, frog, reptile, bird and man is pure hypothesis. Proof of such evolution cannot be adduced from any source. The book would have been improved by sacrificing considerable unnecessary technical explanation and giving more space to practical instruction. E. S.

Conditions of Labor in American Industries. By W. JETT LAUCK and EDWARD SYDENSTRICKER. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co. $1.75.

Selected Readings in Economics. By CHARLES J. BULLOCK; Sociology and Social Progress. A Handbook for Students of Sociology. By T. N. CARVER, Ph.D. Boston: Ginn & Co.

Except the Department of Labor, perhaps no single agency is capable of preparing anything like an exhaustive account of American industrial conditions. Since the Department is not, apparently, inclined to undertake that huge task, the next best thing is a volume such as Lauck and Sydenstricker, formerly cooperating with the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations, have prepared. Statistics are tabulated and discussed, admirably, for the most part, on such important subjects as wages, irregular employment, working conditions, family budgets, health, and minimum standards of living. The conclusion reached by the authors is that the increased cost of living has destroyed "in large measure the advantages gained by wage increases, and by sacrifices made by the wives and children of workingmen in entering industrial employment." Indispensable as a reference-book, the arrangement of the statistics in many instances is unsatisfactory. Wages and food prices are practically useless unless the chronological period to which they apply is known. A number of items, such as those on pages 53-57, 82, 83, to quote but a few examples, will only puzzle the student unless he knows from some other source the year to which they refer. The omitted dates should be supplied in a second edition.

The second and third volumes noted above are new editions of compilations arranged some ten years ago by two Harvard professors, for use in the classroom, and are intended to furnish collateral reading and subjects for open discussion. Dr. Carver supplies an introduction, but otherwise no comment is offered. No space was found in either volume for the presentation of any distinctively Catholic point of view. Dr. Bullock has been particularly happy in his choice of readings: his quotations from Spencer Walpole on "Great Inventions," and from the Tenth Census on "The Growth of the Factory System in the United States," have all the interest of romance, and are well calculated to stimulate the interest of the student in the human and historical elements of economics. P. L. B.

The Labor Movement. By H. F. WARD. New York: Sturgis and Walton. $1.25.

Unemployment. Selected Articles Compiled by JULIA E. JOHNSEN. New York: H. W. Wilson Co. $1.25.

In this reprint of his 1915 Ford Hall Lectures, the Professor of Social Service in the Boston University School of Theology undertakes to discuss, among other subjects, Socialism, syndicalism, the worker's demand for leisure and a decent income, and the relations of democracy with industrialism. The professor's heart is in the right place; as to his head, one may doubt. He finds some difficulty in restraining his admiration for Socialism and for the unspeakable I. W. W. Socialism, he holds, is not opposed to religion or to the family; in fact, "it makes for the perfection and freedom of the family," while "the cooperative commonwealth" urged by some Socialists, "is identical with the Kingdom of God which Jesus taught." The I. W. W., he thinks, has labored strenuously and not without fruit "in behalf of the folks at the bottom" and "is performing a service to society that needs to be done." The pretensions of certain I. W. W. leaders are one thing, the facts another; and the facts indicate that the course of the I. W. W. has been marked by stupidity, selfishness and violence, rather than by any love for society or for the worker. Dr. Ward's words were written in 1915; no doubt, recent events have led him to change, or at least to modify his earlier opinion. The Government, at any rate, holds another view, and even two years ago, it should not have been extremely difficult to forecast the final outcome of the I. W. W. The chief fault of Dr. Ward's book is the apparently low value set upon religion, "pure and undefiled," in the heart of worker and capitalist alike, as a factor of social regeneration.

Miss Johnsen's book is one of the useful "Debaters' Handbook Series." The brief submitted gives a fairly comprehensive view of the case, the articles are well selected, and the bibliography indicates sources which may profitably be consulted by those who wish to make a deeper study of unemployment.

P. L. B.

Personality in German Literature before Luther. By KUNO FRANKE, Ph.D., LL.D., Litt.D., Professor of the History of German Culture and Curator of the Germanic Museum, Harvard University. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

"Before Luther": so runs the title, the implication being that Luther is a memorable landmark in the development of whatever "personality" may mean. The assumption underlying these lectures is that the mission of the German genius has been the "emancipation" of the human mind. By "personality," in its earlier manifestations, the author understands individualism, the "deepening of the inner life," the "democratization of feeling, the rising tide of citizen independence, the imbuing of the masses with the instinct of self-assertion which made Luther's work possible."

Before Luther, Dr. Franke of course admits, "personality" had not assumed the proportions later developed under Rousseau and Nietzsche: "It was left for the eighteenth century to produce a consistent individualistic philosophy: to think of the individual as an independent, autonomous being; to derive the origin of State, Church and society from the conscious will of these independent individuals." In other words, the development of "personality" represents the principle of private judgment, applied to every phase of thought and eventually pushed jusqu'au bout.

For tokens of individualism and growing self-assertion, he reviews minnesong and courtly epic, mysticism in the fourteenth century, folksong and satire, religious drama, Dürer's artistic work and the humanists, Erasmus and Van Hutten. Practically the only cogent evidence, beyond the humanists, that he succeeds in producing, of "personality" developing in Luther's direction, are such reflections as this literature affords of progressive moral degeneracy and social disintegration away from the "collective consciousness" and the ideals of social cooperation prevalent in the Ages of Faith: sporadic attacks on the Church, like Walther von der Vogelweide's unfair treatment of the Pope, the growing scurrility of popular satire, the secularization of the religious drama and such debasement of chivalric ideals as Gottfried von Strassburg's "Tristan," that shameless apotheosis of sensual love that defies moral law and tramples under foot the most sacred obligations. It was the corruption of such individualistic self-assertion alone that "made Luther's work possible."

Dr. Franke, until recently professor of the History of German Culture at Harvard, appears to write with a double purpose, literary and political. "Personality and nationality," he says, "are closely inter-related terms"; "personality" seems to be the key-note to German character in the individual and to German nationality, German culture and civilization, and to Germany's rôle and function in the modern world. "In the sixteenth century," he writes, "Germany gave to the world the principle of religious freedom"; later came a "precious spiritual message" when "Kant exalted the moral law as the only true revelation of the Divine" and "Goethe found the salvation of man in the restless striving for culture"; in the nineteenth century, the best Germans have been inspired by "a new and exalted conception of the State, a State uniting in itself all spiritual and moral aspirations of the people, stimulating every kind of public and private activity, subordinating all individual comfort to the one great aim of national achievements," making "Germany, of all nations, a leader in everything that makes for good government."

But as a matter of cold fact, what do "personality," private judgment and the evolution of German thought since Luther reveal? Mark the progressive steps in the "emancipation" of the German mind: by Luther, from the authority of the Church established by Jesus Christ, substituting his personal interpretation of a Book; by Kant, from all reliance on human reason for the attainment of absolute, objective truth; by Goethe, from the Christian tradition of culture, exalting pure paganism in its stead; by the higher critics, from all reverence for Luther's Bible as a Divinely inspired book, leaving it a mangled mass of myths and ethical aspirations; by the German jurists, from all dependence, in politics and international relations, on the natural and Divine law; and this march of "personality" self-assertion, Kultur and enlightenment has logically led Nietzsche in our own day to emancipate the world from all moral standards and restraints whatsoever and proclaim the new morality of the "beautiful blond beast," the Superman, and the reign of undiluted individualism and brute force. G. H. D.

The Mexican Problem. By C. W. BARRON, Boston. Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.00.

Civilized Commercialism. By ERNEST G. STEVENS. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.25.

After some time spent in Mexican oil-fields, Mr. Barron put down his views on the Mexican problem in a series of papers which are now in book form. They deal with the political and business position of Mexico. In one very pithy sentence he gives the present state of the peace achievement of Carranza: "Seventeen million people on the richest mineral territory of the world that can grow anything, and produce food in abundance every month of the year, use cartridges for currency." The author maintains that the need of Mexico is a strong helping hand, for he finds the Mexican character childlike and dependent, whether at play or in the throes of revolution. The fighting that has been going on south of the Rio Grande, the author asserts, is not with or concerning American or foreign interests, but a struggle between factions and leading families. Two very common theories that are held to be at the bottom of Mexico's trouble, Mr. Barron disclaims and rejects; namely, that the natural wealth of Mexico has furnished a base for contending business interests from the United States to promote Mexican quarrels, and that the land question is the root of discontent. As the Mexican nation was saved from the foreign invader a half-century ago, so must she be saved today from the destroyer within her boundary lines. This, in the author's opinion, is the task of the United States.

Mr. Ernest G. Stevens in "Civilized Commercialism" attacks the principles of business, especially of "big business," for they are at variance with the principles of democracy. Democratic principles must drive privilege out of our business world or business privilege will drive democracy out of our national life. The author endeavors to apply democracy to business in the interesting pages of his book. It contains in outline a scheme for doing away with oppression and cutthroat competition in business, and yet allows for the full development and activity of corporations of any size. Instead of the barbarous business warfare of the present Mr. Stevens would substitute commercialism that is civilized. G. C. T.

Rational Sex Ethics. By W. F. ROBIE, M.D. Boston: Richard G. Badger. $3.50.

Dr. Robie writes like a cultured pagan of the decadent period. Striving to place his teaching on a rational basis, he sanctions, although except in extreme cases he does not advise, at least two practices which the generality of mankind consider open and degrading violations of the natural law. No doubt Dr. Robie's intentions are of the best. He is alarmed at the prevalence of vice, and of the diseases which flourish in that rank soil. But his philosophy, as well as his common-sense, is at fault. Vice is not conquered by concessions. On Dr. Robie's admissions, it would be very easy to construct a defense not only of bestiality, but of other perversions now punished by the State as crimes productive of public disorder, and tending to the destruction of the human race. Dr. Robie cannot throw back the floodgates of human passion, and bid the black waters go so far and no farther. He may protest against the resulting ruin; but if a single perversion be allowed, no reason can be brought forward why all other varieties should not be permitted.

At its best, Dr. Robie's philosophy teaches that nothing may be allowed which is hurtful to the community; a position which is not new. Practically, however, his philosophy is that anything may be permitted which makes for the peace, comfort and welfare of the individual, and in all cases the individual must be the final judge of what is best for him. On no other ground can Dr. Robie's concessions, e. g., when he counsels a degrading form of sin on the ground that it is a psychic sedative, be explained. Of no particular importance in itself, Dr. Robie's essay is a melancholy indication that society, or certain sections of it, is rapidly approaching the low level of degradation which glories in iniquity. The sale of the book is wisely restricted to members of the legal and medical profession. P. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The September 22 issue of the Catholic Mind opens with Father Mageean's thoughtful paper on "The Ultimate Aim of Education," namely "the development of full and effective personality or character." Then follows Bishop Dougherty's convincing arguments for "The Child's Christian Training"; then comes an interesting comment on a passage from Thackeray's "The Newcomes," which is a striking tribute to the Church, and the number ends with stirring appeals in behalf of our parochial schools.

"Sonia" (Doran, $1.50), Stephen McKenna's clever novel, should have been called "David," for that marvelous young Irishman is really the dominating figure of the book. His friend George Oakleigh tells how David O'Rane entered an English public school, defied all its traditions and paid the penalty, carried all before him at Oxford, made a fortune in Mexico, lost his eyes in the present war and came home to marry Sonia, a silly unprincipled girl quite unworthy of him. Lord Loring, a Catholic noble, who had scant faith left after leaving Oxford, was also ready to be Sonia's husband, even at the price of apostasy. The book contains a deal of clever epigram and bright chatter, and excellent pictures of public school and university life in England.——"My Wife" (Dutton, $1.50), by Edward Burke, is described by the publishers as "the work of a new humorist who treats the modern conventional family life in a breezy spirit of burlesque." But the book's humor, alas! is British and flat.

May Wedderburn Cannan's poems, "In War Time" (Longmans, $0.90), rarely rise either in conception or in execution above the ordinary. There is nothing better in the volume than these two stanzas entitled "Since They Have Died":

> Since they have died to give us gentleness,
> And hearts kind with contentment and quiet mirth,
> Let us who live give also happiness
> And love, that's born of pity, to the earth.
>
> For, I have thought, some day they may lie sleeping
> Forgetting all the weariness and pain,
> And smile to think their world is in our keeping,
> And laughter come back to the earth again.

"Best Russian Short Stories" (Boni & Liveright, Inc., New York, $0.60) compiled and edited by Thomas Selzer, is a recent number of the attractively bound and printed "Modern Library of the World's Best Books." The nineteen tales by such authors as Pushkin, Gogol, Dostoyovsky, Chekhov, Gorky, Artzybashev, etc., will give the reader a good idea of the modern Russian fictionist's art. There is a gratifying absence of Muscovite animalism from the selections. In the same series is "A Miracle of St. Antony and Five Other Plays," by Maurice Maeterlinck, whom Catholics, of course, may not read. Indeed, a number of the titles in this very "modern library," far from being the world's "best books," are ethically the very worst.——As Mary Webb's recent novel, "Gone to Earth," is merely a sordid tale of lust, adultery and apostasy, many of our readers will doubtless wonder what made so representative a publishing house as E. P. Dutton & Co. bring out the book.

"Boston and Its Story" (City of Boston Printing Department) a little book prepared by Edward H. Hartwell, Edward W. McGlenen and Edward O. Skelton, has for its purpose as the preface explains:

> To furnish a clue to the history of Boston as an individual community that, owing to the force of circumstances and the spirit of its people, has played a conspicuous and influential part in the larger development of Massachusetts, of New England and of the nation; and to indicate the nature of events that gave historical significance to memorable sites and objects that have survived the ravages of time and still excite interest and veneration. So it is not a history that we present to our readers, but rather a relation or narrative concerning the development of a "poor country village" into a great city of vast and varied interests and of commanding rank.

The book gives with considerable fulness the story of Boston's chief historical features, the account of "Boston's Fields and Commons" being especially interesting. Evidence of original research among the archives of the State and city increases the value of the book.

Mr. Thomas Walsh prefaces his selections from the "Poems of Charles Warren Stoddard" (Lane, $1.25) with the following sonnet to "The Poet of the South Seas, 1843-1909":

> Thine exile ended,—O beloved seer,—
> Thou turnest homeward to thine isles of light;
> Thy reefs of silver, and palmetto height!
> Yea, down the vales sonorous thou wouldst hear
> Again the cataracts that white and clear
> Called from young days—oh, with what loving might!—
> That from our arms and this embattled night
> Thou break'st away and leav'st us sobbing here.
>
> Vain the laudation!—what are crowns and praise
> To thee whom Youth anointed on the eyes?
> We have but known the lesser heart of thee
> Whose spirit bloomed in lilies down the ways
> Of Padua; whose voice perpetual sighs
> On Molokai in tides of melody.

"The City Worker's World in America" (Macmillan, $1.25), and "Women as Munition Makers" (Russell Sage Foundation, $0.75), are recent books that will be of interest to the student of sociology. In the first Mrs. Mary Kingsbury Simkhovitch, the directress of Greenwich House, considers from the uplifter's point of view, the housing, education, health, work, politics, etc., of "the industrial family." She seems to think that birth-control and feminism will do much to improve their condition. In her chapter on religion, which she defines as "the capacity to face life triumphantly," whatever that may mean, the author attests that Catholicism "retains its hold" on the people "far better than Judaism or Protestantism. It is better equipped to meet modern conditions, for it has within it the very elements that are strongest in our social structure. Efficiency in organization is its outward aspect, and a powerful corporate life is its very essence." The other book records the investigations which Amy Hewes made in Bridgeport and which Henriette R. Walter made in England and France, among women munition workers. Particularly interesting is the account of the effects of the war boom on Bridgeport. The city's population increased thirty-seven per cent in six years.

The third edition of a volume of St. Bernard's letters, translated into French, has just appeared from the Paris press of Pierre Téqui. The editor of this volume, Pêre Melot, O. P., has made a good selection of the Saint's virile letters for readers who are not in religious communities. From the same publisher come these two French books, "Retraites de Communion Solennelle," by Canon Vaudon, and "Les Sources d'eau vive," by Canon Poulin. A great, intense fervor from the heart of pitiable France of today breathes out from the eloquence of these two preachers. The prayers which Canon Vaudon puts at the end of his retreat cry out against the infidelities that have marked the people in recent years. Here is one: "Pardon, O my Jesus, the sins of France which have made her wretched, those sins of which Joan of Arc, our great French woman, the Saint of our country, used to say: They keep victory back; they lose battles." The Maid of Orleans should also be asked to protect French orphans from those who would rob them of their faith.

The devotion of Tolstoi worshiper's will be wonderfully stimulated, no doubt, by the recent publication of "The Journal of Leo Tolstoi (First Volume 1895-1899)" (Knopf, $2.00) which Rose Strunsky has translated from the Russian. Every word the novelist set down in his journal during four years, together with V. G. Chertkov's voluminous "notes on the text," have here been Englished so that his admirers can read, for example, how Tolstoi recorded on February 22, 1896 that: "It is now 2 o'clock. I am going to dinner," or how he "rode horseback to Tula" on November 6, of the same year. The author's heterodox, revolutionary and contradictory opinions, many of which are elaborated in his works, are of course to be found in the volume.——"The Shield" (Knopf, $1.25), a translation of a larger work in Russian, is a plea for the complete emancipation of the Jew in Russia from his present position of ostracism. The Jewish race has been persecuted in many lands, but nowhere and for so long a period as in Russia. As an appeal for the religious, social and political liberty of the Jew, this volume is well timed now that the revolution is going on in Russia.

Father Edward F. Garesché, S.J., publishes in the September Queen's Work, a sounding ode on "Niagara," the concluding stanzas of which are these:

Oh Christlike glory of the praying water
That leaps forever to its mystic death!
And from the anguish of that sobbing slaughter
Lifts the clear glory of the torrent's breath
Where, like a paean of rapturous victory, calls
The solemn jubilation of the falls!

An alabastrine priest—thy splendor spraying
More lasting than the immemorial hills!
O monument of waves, O undecaying,
While God's right hand thy flowing chalice fills!
Under the transient world's astonished eyes
Thou offerest abiding sacrifice.

In the pale morning, when the rising sun
Flatters thy pouring flood with slanting beams,
Most reverent thy duteous waters run,
And hymn to God with all their thousand streams.
And in the blazing majesty of noon
Still lifts thy wave its sacrificial tune,
And spills, like jewels of some Eastern story,
Its bright impetuous avalanche of glory.

And in the stilly spaces of the night,
While heaven wonders with its wakeful stars,
Thou prayest still, beneath the solemn light,
In booming tones that reach to heaven's bars,
Keeping thy vigils, while the angelic moon
Walks on thy perilous verge with glorious shoon,
Chanting from foam and spray withouten cease
Thy yearning immemorial prayer for peace.

EDUCATION

The College and Life

ABOUT a hundred years ago a formidable indictment was launched by the Edinburgh Review against the study of the humanities at Oxford, on the plea of their remoteness from the occupations and duties of life, to which they were supposed to be a formal introduction. The assailants of the North were only repeating the lesson learned from Locke, of utilitarianism in education. They were met brilliantly and solidly by Coppleston and Davison for Oxford, from whom Newman afterward drew much inspiration in writing his "Idea of a University." The Scotch reviewers' attitude of mind toward the humanities is emphasized in many quarters in America today. To many, the defense of classical education seems the defense of a lost cause. The importance of the high-school and professional courses is appreciated; the classical college is regarded with a sinister eye. Many professional educators have been attempting to compress it into narrow limits, to make room for the studies which precede and follow it. They consider the college a luxury, a purposeless consumer of valuable time. They favor vocational schools in which youths are placed immediately in direct preparation for their "work in life," and they have been heard to ask with a touch of impatience: What plea can be set forth for a general course of classics, science, and philosophy?

Why the Humanities?

IT may surprise some to be told that the promoters of humane studies base their first and best claim to recognition not on utility, but rather upon the humanizing influence of their course. They think that even if no ulterior purpose were served by classical pursuits, still these ought to be allowed to maintain their position of importance, on their own intrinsic merits. Classical culture is more than a means to an end. The arts of music, painting, sculpture and architecture are worth pursuing for themselves; and as it would be preposterous to value them on any purely utilitarian scale to the exclusion of their inherent excellence, so it is futile to rate the merits of a classical college course without regard for its intrinsic beauty and forcefulness. Surely the breadth, intensity, poise and versatility of mind, the sureness of judgment, the luminousness of imagination, the warmth of feeling, the delicacy and rightness of taste, the power of expression, which a college course purposes to confer, stand in need of no applicability to ulterior ends, to recommend them to a discerning appraiser of human worth. Even if classical studies were not a superb preparation for professional, technical and business avocations, still their place in a university could be abundantly justified by reason of their influence in the formation of a man. The formation of a man is, to speak moderately, as important as the formation of a merchant, or a lawyer, a physician or a theologian. The mind ought to be made master of itself before becoming the servant of a specialty; and the emotional elements of the heart ought to be developed, before the stress and strain of a particular calling have an opportunity of cramping them into stunted passivity.

The Classics Truly "Useful"

THIS humanizing process is well served by the study of classic literature, which is a concrete portrayal of human nature by men of genius for the delight, study and imitation of posterity; again is it well served by the study of philosophy, which calls into play the most characteristic power of man, i.e., his speculative faculty. If, however, it still be urged that the studies of the college course should serve a useful as well as humanizing purpose, the ready answer may be given that they are genuinely useful as well as liberal. Business and the professions do not constitute the whole of life; nor should they be made the sole measure of a man's preparedness for it. The social sphere is a large element in life, and fitness to move in it becomingly is the consummation of human studies in their utilitarian character. Leisured intercourse between man and man, with all that it implies, varied knowledge, wide reading, carefully formed views and the power of expressing them, is one of the choicest boons of life. The chief natural difference between savages and civilized men lies not, I imagine, in the contrast between their respective methods of settling legal difficulties, or curing the sick, or conducting business enterprises; but rather in the manner in which they live in the heart of their families and their friends. The long hours of monotonous silence, often observed among the Indians of North America, were a more pointed index of their savagery than their blunt tomahawks. The pleasure which cultivated men take in manifesting to one another their thoughts and sentiments on topics of general interest, is a better criterion of their civilization than buzzing factories, law-courts and doctors' offices.

Humanities and the Specialist

NOW, there is no chair of conversation or course of social training in a university, for the simple reason that the art of social life is too subtle to be contained in a formal system. But the study of the best literature imperceptibly steeps the soul in thoughts of high and general interest to mankind, and no specialized course can do this. A specialty, by its very nature, is exclusive and narrowing; and experience shows that specialists, who have not enjoyed the advantage of a preparatory general education, nor have made up for the deficiency by personal effort, either talk "shop," or give lectures, or else hold their tongues, when they leave the sphere of their particular avocation to meet men on the common footing of humanity in the larger sphere of social life. Advancing as specialists, they retrograde as men. They have become slaves to their calling; and their shackled minds are incapable of the ease, adaptability, and resourcefulness of a capable participant in cultivated company.

But while a specialized course of study or work, exclusively pursued, unfits the specialist for the more general activities of home and society, the study of the humanities, besides developing humane and social habits of mind, adds breadth and power to any specialized career. Power is not only an admirable thing in itself, but it is bound to produce useful results. Therefore, the mental forcefulness of a college education, though it be acquired on purely liberal grounds, without purpose of utility, cannot but be useful, just as physical strength, developed by athletic games undertaken merely in the spirit of sport, fits for work. A trained mind will assuredly produce better results in any field of activity than an untrained mind of the same natural ability.

The Developed Character

MOREOVER, a college man, on entering a particular career, will not be tempted to exaggerate its importance. He approaches his chosen avocation, as it were, from a height; for he descends from a level of generalized universal thought to more specific and individualized ideas. He is like a man going down into a field from a hill. He understands that his prospective sphere of study or practice is not the only one worth while in the world. Side by side with him other men will labor, along other lines, with as much energy, ability and success, with as high ideals as his own. He will have a reserve supply of appreciation for them and their pursuits. He will not allow himself to become isolated by specialized enthusiasm. His contact with humanity through humanizing studies will remind him that it takes many and diversified avocations to make up a world; that his avocation is only one of the many, and that its highest interests will be best served if it be kept in its place.

Finally, the studies of a college course are of no inconsiderable aid in the leading of a moral life. The very occupation of the mind with wholesome ideas prevents the entrance of a whole array of vitiating influences; the refinements of education incline its possessor to shrink from indulging in the grosser forms of immorality; and intimations of immortality and divinity, which frequently flash across the pages of even pagan poetry and philosophy, favorably dispose a thoughtful student for the teachings and practices of revealed religion.

Detroit University. JOHN A. MCCLOREY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

The Gold of Loving Kindness

IN the year of grace, 1779, Thomas Jefferson, the newly-elected Governor of Virginia, made out a patent to a parcel of land near the present city of Lexington, Kentucky, in favor of one John Floyd, a notable of the day. Floyd at once assigned his rights to John Todd, Jun., a member of another "first family," but, being of an unconventional turn of mind, failed to record the transfer. Litigation followed as a matter of course, to furnish the hungry lawyers of that day with many a fat fee.

Thus is the stage set; and ninety-eight years after Thomas Jefferson had affixed his hand and seal to the care-free Floyd's land-grant, a band of Sisters of Charity, headed by Sister Euphrasia Stafford, came to Lexington to found a hospital. Even then the smoke of litigation had not lifted; but after a brief experience in quarters that soon grew inadequate, the eyes of the Sisters' Mother General, Mother Helena, had fixed upon one portion of the old estate as a site eminently fitted for a hospital. The tale of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce is ever tedious, but by sundry common-sense processes of purchase and compromise, this direct and vigilant lady brought the long-drawn tumults of many forums to a peaceful conclusion. So then, after precisely one century of litigation, beginning with Thomas Jefferson, Governor of Virginia, and ending with Mother Helena Tormey, of the Kentucky Sisters of Charity, the young Sister Euphrasia Stafford, of the same pious Congregation, found herself free to initiate, with the endowment of an unusual trust in God, the establishment of a Catholic hospital and general center of relief, in this new locality

Introducing Sister Euphrasia

SISTER EUPHRASIA began the work, struggled, fought, begged; built her hospital, and brought it to a high plane of worth. But "last February," writes a friend, "she decided in a most business-like way that it was time for her to drop all earthly affairs and to 'go home' to Nazareth to prepare for death," and at Nazareth she died, no doubt also in a "business-like way," which only means trust in God, on September 14, 1917. "Earthly affairs" is, in Shakespeare's judgment, "an ill phrase, a most damnable phrase." Some critic, Hutton, I believe, has remarked that Newman showed more charity in his controversies than most of us know in our prayers. So too, it seems to me who was privileged to know something of her, that the "earthly affairs" of Sister Euphrasia were laid nearer Heaven than the most devout communings of us lesser mortals with the Almighty.

Among the names that clutter the pages of our biographical dictionaries, you will search in vain for some note of the style and title of Sister Euphrasia Stafford. The world knows little about her; for she did not advertise herself as fit for great deeds, but merely did them. She appears in AMERICA for August 12, 1916, under the name bestowed upon her by the Ethiopian population of Lexington, "Miss Sue Prasia," and there are interesting references to her in Miss McGill's "The Sisters of Charity of Nazareth." But her best biography will never be written. What is most beautiful in the story of her more than three-score years and ten, is held in the books of Heaven, sealed until the last great day, and locked in the hearts of those who loved her for her countless nameless little acts of love and courtesy. Happily, however, some record of the deeds of this valiant woman has been preserved.

The Opening Sacrifice

SISTER EUPHRASIA opened her mission by offering, not in aspiration but in deed, the sacrifice of her life. In 1871 small-pox, a scourge then dreaded almost annually by many Southern cities, broke out in Louisville. As there is no obligation, binding all, without exception, to the practice of heroic virtue, no note of universal censure can attach to those nurses who in the face of an appalling plague deserted the city. But some care had to be given the sick; in the emergency, the Mayor and the Board of Health appealed to the Nazareth Sisters of Charity. In reply, Sister Euphrasia, then but seven years in the Congregation, was sent with four other Sisters. As far as I can learn, this was her first mission, and fitly was her career begun by a work which, in those days of primitive prophylaxis, involved much more than the possibility of death. The impression which the young Sister and her companions made upon the community is thus stated by the Mayor in his Report for 1872 to the Common Council:

> Actuated by a sense of duty to their God and of love and sympathy for their afflicted fellow-creatures, liable at any moment to be themselves stricken down by this most loathsome disease, these noble women labored day and night without pay or earthly compensation until all apprehensions had been entirely removed from the public mind, of a farther spread of small-pox. The names of these faithful and self-sacrificing Samaritans who, when their labor of love and charity was over, left as quietly and unostentatiously as they had come among us, are Sisters Euphrasia, Antonia, Joachim, Andrea, Valentine and Mary George; and I feel that your honorable body would be honoring yourselves by giving some official recognition of their great services. I myself would earlier have borne public evidence to their work except that I desired to mention them in my annual message, when their heroism could be recorded in the municipal reports of the year.

This was as far as "recognition" went at the time. A further boon was granted when, on the appearance of "contagious diseases" in 1890, the Sisters were again permitted to take charge of the Louisville pest-house.

Meeting Calumny

TO the shame of our common nature, must it be written that some men are always ready, as New York Catholics can bear ample witness, to cast stones at a heroism which brings into clear light their own craven and disorderly lives. Incredible as it may seem, calumny was the portion of Sister Euphrasia and her companions as they went to take up a task from which all others fled in horror. The attack, however, brought forth a striking defense by a non-Catholic. Published nearly fifty years ago in a Louisville newspaper, it is today as pertinent as when it first flowed from the pen of the indignant Kentuckian:

> In these days, people have a way of judging religion not by its pretensions or profession, but by its fruit. Wherever men find the sweetest charity, the most self-sacrificing devotion to the welfare of others, the most of the spirit of Him who went about doing good . . . there, they will think, is the most genuine religion. If the Roman Catholic Church of all the churches furnishes nurses of trained and loving hand, who are ready with heroic devotion, without fee or reward, to enter the lazar house where the air is heavy with pestilential vapors, to go by day and night from ward to ward with unwearied foot, to minister to those afflicted with a most loathsome and deadly disease, then we say: "All honor to this ancient and honorable Church, and all shame to those who fail to make provision for this blessed work of mercy." . . . We congratulate the Mayor and the city in securing these efficient and self-denying nurses. . . .

Five years later, Sister Euphrasia went to Lexington, where she spent the remaining forty years of her life.

Her Work for the Community

UNDER her care, St. Joseph's became a superb hospital, an inspiration to the profession, and a blessing to the community. Men saw the hand of God in the work, and all who knew it felt the power that goes out from genuine Christ-like charity. In 1914, the City of Lexington, no less than her Sisters, celebrated the golden jubilee of her entrance into the Congregation. Nothing shows better the love and veneration in which she was held than the following editorial written, I think, by Mr. Desha Breckinridge, for the Lexington Leader:

> There dwells in this city one whose remarkable career is lasting proof of the constructive energy and far-sighted judgment which a woman may exercise in the administration of business affairs, and yet retain and develop the exquisite beauty, the most precious traits of womanhood. Sister Euphrasia has for fifty years been doing a man's work in the world. She . . . has directed the work of a small army of workers in the same workshop for thirty-five years, with better results and less friction than any employer could boast in the same length of time. She has given more to the support of St. Joseph's Hospital than its most wealthy patron, for she has given it the benefit of a courageous spirit, and has asked nothing in return. She has worked harder to save the lives placed in her never weary hands than many a physician. She has prayed more earnestly for the souls of men than many a priest. She has amassed a greater wealth than any financier; for in the heart of every man, woman and child who has ever known her she has laid away a store of the incorruptible gold of human kindness. Cloaked in a sweetness, a dignity, a gentleness and an unbounded sympathy. . . . Sister Euphrasia has entered the busy world of mankind, and for the good of mankind has toiled and striven in a labor few men would be hardy enough to undertake. . . . It is not the wish of the Nazareth Community to have their personal works given publicity, so that in the roll of names of men and women who have accomplished great things for Lexington, that of Sister Euphrasia is seldom seen. But the appreciation of a city and a people is none the less deep because infrequently expressed, and not even she herself will know how many hearts echo the Leader's Sunday greeting: "God bless you, Sister Euphrasia!"

Three years later, still unclouded in mind, but growing infirm through age, she went back to Nazareth, the home of her first days in religion. There she waited, in calmness and patience, until "At midnight there was a cry made: Behold, the bridegroom cometh." And with her lamp filled with the oil of faith and good works, she went forth to meet Him.

Principles of Reconstruction

THEORISTS talk, dream; Sister Euphrasia lived in a world of realities, and by self-sacrifice made dreams come true. The charity of Christ urged her to work without ceasing for the solace and the eternal salvation of the sick entrusted to her care, and of those whom, in imitation of the Good Shepherd, she went out into the desert to seek. Simple goodness and unaffected kindness beamed from her eyes, for hers was no disheartening philosophy of materialism, awaiting at the end of the little happiness which life affords, the eternal "farewell" that marks the complete extinction of being. Even in the charnel-house she heard the sublime words, "I am the resurrection and the life." For her, God was the first and most vivid of all realities. Sin was the world's darkness, but on Calvary the Son of God had paid the price of iniquity, and His glorious resurrection was the promise that this poor broken body of decay should rise one day, triumphant, incorruptible. Through the mists and clouds of life, her faith-enlightened eyes looked beyond death's sluggish river, to rest on those fields of peace wherein is built our home, the lasting City of God. On her Faith was founded her conviction that neither in sociology nor in any sphere which involves man and his spiritual nature can we plan with safety, unless as the cornerstone of our endeavors is placed the dictum of Christian philosophy, that man, fashioned in the likeness of God, was created to praise, revere and serve his Maker. This, I take it, is the deeper lesson of the life of Sister Euphrasia Stafford. Men are not high-bred animals, differing merely in degree from the beasts of the field, neither are they the pawns of the State; they are human beings, made nobly by Almighty God, capable of knowing and, through His grace, of attaining their supernatural end. And as in the spirit of that Christian charity which she preached, not in words, but with the moving eloquence of example, we pray that the dear soul of Sister Euphrasia may soon be brought to a place of peace, refreshment and of light, so may we also be made sharers in her trust in God, in her love for the afflicted and the outcast, the most dear brethren of Jesus Christ, poor and in labor from His youth.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Loyalty of the Catholic Central Verein

THE words of the Apostolic Delegate spoken at the annual convention of the Central Verein are quoted in full in the September number of the Central Blatt and Social Justice. Though a very busy man, he traveled the long way from Washington to St. Louis, he said, in order that he might show he was a friend in need and a friend indeed. "Amicus in re incerta, re vera amicus":

> Notwithstanding your work for which you so well deserve the thanks of your Church and country, I saw and feared that perhaps somebody might question or dispute your patriotism. For this very reason I am here today. No institution under the sky assists so much in fostering loyalty to one's own country as the Catholic Church. I represent the Head of this Church, and today my presence here signifies that you are loyal to your country, my presence emphasizes your patriotism. If I did not believe that you are good, loyal, patriotic American citizens, I would not be here today. That is the special reason of my presence with you.

No one can think of questioning the spirit of patriotism that animates the members of the Central Verein. It is unexcelled by that of any class of American citizens. But the words of the Apostolic Delegate do equal credit to himself and to his loyal friends.

French Priests at the Front

FRANCE has mobilized between 25,000 and 30,000 priests. Nearly three-fourths of them are facing death in the trenches or as stretcher-bearers at the front, and 3,000 have actually been killed in the war. These figures are quoted by the London Tablet as given by Father Henry Flynn, curé of Menilmontant, to a representative of the Dublin Freeman's Journal. No fewer than 6,000 expelled priests, according to the same authority, have voluntarily returned to France in answer to their country's call. Father Flynn added:

> I hope that after the war they won't be expelled a second time after rendering a great service to their country. I hope that the gratitude of the French Government will not be expressed in such a way. Called by their vocation to be the salt of the earth, they have become the salt of the army, where everybody has greeted them cordially. Providence uses an infinite variety of means to defeat men's designs. It was certainly not out of respect for canonical laws, nor to help the clergy to recruit, nor to honor priests, that the law Les curés sac au dos was made. Yet God brought good out of evil. A blessing came in the disguise of a cross. So many soldier priests gave the rites to their dying comrades! It happens now that the presence of these curés among the soldiers, in the same shower of bullets and shells on the battlefield, or in the same trenches and ambulances, has created between them a respectful and brotherly sympathy, which, if it has no other result, is at least as efficacious as the best of sermons. It is a fact that since the days of Joan of Arc, never have the French soldiers been so careful to say their prayers, to attend Mass, to go to Confession and Holy Communion.

Every month 600,000 Masses are said by these soldier priests on the lurid edge of the great world war. "It [the spiritual awakening] is in the midst of the most tragic events, like a spiritual retreat preparatory to death, and it is followed in the fraternity of arms by the whole youth of France."

Occultism and Socialism

THE number of silly people is infinite, and some make it their duty to rush into print. One such has favored AMERICA with a leaflet entitled "Damant (sic) quod non Intelligunt," containing the following intelligent information:

> All ancient religions were based on astronomy. Upon astronomy was built astrology and upon astrology a superstructure of mythology. Christianity makes no exception. The Brahmins had a cycle of 658 years. Christianity is the ultimatum of all religions, for it is based upon the shortest possible cycle, the one-year cycle of 365 1-4 days. Nothing further can come. When the ancients examined the sky, they found that the ever-recurrent circles of stellar motions were under the sway of the highest law of nature, the law of harmony, and nothing in this created world of ours, according to Thomas Aquinus (sic), is superior to natural laws. The Prophecies of the Gospels are based on this natural law. As the law compels the stellar motions so it will compel human society, nolens volens, into one comprehensive whole.

It is interesting to note that the writer next approaches the subject of communism, and ends with the Socialist watchword, set in heavy type: "Proletarians of all countries unite. You have nothing to lose but your chains and a world to win."

The Catholic Federation Sociability Movement

THE nationalization of the Catholic Federation Sociability movement, which originated in Dayton, was proposed at the annual convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies. Its purpose, as announced, is the elimination of mixed marriages by promoting acquaintanceship and sociability among all the Catholics, especially the young folk, of each city. The method adopted by the Dayton parishes can thus be briefly outlined to enable the reader to judge of this movement. Separate buildings for men and women and a common structure for both were provided on a pleasant country site. Immense family gatherings were held here, and outdoor amusements as well as indoor parties were arranged on a gigantic scale. There were games for boys and girls; sand piles, wading pool, "merry-go-rounds" and other diversions for the children; and dances in the large "aerodome" for the young people. "The children," we are told, "have their own dance from six to seven-thirty under the direction of a competent instructor. Correct dancing and deportment are taught the little ones, and the improper positions in dancing are pointed out and corrected." Special arrangements were likewise made, on certain occasions, for gathering together the Catholic people from all the parishes of twenty neighboring small cities and towns. The patronesses for the many various parties during the different seasons included, besides the leading Catholic women of the city, members of every parish and from all walks of life. "All federation socials are strictly informal and the crowds are cosmopolitan and democratic. The patronesses themselves set the good example of simple and informal dress." On special occasions prominent non-Catholics were invited.

> The results of the Catholic Federation Sociability Movement in Dayton are indicated by an increasing sociability between members of the same parish and Catholics of different parishes. All now have an opportunity to meet one another socially at these frequent gatherings. They have marked the beginning of many friendships between young Catholic men and women of Dayton. The older folk also have an opportunity of renewing old acquaintanceships.

All idea of profit is excluded, and the policy is to furnish amusements at cost. The admission fee is kept at a minimum, amounting to from six to twelve cents a person per party when season tickets are procured. No charges are made for children under sixteen when accompanied by an older person. Some 3,000 persons were present in Memorial Hall at the concluding "Mother's Party," where mothers had for partners a son or daughter, or some kindly neighbor. A white flower was worn by each person present if mother was dead, and a colored flower if she was living. The growth and popularity of the movement, we are further told, was indicated by the active participation of twelve of the leading parishes in the city during the summer socials of 1917. An introduction card must be signed by the pastor or other designated person in the parish before a patron is entitled to purchase either a single or a season ticket.

British Convert Writers

ON reading in the Pall Mall Gazette the remark: "It would be interesting to know the exact number of people of great intellect who were received into the Catholic Church in England in recent years," Mr. Scannell O'Neill made out and sent to the Catholic Convert the following list:

Compton Mackenzie
Mary Angela Dickens (Charles Dickens' grand-daughter)
Max Pemberton
Lucas Malet (Mrs. St. Leger Harrison) Charles Kingsley's daughter
Mrs. Blanche Warre Cornish (Thackeray's niece) and her daughter, Mrs. Reginald Balfour
Cecil Chesterton (Editor, the New Witness)
Ernest Oldmeadow
"Guy Thorne" (author of "When It Was Dark," etc.)
John William Conybeare
Charlotte Graves ("Richard Dehan")
Anita Bartle
Laurence Alma-Tadema
Etheldreda Wilmot-Buxton
Baroness d'Anethan (Rider Haggard's sister)
Joseph Clayton
Honorable Maurice Baring
Edward Harrison Barker
Mrs. Stephen Gwynne
John E. De Hirsch-Davies
Lord Alfred Douglas
Constance, Countess De La Warr
Lady Alfred Douglas (Olive Custance)
John E. Crawford Flitch
Leslie Moore
Mrs. Robert Goff
C. C. Martindale, S.J.
Frederick Landseer Griggs
Theodore Maynard (the poet)
Mrs. Coulson Kernahan
Isabel Clarke
Mary Alice Vialls
Rothay Reynolds
Robert Coningsby Clarke
Prof. John Swynnerton Phillimore
Bernard Holland
Christopher St. John
Herbert Moore Pym ("A. Newman")
Helen Parry Eden
Norman Wise Sibley
Richard Johnson Walker, editor of the British Review
Sir Charles Paston-Cooper
Percy Cross Standing
Mrs. Arthur W. Hutton
Capt. Henry Curteis

To the foregoing names should be added that of the Rev. John Charles Cox, F.S.A., LL.D., one of the best-known writers on Christian archeology, who became a Catholic not long ago.

The New Word from France

FRENCH, says the Town Talk of San Francisco, has been a prolific source of enrichment to our vocabulary. The latest addition is in everybody's mind and on everybody's tongue at present, camouflage.

Here is camouflage, excellent word, welcome to our vocabulary though it fills no long-felt want. Always we have been able to describe the wolf in sheep's clothing, to berate the pretender, to scorn the hypocrite, to denounce dissimulation and deception, but in camouflage are many delicate shades of meaning.

Writers everywhere are employing the new word nowadays, rolling it on the tongue, as it were, like a new sweetmeat. Hitherto we have known the noun camouflet, meaning a "mine producing no crater" from which the term "a stifler" was coined and which was used broadly and rhetorically in the sense of blowing smoke in somebody's eyes. Between camouflet and camouflage there is an obvious affinity, which rhetoricians fond of fine distinctions may well keep in mind, but a man need not be a wordsmith to appreciate the new term in a country much given to poker playing and much addicted to intellectual dishonesty.

No wonder then that the new word has won such ready acceptance in our current literature. It is kindred to two other strictly American words that were received with an equal welcome and have become a lasting part of our language: "humbug" and "buncombe."

Protestantism and Catholicism Viewed by Matthew Arnold

AT the moment when the attention of the world is centered, though somewhat vaguely, upon the Wittenberg monk and his work, a passage from Matthew Arnold's essay on "Pagan and Medieval Sentiment" will prove illuminating in spite of its innuendo and Anglican bias. He invites the reader to visit with him the reading room of the British Museum, and there calls attention to "the collection of the Abbé Migne, lording it over the whole region, reducing to insignificance the feeble Protestant forces which hang upon its skirts." Yet Protestantism is fully represented here in all its varieties, for "Mr. Panizzi knows his business too well to permit it to be otherwise." He then continues:

> There is the library of Anglo-Catholic theology, learned, decorous, exemplary, but a little uninteresting; there are the works of Calvin, rigid, militant, menacing; there are the works of Dr. Chalmers, the Scotch thistle valiantly doing duty as the rose of Sharon, but keeping something very Scotch about it all the while; there are the works of Dr. Channing, the last word of religious philosophy in a land where everyone has some culture and where superiorities are discountenanced,—the very flower of moral and intelligent mediocrity. But how are all these divided one against another; and how, though they were all united, are they dwarfed by the Catholic Leviathan, their neighbor! Majestic in its blue and gold unity, this fills shelf after shelf and compartment after compartment, its right mounting up into heaven among the white folios of the "Acta Sanctorum," its left plunging down into hell among the yellow octavos of the "Law Digest." Everything is there, in that "Encyclopédie, Théologique," that "Nouvelle Encyclopédie," that "Troisième Théologique," religion, philosophy, history, biography, arts, science, bibliography, gossip. The work embraces the whole range of human interests; like one of the great Middle Age cathedrals, it is in itself a study for a life. Like the net in Scripture, it drags everything to hand, bad and good, lay and ecclesiastical, sacred and profane, so that it be but matter for human concern. Wide-embracing as the power whose product it is,—a power for history, at any rate, eminently the Church; not, I think, the Church of the future, but indisputably the Church of the past, the Church of the multitude.
>
> This is why the man of imagination,—nay, and the philosopher, too, in spite of her propensity to burn him—will always have a weakness for the Catholic Church; because of the rich treasures of human life which have been stored up within her pale. The mention of other religious bodies, or of their leaders, at once calls up in our mind the thought of men of a definite type as their adherents; the mention of Catholicism suggests no such special following. Anglicanism suggests the English Episcopate; Calvinism, the Duke of Argyll; Channing's, Boston society; but Catholicism suggests—what shall I say?—all the pell-mell of the men and women of Shakespeare's plays. This abundance the Abbé Migne's collection faithfully reflects. People talk about this or that work which they would choose, if they were to pass their life with only one; for my part, I would choose the Abbé Migne's collection. Quidquid agunt homines. Everything, as I have said, is there.

Such is the true catholicity of the Catholic Church. Matthew Arnold's statement, of course, that he does not think she is the Church of the future can only provoke a smile from him who firmly believes in the promise of Christ that He will be with His Church to the end of time. She could, therefore, neither have failed in the past nor can she fail in the future. The poet's little fling at her propensity to burn philosophers apparently overlooks the fact that she is the Church of St. Thomas Aquinas, the greatest of all philosophers.

same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No wrapping; no address.—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

AMERICA

A-CATHOLIC-REVIEW-OF-THE-WEEK

October 6, 1917 PRICE 10 CENTS

Mexican Anarchy and American Gold

Eber Cole Byam

The Autobiography of a Soul

James Louis Small

The Terror by Night

E. L. Wolfe

Socialism: A Paradox of the War

Lawrence Flick, Jr.

Relief Work in the Civil War

Gerald C. Treacy

THE AMERICA PRESS NEW YORK CITY

CONTENTS
for October 6, 1917

VOLUME XVII, No. 26

PAGE

TOPICS OF INTEREST

CHRONICLE 637–640

Mexican Anarchy and American Gold—The Autobiography of a Soul—The Terror by Night—Socialism: A Paradox of the War—Relief Work in the Civil War 641–649

COMMUNICATIONS 649–651

EDITORIALS

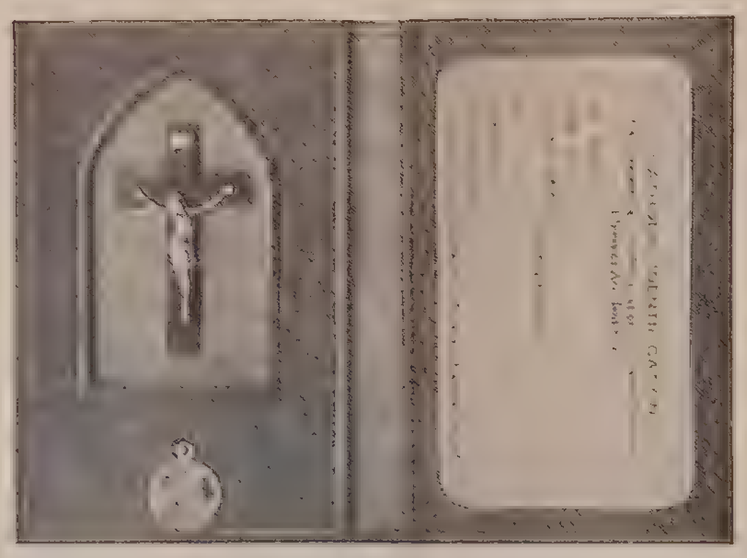
Peace by Christmas—Flexnerian Argument.—The Pope's Peace Note—Death and the Physician—Sauce for the Gander—An Important Collegiate Event.. 652–655

LITERATURE

The World's Greatest Book — Reviews — Books Received 655–657

EDUCATION

Science in the Curriculum.... 658



ECONOMICS

Benefits and Burdens.... 658–659

NOTE AND COMMENT.... 659–660

The Catholic Identification Booklet

25 CENTS . . . . PRICE POSTPAID . . . . 25 CENTS

A NECESSITY

for all Catholic men and women in the military or other dangerous walks of life

BUT

all Catholics should have one

BECAUSE it is a safeguard against remaining without spiritual help among strangers, the Catholic Identification Card telling them to call nearest Catholic priest.

DESCRIPTION—An unostentatious article, leatherette bound, containing crucifix, scapular medal, identification card, and leaflet with instructions for assisting the dying. In small pocket-sized card case form.

BE WARNED—Like all valuable religious articles, it has its unauthentic imitations. This booklet only has the Imprimatur of His Eminence John Cardinal Farley, and the endorsement of numerous other clergy. To be sure, look before buying for this Imprimatur on inside of front page of leaflet.

IF YOUR DEALER CANNOT SUPPLY YOU SEND TO

THE W. J. FEELEY COMPANY, 10 EAST 50TH STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Manufacturers and Distributors

Who's Who

JAMES LOUIS SMALL, "James Loomis," educated for the Episcopal ministry, graduate of Nasherah House, class of 1907, private secretary to the Rt. Rev. Dr. Webb, Anglican Bishop of Milwaukee, received into the Church, 1911; has contributed to leading Catholic periodicals and for two years past has lectured under the auspices of Catholic societies, especially the Knights of Columbus. His best known literary work has been done under the name, "James Loomis." "Within My Parish," a group of sketches which appeared, first in serial form in the American Ecclesiastical Review and afterwards as a book, excited favorable comment both at home and abroad. A series of essays entitled "From a Study Window" has been running weekly in the New World for two years past.

Read AMERICA and Keep Up with the Best Current Thought

Helps for Teachers and Students

THE EDUCATION OF BOYS, by Dr. Pallen

Price 60 cents. Postage extra

SHOULD BE IN THE HANDS OF EVERY EDUCATOR

WHAT THE CHURCH HAS DONE FOR EDUCATION
THE RELIGIOUS TEACHER
CATHOLIC SCHOOLS FOR CATHOLIC YOUTH
THE CATHOLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM
HOW CATHOLIC COLLEGES EXIST
THE DANGERS OF SECULAR UNIVERSITIES
POPULAR ERRORS ABOUT CLASSICAL STUDIES
THE ULTIMATE AIM OF EDUCATION
READING AND CHARACTER
AMERICAN CATHOLIC HISTORY AND RELIGION
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

Price 5 cents each. $4.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83D STREET NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVII. No. 26
WHOLE No. 442

OCTOBER 6, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The only event of military importance was the further advance of the British in Flanders. The offensive was started along the greater part of the line won the previous week, and carried the British forward for the distance of about two-thirds of a mile on a front of six miles; it resulted in the capture of Zonnebeke and the occupation of all the Polygon Wood. The attack was made against a line strengthened by heavy German reinforcements and followed a series of vigorous assaults made by the Germans in the effort to recover the ground lost by them on September 20. The significance of the victory consists in this, that it brings the British dangerously near the ridge which defends the northern end of the Hindenburg line and which dominates the entire surrounding country, and was gained in an attack which the Germans fully expected and for which they had made every preparation.

Bulletin, Sept. 24, p.m.-Oct. 1, a.m.

The War Revenue bill was reported out of conference to the House on September 29 and to the Senate on October 1. The bill had been four months before Congress and three weeks before the conferees. It provides for the levy in taxes of approximately $2,700,000,000 and adds $300,000,000 to the amount authorized by the Senate. The principal revisions are concerned with taxes on excess war profits, incomes, and first and second class postage.

The War Revenue Bill

The tax of $1,000,000,000 on excess war profits remains practically unchanged in amount, but there are other slight changes. A graduated tax, rising from 20 to 60 per cent, will be levied on excess profits, after exemptions of from 7 to 9 per cent have been deducted. The tax is to be levied on a basis of invested capital as compared with invested capital of the three years, 1911, 1912 and 1913.

The income tax underwent little revision. A tax of 2 per cent is to be levied on incomes in excess of $1,000 for unmarried persons and in excess of $2,000 for married persons. Graduated surtaxes of from 1 to 50 per cent are to be levied on incomes ranging from $5,000 to $1,000,000.

Postal rates for first-class matter, except drop letters and postal cards, are to be three cents an ounce or fraction thereof. This rate is to go into effect thirty days after the passage of the act.

Publications entered at the Post Office as second-class matter are to be taxed one and one-quarter cents a pound or fraction thereof from July 1, 1918, to July 1, 1919, and after July 1, 1919, one and one-half cents a pound or fraction thereof, provided the space devoted to advertising does not exceed five per cent of the total space. If the space devoted to advertising exceeds five per cent of the total space of the publication the portion devoted to matter other than advertising is to be taxed as above, but the portion of the publication devoted to advertising is to be taxed within the zones applicable to fourth-class matter on a graduated scale as follows: For the first and second zones 1¼ cents, for the third zone 1½ cents, for the fourth zone 2 cents, for the fifth zone 2¼ cents, for the sixth zone 2½ cents, for the seventh zone 3 cents, for the eighth zone 3¼ cents.

This scale of rates applies to the year beginning July 1, 1918, and ending July 1, 1919. Further increases are to be made during succeeding years, the maximum rate of 2 cents for the first and second zones and ten cents for the eighth zone being provided for the period following July 1, 1922. Daily newspaper rates remain unchanged.

Special provision is made for religious publications, entered as second-class postage, the net income of which does not inure to the benefit of any stockholder or individual. For such publications a flat sum of one and one-eighth cents a pound or fraction thereof, irrespective of the zone in which they are delivered, will be levied from July 1, 1918, to July 1, 1919, and one and one-quarter cents a pound or fraction thereof after July 1, 1919. An exception is made "when the same are delivered in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, in which case the rate shall be the same as now provided by law." The entire section relating to religious publications and others of somewhat similar purpose follows:

> Section 1103. That in the case of newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, educational, scientific, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, the second-class postage rates shall be, irrespective of the zone in which delivered (except when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, in which case the rates shall be the same as now provided by law), 1⅛ cents a pound or fraction thereof on and after July 1, 1918, and until July 1, 1919, and on and after July 1, 1919, 1¼ cents a pound or fraction thereof. The publishers of such newspapers or periodicals before being entitled to the foregoing rates shall furnish to the Postmaster-General, at such times and under such conditions as he may prescribe, satisfactory evidence that none of the net income of such organization inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

The most important of the remaining items of taxation are dues and admission to amusements, beverages, including "soft drinks," transportation, Pullman seats and berths, tobacco, insurance, war excise and war stamps, estates, munitions, luxuries and sporting goods.

Trading with the Enemy Bill

The trading with the enemy bill which the conferees have reported from conference, has been adopted by both Senate and House. It is aimed at foreign language publications and has for its purpose to repress seditious utterances. As finally passed, however, by Congress it contains a clause which gives the Postmaster-General wide powers and which it is alleged may be construed by him to contain practically the same censorship over newspaper utterances as was defeated some months ago in the Espionage bill. The section is as follows:

> Any print, newspaper, or publication in any foreign language which does not conform to the provisions of this section is hereby declared to be non-mailable, and it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to transport, carry, or otherwise publish or distribute the same, or to transport, carry, or otherwise distribute any matter which is non-mailable by the provisions of the act relating to espionage, approved June 15, 1917.

Although the foregoing section was subjected to vigorous criticism, the entire bill as reported by the conferees was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 48 to 6.

The Urgent Deficiency Bill

The Urgent Deficiency bill was passed by the Senate on September 25 without a roll call. It carries appropriations to the amount of $7,991,400,000. The Senate added $779,000,000 to the House bill. Yielding to the request of the Secretary of War for authorization to draft as many men as the army could equip, clothe and train, the Senate adopted the following amendment to the Senate Committee draft of the bill:

> Provided, that the appropriations herein and heretofore made for the purposes herein named shall not be available for the examination or selection of men as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the military establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, in excess of the number that can be clothed, armed and equipped for service in the army.

This amendment took the place of a section directing the War Department not to call to the colors more than 1,000,000 men in excess of the number now enrolled for service. The bill has gone to conference.

On September 27 Secretary McAdoo announced for October 1 the Second Liberty Bond issue, which, unlike the first issue, is to be unlimited. This step has been taken in conformity with the practice of many of the belligerent nations and will preclude the contingency of oversubscription. Mr. McAdoo's statement is in part as follows:

> With the approval of the President, I have determined to offer on October 1, 1917, three billion or more dollars of United States of America 4 per cent. convertible gold bonds, due on November 15, 1942, and subject to redemption at the option of the United States at par and accrued interest on and after November 15, 1927. The bonds will bear interest from November 15, 1917, and the interest will be payable on May 15 and November 15 in each year.

A minimum subscription of $3,000,000,000 is asked, but it is expected that the sum raised will be $5,000,000,000.

Second Liberty Loan

The issue has been apportioned among various Federal reserve districts, the greatest amount being assigned to New York, from which $1,500,000,000 is expected. Chicago is expected to realize $750,000,000 and Boston and Cleveland $500,000,000 each. Lesser amounts are expected of the remaining nine districts.

> The amount has been computed on the percentage basis, and while the banking resources of each district—that is, the total resources of the nationals, State banks and trust companies—have been given large consideration, other factors have been taken into account, such as the income tax collected from each district, the assessed value of property therein, the subscriptions received from each district to the first Liberty Loan, and the amount of bonds allotted on such subscriptions, the capital available for bond investment in each district and its population.

It is stated that the "amount expected" should be subscribed by each district "in order to secure the result imperatively demanded for the defense and security of the nation."

Great Britain.—A recent report issued by the British Ministry of Labor furnishes some interesting statistics of the number of British women at work. Exclusive of those employed as domestic servants and in hospitals, there are about 5,000,000 engaged in gainful occupations. At the beginning of the war 3,298,000 were employed, since then this number has been increased by 1,240,000 permanent workers and 963,000 casual workers. Before the war 2,000 women found work in government industrial establishments; to these 198,000 have since been added. At the outbreak of hostilities 9,500 women were engaged in finance and banking; there are now 60,000 so employed.

Women and Work

Three years and a half ago 19,000 were engaged in transportation, now there are 81,000 engaged, while in the same time the number employed in different commercial pursuits has leaped from 496,000 to 803,000. In 1913 civil service gave occupation to 66,000 women, it now employs 155,000. All told 1,256,000 men have yielded their places to women. In the last quarter of 1916 there was an increase of 29,000 women in industrial occupations; in the first quarter of 1917 there was an augment of 54,000. In the first three months of 1917 the metal trades took on 41,000 women; in the first quarter of 1917 chemical industries gave employment to 8,000. Between October, 1916, and January, 1917, 5,000 women dropped out of the textile industries, but today there are 22,000 more in these trades than there were at the beginning of the war. The food, drink and tobacco trades show a large falling off in the number of female workers; the first quarter of the present year showed a decrease of 8,000, the last quarter of 1916 a decrease of only 1,000.

The presence of so many women in gainful occupations will later on constitute one of England's great social and economic problems.

Ireland.—The death in a Dublin jail recently of Thomas Ashe, a Sinn Fein leader, reported to have been due to voluntary starvation, has caused something of a sensation. At the inquest into the death of the prisoner, Professor McMeeny testified that the post-mortem examination, at which several other doctors were present, showed that Ashe did not die of hunger. The body was not emaciated and there was an abundance of food in the stomach. Death, he said, was due to syncope, arising partly from heart trouble and partly from an intense congestion of the lungs. Ashe's heart, he added, was abnormal, and he would be apt to succumb to any sudden shock or prolonged struggle. Dr. McKenna, a hospital surgeon, testified that Ashe once told him that after he had been fed forcibly he had collapsed from a fit of coughing.

The Death of Thomas Ashe

Thomas Ashe, formerly a national school-teacher, was arrested last year at Ashbourne, on the occasion of a local rising timed to coincide with the Sinn Fein insurrection in Dublin. In the conflict which then took place, two police inspectors, five policemen and three civilians were killed and sixteen wounded. He was sentenced to death, but the sentence was later on commuted to penal servitude for life. Eventually he was released with the other Sinn Fein prisoners under the general amnesty order. He was rearrested two months ago for making a speech "calculated to cause disaffection," one passage attributed to him being that "if he saw England overpowered on the Western front, he would have no hesitation in calling out his men, as in Easter week." It was for this that he was tried by court-martial in Dublin and resentenced to prison. His own explanation was that he would be prepared under such conditions to protect Ireland against any possible invader, whether England, France or Germany; and he denied that his purpose was to create dissatisfaction. His death, and the circumstances surrounding it, have for the moment diverted the attention of the public from the National Convention, whose sittings were transferred from Belfast to Cork, where the members are amicably and with deliberate slowness discussing the vital questions at issue. The friendly feeling existing between the delegates of every section of the country and the deliberation with which they are acting are looked upon by all as most hopeful signs of the ultimate success of the Conference.

Russia.—In the middle of last week on the eve of the Democratic Congress, the situation in Russia was ominous and uncertain. No one could predict what turn affairs would take. The Bolsheviki or Radical Socialists, seemed to be growing stronger and stronger. It was even reported that Nicholai Lenine, the extremist agitator was to be the orator of the Congress, but the Government announced that he would be arrested. The Petrograd Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates in selecting their representatives for the Congress insisted that the Cabinet must not contain members of the bourgeoisie, and must carry through these measures: Settle the Korniloff affair; reabolish capital punishment; strain efforts to attain peace; summon as soon as possible the Constituent Assembly; dissolve the Duma and the Council of the Empire; transfer the land to the peasants immediately; establish State Control of production; pass an eight-hour labor law, and change radically the command of the army.

A Critical Situation

The moderate and conservative elements in the country were inclined to boycott the Congress, and thus challenge the extremists' claim that the gathering would represent the entire Russian democracy. The Bolsheviki were known to be working for the rejection of a coalition ministry and the virtual dictatorship of the proletariat instead, a victory which might easily lead to a reign of terror.

The Democratic Congress, apparently under the control of the Bolsheviki, began its sessions at the Municipal Theater, Petrograd, on September 27. Twelve hundred delegates from all parts of Russia attended the Congress, the presiding officers being five representatives of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, five each from town Zemstvos and two each from other groups. N. C. Cheidse, president of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, in opening the Congress explained that the country's grave situation necessitated the constitution of a strong revolutionary power responsible to all elements. M. Avksentieff, president of the Council of Peasants' Delegates, said that the time had come for democracy to save the conquests of the revolution. Premier Kerensky also addressed the Congress and undertook to defend the acts of his Government, but was often interrupted by shouts from the opposing factions in the assembly. The Premier maintained that his régime had saved Russia in her darkest hours, and that he had frustrated the Korniloff revolt. But Kerensky seems to have but a small minority of the Congress with him. General Verkhovsky, the Minister of War, made a speech pledging the

The Democratic Congress

Congress to a final victory over Germany, provided discipline were restored to the army and announcing that he intended to change the army commanders, to educate the troops along revolutionary lines that would promote mutual trust between officers and men and that he meant to disband the useless hordes in the rear. The Minimalists and the Social Democrats at the second day's session of the Congress voted 81 to 77 for a coalition cabinet to include representatives of the bourgeoisie, but 86 to 51 against the inclusion of the Constitutional Democrats. The Revolutionary Socialists voted in favor of a coalition, excluding the Constitutional Democrats, 91 to 87. Events move with such rapidity and complexity nowadays in Russia that correspondents are quite bewildered. It is plain, however, that the Korniloff revolt gave the Bolsheviki great power. "Save the revolution!" became their slogan. The Petrograd Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates suddenly found itself a violent extremist body. The Democrat Congress was summoned through their influence, the Councils in other large cities became very radical, too, and now the contest in the Congress is between the moderate and extreme Socialists.

News came on Monday that Premier Kerensky has accepted a program submitted by two Moscow leaders which calls for the immediate adoption of measures to put the army and navy in fighting condition, the merciless suppression of anarchy, absolute independence of Cabinet Ministers from parties and the choice of a constituent assembly that will express the people's will. It is reported that a new coalition cabinet will be formed by the Premier.

Spain.—Fuller reports of the revolutionary strike describe a far more dangerous state of affairs than had been suspected. In Madrid a determined effort was made by the strikers to terrorize the city by stopping all street-car and railroad traffic, closing the shops, factories and public bakeries, hampering all public utilities, and thus putting the capital under the complete control of the most lawless elements. Repeated and bloody assaults were made by the strikers on the cars and trains that tried to keep traffic open, and on the stores and delivery wagons that attempted to distribute supplies. In one quarter of the capital six strikers were killed. In Barcelona barricades were erected and there were scenes of riot and bloodshed. In Sabadell machine-guns and field-pieces had to be used; in one encounter seventeen strikers and five of the troops were killed and a row of houses serving as fortresses to the rioters had to be blown to pieces. In Bilbao the same scenes were repeated and not far from that city the strikers derailed a train killing five and seriously wounding eighteen persons. In the mining districts of the Asturias, where at the beginning of the outbreak the troops had been concentrated in Oviedo, the "revolutionists," availing themselves of the absence of the military, proclaimed a republic and appointed a provisional government, which was totally unable to put an end to the disorders which ensued.

The "Revolutionary Strike"

The Government handled the critical situation with the utmost skill and was everywhere loyally supported by the police and the troops. The Minister of the Interior stated he was convinced that the country was face to face with thoroughly organized attempts at a revolutionary rising. Premier Dato characterized the movement as an outbreak of "pure anarchy." Martial law was everywhere proclaimed and the civil authorities handed over their respective districts to the care of the troops. Two objects were aimed at, the continuance in spite of all obstacles of the public services and the stern and energetic repression of all outrages against law and order. The trains and street-cars were run under military escort, and in Madrid the military bakeries were opened to supply the capital and its environs with bread. The headquarters of the Socialist and revolutionary committee was raided and the ringleaders of the movement, Caballero, Anguiano, Besteiro were captured. A large number of documents was found, as a result of which 900 other agitators were captured throughout the Peninsula. These documents revealed the extent of the anarchistic plot. The monarchy and the whole present régime, including property rights, were to be wiped out, a provisional government was to be promptly erected, a Constituent Assembly called and the golden age of liberty ushered in. One of these documents called for the enlisting of women and children in the ranks of the party, for "they possess an extraordinary degree of temerity, and a fury of destruction animates them which must be allowed free scope."

The movement failed of its purpose and the whole country was aroused by the dastardly attempt at destruction. The press, of almost every shade of opinion, indignantly expressed its condemnation of the plot and the crimes and disorders it caused. Individuals, clubs, associations placed themselves at the disposition of the Government to undertake any task of restoration which might be assigned them. Subscriptions were opened to reward the workmen who remained at their posts and those who suffered injury for doing so, as well as to provide for the troops and the police who suffered in the numerous affrays, and for the dependents of the police and soldiers who were killed.

One of the most striking results of the plot has been to cause a salutary reaction among the workmen of the Peninsula against the sordid agitators who attempted to plunge them and the country into ruin. They declared that they have had enough of strikes forced upon them which had nothing to do with their social or economic betterment, but were organized for purely revolutionary ends. The Printers' Union, one of the most numerous and important in Spain, renounced all connection with the Socialist General Union of Workers, and others quickly followed. The Government, such seems to be the common verdict, emerged stronger than before from the conflict.

Mexican Anarchy and American Gold

EBER COLE BYAM

MEXICO, or rather Carranza, needs money badly, very badly in fact, as has been evidenced by the persistent efforts in New York and elsewhere to secure some sundry hundreds of millions of pesos. The swarm of swashbuckling Socialistic bandits must be fed, for they are yapping, like the hungry creatures they are, about the aged, bewhiskered successor to Huitzilopochtli.

The anarchs now ruling Mexico have been doing their best to destroy property and capital according to approved I. W. W. methods, and, as a consequence, American capitalists and bankers have been shy about lending any money to a government whose cardinal creed is destruction. Nor should the United States Government advance, even in its present liberal mood, some hundreds of millions of dollars to a government that stands the world over for murder and pillage.

Yet Carranza has hope, and in that hope it appears that an attempt is to be made to educate the American people to the point of not objecting should this money be lent, perhaps as a war measure, should Mexico decide to enlist its invincible legions with the United States against the Germans.

As an opening gun in this campaign, we have an article by Mr. Carl Ackerman, appearing in the Saturday Evening Post of September 15. Mr. Ackerman, in spite of himself, contrives to pen some truths which quite evidently he was not paid to write, and it is impossible to refrain from expressing a not unnatural admiration for the writer's perspicacity, considering his complete ignorance of the language, the country and the people.

Mr. Ackerman went to Mexico in company with the recently appointed American Ambassador, and takes occasion to inform us that that official was received "enthusiastically" and "like a conquering hero." Perhaps this statement may be due to the writer's fortunate ignorance of things Mexican. However that may be, the facts are that the American Ambassador was greeted by whistles and catcalls, and insulted as only a Mexican knows how to insult. And this was his reception by the galleries when he visited the Mexican Congress, this too was the reception given him by the assembled populace outside the edifice as he arrived and departed.

But the most interesting statement by Mr. Ackerman is that regarding the Carranza Government. He says: "Should the Carranza Government fall there are on the horizon today no leaders or group of men who could take hold and do as well as the Carranza Government is doing." This statement is repeated in the second article by Mr. Ackerman, published in the Saturday Evening Post for September 22.

The particular interest in this statement lies in the fact that its official denial had already been anticipated by no less a person than Luis Cabrera, spokesman for the Carranza Government. And Mr. Cabrera, whatever else may be said of him, has yet to be charged with being a fool.

Mr. Ackerman conveniently reminds us that "early in the summer the Mexican Government invited Mr. Henry Bruère, former City Chamberlain of New York, and two expert accountants who spent nine years helping to reorganize the Philippine Government, to establish business methods in the governmental departments."

Incidentally, we are warranted in asking: If it took nine years "to reorganize the Philippine Government," under the powerful protection of the United States army, how long will it take "to establish business methods in the governmental departments" of Mexico?

The presence of the above-mentioned expert accountants in Mexico attracted not only the attention of Mr. Ackerman—doubtless they accompanied him on the same train with the Ambassador—but, as well, the excited and adverse comment of the Mexican Congress, to the extent that an interpellation was addressed by that body to the Chief Executive demanding an explanation why these Americans were in the Mexican Treasury Department and expressing the not unnatural fear that their presence presaged a repetition of Nicaragua's problem, where the hungry politicians are now barred from the money bags by a vigilant American agent.

Speaking in support of the resolution, Deputy Manjarrez said: "I ask, has this Republic, or has it not, men capable of solving by themselves the financial problems of the country?" In answer to this, the spokesman for the Administration, Luis Cabrera, arose and said: "Deputy Manjarrez has hit the nail on the head. In effect there are no men; or better, yes, there are capable men, but one of them, Señor Limantour, is in Paris, and others are in different places in Europe and America. Yes, there are men capable of solving our economic problems, but they are not with us." Then, after explaining that the revolutionists are doing the best they know how; that all the men with brains do not agree with them politically, and therefore cannot be employed, Mr. Cabrera said that it had been necessary to call in Messrs. Kemmerer and Chandler to untangle the Mexican financial snarl.

The opposition to the employment of these gentlemen appears to have been nearly unanimous, and a variety of interesting and amusing reasons were offered in support of it. The principal fear seems to have been that the hated strangers would uncover the momentous secret that the Mexican Government is bankrupt and the equally important secret that all connected therewith are conspicuous neither for honesty nor ability.

Deputy Sanchez Pontón, in speaking for the resolution, epitomized in a paragraph the exaggerated conceit of his fellow-anarchs. In a moment of frankness he said:

> If it were true that we would advance greatly under the protectorate of the United States, it would be preferable for all Mexicans to do by themselves in fifty years what they might do in five at the side of a foreign power. We must be Mexico; not Cuba, nor Nicaragua, nor the Philippines, nor Panama, nor Porto Rico!

Whether Mr. Pontón speaks for Mexico remains to be seen, but at least he speaks for the blatant part of it, which has for several years made itself heard, at least as far as the Potomac. Like General Grant's two coyotes, the revolutionists make a noise out of all proportion to their numerical importance, and, in voicing their venomous spite against foreigners and their thrift, in expressing their envious protest against the exercise of a protectorate, and in putting these sentiments into action by cold-blooded murder and wanton destruction of property, these petted fiends are doing more to force intervention than all the imperial ambitions their heated imaginations have ever conjured from their cups.

Perhaps the Mexicans, by themselves, might in fifty years accomplish the progress that would be theirs in five under an arrangement like that in force with Cuba. But if they insist on rising in frenzied and causeless rage every fifty years to destroy all that has been accomplished during that period, there can be but one solution to their problem, and that is zero, which is just exactly what the revolutionists represent, politically, socially, and morally.

Mr. Cabrera and his fellow-deputies also have "hit the nail on the head," or, better still, have placed their blood-stained fingers upon the ulcer that is destroying the vitals of Mexico. And Carranza? Perhaps, as both Mr. Ackerman and Señor Cabrera would have us believe, he is doing his best to restore tranquillity and to moderate the rapacity of his followers. If this be true then indeed is he doomed, for it has been a characteristic of Mexican revolutions, that when the leader in power becomes moderate, from the sense of responsibility that power brings, his radical coterie rises up to tear him down. For it is upon this extreme radical and criminal element that the Mexican revolutionary leaders have depended for their fighting material. For a hundred years, since the murderous Hidalgo loosed his pillaging hordes, this has been repeated time and again, and thus Mexico has been a chronic sufferer from anarchy. Even Porfirio Diaz throughout his long rule was ever on guard against them, and they finally overcame him.

To lend a single centavo to Mexico under present circumstances would be the height of criminal folly; criminal, because it will but serve to further enrich the bandits who have exhausted the resources of the country and now seek this loan to support their extravagant debaucheries; folly, because Mexico already is mortgaged to the limit and is a nation bankrupt, and as such cannot repay. The principles of the I. W. W. now rule in Mexico.

Mr. Ackerman tells us that there are no schools nor churches in Mexico. This is what might be expected from a government that permits one of its leaders to declare officially that "Religion is ignorance and as the revolution triumphs God goes down."

Some of the Mexican anarchs and their American sympathizers have been pleased to compare the dreadful nightmare south of the Rio Grande to the French Revolution. Perhaps it is like that, for Mexico has had its Terror; has been flooded with unknown hundreds of millions of "assignats"; has had its Convention; and perhaps Carranza is its Robespierre awaiting his ninth Thermidor.

The Autobiography of a Soul

JAMES LOUIS SMALL

FIVE years and more have gone by since, in a little Franciscan chapel not a hundred miles from New York, I knelt before the altar, placed my hand upon a copy of the Holy Gospels and in the most solemn manner declared my belief in the Holy, Catholic, Apostolic Roman Church as "the only and true Church established on earth by Jesus Christ," to which, I also declared, I desired to "submit myself with my whole heart."

Most men, even the spiritually thoughtless, will agree that there can be nothing more soul-shaking than a change of religion. This is transcendentally true of a change from Protestantism to the Faith. Old opinions, held from childhood and deeply rooted in tradition and prejudice, are wrenched forth and cast away. The soul is left naked and alone, bereft for the moment of all human consolation and sympathy. One sees God face to face, and seeing Him veils one's countenance, like Moses, at sight of His majesty and power. There is little of immediate exhilaration, simply the consciousness of having arrived at Eternal Truth. As the late Monsignor Benson says in his "Confessions of a Convert": "I was as one coming out of the glare of artificial light, out of warmth and brightness and friendliness, into a pale daylight of cold and dreary certainty. I was uninterested and quite positive."

Nearly half a dozen years of Catholic life have convinced me of this identity of experience. There are, of course, exceptions to it, for God deals in His own way with the individual soul, but I think that careful examination would disclose a greater similarity than appears upon the surface. As time has slipped away I have been blessed with a constantly broadening range of vision. What was once blurred and indistinct has taken on the well-defined attributes of form and color. I have learned, am always learning, something of proportion, something of what the great Apostle to the Gentiles so admirably characterized as " the breadth, and length, and height, and depth."

Having come thus far along the road I have reached the conclusion that no conversion worth the name is made without some struggle, some sacrifice. The life that seems so cool and self-contained may be, for all we know, a veritable battle-ground of scars and wounds. Or, to put it in another way, the journey across the waters of unbelief or partial belief is made amid such apparent calm as to deceive the closest observer. The soul, in the meantime, has passed through all manner of storm and stress. More than once the frail bark was well-nigh engulfed by the waves; more than once the stars failed and the moon refused to give her light, and the voyager who at length gained the solid ground and grateful shelter of the City of Rest, so far from being the self-possessed person his friends supposed him to be, is spent and worn with the conflict.

There is far too much exploitation of converts; far too much acclamation of men as noted, who in the non-Catholic bodies from which they have come occupied positions that if not humble were certainly not exalted. There are far too many lists of converts, some of them so abounding in inaccuracies as to defeat the very purpose for which they are published, and holding the Church up to ridicule by a Protestant public that is only too glad to avail itself of the opportunity.

Herein there is worked a two-fold injustice: an injustice to the Bride of Christ, made to suffer at the hands of scoffers, and an injustice to the convert, who is as a man dragged into the midst of the throng, unable to collect himself, confused by the clamorous voices about him. This, if he is modest. If he is by temperament hardy and unabashed he is apt to fall prey to that most insidiously fatal temptation, the desire for notice, in which case it is not unknown that the brightest hopes have been blighted by apostasy.

There is, or so it seems to me, a suggestion of bad taste in a convert's pre-empting the lecture platform immediately after his reception into the Church and telling people why he became a Catholic. The procedure has always impressed me as being somewhat analogous to washing soiled linen upon a front porch. At all events, the public will derive much greater benefit from his treatment of the subject five or ten years later. A man does not jump into the Catholic religion, he grows into it. Anything he may have to say now will be crude and poorly correlated; it is bound to be. After a time, when Catholic currents have deepened his life and Catholic atmosphere has permeated it, his message will without doubt have a constructive value that it cannot possibly possess now.

For the present, then, silence. St. Paul, who made a journey into Arabia shortly after his conversion, for the purpose, it would seem, of meditating upon the truths revealed to him, affords an excellent example to those of us to whom the Faith has come as a belated, though none the less welcome, gift.

Someone has said, and said well, that converts have little else to bring the Church but their sins. The Church, on the other hand, gives us everything. She takes us in tired, hungry, naked, homeless. Whatever our station in life we are received as equals. We take out our naturalization papers, so to speak; we become citizens of no mean city. It were unfair to require of us as a quid pro quo for food and lodging that we should stand in the market-place and prate of beauties which, as yet, we have had neither time nor opportunity to assimilate. Let us alone for a while, good friends, until we have come to be more at home. Then we shall be glad to speak to you, and you will feel that you have not listened to us in vain.

What I have said will explain my unwillingness, hitherto, to yield to urgings for an account, verbal or written, of my impressions and experiences.

But now " the former things are passed away." I find myself vastly better able to analyze motives and sift principles than I could possibly have been on that evening over five years ago when, having torn myself away from associations very nearly as dear to me as life itself, yet secure in the conviction that the course I was about to pursue was the only one open to me if I wished for salvation, I knelt before the Franciscan Father in the convent chapel and made my submission to the One True Church.

" What led you to the Church? " I suppose no question is so often addressed to converts. It would be as easy to say what led one from childhood to youth, or from youth to middle age. The query predicates an act, whereas any answer that is made to it must have to do with a process, a process that is complex, governed by influences that sometimes appear to be contradictory and that defy analysis and baffle inquiry.

The late Father Maturin, intellectually and spiritually one of the most gifted of the Church's nineteenth-century converts, brings this out strikingly in his " Price of Unity." He tells how in his Anglican days he once submitted to a friend his reasons for thinking that perhaps Rome might be right and the Church of England wrong. His friend considered them carefully and then remarked that they were not such as to convince him. Maturin replied that he, not his friend, was the one in doubt, and if the reasons set down were cogent to him, that was sufficient.

I passed a number of months under a friend's roof just before my entrance into the Church. I soon made the discovery that he was laboring under precisely the same difficulties as myself. We spent long hours together, hours that neither of us is likely to forget, endeavoring to thrash out the problem. Always we found ourselves viewing it from different angles, a fact due, I have thought, to differences in early religious training. Yet all during this period of perplexity we were both deeply aware that the logical solution was submission to the See of Peter; our minds were carried forward irresistibly to that, even if our hearts, as yet, were not. Trace them out as we would, the paths we were following led nowhere else, and as one would naturally expect there came a day when we could no longer resist the Voice that spoke or the Hand that compelled.

Now it is rational to assume, is it not, that underneath these seemingly divergent lines of thought there should run a controlling motive, a motive that in the end will be seen to merge them, to make them at the same time luminous and coherent? There is such, and it is best expressed by the single word authority. The Baptist, Methodist and Low Church Episcopalian are, in reality, actuated by the same purpose in seeking the Church as is the High Churchman, though all of them may, in the inception, be unconscious of the fact. It is the desire for stability, for permanence, that causes them to exchange the shifting quicksand for the solid rock.

I have always been profoundly thankful that in the initial stages of my struggle I was provided with a wise counselor in the person of a teacher of Church history. I was a senior classman in an Anglican seminary when, somehow, from somewhere, the paralyzing doubt that is as old as the Church herself threw its shadow across my life. Nothing of the sort had ever occurred to me before. For years I had believed as firmly in my membership in the Catholic Church as I had in my citizenship in the United States. And now this had come. I was disturbed, disconcerted. After a few days of reading and prayer I turned my steps in the direction of the stately stone house upon the hill, whence no student had ever gone without receiving advice and comfort.

The professor was a kindly, warm-hearted man, devoid of the "Romophobia" which unfortunately characterizes so many of the High Church clergy. He not only taught history; he had the historical sense, two very different things. After listening to me with phenomenal patience he said quite positively:

> I wish to make this much clear to you: The crux of the Roman controversy is the Pope. If you are unable, as I am unable, to accept communion with Rome as a sine qua non of Catholic life, then you must stay where you are. If, however, you reach the point where you are convinced that communion with the Catholic Church is synonymous with communion with Rome, then you must make your submission to her, whether certain of her externals do or do not appeal to you. These are all subsidiary to the main issue.

Thus, happily, the ground was cleared for me at the outset, a circumstance for which, as I have said before, I am grateful. I honored, and honor today, my instructor for his clear-sighted sincerity. He is still an ornament to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and it is my hope and prayer that his largeness of vision may some day be augmented by the sublime gift of faith. I have experienced the more thankfulness as others of my advisers were more superficial in their treatment of a subject which all confessed to be vital. Much dust has been thrown in people's eyes and much talk wasted upon comparatively unimportant adjuncts, such as the use of Latin in the services of the Church, Communion in one kind only, the King James as compared with the Douai version of the Scriptures, etc., etc. Even of late months an editorial writer in a leading Anglican weekly (The Living Church, February 3, 1917) had the amazing effrontery to state that "it is not the primary issues that send men to Rome."

As for myself, the inward conflict raged for four years, with nothing to distinguish it from hundreds of others. There were moments of exaltation, when certainty seemed to have been attained, followed by periods of dejection that was almost despair.

Beyond a certain point I think that reading is a hindrance rather than a help. Of all the books and pamphlets that I read only two or three stand out as having been of special service. One was Dom Chapman's "Bishop Gore and the Catholic Claims," a reply to "Roman Catholic Claims," by the then Anglican Bishop-designate of Birmingham, and Dr. Gairdner's fairly written and illuminating "History of the English Church in the Sixteenth Century." The latter affected me powerfully, for I felt that it had proceeded from a man who could certainly be charged with no predilections on either side. Towards the very last I was considerably interested in a work, the exact title of which I cannot now recall, from the pen of the brilliant, but erratic, Dr. Frederick George Lee. It dealt with Elizabethan Anglicanism, and although written by a clergyman of the Establishment went far to pulverize any conception of continuity that I might have entertained.

All this time, but very gradually, there was dawning upon me the realization that the Catholic Church, wherever she was, whether in Rome, or, as the Anglicans taught, in Canterbury, Constantinople and Rome, must be, if one believed in Our Lord's words, sufficiently simple for the average layman to grasp. This I had not observed to have worked out practically in Anglicanism. As a matter of fact, I saw my brethren all about me engaged in an attempt to convince their people of a Catholic inheritance which the people themselves had, for the most part, no desire to claim.

At last I put books aside, and when I did so it came to me with a sort of glad surprise that the Kingdom of God not only was for the wise and learned, but for the ignorant and foolish as well; that Our Lord actually meant what He said; and that infallibility, so far as the Church goes, means at least as much as it means in other departments of life; in other words, that God will not permit a condition of chaos in His Church that men would not permit in a well-regulated business concern.

I am aware that this is a very untheological method of expression, but it crystallizes a sentiment that helped me to pass from chaos to order. I have come with joy to comprehend the saving truth that the Church has a place within her gracious fold for everyone, if he be humble and willing to learn, and to keep on learning.

The Terror by Night

E. L. WOLFE

WHEN the great grey ship, of which Abelard sang in prophecy: "Vere Hierusalem est illa civitas," left a port on the Atlantic sea-board with 1,200 or more troops and sundry civilians on board, there were few people who knew of her departure. To be accurate, six persons and a dog stood on the pier and watched the vessel swing out from her moorings. And the people, being human, cheered lustily to encourage the departing troops, and gave the lie to the sympathetic tears that would come to their eyes, by doubling the energy of their cheers, and by waving that flag which is to bring fresh courage to the war-worn troops on the battlefields of Europe. The dog, knowing nothing of democracy or the Divine right of kings, barked and flung himself around with such vehemence that more than once he nearly fell into the river. Night had fallen by the time the vessel had cleared the pier. The shouting had died away. And with all lights out on deck, in silence the great grey ship, like a lean, swift greyhound, slipped out from her port into the open sea.

Past tall office buildings, in which flickered a multitude of lights, by gaunt many-masted sailing vessels that stood out like skeletons in the night, through the midst of squat, sleek-looking freighters, under the nose of a fort she hurried swiftly. Then when the lights of coast towns glimmered dim in the distance, and the open sea stood out black and shapeless before her, she stopped. Suddenly, like a sword-blade, a flash of white light stabbed the darkness of the night and then disappeared. Far away two eyes of light flashed and winked some message in code. It was the destroyer that was to escort the transport on the first part of the voyage, and the great engines began to thud again, never to stop until the vessel had reached her destination in safety, or was sent to the bottom of the sea as the victim of German frightfulness.

Those who go down to the sea in ships, these days, and see the wonders of the Lord are still at liberty to tell of them. But with the wonders of men it is different; there is a censor who attends to that. On the morning of the first day out there was a destroyer circling the transport, but towards night she returned to her station. And alone the vessel went along the secret course that was known to one man only of all those on board, the captain.

One day on board ship is very much like another. A person rises in the morning, bathes, has breakfast, and for the remainder of the day tries in the most apathetic manner to fill in the time between meals, until it is time to go to bed again. In these days, however, one is not quite so certain that the morning will ever dawn again; for there are hungry wolves lurking in the depths of the sea whose appetite for human blood is insatiable. Hence the words of the Compline Psalm come to have a more significant meaning to the traveler by sea: Non timebis a timore nocturno: "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night." For the terror by night is something more than a pious phrase, it is a reality that is ever present, lurking in secret. And the seafarer knows, as he has never known before, that he is entirely in the hand of God.

The submarine has extended its field of operations, and although there is a definite area known as the danger zone, the seven seas are, in fact, one vast danger zone. The look-out is on watch day and night throughout the whole of the voyage. Not the least glimmer of light shows on the vessel at night, and at sunset all smoking on deck is forbidden. To go out on deck after nightfall is like venturing upon a mythical ghost-ship, and through the darkness the hushed whispering of the troops sounds like the devilish conferences of the wraiths of drowned sailors. But there comes a time when even this diversion is no longer allowed, and after dark the decks are forbidden to all save the look-out and ship officers who have business on deck. And every hour the vessel was drawing nearer to those waters where death springs suddenly and horribly from the depths of the sea.

The Sunday that fell about the middle of the voyage was given up to religious exercises. The solitary Catholic priest on board, a passenger, offered the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass in the second-class saloon. The small passenger list was well represented, and of the troops it is safe to say that quite thirty per cent of them were at Mass, nearly all of them with rosaries. The Protestants of all denominations gathered together and enjoyed the ministrations of a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

It is difficult for any living man to describe, with any respect for accuracy, what is likely to happen when the archangel blows the Last Trump. The only thing that approaches it is the signal, five blasts in succession on the ship's horn, which is the announcement that death is about to fling itself on us. But when, on a certain day the ominous signal was heard, it was known by prearrangement that it was the sign that boat drill was to be held. Places were assigned in the different boats, and each boat's crew was told off to its station, so that when the signal was given passengers and crew were all in place. "Ladies and gentlemen," said the purser, "we are now entering the danger zone, and you will do well to keep your life preservers by you day and night. You will do well to sleep in your clothes, and to remain on the upper decks all the time. In the case of an emergency," so he spoke of the horrors of being torpedoed, "you will go at once to your station, and obey the orders of the life-saver in command." That was all, and he spoke of death as one would speak of making a change in pursuing a journey. All the while the vessel was penetrating farther and farther into the danger zone.

For days the weather had been both rainy and foggy; unpleasant from the point of view of enjoying an ocean voyage, but the most secure kind of weather when submarines are about. Then, at length, the sun came out, the wind dropped, and the sea was as calm as a lake. Everyone of the passengers had found life a little dreary, for a life preserver is cumbrous, and it conduces to continual unpleasant thoughts and uneasiness. The day had nearly come to an end, and some of the passengers, girt about with their life preservers, prepared themselves for sleep in the reading room. Others, armored in like manner, tried to find comfort in the smoking room, while certain hardened ones, having, perhaps, little more than their lives to lose, went below and slept the sleep of the just. In the northern latitudes the twilight lasts longer than in the south, and in summer it is not quite dark until nearly ten o'clock.

Suddenly behind the vessel, a good way off and deep below the surface, a dark gray shape moved rapidly along. Like a great whale it ploughed through the water, and in its very bowels there was the rush and thud of intricate machinery. It was the terror by night seeking its prey. The transport, heavily laden, hurried on its way, and following it was the hidden monster of the sea. Then in the semi-darkness something that looked like a gas-pipe rose out of the sea, and following the pipe arose a metal hump, not unlike a steel barrel. And as the steel hump rose out, wet and shining in the half light, there came a roar and a sharp angry bark from the transport as the gun was fired at the conning tower of the submarine. Yet, even before the echo of the gunfire had died away, there sounded five hoarse blasts from the throttle of the ship's horn, and at the sound men sprang from their berths, from the smoking rooms; women caught up their children; money and papers were thrust into safe pockets, and through passages and corridors, up gangway and companionways, groups going here and there, soldiers hastening to different stations under the command of their corporals, everyone on the ship hastened as best he might to the place that had been assigned to him by the boats. A father gathered his children round him, ready to place them in the boat before it was loosed from the ways. An aged man hobbled along with the help of a cane. Fortunately the passenger list was small, and the regiment of troops responded instantly to discipline: so there was no panic as the whole ship's company mustered while it waited for the death blow to come out the jaws of the sea wolf.

But the blow never came. At the instant the shot was fired from the ship's gun the conning tower of the submarine disappeared beneath the water. It may have been hit; it may have dodged. But the terror had disappeared, and the passengers and crew went back to their places, and got what rest they could, and when morning dawned early risers saw on either side of the vessel one of Uncle Sam's destroyers that had come out from a European port to escort the vessel safely in.

One thing remains to be told. It has been said that when the signal was given all the ship's company went to their appointed stations. The account is inaccurate as it was found that two persons were missing. While the passengers and crew were assembling at the boats, somewhere below decks there was sitting a man in black, wearing a Roman collar, and by his side knelt a young man in the uniform of the United State army. The young soldier's head was bowed, and the priest was looking straight ahead and saying: Indulgentiam, absolutionem, and not until he had finished these words did he or the young man kneeling at his side go forth to save their lives, if death were indeed upon them.

Socialism: A Paradox of the War

LAWRENCE FLICK, JR.

THE war, having inflicted on the world such miseries as were never known, now offers Socialism to humanity as a palliative, and Socialism has grasped and firmly holds a power it never before approached. Every European country, belligerent or neutral, has witnessed its sudden forward surge. In a less but sufficiently marked degree we have experienced it here in the United States. Socialism's most notable victories, however, have been won in Russia and Germany. In Russia, it largely prepared the way for the overthrow of the reigning house and the abandonment of the monarchial system. Since the revolution, through the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, it has overawed and overruled the Provisional Government. It withdrew Russia from effective participation in the war at the very moment when Russia's performance of the task assigned her offered some hope of a swift peace through victory. It has embarrassed the Allied Governments with demands for a new definition of their war aims in keeping with Socialistic principles.

No less startling are the victories of the German Socialists. The suspicion that the German Government recently has overreached and exploited its Socialistic element does not discount the gains of the party in Germany. In three years German Socialism has brought about vast political changes: one might say almost revolutionary changes, considering the harsh political discipline kept of old in Germany.

Early in the war a famous German Socialist was sent to prison because he opposed the war program too vehemently. The workingmen's resentment was expressed in protests, disturbances, a general strike. He was not released, and the outcry subsided. Socialism was at that time, in Germany, only a little more than a doctrine with a large following. Its representatives in the Reichstag, after brief opposition to the war fruitlessly expressed by a minority vote, went over to the Government. Outside of Germany these events were interpreted as expressing the inherent weakness of Socialism. It did not stand the strain of actuality.

Contrast to this the recent scene in the Reichstag, when a spokesman of the extreme Socialist wing dared declare that his party would draft a new constitution, based on democratic principles. At the same turbulent session another radical Socialist broadly hinted that Germany must emulate Russia, and seek relief in revolution. True, he was hissed down by his fellows: but in Germany is not such plain speaking epochal? Socialism is now the loudest and most vehement of the German parties. German Socialists unhesitatingly demand that their country abandon any purpose it may have had of aggression and aggrandizement. Recent official disavowal of a policy of conquest plainly was in response to this very insistent demand.

A significant fact is that in Russia, in Germany, and to a lesser degree in France and England, Socialists are making themselves the spokesmen of peace. The appalling failure of Socialism to better the fortunes of Russia neither discourages the Socialists of other countries, nor apparently makes great masses of the war-ridden peoples less ready to see in Socialism a possible refuge from the evils of war.

Though Socialism has grown sufficiently powerful in Russia to throw down a dynasty, and in Germany to make the most absolute of existing governments yield it freedom of speech, yet, paradoxical as it may seem, its new impetus proceeds largely from the warring Governments themselves. Socialism, to quote a noted authority,

> Pleads for an economic regime wherein all land and material capital shall be public instead of private property, the State, not the individual capitalist, being the employer of labor; and the production and distribution of products not left as now, subject to speculation and the law of supply and demand, but regulated justly and by authority, according to the wants of the whole body of consumers, so that no one need be idle, uncared for, ignorant or poor.

This is Socialism's platform and program. Practically, such a regime has found favor, more or less, with all the warring Governments. It might almost be said, that the war has been conducted effectively in proportion as it has been conducted socialistically. Germany again is the notorious example. For years the German Government has been paternalistic. It has substituted for Christianity and a Christian freedom and equality in human and political relations a host of paternalistic regulations. Along with these it has set up the evil philosophies of the Nietzschean school, the one buttressing and supporting the other.

Since the war, it has commandeered, for the purposes of the State, all the activities of human life, both private and public. It has largely abrogated the law of supply and demand, substituting governmental regulation of prices and consumption. It has taken charge of man-power absolutely, decreeing beyond appeal that certain men shall fight, that certain men, and women, too, shall work in the factories, shall till the fields, shall carry on commerce. This not in every instance by specific regulations, but by the creation of conditions which give rise to a resistless economic necessity.

To a less extent the other warring nations have followed suit, the resistance being most marked in France and England, the latter most truly representative. Obviously here in the United States we will to some extent imitate Germany: witness the laws designed to control distribution and prices of food, and to tax heavily private and corporate incomes.

It is not to be wondered at that Socialism is raising its head. What might be called "monarchical Socialism" has been imposed upon a great part of the world. Socialism, surging up from the mob below, is encouraged to preach its propaganda by the obvious benefits derived from the practical working out of many of its principles, put into force from above by absolutism. The war has steeped the world in misery. What amelioration there has been is attributable to such governmental regulations, paternalistic at the least, as have made it possible for the poor to get food to eat, clothes to wear, and houses to shelter them. What more natural than that the Socialists should point to these benefits and argue from them that the whole doctrine of Socialism would lift the world wholly out of its present agony? And what more natural than that the people of the warring nations, worn down to the last shred of their endurance by these three years of blood and sacrifice, should turn to Socialism as a partly proved and wholly promising panacea?

Are we about to witness the phenomenon of a Socialistic age, of a whole world turning to Socialism? Statesmen and military experts vaguely estimate that the war is to be "prolonged," possibly over a term of years. All the signs of the times seem to point, however, to a swift abandonment of the war by popular demand. There is danger that this demand may express itself in social upheaval. The example of Russia may be followed in Germany and other countries as well. Our own country at present contains elements of discontent which ought to make us thoughtful.

The remedy? Does it not lie in the true principles of Christianity, principles well-nigh forgotten in these three red years? Only their powerful revival and expression can offset the appeal to the primitive feelings of men made by the Socialist propaganda of the day. Our present need is a powerful Christian voice, urging all the nations to restate their terms of peace in terms of Christianity. There is hope here, for the sorrows of war should turn the thoughts of men, if not of rulers and governments, to Christ and His Kingdom. If the Godless and pernicious doctrine of Socialism can command a substantial response from a great part of the world, how much more so the doctrine of universal peace and charity, the doctrine of universal forgiveness and amity, the doctrine of universal freedom and justice!

Relief Work in the Civil War

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J., CHAPLAIN U. S. A.

NO chronicle of the work of the Sisters of Charity among the sick and wounded in the Civil War would be complete without a word on Gettysburg. As is well known, it was the big battle of the war as battles went in those days. It lasted for three days, the first three days of July, 1863. Emmittsburg was not very far from the battlefield, and on the morning of July 1 the 107th Pennsylvania Volunteers swung by St. Joseph's College, the mother house of the Sisters of Charity. Major Delaney, who was with this body of troops, has left an account of a very pretty scene that greeted the soldiers as they marched past the college. Along the white ribbon of a road that ran close by the Emmittsburg school the Sisters and the children awaited the approach of the troops. As the first of the column came in sight, at a signal from the Sisters all knelt down and said the usual morning prayers for the welfare of the men who were marching by on their way to battle. Those who came through the three days of blood often spoke of this morning prayer. They had never marched to sweeter music. The roads leading to Gettysburg were bad enough at best, but an all-night rain on July 3 made them heavy with mud, and the dozen Sisters of Charity who left Emmittsburg for the scene of conflict had no easy journey before them. What greeted them on their arrival is best told by their own narrative: "Ruins of burned houses, the dying and the dead lying on all sides; thousands of guns, swords, vehicles, wheels, projectiles and habiliments of all colors. We had to make circuits to avoid passing over dead bodies."

Every building in Gettysburg was being filled as fast as the wounded could be carried in. Besides the improvised hospitals in private houses, 113 hospitals were in operation in and around the town. The Catholic church in Gettysburg was crowded with the wounded and the sick. Soldiers were lying on the pew seats, under them, and in the aisles. The sanctuary and gallery were packed with the sufferers, so close together that walking between the agonizing bodies was difficult. It was not uncommon to hear the cry, when the Sisters reached the scene of suffering: "Come, please, and dress my wound. Oh, do come to me next." Many of the men had their wounds dressed for the first time by the Sisters, surgeons being few in number. As it was before the day of the "first-aid," many of the troops were lying in their own blood, or in the water that had been placed in open basins beside the sufferers. Of course, a great many died of tetanus. The condition of the different hospitals from a hygienic standpoint may be gleaned from the account given by a wounded Confederate prisoner who with 600 others was quartered in the Transylvania College building. He and another youth of eighteen, as they were not as severely wounded as the others, were placed on a blanket stretched upon the ground at the entrance to the building. Near them the bodies of the dead who had died that night were laid, awaiting sunrise for interment. To prevent the rain from running under the bodies of these two prisoners, a little ditch two inches deep was dug on both sides of their earthen bed.

The Methodist church in the town was given over to hospital use, and the Sisters of Charity were in charge there. Once when the Sister in charge of supplies went to the sanitary store to have her order filled, the clerk asked her, "Where are these articles to be sent? I believe you belong to the Catholic Church." "No, sir," said the Sister with a smile; "I belong to the Methodist church. Send the goods there." The churches and the houses in the town were used by the medical department until tents were erected nearby and the general hospital established. More Sisters were sent to Gettysburg when the general hospital was opened. From this hospital the wounded were transferred to the Satterlee Hospital in Philadelphia.

The Satterlee Military Hospital in Philadelphia was in charge of Dr. Walter F. Attlee, a prominent physician. He interviewed Surgeon General Hammond and Secretary Stanton, and the result was that the Sisters of Charity were invited to take over the care of the institution in June, 1862. Sister Mary Gonzaga was the Superior, and with her were forty Sisters of Charity from all parts of the United States. A requisition was made by Surgeon General Hammond for twenty-five more Sisters from Emmittsburg. By August, 1862, the building proved too small for the wounded, and tents had to be placed in the yard. There were 4,500 patients there at that time. The soldiers as a mark of appreciation for the Sisters' unselfish labors took up a collection among themselves, and gave it to the Sisters to purchase what was needed for the chapel. The men stipulated, however, that when the hospital was closed the Sisters should take everything that remained for the use of the orphans. In 1863 and in 1864 the Sacrament of Confirmation was given to several soldiers by Bishop Wood. Mass was said each morning at six o'clock and many of the patients came as early as 4.30 to secure seats. Many of the cripples had to be carried in the arms of their comrades. At three o'clock on Sundays and feast days Vespers were sung, in Lent the soldiers attended the Way of the Cross, and in May devotions were held in honor of the Blessed Mother. The soldiers were very proud of their neat hospital chapel.

It is estimated that in three years the Sisters cared for 50,000 soldiers at Satterlee Military Hospital. Some smallpox cases developed in the early days of the hospital's career, and a smallpox hospital was opened several miles from the city. The difficulty was to get the soldiers to leave. They begged to be left at Satterlee with the Sisters, even if they were isolated from every one else. At last the surgeon in charge got the Government's permission to open a smallpox ward. A camp was opened some distance from the buildings. From November, 1864, until May, 1865, there were about ninety cases. Some nine soldiers died. The Sisters who were detailed for this work saw no one during their isolation. In one account written of this hospital it is stated that a doctor scarcely ever entered the smallpox ward, leaving everything to the care and skill of the nurses. There was a general impression among the soldiers that the Sisters were immune. A man who had been poisoned was given a remedy by one of the Sisters, who recommended it by saying that it had cured one of the Community. "One of the Sisters! Why, I never thought a Sister took anything like sickness!" His nurse assured him that the Sisters fell victims to disease as readily as other people. "I don't believe it," he answered. "The boys often say that they must be different from everybody else, for they never get sick here, and they do for us what no other person would do. They are not afraid of fever, smallpox or anything else."

Sister Mary Gonzaga always recalled two events in connection with this large military hospital. The first, the aftermath of Bull Run, the second the sequel to Gettysburg. After Bull Run the wounded were brought to Satterlee by the hundreds; after Gettysburg they came by the thousands. Early July, 1863, was an anxious time for Philadelphians. They knew in a general way only that a big battle was in progress somewhere near the State capital. Their first news of Gettysburg arrived with the carloads of wounded that came pouring into the city, in seemingly endless trains, headed for the military hospital.

The hospital was closed at the end of the war, and Sister Mary Gonzaga returned to St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum. In 1877 she celebrated her golden jubilee, and in October, 1897, she died at St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum, Philadelphia. A small piece of crape, crowned with white ribbon, hanging from the door-bell of the building that sheltered the homeless little ones, told the passer-by that one who had been a mother to them, as she had been a mother to thousands of Union and Confederate soldiers.

had passed to the fuller life. In an old copy of the Philadelphia Evening Star a veteran soldier wrote:

> In your paper yesterday you recited the many acts of charity of Mother Gonzaga for the orphans during the many years of her life. You were not aware that your short notice touched a tender note of affection in the breast of many a veteran of the late war. I was one of 60,000 patients, soldiers, at the Satterlee Military Hospital during the time Mother Ganzaga was in charge, from 1862 till 1865. Those who were under her care, no matter what their religion or creed, will never forget her. Administering medicine when required, tenderly bandaging a sufferer, watching beside a trying case, she was, indeed, an angel of peace and sweetness. To see her always calm and kindly, modest and faithful to duty, standing by the death-bed when all human aid had failed, is a picture never to be forgotten. The solemnity of the silent prayer when this Sister of Charity commended the dying soldier's soul to the care of Him whose servant she was! As one of many thousands who received her tender care, I shall never forget her.
>
> J. E. MacLane, G. A. R.

It is quite certain that Satterlee Military Hospital was the largest under the care of the Sisters of Charity during the war. As has been seen, relief work called them to different fields. In 1864, for instance, we find a band of Sisters of Charity at Alton, Illinois. The State Penitentiary there had been turned into a prison hospital. The muster rolls showed a list of 4,000 Confederate and 1,000 Federal prisoners, the latter deserters from the Union armies. When the Sisters took charge the daily death-list varied from six to ten patients. After two weeks the mortality rate was cut in half. Here at Alton the Sisters opened a general hospial at the request of the citizens of the town, and many of the Alton prisoners on receiving their discharge entered there.

Toward the close of the war the Sisters serving with the Confederate forces were recalled to Richmond They were there when the city fell. On the arrival of the Federal troops a Union officer rode at once to their quarters and informed them that their property would be held sacred and that a special guard would be detailed for their protection. There were 1,000 prisoners in the Southern capital and about 5,000 sick and wounded. The Sisters remained in Richmond until their patients were able to leave the hospitals. At Washington they were on duty till the military hospitals closed. In the latter part of 1865 from North and South the Sisters returned to Emmittsburg followed by the gratitude and prayers of the wounded of both armies. It was once remarked by a convalescing Protestant officer in one of the military hospitals at Washington that "The Sisters of Charity have done more for religion during the war than was ever done in this country before."

Two years ago when the "Battle Cry of Peace" was playing on Broadway, Captain Jack Crawford, the poet-scout, appeared at each performance to plead for national preparedness. Doubtless he was a strange figure to the youthful cinema audiences. But in the seventies he was a popular figure on the lecture platform. He was invited once to lecture before an audience in an obscure town of the Middle West whose inhabitants knew little about the war and thought little of Sisters. The closing lines of his lecture ran through his startled audience like an electric current:

> My friends, on all God's green and beautiful earth, there are no purer, no nobler, no more kind-hearted and self-sacrificing women than those who wear the somber garb of Catholic Sisters. During the war I had many opportunities for observing their noble and heroic work, not only in the camp and hospital, but on the death-swept field of battle. Right in the fiery front of war I have seen the black-robed Sisters moving over the field. My friends, I am not a Catholic, but I stand ready at any and all times to defend these noble women, even with my life, for I owe my life to them.

And so said thousands of veterans of the Civil War to whom these devoted Sisters had ministered.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Mr. Leslie and His Critics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I sent you the outline of the Home Rule bill, as there was a request for the same in your columns. I hold no brief for it except so far as I fought two elections in the endeavor to bring it about. I regard it as dead and therefore as an appropriate target But the constructive and vital parts of it will be carried on into the plans of the nation-builders of to-day. It will prove yet another stepping-stone of her dead self to enable Ireland to step higher out of the past. No more.

In slaying the bill yet using whatever is best in its heart, Irishmen should, and this is all my letter was intended to ask, give credit for what it afforded to the unhappy Redmondites, who, if they have shortly to give account to the Irish people for what they have not done, may in all fairness receive thanks for what they have done to Ireland's good. Personally I wish it were more, but it is something.

I believe I am still right in saying that the three Home Rule bills have been rapturously applauded by the majority of the Irish at home and abroad. I refer to Gladstone's bills in 1886 and 1893 and to Asquith's of recent memory. Campbell Bannerman did not introduce a Home Rule but a Local Councils bill, which was properly rejected by Redmond. As it was never considered or referred to as a Home Rule bill, I hope Mr. David O'Connor will find the contradiction cleared up.

As to the financial provisions of the Home Rule bill, they could not have made the Irish system of finance worse, so there was a probability of their improving it, especially if Dr. Kelly's prevision was true that Ireland would have the benefit of every penny of taxation raised in her boundaries. I do not think we could ask for money raised elsewhere. As to Mr. William Murphy's opinion that the British Parliament would still be drawing £16,000,000 out of Ireland for British purposes, I can only say that if the Irish people or party had construed it in that way they would not have applauded the bill. The spirit in which a British-made law is carried out in Ireland is often very far removed from the letter, and I doubt if any Irish Parliament would have allowed such a sum to pass out of the country annually. Both the Bishop of Ross and Mr. Murphy are experts and it is not for me to judge between their views. I have always regarded the value of such measures not in the light of how much can we extract from England, but how much can we make of what we extract.

Mr. Murphy is worth hearing on economic questions, but ever since the desperate struggle which he waged with Larkin and Connolly he has naturally become a partisan. I do not know why his paper is as bitterly anti-Redmond as it was anti-Connolly, so much so that he is now regarded as an ally of the Sinn Fein. The London Times says of him:

> There is no enemy of Sinn Fein, however implacable, whom the Sinn Feiners will not accept provided he is also an enemy of Mr. Redmond. The Irish newspaper which called most insistently for the head of James Connolly is now the favorite journal of his followers.—The Irish Independent.

It is very difficult for anybody even to guess how anything or any individual may turn out in the next few months in Ireland. I shall be disappointed if the Convention does not make a living reality out of what I confess is a dead Home Rule bill, and the merrier the latter is criticised the better for the success of the former. Personally, having no axe to grind, I have no desire except to act as a clearing house between constructive Irish thought in America and the leading brains in the Convention. Letters like those of Messrs. David O'Connor, St. George Joyce and Father O'Loughran I pass on to Sir Horace Plunkett, who is glad to keep in touch with what is sound in American opinion.

As to the Convention, which has been described as a means of saving Ulster's face by some and Redmond's face by others, it is really likely to prove as useful to the Sinn Fein as to any in helping them to express themselves under circumstances of difficulty, which they are already beginning to feel. The bedrock difficulty in Irish Government has been and still is the patronage. The mistake of the Irish Party has been, while promising a fair distribution of the patronage to the Ulstermen, to exclude any Nationalists who differ from them politically from the same. The orthodox Nationalists have excluded from positions many who were or are now Sinn Feiners. Under Home Rule it was natural for the Sinn Feiners to feel what the Ulstermen insisted would be the case with them, that they would be passed over by a Cabinet made up of Redmondites. Though the Sinn Feiners had idealistic reasons as well for their opposition, I feel that this was a just grievance. The great feat of the Convention will lie in apportioning the first legitimate fruits of autonomy among all three sections or in putting the people in a position to do so.

I am glad to hear privately that Sinn Fein has after all made itself heard at the Convention. Though it would be impossible for any member of the Convention to give information, I have had an outline of a plain speaking debate from one who has mixed with the members:

> Michael Knight is said to have made a grand speech . . . our Primate very genial. . . . We talked to many. A spirit of good humor and good will through it all . . . began by kissing the Protestant Bishop's ring. "It's the wrong ring, but it is a ring." . . . I wandered with a County Councilor. . . . He was full of "guarantees to the North." . . . I talked with many, and gathered that A. E. made the finest speech of all, every one impressed by it. The County Councilors very good, but some too verbose, and a great many harping on some small issue relating to their own district. Young Lysaght, a rather bitter and not courteous speech, but explaining the Sinn Fein spirit. Dunraven good. One Belfast member painting that town as a den of sweating enterprises. Answered by Hanna, a workman in Harland-Wolff, risen from the ranks, who now keeps his motor and insists wages are good and rates low and living in Belfast comfortable. They are apparently each giving out their views, and then later groups will form and discussions take place. . . . Many think the educated Sinn Feiners would accept Dominion constitution. The Sinn Feiners have promised a program of their own in October. . . . Yesterday they all flitted, and next week the Convention meets in Belfast, and the South are to be shown Harland and Wolff.

I think my critics will be glad to have this information pointing toward a better state of affairs.

New York. SHANE LESLIE.

Mail for Soldiers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

While doubtless many of your subscribers, the writer included, are happy to avail themselves of the opportunity of remailing their magazines to the American forces under a recent ruling of the Post Office Department, the thought has occurred to me, and I pass it on for what it may be worth, that owing to the fact that many of our religious magazines have on their covers large and bright pictures of our Blessed Lord and His Mother, and as these magazines are to be handled through the mails and distribution centers without wrappers, simply by having a one-cent stamp placed on them, it might not be a bad idea for these publications to change the adornment of their covers to some simple, conventional design, retaining their original pictures inside of the covers, if they so desire. I think this would eliminate a great deal of possible irreverence and even perhaps insure the delivery of the magazine to the soldiers more certainly than might otherwise be the case.

To the ordinary Catholic there is something more than jarring to see pictures of our Blessed Lord and His Mother placed in positions where they may be subjected to intentional irreverence.

Los Angeles. S. DURNERIN.

John the Scot and the Eucharist

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In Doctor Derry's interesting review of "The Mystic Vision of the Holy Grail" I find Scotus Eriugena associated with "Ratramnus, Berengarius and a few others" in the "unprecedented denial . . . of the doctrine of the Real Presence as held by the Faithful since the days of Christ." Perhaps the reviewer has made up his mind in the matter and is convinced that the great ninth-century Irishman did really deny this important doctrine of the Church. He is, of course, entitled to his opinion, and has the support of many learned authorities. There is, however, another side to the question. Doctor Floss, in his prove-mium to the works of John the Scot (Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. CXXII), brings forward reasons which convince me that we may interpret Eriugena on this point in the orthodox sense. Consequently, it seems to me that we should hesitate before adding a Eucharistic heresy to the errors into which this remarkable philosopher undoubtedly fell.

Washington, D. C. WILLIAM TURNER.

An Illustrious Convert

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the last issue of AMERICA appeared an article concerning Admiral Benson, which calls to mind a distinguished and noble convert about whom little has appeared in print, Francis M. Ramsay, one of the most illustrious of the young officers of the Civil War. He filled every position to which he was detailed with the greatest efficiency. He was one of the best superintendents the Naval Academy ever had, and finished his active naval career as Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, a position at that time equivalent to chief of staff.

Under God he probably could trace his conversion to his saintly wife, formerly Miss McMahon. He was an upright, straightforward, consistent Catholic, an honor to his profession and an honor to his Church. He died full of years and virtue.

New York. E. B. BARRY.

"The True Sceptic"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A few weeks ago I quoted in AMERICA the remarks of a correspondent in the London Times in explanation of the disrepute into which the doctrines of Herbert Spencer have fallen in these calamitous days. In the more recent issue of August 25, 1917, a correspondent, unquestionably the same, writes on "The True Sceptic—The Search for Truth," and it is worth while to note the drift of his musings, for they are in all probability more or less typical.

Man, he says, must seek truth, and, naturally, his search for the "Absolute, which for the Christian is God," is the highest search of all. Complete success in this quest for God can never be attained, "but we can always be advancing to a clearer knowledge though not always at the same rate of progress." We can and do know "something" of God—

> And this knowledge is sufficient justification for our conviction that the diligent inquirer may learn more and more of the mystery of His nature. This is the creed of the True Sceptic. He inquires because he knows something and would know more. In this faith he searches into the unknown. He is in no hurry to frame theories or seek to give his thought a systematic form. He accepts apparently irreconcilable propositions, recognizing that he cannot correlate them to each other or make them fit in with anything like a symmetrical system of thought, though each claims a place in the full circle of truth. God's sovereignty may be difficult to correlate with man's free-will, yet the True Sceptic sees no justification for denying the one or the other, because he finds it difficult to bring them together in a synthesis which will perfectly match his logic.

It is the problem of evil, that punctum pruriens, that is at the bottom of "a correspondent's" musings, as it must be also in the case of those for whom he mainly writes. Unlike Mr. Wells, however, he does not find it necessary to save what he calls the "moral character of God" at the cost of His omnipotence. Evil cannot be doubted; it is a grim "experience," apparent, inevitable, undeniable, but it does not substantiate the "doubt" of God's moral goodness. Quoting Thompson's lines:

"Is my gloom after all Shade of His hand outstretched caressingly?."

he insists that God's goodness is known to the "True Sceptic."

> He has purified his soul by discipline. Light has come here and there, and the vision splendid has at least sent its gleam to his soul. He has tested it in the alembic of experience and found it true. The light came from God. It was a divine act of self-disclosure—a self-disclosure of the Most High. The True Sceptic finds in that fact inspiration for his further quest for truth.

It might be inferred from the language quoted that the "knowledge" of God taken by "True Sceptic" as a starting point for further inquiry was merely "experience" in the Jamesian—or Wellsian—sense. But if "True Sceptic" and the writer on Herbert Spencer are one and the same, as I suspect, we must assume a rational basis for that knowledge, for, as readers will remember, in the former article he offered an argument for the existence of God closely parallel to the fourth of St. Thomas's proofs. It may be that he had in mind the well-known passage in Pascal: "Le coeur a des raisons que la raison ne connait point. C'est le cœur qui sent Dieu, et non la raison. Voilà ce qu' est la foi parfaite, Dieu sensible au cœur." But if he knew his Pascal well he would hardly have approached his problem from his present angle.

Between Mr. Wells and "True Sceptic" there is a world of difference, yet the motivation of both is one and the same. Both from the void of materialistic negation are reaching out to "God." Mr. Wells does so in a splay-footed, tactless, vulgar way which only just fails to conceal his sincerity. "True Sceptic" is vastly more intelligent and consequently more reverent and humble. It cannot be a wholly accidental coincidence.

Mt. Vernon, N. Y. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

Catholic and Social Action

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Garesche's timely article, "An Efficient Catholic Organization," in AMERICA of August 25, calls attention to the disorganized condition of our Catholic activities and makes a plea for the sodality as a link to bind together the various classes and divisions of our people. That we lack organization cannot be denied. The need of it is apparent on all sides. Though the harvest is over ripe and storm clouds threaten, many of us stand idly in the market place because no man hath hired us, while others, sorely grieved at seeing the bountiful crop imperiled, have gone unbidden into the fields and are doing a little desultory garnering without direction. The results of course are not perfect, for the workers are untrained and the crop is far too great to reap with pocket knives and sickles. We need a skilful husbandman with a modern binder.

It will be admitted, I believe, that the sodality is a most potent instrument for promoting the social activities of Catholics, at least in the sense that it arouses them to a realization of their duties, presents the proper motive, and inspires them with a desire to serve. The sodality is the ideal organization for the promotion of spiritual activities, but that it would be equally effective, as at present organized, in directing and coordinating Catholic energies in all the channels of social activity is not quite so certain.

It is a fact which many must have observed that the Catholic layman rarely puts forth his best energies in organizations, other than those of a purely spiritual character, in which the priest leads. In the exceptional case where he does exert himself to his utmost, I believe it will be found that the priest rather than the layman is exceptional.

It has been my privilege for many years to belong to a sodality, not one of the moribund or ambiguous type, but a true sodality of the Blessed Virgin, whose directors, without exception, have been men of great devotion to the Mother of God and untiring in their efforts to increase the number of her servants. Naturally, therefore, Father Garesche's plan of making the sodality the center of all parish activities appeals strongly to me, though there are difficulties even here, but when we broaden the field beyond the parish limits the difficulties are vastly increased.

The activities and progress of a sodality are usually in direct proportion to the zeal and energy which the director can put into it. The officers as a rule "cut but little figure." They are usually and properly chosen with the prime object of the sodality in mind, for piety rather than energy, for tractability rather than initiative.

There is nothing surprising in this, for we can readily appreciate the predicament of a director having on his hands as prefect, a high power motor rotating in the contrary direction, though I believe, a slight change in the wiring would in most cases correct this trouble. But even when the impossible happens and the most active and energetic man in the parish, a veritable Ignatius, is chosen prefect, for some unaccountable reason, he usually retires to Manresa to await the expiration of his term of office. It is evident of course, that this condition is not peculiar to sodalities, but on the contrary is quite general.

I once heard a good priest propose to an organization, city-wide in its scope, a course of action necessitating the raising of a large sum of money for a very laudable purpose. Though the cause was worthy, it was not in the line of work of this society, whose treasury had shortly before been drained of its last cent by similar calls upon its generosity, and which had also assumed obligations sufficient to tax its utmost endeavors for several years to come. This proposal, though in direct opposition to the will of the great majority, aroused only a murmur of dissent, and when put to a vote was passed apparently unanimously.

No sooner, however, had the meeting adjourned and the good man taken his leave, with all the satisfaction that follows a good deed well done, than many murmurs became quite audible, in fact some echoes may be heard even to the present time.

I may state that the priest had nothing to gain in the matter, but was actuated by the highest motives. The worthy man is sorely perplexed to this day at the failure of the organization to translate into action the resolution unanimously carried, the members of the society are disheartened and discouraged, its proper work has been utterly neglected, and for all practical purposes for over two years it has been as dead and as mute as the Guardians of Liberty in war time.

What is the reason for all this? Are energy and piety, so compatible in the priest, incompatible in the layman? Are we so accustomed to being led by our priests in matters spiritual that we look to them for leadership in every other sphere? Why should the number or effectiveness of societies in a parish be limited by the number of priests in that parish? Can the pastor, whose every waking moment is devoted to the faithful performance of the strictly priestly duties, be expected to furnish the motive power for every social and civic service?

It would seem that if the countless social problems which confront the church in this country are to be solved the dormant energy of the Catholic layman must be aroused and applied to them. Even at the risk of an occasional misstep he must learn to walk alone. His powers of initiative should be stimulated and encouraged so that he may acquire the confidence and courage that beget success.

Milwaukee, Wis. PETER F. MURPHY.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1917

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.
Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.
Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Peace by Christmas

THE criticisms evoked in the press of the United States and the nations of the Allies by the publication of the replies of the Austrian and German Governments to the Pope's peace proposals have made it clear that our hopes for an early cessation of hostilities have been unfounded, so far at least as they have been built on merely human considerations. Maximilian Harden's suggestion that a short armistice be agreed to before American and German troops clash on the Western front is a fond dream; and peace by Christmas, to judge from the present temper of the belligerents, would seem to be scarcely within the range of possibilities, not to say probabilities. Man apparently is powerless to stop the carnage.

But God can effect what man cannot do. The measure of iniquities may not yet be complete, nor the penalties they entail. But the hand of the Lord is not shortened; and no matter what may be true of us, it remains an eternal fact that His mercy is above all His works. The sins of the world may have turned away God's face from us, but He can yet be propitiated. The problem is how to placate His offended majesty. Of ourselves we may be, and doubtless are, unworthy to be heard, but we have an advocate who is extremely pleasing to Him. If our Blessed Lady would only re-enact the scene of the marriage feast of Cana and whisper to her Divine Son words like those which won from Him His first miracle, we might have peace by Christmas after all. Let us ask her by a nation-wide novena to do for us, her agonized children, what she did of old for embarrassed friends. The Queen of Peace is still, as she was then, the Mother of Christ.

Perhaps our prayers would have a greater efficacy, if we imparted to them a note of altruism, and, not content to ask peace for ourselves, added a petition for our harassed brethren below the border. If we made of our novena a double novena, and continued it to the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, the patroness of Mexico, and not only offered our Communions on December 8 in behalf of the world at large for rest from enemies from without, but also on December 10 in behalf of Mexico for rest from strife within, who knows but what in the book of life might be recorded this Christmas, as on the first Christmas, that the Christ-Child came unto His own, when the whole world was at peace?

Flexnerian Argument

BECAUSE of a long and intimate association with corporations founded on the theory that money can buy anything, Dr. Abraham Flexner has not unnaturally come to the conclusion that his ipse dixit is the final word on any given topic. It is more than likely, however, since the publication, by the favor of Mr. Rockefeller's Education Board, of "A Modern School," that this eminent expert has realized the danger of quoting figures to which others besides himself have access. Dr. Flexner, it will be remembered, "quoted figures to prove how egregiously we fail in teaching Latin," but his method of quotation was of a variety usually termed "garbling." Asserting that "in the examinations . . . 76.6 per cent of the candidates failed to make even a mark of 60 per cent in Cicero; 75 per cent failed to make a mark of 60 per cent in the first six books of Vergil," his case seemed demonstrated. These particular figures happen to be correct, but they are not complete. They represent two out of twelve Latin subjects, taken by only 128 out of a total of 5,979 pupils. To say that they prove the case against Latin, is like saying that the President of the United States is elected by the votes of Maine and Idaho. Dr. Flexner's attempt to show that most pupils fail in the study of Latin falls flat, when compared with the genuine figures. These testify that of the 5,979 pupils preparing for college, 59 per cent attained an average of 60 per cent or over in the Latin entrance examinations.

It thus appears that the sole point "proved" by the very statistics "quoted" by Dr. Flexner, is that this expert, eminent by his own appraisal; "egregiously" misrepresented the results of the Latin test set by the College Entrance Board in 1915. In the current School and Society, Professor Harris Hancock discusses Dr. Flexner's views on the teaching of mathematics, with rather unhappy results for the "expert." In "A Modern School" it had been suggested that arithmetic, algebra and geometry be taught "only as people have occasion to use them." Thus treated, these subjects "will shrink to modest proportions" in the school program.

> What is taught, when it is taught, and how it is taught, will in that event depend altogether on what is needed, when it is needed, and the form in which it is needed.

This beautifully balanced remark seems to indicate that Dr. Flexner looks on mathematics as a staple neatly tied in packages, and delivered at the area door, "when it is needed and in the form in which it is needed," solid, liquid or powder, like a shaving-soap. Professor Hancock, himself a mathematician, writes:

> If any one does not recognize how absurdly foolish this statement is, let him take a concrete example, and try to write down what mathematics is needed at the present time in the United States Navy.

Meanwhile, if rumor speaks true, the widely-heralded New York school, built on the Flexnerian model, falls short of the expectations of its founder. Practice and examination prove that Flexnerian theory, like Flexnerian argument, is essentially defective.

The Pope's Peace Note

THE enemies of the Papacy find it hard to do it justice. If the Pope speaks, his words, no matter how clear, are usually tortured out of their meaning, misinterpreted and misunderstood. According to them, a Papal document is a specimen of logical and verbal camouflage and must not be read in the light of the ordinary principles of critical analysis. Some cryptic and sinister meaning lurks behind its plainest and most obvious words. Evidences of this hostile and fundamentally false attitude can be seen in the view taken by the self-appointed critics of the peace note of Pope Benedict XV.

The Pope himself, his Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri, and the semi-official organ of the Vatican the Osservatore Romano, protest that the note of the Pontiff to the belligerent Powers was absolutely uninspired by German or Austrian influence; that it was due to the initiative of the Holy Father alone and to his sentiments of humanity, justice and charity. But these blind and bitter enemies of the Papacy detect in the document the clumsily disguised trail of the shifty and hypocritical statecraft of Vienna and Berlin. They do not tell us, however, how it is that the Pope should go for inspiration to the Cabinets of Austria or Germany in order to find a basis for a peace acceptable not only to the Central Powers, but to the world now leagued in arms against them. They do not stop to reflect that the faintest suspicion of a tainted origin to the Papal note would poison the whole document and that the Pope must have foreseen that in such a case his appeal was doomed to failure before its first words were penned.

If the sincerity of the Pope has been called into question it must not surprise us if the purpose of the note has been misunderstood. It has escaped the notice of the same class of critics that the document is not the draft of a definitive peace-treaty, with all the momentous questions, in litigation now before the world, finally and solemnly adjudicated. The note is scarcely even a protocol. It is merely a broad, tentative outline containing a few terms on which, it might be presumed that the belligerents, war-wearied and heart-sick of blood and slaughter, might agree. It is an attempt on the part of the Pontiff to get them together and to induce them to discuss in a friendly manner the possible terms on which they might be willing to end the strife. It is evident, then, that the language and the proposals of the Holy Father had to be such as would not at the very outset reasonably offend either party.

Hence, and it is here that one of the gravest mistakes has been made in the discussion and the criticism of the document, the Holy Father never intended that the note should formulate a doctrinal decision on the causes, the responsibilities, the moral issues, the thousand and one "cases of conscience" involved in the war. The note is simply an offer of diplomatic mediation, an effort inspired by the most unselfish motives, the purest humanitarianism, nay the very spirit of Christ, to put an end to the frightful slaughter and ruin which are filling the world with want, misery, degradation and death, and to open the way to a just and lasting peace. It is plain that in such a case the terms must appear at least adaptable to both belligerent groups. To imagine for a moment that in making such overtures the Pope should anathematize one or the other party, that he should decide on all questions of right or wrong and commit himself to a verdict as to the moral guilt of any one group of Powers, is to misunderstand the nature and the purpose of such a diplomatic act.

Although the Pope, in one instance, insists on the redress of a great wrong, when he insists on the complete political, military and economic restoration and independence of Belgium and the return of the provinces of northern France to their rightful owners, he does not propose to decide all the moral issues of the war. To do so now when the minds of the belligerents are still inflamed by the hate born of the long and savage contest, would be useless and unwise. He is showing a way sufficiently broad and safe for both parties which will lead them to the Temple of Peace, where they may settle all their grievances. If the statesmen that guide the destinies of the warring nations can be brought together to discuss in detail the issues at stake, the Pope is nobly optimistic enough to believe that they will find a way to an honorable and lasting peace. It is unjust to say that the infallible Pope, the guardian of morality, has failed to take cognizance of great moral issues. It might be answered that even in the document which the enemies of the Papacy criticize, Benedict XV has taken notice of them. Where the injustice was patent he has not been afraid to speak out in behalf of the moral law. But he saw that the problem now was not to sift the pros and cons which either side may allege as vindicating its case, but to separate the fighters, to say halt to them, and to convince them now that it is not impossible for them to agree to a fundamental peace basis acceptable to both. The Pope never intended to act as judge, but as mediator. The offices and duties of these two are totally different. It is because they have been confused that Benedict XV has been so unjustly criticized.

Death and the Physician

THE son of a Catholic home and the graduate of a Catholic college, Lieutenant William T. Fitzsimmons of Missouri, sailed last spring with the troops that went to France. His work was to save life, not to destroy it, for he nobly bore the noble title of physician. Well did he play his part in the never-ending fight against death, until the hour when a bomb, dropped from a German aeroplane, stilled the merciful hand forever. God's mercy searches out the soul that has known "the greater love," and William T. Fitzsimmons, a true Catholic, and, because of his Faith a true physician, assuredly gave up his life that other men might live.

The beauty of this young American's sacrifice is heightened by the action of a body of men, calling themselves physicians, who sat last week in Chicago. According to the press reports, the net result of their deliberations was a resolution to legalize the murder "of the aged, and of infirm or suffering persons who desire death." In other words, these false physicians propose to introduce into civilized life, practices once common enough among barbarians, but now confined to the most degraded savages.

There is little reason to suppose that this thoroughly pagan proposal will be countenanced by any American legislature. For reasons in which both sentiment and science play a part, reputable physicians today are slow to pronounce any case "hopeless," but prefer to work on the theory that while there is life, there is hope. Apart, however, from both sentiment and science, the case can be reduced to very simple terms. God alone is the master of life and death. Sickness confers no right to commit suicide, nor is any physician or legislature justified in killing a man simply because he is "aged, infirm or suffering."

Sauce for the Gander

THE meetness and justice of serving with the gander the same kind of sauce that accompanies the goose to the table has always appealed forcibly to fair-minded folk, and the point is ably stressed once more in the course of a notice in the July Dublin Review about a recent book called "Shelley in England." From letters, now published for the first time, written to his father by the youthful author of "The Necessity of Atheism," it is clearer than ever that Shelley, consummate poet though he was, in his private life was a despicable cad. As the reviewer well brings out, this selfish egotist "who wrote largely of the love of his kind," was "unkind to nearly everyone of mankind's representatives with whom he came into personal relation. . . . in denying the Divine, Shelley came in his daily life to deny the human." In money matters "he was the most abjectly mean of men"; when he had contracted a clandestine marriage with a schoolgirl, he sought "to cover himself by an appeal to laws he disowned, and a creed by which his own conduct was not ruled," and when by eloping with another woman he drove his child-wife to suicide, he then wrote fiercely about the tyranny of priests and kings.

Shelley's adoring biographers have been accustomed to gloss over and palliate these grave moral blemishes in his character, for a great deal, forsooth, must be pardoned a genius. The Ten Commandments were not meant to bind sacred bards. But let a churchman lapse but a little from his high professions and what a scornful cry goes up from the ranks of the Philistines! As Shelley's reviewer admirably observes:

> The world demands of the Church, and most righteously, that her pontiffs and her priests should live their doctrines. It is a stark test, and who shall bear it? We, at least, have no alternative. "By their fruits ye shall know them"—more and more will that Divine formula, which brings us back to the flesh, which recalls us from creeds to conduct, displace all mere words. But what the world asks of the Church, and the Church lives by conceding, the Church, by all these sung laws of fraternity and equality, has a right to ask of the world. Republican poets, let us have no privileged classes! We have a right to demand from the new teachers who are out to supplant the old, from Shelley a century gone, from Mr. Wells today, the old credentials, guarantees, sanctions. We have a right to contrast Swinburne's sonorous praises of liberty with the callous face he turned toward distressed Ireland, or the shameful bloody lust of his allusions to Boer dams and cubs. Because these men come as supplanters of the Cross and proclaimers of a new doctrine, they impose on us the hateful task of marking the separation—so inartistic, if only that—between their literature and their lives. And Shelley could be this perverted son, brother, husband, friend, fellow man, and yet one of the "holy poets," nearly the most divine dispenser of words ever set in our midst.

The point is excellently scored. Let the sauce that is so graciously tendered the goose be just as lavishly granted to the gander.

An Important Collegiate Event

A PRELIMINARY attempt was made at the close of the preceding scholastic year to interest the teachers and authorities of our various Catholic academies, colleges and universities, as well as the student body, in the work of the foreign missions. The response given to the movement was at the time highly gratifying to its promoters. With the opening of the new school year this appeal will doubtless be renewed and constructive work begun. The practical results should show themselves in the formation of mission organizations, whether as sodality sections or separate societies, in all our institutions of higher learning.

It was not at the request of the promoters of this movement, which promises such glorious results for the Church, that these lines were written. They were suggested by an editorial in the North American Student. This Protestant student organ strongly insists with the young men and women in the various non-Catholic institutions of higher learning upon the need of "far more missionary knowledge, imparted through study classes, reading circles and public addresses." Such is precisely the purpose of the new Catholic student movement, which without hesitation we may designate as the most important event of the day in Catholic educational circles. The signal accomplishments of non-Catholic students in the cause of Protestant evangelization should at least be paralleled by our own colleges. During the past year Protestant student volunteers contributed $247,424 to the foreign-mission cause, partly by their own donations, and partly by the money collected from the faculties and pupils of the public or private institutions of learning in which these mission societies flourish.

Far more than all this, they are able to refer in their report for 1916 to the enlistment of 444 "sailed" volunteers. This augments the total number of volunteers who have entered the active mission field, since the foundation of the student volunteer movement in 1886, to 6,934. That such magnificent results were the effect of persistent efforts and thorough student organization is evident.

Reports of mission activities were received this year from 1,013 educational institutions. How many mission organizations have flourished during this same period in our own Catholic institutions? Are we looking ahead or are we satisfied with merely viewing our glorious opportunities?

A description of the nature of this work, as carried on by Protestant students, and some practical suggestions for its introduction into our own academies, colleges and universities were given in AMERICA at the close of the preceding scholastic year. Catholic college authorities, teachers and students still have the opportunity offered them for promoting the great cause of the Church, the propagation of God's Kingdom throughout the world. Does not the fact that wealthy Catholics have hitherto almost entirely ignored the foreign missions seem to argue that our Catholic institutions for the youth of both sexes have failed to inspire their students with the sublime ideal of the catholicity of the Catholic Church, and have also failed to inspire them with a practical zeal for its utmost realization? This can be accomplished in no other way than by insistently promoting the interests of the foreign missions. The results are certain soon to manifest themselves whether in mission contributions and apostleship at home, or else in personal dedication to God's service in the field afar. We must not permit the present opportunity to slip by. The most momentous interests of the Church are at stake. The enlistment of millions of young men in the armies of the world should be an impelling argument to urge enlistment in the great cause of Christ.

Literature

THE WORLD'S GREATEST BOOK

The Bible is the inspired word of God. As such it has a right to our respect and a supreme claim to our submission and acceptance. As the inspired and infallible utterance of the Deity, it holds a position unique in history. But the Bible is not only God's book in the truest meaning of the word, it is the world's noblest literary treasure. Even were we not to consider it as God's book, written for our spiritual needs and instruction, sealed with the Divine authority of His message and the wisdom of His teaching, it would still occupy a position absolutely unique. In theme and treatment, in originality, power and beauty, in unity and variety, in simplicity and sublimity; by its startling contrasts all blending into the stern inflexibility of its one single purpose, by the marked individuality yet universality of its appeal, by its epic grandeur and tragic catastrophes, in melting pathos and idyllic charm, it is without a peer or a rival, it will never be surpassed. In perfection of form the classic literature of Greece and Rome may be superior to that of the Hebrew writers. Among the giants who shed an undying luster on the little tribe locked in the fastnesses of Palestine, there were no great tragic writers like Sophocles, whose "Œdipus Rex" is perhaps the most harmoniously planned and most faultlessly executed work the world has seen. But the "thought is more than the expression, the kernel more than the shell," and in substance, in depth, in the hold which it has over the human heart in every race and clime, the Bible surpasses every other book. It dwells in a region and an atmosphere peculiarly its own and to which others may not aspire.

The Bible is the true universal history. The book is as wide as the world, as deep as the heart, as sublime as the heavens. In its pages are to be found the destiny and the annals of mankind, the very thoughts and secrets of God. Of all books, it alone authoritatively records the birth of time, when the new earth in virgin beauty clad wheeled into space and the stars sang their morning hymn. Alone of all the records of men it has dared to describe the hour when the heavens will be folded up as a scroll and the Angel of the Judgment will swear by the living God that time shall be no more. Genesis is the story of the birth of a world; the Apocalypse is a mournful threnody over the end of all created things. In the former Moses writes with the freshness and innocence of childhood marveling over the loveliness of a fairy tale, yet unconsciously carried into the regions of the sublime by the very beauty of the story. In the latter John, the eagle-eyed, chronicles the closing act, the tragic catastrophe of the world-drama and then is swept to the heights of vision and song as he describes the new Jerusalem coming in her bridal garb to meet her Lord. The idyl and the dirge, fact and prophecy, the old and the new, time and eternity, meet in the first and the last syllables of this marvelous book.

Between Genesis and the Apocalypse are all the emotions, all the passions, and joys and sorrows, all the virtues, all the sanctities, all the vices and crimes which can stir or move, defile or ennoble the human heart. There Moses sings his hymn of triumph as the horse and its rider and the chariots of Pharaoh roll weltering in the waves; and David mourns over Saul and Jonathan slain on the high places, the two dread warriors swifter than eagles, stronger than lions. There a Virgin exults in spirit and magnifies her Lord because she is to become the Mother of her God. Gather together all the thoughts and feelings which can agitate humanity. They are all in the Bible. God, Nature, Man—these are its themes.

That book, says Goethe, "is not the book of a nation, but the book of nations, because it places before us the fortunes of one nation as a symbol unto all the rest, because it connects the history of this one people with the origin of the world, and by a series of earthly and spiritual developments, of facts necessary and accidental, continues it unto the remotest regions of the farthest eternities." The Bible is written practically in its entirety by men of Jewish blood. On every page, even when the language is Greek, there is an unmistakable Hebrew color. Every thought has been fused in the Hebrew mold. Language, customs, manners, religion, traditions, civilization, prejudices, opinions: all that is decidedly Hebraic. It is impossible to mistake them. No book is more nationalistic, in one sense more narrow. It tells the tale of a single race, it is confined to the formes, material and spiritual, of a single people dwelling in a single province insignificant in comparison with its neighbors and still more so with regard to the larger bustling world around it; small, tradition-bound and unprogressive. Yet no book is more universal in its appeal. No other has so deeply stirred the heart of humanity. Not one of those who deny its Divine inspiration and authority has dared to deny its magic hold on the passing generations. For in that book the very soul of man is laid bare. We read humanity's secrets there as if we held its quivering heart pulsating within our palm. The great artists of the Bible have depicted as on a tapestry of colossal size but rare and marvelous texture and color the history of the human race, the birth of worlds, the creation of angels and men, the fall of empires, the death of princes and kings; battles, sieges, murders dark and bloody in the palaces of eastern monarchs, strife, treachery and hatred under the shepherd's tent, epic battles and pastoral idyls, the heroism of the patriot dying for the fatherland, the purity of the Hebrew boy repelling the assaults of the temptress, the repentance of a man after God's own heart prostrate in the dust at the recollection of his ingratitude towards the God who had anointed him king. A wonderful book that opens with the voice of Jehovah breaking the eternal silence in Genesis and closes with the trash of the Angel's trumpet in the Apocalypse; where we assist at the birth of the stars and the dissolution of all things, where Jehovah is shown to us as dwelling in light inaccessible and yet appears a helpless Babe wrapped in swaddling bands in a manger; where the God who laid the buttresses of the everlasting hills, the source of life to all that lives, who spoke to His people amid the thunders of Sinai, dies in ignominy and shame on the Cross.

Across its majestic pages the shadows fall of the great empires of the world. There loom the walls and the hanging gardens of Babylon, the barbaric and the towers of Nineveh, the massive tiers of the Pyramids and the cold, sarcastic smile of the Sphinx. In its chronicles we hear the muffled footsteps of the hosts of Persia, the shout of the embattled legions of the Consuls and the Cæsars of Rome. Above all these rise the turrets, the towers, the palaces of Sion, the loved walls of Jerusalem, the city of the heart, the Prophets, the Kings of Judah, the City of Peace, the City of the Son of God. The bowers of Eden, the tents of Abraham under the oaks of Mambre, the field where Ruth garnered the sheaves, the Tabernacle in the wilderness, the Temple with its courts, its sacrifices, its altar, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Golgotha—these are the scenes where its story is laid, where its idyls and sacred tragedies are enacted.

What a book, where history has all the charm of a fairy tale and the most astounding marvels are vouched for by the infallible word of God! What other volume has dared to tell of a host walking dry-shod through the waves of the Red Sea, of the waters of the Jordan arching their waves in the majesty of their pained flight over the Ark of the living God, or of a mortal putting his hands on the bridle of the fiery horses of the sun and stopping them in their course in the heavens, of One laid in the tomb and rising from the dead? Since the days of Job, no mortal man has dared to enter into discussion and debate with the Creator. Since the harp of Sion has been silenced, no lyre has ever sounded a solemn and tender a chord as vibrated under the wizard sway of the inspired singer of the Psalms, or in the mournful harmonies in which Jeremiah wailed the sins and the sorrows of his people. What epic can compare with that of Joshua, and Gideon, of David and the Macchabees? In what literature is there a more triumphant and martial strain than that of Debora in which the kings of the routed hosts of Sisera? Greek genius never invented so tragic, so touching a story, as the wondrous history over which even the cynical Voltaire dropped a tear, that of Joseph and his brethren. The pen of Tacitus never wielded in nobler majesty the awful pages where Ezechiel scourges the vices and the crimes of his worldly generation. The mind of Plato never dreamt of the sublime vision, the majestic utterances of the princely Isaias; the tender heart of Vergil could never imagine that scene in which a God clad in the vesture of our humanity should nestle as a Babe in a Virgin's arms, clasp innocent children to His heart, make ignorant fishermen His friends, and speak to the repentant sinner only words of forgiveness and love.

And in every word, in every thought there is the echo and the impress of the Divinity. Authority, power, unction, majesty, calm, are stamped on these sacred pages. Dryden was not mistaken when he said of the world's greatest book, that in > Style majestic and divine,

> It speaks no less than God in every line;
> Commanding words whose force is still the same,
> As the first fiat that produced our frame.

And the heavens shall grow old as a garment, like a scroll and a parchment they shall be rolled up. The words, the teachings, the schools of the learned, the thoughts of the poets and the sages of the world will fascinate men for a day. This Book is dowered of God with immortality and a beauty that will never know decay. It is God's word and it lasts forever.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Ebb and Flow of Life. New Stories for Old and Young. In Four Volumes. By KONRAD KÜMMEL. Translated from the Third and Fourth German Editions, with the Permission of the Author, by a Father of St. Bede Abbey, Peru, Illinois. The English Translations printed by the Mission Press at Techny, Ill. $5.00.

The way of the translator, like that of the transgressor, is hard; for the translation is truest when it is likest the original in style, and the translator to realize this perfection of approach must be proficient to no ordinary degree in two tongues. The translation of these volumes of Kümmel's is for the most part well done. Bits of description stand out for their beauty, and the narrative reads with vividness and rapidity. But there are lapses from idiom and crudities of expression that lean to the German mode rather than to the English, and there are numerous typographical errors and weird hyphenations which a more careful proof-reading might have corrected.

The stories themselves are full of interest, instruction and edification. There are tales of political intrigue, religious persecution, romance and realism. History is drawn upon freely to supply the element of place, plot, or persons, especially the periods of the Protestant Reformation, the Kulturkampf, and the Italian Revolution. Edification is found in the theme of mothers' enduring love, tender devotion to Our Lady, and the grace of deathbed conversions. There are stories to show the baleful effects of evil reading, the disastrous results of mixed marriages, the sweet Providence of God, and the wisdom of His ways. The stories are alive with the breath of Catholicism; hardly a one but deals with some priest or some Sister. It is good to have these books in English, for we have nothing quite like them. "The Convent Violin," "Salve Regina," "Of a Cowl Only," "The Last Priest," "The Little Bell of St. Xavier," "Dame Benedicta's Crucifix," "The Augustinian Nun," "The Funeral of the Pope," are eight of the most characteristic and interesting of the entire group of these thirty-eight thoroughly Catholic tales. C. L. B.

Factories, Poems by MARGARET WIDDEMER. $1.25; Portraits and Protests. By SARAH N. CLEGHORN. $1.25. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

The Answering Voice: One Hundred Love-Lyrics by Women. Selected by SARA TEASDALE. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25.

In the first of these volumes of women's verse there is nothing more musical and moving than the poem which gives the book its title. The opening stanza runs thus:

I have shut my little sister in from life and light
(For a rose, for a ribbon, for a wreath across my hair);
I have made her restless feet still until the night,
Locked from sweets of summer and from wild spring air;
I who ranged the meadowlands, free from sun to sun,
Free to sing and pull the buds and watch the far wings fly,
I have bound my little sister till her playing-time was done—
Oh, my little sister, was it I? Was it I?

A like tender pity for the children and maidens who have to toil hard for the pittance that enables them to keep body and soul together has inspired the best poems in Miss Widdemer's book. Particularly worthy of mention are "The New Spinning Song," "The Beggars," "A Christmas Doll," "The Old Town," which is full of melody, and "A Country Carol," which is a novel Christmas hymn. There are some sweet love-songs, too, in the book, a number of poems to hearten the suffragists, and some more somber ones about "The Border Country."

Among the "Portraits" in Sarah N. Cleghorn's volume, "Dorothea," "The Sisterly Child," "Margaret Mary," and the poem telling why Sister Stanislaus valued so highly "Treasure Island," show this discerning author's love for children, and among the "Protests" there is none more effective than the ironical quatrain:

The golf links lie so near the mill
That almost every day
The laboring children can look out
And see the men at play.

The compiler of "The Answering Voice" has gathered together one hundred love-lyrics written by women since the middle of the last century. The majority of the authors represented are Americans, though Elizabeth Barrett Browning and Christina Rossetti, as was to be expected, each contribute more than anyone else. The anthology seems rather disappointing, for most readers will doubtless be under the impression that women have written finer love-lyrics than the average quality of this volume indicates. Here are the stanzas selected from Louise Imogen Guiney's poems:

When on the marge of evening the last blue light is broken,
And winds of dreamy odor are loosened from afar,
Or when my lattice opens before the lark hath spoken
On dim laburnum-blossoms and morning's dying star,

I think of thee (oh, mine the more if other eyes be sleeping!)
Whose greater noonday splendors the many share and see,
While sacred and forever some perfect law is keeping
The late, the early twilight alone and sweet for me.

W. D.

A Son of the Middle Border. By HAMLIN GARLAND. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.60.

In this autobiography, Hamlin Garland gives a picture of the Middle West of fifty years ago when the homesteads of today were pioneer camps. The land between Wisconsin and the Dakotas was settled by people from our northern States and from the countries of northern Europe, and among the first settlers the Garlands represented those who carried New England west of the Mississippi. The writer unfolds country life as it really was, its squalor and ugliness as well as its glory and poetry. On political and public events the writer hardly touches in his resumé of half a century, yet his excellent character-sketches throw much light on those events. Hamlin Garland pours himself out in this book, revealing his own life and its longings as well as those of kindred and neighbors.

The reader pleasantly follows Mr. Garland breaking with the life on the farm to seek his fortune in the realm of letters. Ever the poet, as his books show him, he was brave to battle with poverty till he won a welcome from the growing group of American authors. His story of the Anti-Poverty and Populist movements as they affected his career is one of the finest parts of his autobiography. His career as a fictionist really began at this time. "My eyes were opened," he tells us, "to the enforced misery of the pioneer. As a reformer my blood was stirred to protest." His mental attitude was embodied in the stories that he sent to first-class magazines only to have them returned. "Give us charming love stories," pleaded the editors. But Garland replied that he had come to tell the truth about the barnyard's daily grind. Other writers were telling the truth about the city; he had lived the farm life and was going to picture it truthfully. The author has told in vivid fashion not only his own life-story, but the history of a generation in American life. G. C. T.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Abingdon Press, New York:
With the Children. In Lewis Carroll's Company. By William Valentine Kelley. $0.75.

Allyn & Bacon, New York:
Exercises in Latin Versification. By Leo T. Butler, S.J. $0.75.

George Banta Publishing Co., Menasha:
A Child's Book of Verses. By Raymond E. Manchester.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Thursdays with the Blessed Sacrament. By the Rev. C. McNeiry. $0.95; Manna of the Soul. A Book of Prayer for Men and Women. Compiled by Rev. F. X. Lasance. $1.50.

American Book Co., New York:
Burke's Speeches at Bristol, Previous to the Election and Declining the Poll. Edited by Edward Bergin, S.J. $0.20.

The Arthur H. Clark Co., Cleveland:
A Social History of the American Family from Colonial Times to the Present. By Arthur W. Calhoun, Ph.D. Vol. I. Colonial Period. $5.00 a volume.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
Scouting with General Funston. By Everett T. Tomlinson. Illustrated by J. E. Allen. $1.25; Parnassus on Wheels. By Christopher Morley. $1.25.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Army and Navy Information. Uniforms, Organizations, Arms and Equipment of the Warring Powers. By Major De Witt Clinton Falls, N. G. N. Y. Illustrated by six color plates and thirty line cuts by the Author. $1.00; Hospital French. Questions and General Conversation. (English-French). Translated by Ernest Perrin. $0.25; Under Fire. The Story of a Squad. By Henry Barbusse. Translated by Fitzwater Wray. $1.50; The Spires of Oxford and Other Poems. By W. M. Letts. $1.25.

J. Fischer & Brother, New York:
Missa et Absolutio pro Defunctis. By Pietro A. Yon. $0.35.

Ginn & Co., Boston:
Caesar in Gaul and Selections from the Third Book of the Civil War. With Introduction, Review of First-Year Syntax, Notes, Grammar, Prose Composition, and Vocabularies. By Benjamin L. D'Ooge and Frederick C. Eastman.

Hathaway & Bros., Philadelphia:
Modern Poems of D. F. Hallahan. Illustrated by Herbert D. Senat.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Gold Cache. By James Willard Schultz. With Illustrations by George Varian. $1.25; The Inn of Disenchantment. By Lisa Ysaye. $1.25; The Man in the Ranks. By John Gallishaw and William Lynch, U. S. Army. $1.00; The Answering Voice. One Hundred Love-Lyrics by Women. Selected by Sara Teasdale. $1.25; The Newcomers. By Elia W. Peattie. Illustrations by B. F. Rosenmeyer. $1.25; The Dot Signal Book for Boys and Girls. By Clifford L. Sherman. $0.50; The Wanderers. By Mary Johnston. $1.75; Cloud Boat Stories. By Olive Roberts Barton. $1.50; Northern Diamonds. By Frank Lillie Pollock. Illustrated. $1.25.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
The Three Black Pennys. By Joseph Hergesheimer. $1.50; Palestine, the Rebirth of an Ancient Nation. By A. M. Hyamson. Illustrated. $1.50.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Early Philadelphia, Its People, Life and Progress. By Horace Mather Lippincott. With 120 Illustrations. A Limited Edition. $6.00; The Raccoon Lake Mystery. Further Adventures of Mason Brant. By Nevil Monroe Hopkins. With Illustrations in Color by Gayle Hoskins. $1.35; Opening the West with Lewis and Clark. By Edwin L. Sabin. Illustrated by Charles H. Stephens. $1.25; The Water Babies. By Charles Kingsley. Illustrated by Maria L. Kirk. $1.35; Lippincott's Home Manuals. Successful Canning and Preserving. By Ola Powell. $2.00.

Marshall, Jones Co., Boston:
The Substance of Gothic. Six Lectures on the Development of Architecture from Charlemagne to Henry VIII. By Ralph Adams Cram. $1.50.

EDUCATION

Science in the Curriculum

WRITING in the September Catholic World on "The Anomaly of Modern Education," Mr. Joseph V. McKee gives a suggestive historical survey of the tendencies which have shaped educational theory and practice since the seventeenth century. A masterly analysis of the influence of Bacon, Rousseau, Pestalozzi, Froebel, Herbart and Spencer makes one realize the continuous series of causes responsible for modern education outside of Catholic schools, and deserves the attention of educators. But when Mr. McKee, concluding his historical survey, begins to interpret its data, he is not, I think, so fortunate. The older system based on the classics and mathematics, he seems to hold, was and is purely disciplinary, while the modern course, based almost exclusively on science, is a mere content curriculum. "How," he asks, "can modern education, based upon the mere content theories of Ratke, Comenius, Rousseau, Froebel, Pestalozzi, Herbart and Spencer, accomplish this ideal [the gradual adjustment of the individual to the spiritual possessions of the race] set up by the very educators who sanction the teachings of the former?" and continues to contrast the modern "content" system with the older "discipline" system. But educational life as little admits of being neatly imprisoned in a dilemma as any other living thing. There is not, in fact, so complete a disjunction between the older and newer systems as the formula, "either you educate for discipline or for content," suggests. It cannot be denied that, in learning the classics and mathematics, in addition to discipline, a considerable amount of content is acquired. On the other hand, science, properly taught, will produce not merely a fund of information, but a definite and very valuable discipline of mind.

An Unwarranted Assumption

SCIENCE, in Mr. McKee's opinion, has scarcely any significance as an educational factor. With his condemnation of the teaching of science in the grade schools we are in accord, not, however, because it lacks educational value even there, but because the time spent in the grades is needed for more fundamental subjects. But with his views on science in the secondary schools we are utterly at variance. "For the most part," he writes, "science studies are mere content studies. They are informative studies only. And any study that merely gives information is of little value for disciplining the mind."

> It is true that it does improve the powers of observation; it is true that it does strengthen the memory; but it fails in the most essential requisite, in the only real value that a study can have: it seldom trains the mind to think or the judgment to act. After long contact with some of our most capable science teachers the writer has found the complaint the same in every instance, whether in zoology, botany, biology, chemistry or physics; the pupil will do all the work of observing and experimenting, but when a conclusion must be deduced, he fails absolutely to do any original thinking, and the work then devolves upon the teacher. . . . The study of science is so poorly adapted to the training of the mind, beyond the memory and observation, that it resolves itself into a mere imparting of information that anyone can get by going to the proper page in the encyclopedia.

The tacit assumption underlying this indictment is that science is, and must necessarily be, taught as a mere content branch, and poorly at that. But is it so certain that there are no teachers who insist on the pupils getting the full benefit of science, by making them reason on the facts observed, or that the pupils, thus trained, do not acquire a scientific habit of mind?

Competent Teaching

THE competent teacher is able to teach science in such a way that caution, accuracy, a habit of inductive and deductive reasoning, all in fact, that is implied in calling science "natural philosophy," will result. Certainly, if science be made a mere informative subject, the pupil might as well be told to consult the encyclopedia; but if the classics be studied in the same way, as is possibly the case, it would be as well to go to the proper page in the facile and ubiquitous translation. But the sciences need not be taught as a mere content branch, and there is no cogent reason for the assumption that mathematics and the classics are usually, and the sciences rarely, taught in an efficient manner.

Moreover, even if science were a mere content study, it cannot be legislated out of the schools at this late hour. Science has come to stay. Dr. Flexner, in his one-sided advocacy of science and nothing but science, calls for no sympathy; on the other hand, unreasonable criticism of science will not better the case for the classics. There is room and need for both science and the classics in the same course; to neglect either is to court an unsymmetrical mental development. To minimize the significance of science as an educational factor is to ignore the fact that since the seventeenth century science has achieved glorious results in its own sphere, and has earned its right to a place in the curriculum.

The New Development

IT is quite as futile to refuse science a just place in the curriculum of the twentieth century as it would have been to attempt, after the thirteenth century, to treat theology and philosophy without employing "the strict discipline of the Schoolmen, which gave the world such men as St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Dominic." The Church accepted the situation when the intellectual framework of Christian thought was shifted from the Platonism of earlier days to the Aristotelianism of Aquinas. Today when the basis of secular thought has been shifted to science, the Church will accept and assimilate what is best in the new discoveries of human thought. It is useless to quarrel with the fact that the significance of science is greater than it ever was. The fact will not change. We must change. Surely, it is possible to give credit to the older educational system without disparaging the newer. Any other attitude ignores the development of education.

Finally it would be injurious to the classics, as well as to theology, philosophy and mathematics to discard or minimize science. The benefits conferred on these and other extra-scientific subjects are apparent in many ways. Who can regret the scientific methods that have revolutionized the study of history? In philosophy and theology, what lacunae would appear, were all the aids conferred on these subjects by science suddenly taken away; while the impetus given to the study of the classics themselves by scientific criticism, archeology and philology is clear.

A. G. Brickel, S.J.

ECONOMICS

Benefits and Burdens

IT is fair that a tax upon a commodity should be paid by the consumer, as should the entire cost of production, including wear and tear to the human machines employed. It is also fair that any added cost of distribution or transportation should result in an increased price to the consumer, rather than in a forced decrease of the producer's selling price. As a matter of fact, every step from producer to consumer, including gaudy labels, fancy packages, adulterations and drug preservatives, is paid for by the consumer. Even the purchase of a freight car, the building of a factory and the plowing of a field, result in as certain a tax upon the consumer of the article carried, manufactured or grown, as though it were levied directly by the Government. The public is, therefore, vitally interested in obtaining the elimination of every unnecessary step or process along the article's journey, and in ascertaining that every necessary step be performed properly and economically.

It is quite as much for the public welfare and the maintenance of the machinery of commerce, that each person who performs a necessary service during the progression from producer to consumer, be properly compensated. Proper compensation should allow for a decent living for the worker and his family, provision for the future and for old age, and insurance. In other words, to him who has assumed a burden should be given the corresponding benefit.

This is the Christian doctrine of benefits and burdens, this is Christian cooperation, but today whoever casts his bread upon the waters may observe how the big fish get all the feast. But let toil and hardship be suggested, and just as quickly the poor and overworked are given an enforced monopoly. In human society, benefits tend to work upward and burdens downward. All obviously good things, such as a living wage, steady employment, sanitary and pleasant environment, vacations, pay when sick, comfortable shelter, nourishing food, sufficient pleasures, insurance, pensions, education, and the rest, very rarely are enjoyed by that vast multitude which fills our factories, our mines and our mills. But let the Government place a tax on anything or anybody, for any purpose, war or peace, and immediately the burden of that tax is shifted down until it reaches the already submerged.

The Accepted Solution

WHAT seems to be the accepted solution of this condition? Get money! Let each individual get and hold as much money as he possibly can, and as quickly as he knows how, whether by restraining commerce, or otherwise. With money a man can secure all benefits and pleasures, and avoid all burdens and toil. Of course this doctrine of pagan individualism contemplates a government restricted to the duties merely of a prize-ring referee. Governmental activities outside of the designated scope create great indignation among the "interests." For example, it was perfectly correct, under the draft law, that the young men of our country should give themselves up, principal and interest, to the service of the State; but the State's attempt to touch the excess profits (not the principal, simply the excess profits) evoked an extraordinary activity against so "undemocratic" and "un-American" a proposal. As one of our great weeklies thoughtlessly remarked, criticizing the proposed tax on excess profits: "It is essentially an objectionable tax; for taxing high profits that are not due to monopoly, means taxing initiative, invention, enterprise, exceptional ability." This contention is cruel beyond measure.

Share and Share Alike

IN the first place the killing or crippling of our young men is at least equally a loss to the country of initiative, invention, enterprise, and exceptional ability, and secondly, the President's appeal was for the concentration of the nation's entire energy to win the war. They are but sorry patriots who will not use their talents unless they are permitted to take all for themselves. What would happen to the initiative, invention, enterprise, and exceptional ability of those at home, if the enemy broke through the initiative of those at the front? It is very evident that the welfare of those at home and of those on the firing line is a matter of direct and whole-hearted cooperation. Would our business men accept all the benefits of protection, but avoid the burden of paying for it? Surely their gold is not more precious than the lives of our citizens. If our young men must risk their lives for their country there is nothing unreasonable, un-American, or inconsistent with liberty in asking the others to risk their dollars.

Conscript the Dollars

EVERY citizen should contribute to the war fund in proportion to his ability. This method of conscripting dollars would not touch our industries, would not interfere with trade, would leave taxes practically as they were before the war, would prevent the cry of increased taxes as an excuse for raising prices, would pass on to the next generation no appreciable share of the war's financial burden in the form of taxation to meet interest charges and matured loans, and would tend very greatly to discourage disturbers of world peace. Above all, it would strike a nice balance between the benefits and the burdens of war that would prevent the benefits from working upward in society, and the burdens from working downward.

Finally, while our lives and property are protected by the soldiers and sailors called into the service, these men are to be deprived of a large part of their pay to provide insurance for their dependents. Is this fair? Conscripts should be provided with insurance as well as with ammunition.

Robert E. Shortall.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Is Kerensky a Jew?

THE report that the Socialist Premier of Russia is a Jew has been frequently repeated. The statement, says the American Israelite, will surprise nobody:

> This is in harmony with Zangwill's clever remark, that every genius must pay such penalty of his fame. We have a long list of these pseudo-Jewish celebrities. Aristotle and Horace, Columbus and Napoleon, Graham Bell and Otto Lilienthal, Masséna and Gambetta, Gabriel d'Annunzio, Rudyard Kipling, Henry Irving and Herman Sudermann, Pius IX, Cardinal Howard, Archbishop Neto, and St. Patrick, even antisemites like Drumont and Richard Wagner, not to speak of Bismarck and Frederick the Great, were not immune against this libel. Thus we are well represented in all countries and in all departments of human activity, inventors, actors, authors, statesmen and even monarchs. In the case of Kerensky we even receive what is supposed to be inside information. A Russian Jew of Chicago, who exercises the caution not to publish his name, knew Feivish Kerensky, a leader in the Wilna Jewish community, who afterwards moved to Saratov, where he was converted to Christianity. He is the father of the Russian statesman upon whom the eyes of the world are turned just now. The latter has a first cousin named Hannah, living somewhere in Illinois, no exact address given. The "Jew" Horace said: Credat Judaeus Apella.

Thus the rumor may probably be laid to rest for a time.

A Banner-Carrier of Christ

RECENTLY there died at St. Stanislaus College, Bay St. Louis, Miss., one of the most successful Christian educators of the South, Brother Charles of the Order of the Brothers of the Sacred Heart, for a long period the director of St. Aloysius College at Vicksburg. His life offers no brilliant episodes, but like the lives of countless other religious teachers throughout the land, was in itself a single and continued act of heroism.

> Gifted by nature with an iron constitution, Brother Charles never wearied in his work, but the severe strain of forty continuous years in the classroom sapped his strength, and in 1911 he was sent to Baton Rouge that the lighter work might give him opportunity for rest. Only the Recording Angel and He whom Brother Charles served, know the good he accomplished there. Many a man owes his present position and happiness to the encouragement and influence of Brother Charles. He never asked anything for himself, but after exhausting his own scant means of charity, hesitated not to importune those who could help him if they would.

Recalled from his post in 1916, with broken health, the victim of a cancerous growth, he soon asked to resume his work. His request was granted, and his labors in the cause so dear to his heart continued until close to the end, when he prepared in prayer to meet his Lord. He is one of the many thousands whose names are unrecorded in the annals of fame, but who have been the true heroes, the banner-carriers who have won for Christ the battles fought for souls.

Distribution of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Fund

REFERRING to the Armenian and Syrian relief fund, the Ave Maria calls attention to the fact that while the names of two or three Catholics appear on the list of the National Committee, yet it knows of no Catholic missionaries, whether bishops, priests or sisters, who are among the distributors of the alms, although the Catholic Church has many representatives in Western Asia. If they are not included, the editor suggests, it is doubtless by accident rather than by design: "For it is altogether unbelievable that prejudice should at all prevail in circumstances so well calculated utterly to disarm it." It is certain moreover that nothing could be further from the wishes of the contributors, as he says, than that there should be any discrimination shown in the distribution of these alms. The following are some of the details regarding this work:

> The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief has already sent the magnificent sum of $4,000,000 to the suffering, starving people of Western Asia, in one section of which natives are reported to be dying at the rate of a thousand a day. In Lebanon alone there are said to be at least 50,000 helpless orphans, innocent victims of the great war. Cablegrams recently received from American consuls and missionaries in different places abroad prove the urgent necessity of continued help during the coming six months of winter. The Committee hopes to raise $30,000,000, in order to prevent widespread death by starvation and to provide support for the thousands of families and tens of thousands of individuals now largely dependent upon the charity of Americans. We feel sure it would quicken the generosity of our countrymen, Protestants and Catholics, Jews and Gentiles, to be assured that in the bestowal of their alms—sure to be forthcoming—scrupulous care will be taken to guard against any distinction of race or religion.
>
> Assurance is given by a member of the National Committee for this fund that one hundred cents of every dollar contributed is devoted to relief work and that no salaries are drawn from it, since all expenses are paid for privately. Auditors' statements are offered in proof. It is no less important that the same delicacy be shown in avoiding all discrimination. To have chosen a proportionate number of Catholic missionaries for distributors would doubtless have greatly facilitated this work.

The Report of the Holy Childhood

IN the lately issued summary of receipts for 1916, published by the Holy Childhood Association, France, in spite of all her sacrifices and hardships, is leading the list of contributions with $142,598. The United States is second with a total of $73,805, and Italy third with $69,804. The grand total of the receipts for the year is $397,158, as against $828,267 contributed in the year before the war. It is true that the Central Empires are not included in the present list, since their offerings could not be sent to the Central Office at Paris, although they have certainly not forgotten this important cause. In the year before the war the children of Germany led the world with a donation of $336,905. Yet the fact remains that the present sum at the disposal of the Association is far too small. Says the national director in the latest issue of the Annals of the Holy Childhood:

> A deficit of $431,109.00 tells its own tragic story of poverty, hardship, and suffering in the hundreds of missions supported by the funds of the Holy Childhood. Orphanages have been obliged to close their doors to the helpless waif; countless little ones have perished unbaptized; babes adopted by the missionaries have succumbed to the pangs of hunger; and who will tell the silent anguish and bitter heartaches of the missionary nuns and priests as they witness, without means to succor, the misery of these babes and the ruin of their fondest hopes!
>
> There are millions of abandoned pagan children in heathen countries to be saved, soul and body. Will not the charity of the children of our own land go out to them during the coming year? Shall the voice of the Vicar of Christ urging every child in the United States to become a member of the Holy Childhood be but a voice crying in the wilderness? Twelve cents a year from each child in our Catholic schools would mean a grand gift of $180,000 annually to the cause of Christ's little ones. Our receipts last year of slightly over $67,000, which included membership dues, special donations, bequests and Mass intentions, show how far we are from realizing the earnest wish of the Holy See.
>
> Children are asked by the director to interest their parents and friends in the special donation of five dollars that will "buy" a pagan child. They can thus become zealous apostles in their own homes. "Little saviors," Pope Pius X beautifully called the child members of the Holy Childhood Association.

The League of Daily Mass

HIS EMINENCE, Cardinal Farley, has chosen the present time as most suitable for the introduction of the League of Daily Mass into his archdiocese. "As the weeks go by we shall have an ever increasing number of soldiers engaged in dangerous foreign service," he writes, "and our people should be urged and encouraged to gather daily before the altar to pray to Almighty God for their safety, and for a speedy return of peace and concord among the nations." The League, he explains, is the outgrowth of the love and devotion which the people of Ireland cherished to the Blessed Sacrament during the days of persecution, and was intended to preserve the heritage of the Faith in their descendents. Beautifully he says:

> The Holy Mass is the very essence of religion. It is the sacrifice which Our Saviour Himself has given us, the priceless treasure which we offer in acknowledgment of God's omnipotence and our dependence upon Him. It is the pledge of our redemption; in it Our Blessed Saviour becomes incarnate, and is offered in expiation for the sins of His people, just as He offered Himself on Calvary. It is the most perfect means we have of supplicating God for the graces we need, and of thanking Him for the graces we have received.

In granting permission for the establishment of the League in the archdiocese of New York, the Holy Father wrote:

> Our Beloved Son, his Eminence John M. Farley, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, and by Apostolic concession and dispensation Archbishop of New York, has informed Us of his intention to establish in his archdiocese the League of Daily Mass, which, founded in Ireland, was recently endowed by Us from the Church's heavenly treasures. Ardently desiring to draw also the Faithful committed to his pastoral care to the practice of hearing Holy Mass daily, and in this manner to encourage them to receive Holy Communion more frequently, he has besought Us earnestly to grant to the association he has in mind to establish the same Plenary and Partial Indulgences with which the League in Ireland has been enriched. We are firmly convinced that this pious and religious League will produce splendid results.

The various indulgences granted are then enumerated. To emphasize the purely spiritual nature of the League Cardinal Farley expressly forbids that dues or contributions of any kind be requested from the members enrolled in it. As he rightly says, there are in every parish many who could attend Mass on week days, and who, with this added incentive, may be made to avail themselves of the great opportunity not only of attending Mass each day, but also of receiving daily their Divine Lord, according to the desire of the Church.

GTU Library
3 2400 00252 0769

THREE DAY.
T61
v.17

America

v.17
1917

THREE DAY.